pass into a law in the form in which it came from the Senate, sooner than delay or endanger its passage by the adoption of any amendment in this House. But the amendment adopted by the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union rendering its return to the Senate necessary, he was disposed, if the bill must be changed, to arrange the details of the distribution among the States according to the principles of justice and equality. To decide what justice and equality among the States required of us, he should assume the bill to mean what every gentleman here knows and understands its object and intent to be. He should consider it as a bill intended to get rid of the surplus in the Treasury, by making a gift of it to the States. Now, it would seem to be a very plain principle, that if we undertake in this way to divide out among the people of the United States their money, the distribution ought to be by the same rule and the same ratio by which you would collect this money from the people by taxation. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Virginia conforms to that rule. If the question now were whether we should raise this money by a tax on the people of the United States, instead of the question whether we shall distribute it among them, the representative population of the several States according to the last census would be the rule fixed by the constitution, by which we should be compelled to apportion the tax. This rule subjects a citizen of one State, whether that State be great or small, to precisely the same burden, and no more, than is imposed on a citizen of every other State. It is a rule uniform, equal, and universal in its application. Let us look for a moment into the practical operation of the rule which divides this money among the States according to their representation in the two Houses of Congress, and we shall see whether it goes on a principle of equality. Take two of the great sections of the country lying adjacent to each other—New England and New York: the former has thirty-eight Representatives on this floor, and the latter forty. But if you add the twelve Senators of New England to her thirty-eight Representatives, as this bill proposes, you will give to New England, if the sum to be distributed should be as large as it is generally believed it will be, something like six hundred thousand dollars more than New York will receive. And for the same number of people, they will receive in New England about five hundred thousand dollars more than the people of Pennsylvania, and about three hundred thousand more than the people of Ohio. As between these sections of country, the difference in favor of New England over New York is from twenty to five-and-twenty per cent.; over Pennsylvania, from seventeen to twenty; over Virginia, about fifteen; over Ohio, about twelve or thirteen; and over Kentucky, Tennessee, and North Carolina, from seven to ten per cent.

The gentlemen from New England appear to understand very well the advantage which this principle of distribution gives them, as is evinced by the fact of their coming up almost in a solid body in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to vote against the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Virginia. He did not state this as matter of accusation against them, or of complaint; but it certainly was a good reason why the large States should look to it, and protect themselves, so far as to get their proper proportion, and more than that they ought not to ask for. I have spoken of New England as a whole, taken collectively. Among the New England States, the interest of Massachusetts is in favor of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Virginia. In respect to the other five New England States, therefore, the advantage they get by the bill is much greater over the large States than the difference before stated. The gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. PEARCE] made a speech against changing this part of the bill. He thinks it very just as it is. When the last census of the United States was taken, no one here imagined that the ratio of representation would be fixed at less than fifty thousand. But it turned out that Rhode Island wanted a small fraction of a hundred thousand inhabitants. It was thought to be a hard case, as it truly was, to take from that State one of her two Representatives, and leave her with a single member and a large unrepresented portion of population. To save her from this misfortune, Congress, out of sheer sympathy for her case, reduced the ratio below fifty thousand, and fixed it at a number which gave her two members, and left her with one of the smallest, if not quite the least unrepresented fraction of any State in the Union. Now, when Rhode Island shall be permitted to count her two Representatives and her two Senators in the distribution, the result will be that the people of Rhode Island will receive from the Treasury, man for man, two dollars for one received by the people of Ohio; and indeed they will get something more than two to one, for Ohio has a large unrepresented fraction of near forty thousand.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if the proposition were to lay a tax on the people to raise the money we are about to divide out among them, and it should be proposed that a citizen of Rhode Island should be taxed twice as much as a citizen of Ohio or Pennsylvania, the gentleman from Rhode Island would probably very soon see the point of the argument, and feel the true value of the rule which he now thinks is a rule of justice. No good reason for this inequality of benefit under the bill can be given in favor of Rhode Island; and, on that account, the gentleman travels very far from home in search of an argument in justification of it. He tells us that the new States have, since the last census was taken, increased greatly in population, and the constitutional mode of distribution would, therefore, be a hardship upon them. That argument would not justify us in extending the principle beyond those States whose population had increased so as to call for its application. And that certainly is not the fact in respect to the small States of New England. As to the new States, they ought to remember that the laws which have produced the surplus in the Treasury were in full operation and produced this effect before most of this excess of population came to them, and while it was yet a portion of the population of the old States. The new States are all destined very soon to take rank among the large States. As the rule now adopted will be likely to be adhered to in similar cases hereafter, they, in the long run, have more to lose than to gain by the principles of the bill.

And here, Mr. Speaker, let me return again to the State of Ohio, and see what will be its operation there. In the first place, the State of Ohio has very greatly increased in population since the last census. While you propose to compensate the small States for their increase, the bill withholds a like compensation from Ohio. Here, then, is the first item of loss she suffers. In the next place, the land bill gave to Ohio, as well as to the other new States, ten per cent. on the nett amount of the sales of the public land. That item, which for the present year alone would be equal to two hundred thousand dollars, or near that sum, is also lost to the State under this bill. And last of all comes this inequality, arising from counting the Senators in the distribution, by which an equal number of people in the five New England States, exclusive of Massachusetts, will receive, in a division of twenty millions, full four hundred thousand dollars more than the people of Ohio.

For one, (Mr. V. said,) he did not see the justice of this; and he was not willing for it to be so. If the small States have an advantage over the large ones, in their greater relative representation in the Senate, (and it certainly is a very great advantage,) they ought to be satisfied with that; and least of all could it be adduced as any just reason why they should also have a pecuniary advantage over the people of the large States.

He hoped the growing prosperity of the country would from time to time give us other surpluses for division. It was therefore of importance that the principle of distribution should be properly adjusted at the present time. The rule would in future be regarded as established, and such, at least, would be the force of this precedent, that, if broken down at all hereafter, it could only be done by great effort, and would probably occasion a dissatisfaction that otherwise would never be felt. On raising money by duties and taxes, all the citizens of the United States are assessed alike, and by the same rule, whether they live in the large or small States. It is by this rule the money has been collected into the Treasury, and it is but a principle of the plainest justice on the part of the large States for them to require that this money should be divided out, dollar for dollar, and man for man, in every part of the Union. The large States ought not to demand more than their equal distributive share; less than that they ought, upon no consideration, to consent to receive.

Mr. LANE made an earnest and warm reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio last up, and contended that, even upon the Senate's plan of distribution, the States of Illinois, Indiana, and Missouri, would lose much of the proper proportion of the surplus due to their greatly increasing population.

Mr. MERCER signified an intention to move to amend by allowing the new States ten per cent. in addition to their distributive share.

Mr. MANN, of New York, offered the following, as an amendment to the amendment of Mr. MERCER:

"And the respective shares of such deposit with the States of Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama, Missouri, Illinois, and Indiana, shall be increased, respectively, ten per cent., in consideration of the increase of their respective population since the taking of said census; and in apportioning such deposits to the new States of Michigan and Arkansas, their federal numbers shall be taken and deemed to be sixty thousand persons."

Mr. MERCER accepted this as a modification, but subsequently withdrew it.

Mr. LEWIS thanked the gentleman from New York for his amendment; but, though it rendered the bill better for the new States, he warned gentlemen that they would lose the bill if they undertook greatly to amend it. He believed that the mode of distribution adopted was as fair as any that could be devised; and, even if Rhode Island and Delaware gained a little by it, it was but a small objection.

Mr. ADAMS said that the bill, as it stood, was, he believed, as fair as any that could be adopted by the House.

Mr. ASHLEY was, he said, in favor of sticking to the bill as it stood.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, expressed the same sentiment.

The question was taken by yeas and nays on the motion to amend, offered by Mr. MERCER, and decided in the negative: Yeas 88, nays 119, as follows:

Mr. LOVE called for the yeas and nays on the amendment of the Committee of the Whole, which was the substitute for the thirteenth section; which were ordered.

At the suggestion of Messrs. MORRIS and R. GARLAND, the House concurred in several verbal amendments to the amendment.

Mr. PARKS then rose and addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Speaker: I am well aware of the determination of this House to pass the bill now before us, of its anxiety to do so immediately, and its unwillingness to listen to any remarks upon the subject. But, sir, as I intend to vote against this bill, whether amended as proposed or not, it is a duty I owe to myself as well as to my constituents to give, in a very succinct manner, some of the reasons which impel me to do so. I am well aware, sir, that I have no right to expect the attention of this House, indisposed as it is to listen to gentlemen far more able than myself, from any power of arguments that I can offer, or from ingenuity of arrangement, or any eloquence of manner with which I can enforce them; I can only hope for it, sir, from that kind courtesy which this House is ever willing to extend to one who seldom obtrudes his views upon them, and never long.

And, sir, in the first place, I beg leave to extend my thanks to the honorable gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VINTON] for the frankness with which he has spoken of this bill by what I conceive ought to be its title. In his remarks he observed he would speak of it "as every body here understands it," "as a donation to the States." That it is so, in truth and reality, is one of the reasons why I shall vote against it.

Sir, I deny the right of this Federal Government to raise money from the people, either by taxation or otherwise to be distributed among and given to the several States of this Union. I ask any one to lay his hand on the constitution, and point out this power—you will look in vain for it. Sir, it is not in the book, nor do I know that any one pretends that it exists. Gentlemen say, however, that by the operation of this bill and the amendment about to be adopted, no such thing as a donation to the States takes place, but that the treasuries of the several States

Public Deposits.

are merely made depositories for the safe keeping, of the public moneys, in the same manner that certain local banks now are. This, sir, would be true, provided that it was intended or expected that the treasuries of the several States should ever be called upon to repay this money. Sir, every one within the hearing of my voice knows that such is not the expectation of a single member of this House who will vote for the bill, however different the final result may be. Do we not all know, if the present feeling of this House should be transmitted to future Congresses, that the first movement of the Secretary of the Treasury to call back a single cent of this misallotted deposit would be promptly prohibited by a large majority of both Houses of Congress? Can any man doubt that this would be the result? Let us, sir, look back to the days of the confederation, and remember with what difficulty money sufficient to support the Government of the then existing Congress was obtained from the States. When the requisitions were made, some would complain that their share of the general fund to be raised was too much; others would plead poverty, and agree to pay a part; others asked for time; and some, I believe, refused to pay at all. I believe, sir, that to this very day large sums of money are due, and unpaid, of the sums called for by the continental Congress; and what, sir, are we now about to do, but to resort to that very system, in theory, to avoid the evils of which the constitution of the United States was formed? Sir, in my view of the case, it would be better, when we have too much money on hand, to reduce the tariff, to relieve the hard-working people of this country from taxation, than thus to distribute it to the several States, to be expended by their Legislatures: a measure which I believe will be, like Pandora's box, but the mother of evils.

Mr. Speaker, a growing spirit of extravagance and speculation is pervading our whole country. Every man is seeking to live in some other manner than by the honest labor of his own hands. This spirit of speculation, if report speaks truly, has made rapid progress within these walls. The moment this money shall have been distributed, this spirit will fly to the council chambers of every State, and their legislative halls will exhibit such scenes of strife and contest as to who and what sections of the States shall obtain most of the public plunder, wrung, every cent of it, in some way or other, from the producing portions of the community, as I, for one, dread to look upon. But further, sir: the natural consequence and tendency of all this is to corrupt the people themselves. Its tendency will be to induce thousands to quit their happy, peaceful, and prosperous, though laborious avocations, to live and gorge on public plunder. If corruption heretofore has existed in high places, it has been confined to high places, and the people of the country have ever had the power, as they have always heretofore had the disposition, when discovered, to expel it. We ought always, sir, to remember that the truest maxim in political economy is to take no more money from the pockets of the people than is absolutely necessary for a safe and healthy administration of the General Government. By this bill, not content with overlooking that maxim ourselves, we are about to tempt every State Government to do the same. This large sum of money thus suddenly thrown into the treasuries of the States, to be disposed of by their Legislatures, will induce them to commence great and expensive works of internal improvement, which, when this money is exhausted, will be left in an incomplete and unfinished state, and heavy direct taxes will have to be laid upon the people of the several States to complete them, or they will apply to Congress for more money through their representatives.

Sir, the Treasury of the Union may not always be in as plethoric a state as it is now; and how, sir, will the deficiency be supplied? By an increase of the tariff, sir, the tariff! And are the people of Maine prepared for this? Are the constituents of gentlemen from the South prepared for this? And to this complexion, if this system goes on, we must come at last. As I have before observed, many of the State Legislatures will be encouraged to launch forth upon internal improvements, which they will want money to complete; having got the taste of the public blood, they will not be satisfied with the first debauch; they will clamor for more; and the moment they find the public Treasury exhausted, they will demand that it shall be replenished from the pockets of the people by an increase of the tariff of duties, and in this they will be most willingly aided by the representatives of our venerable mother, Massachusetts, and by every manufacturer in this country. Do the gentlemen from South Carolina flatter themselves that their boasted compromise will save them? Let me tell those gentlemen that they will find it but a rope of sand, broken by the first blow of self-interest, and that blow given as soon as she will dare to do it.

In this manner, sir, taxes will be raised from the people by the Congress of the United States, to be expended under the direction of the State Legislatures, which those Legislatures would, under no circumstances, dare to raise themselves.

Having said thus much, Mr. Speaker, as to the operation of this bill upon the Union generally, permit me, sir, to make a few remarks upon the effect it will produce upon my own State, and the seaboard and commercial States.

Maine, a part of which I have the honor to represent, is from necessity an extensive commercial State. The coldness of her climate, the great abundance of her ship timber, and the sterility of her soil upon her seacoast, compel her to be so; and well has she fulfilled her destiny. Though among the smaller States of this Union, she has for many years been the third State in the Union as an owner of tonnage. Her canvass whitens every sea, her ships are borne onward by every breeze. We are, moreover, from our local situation, more exposed in our persons and property to the contingencies of war than any of the other States of the Union.

We are united to the rest of the Union but by a line of one hundred and thirty miles in extent, while we have a frontier on the British provinces of Lower Canada and New Brunswick, and on the ocean, of more than a thousand miles. As a member of the Union, thus remotely situated, and dangerously exposed, and thinly populated, but with more good harbors than in any State of the Union, I might almost say than in the whole Union besides, it might naturally have been expected that she would have been most especially the subject of the protection and regard of the General Government. How has it been? Let any member on this floor pass along our seaboard and our frontier, and his cheeks would mantle with shame at her neglected and exposed situation. There is not a city, a town, or a village, upon any part of her coast or rivers, but might be laid in ashes by the very smallest vessel of war that floats on the ocean. She seems to have been accepted as a member of the Union but to be insulted, abused, and neglected. Does a foreign enemy take possession of a part of the State, you quietly permit them to remain there till the war is over. Do you want to make a peace with a foreign Power with whom you are at war, you quietly cede to her a portion of our territory, under pretence that the line is in dispute, when that same Power, during the same negotiations, had demanded a cession of that very territory; thus acknowledging our title as we claimed it, and indeed as they had marked it upon every map of their adjacent provinces they had ever made. Our commerce is trammelled by an odious and oppressive tariff, and our whole seacoast, the most extensive, I believe, of any State in the Union, is left without protection or defence. Truly may I say, sir, we seem to have been received into the Union only to be derided and oppressed.

H. OF R.]

Public Deposites.

And what, sir, is to be our situation under the new state of things to commence with the passage of this bill? One evil, as I think I have fully demonstrated, is an eventual increase of the tariff, which will lay the axe at the root of the tree of our prosperity. Our navy, too, to which we might have looked for some protection in time of war, will no longer be increased. Our fortifications are to be stopped, or rather, as far as regards my own State, not commenced. At the very moment when, for the first time, we had engaged the attention of Congress, and when a bill providing for our defence had already passed the Senate, then comes this biting, chilling frost, and freezes up our hopes. But a few days since I was flattering myself with being able to return to the city of my home, and say to my fellow-citizens, you are no longer overlooked or neglected by the General Government: a bill has passed for your defence and protection; but, sir, I no longer cherish such delusive hopes. No one who was present when the news came to this House that this bill had passed another body in the other end of this Capitol, (the Senate,) and witnessed the effect produced upon members here, can doubt the result.

Sir, it is well known that there is a settled determination, on the part of a great majority of the members west of the Alleghany mountains, to grant no more money for the defence of the Atlantic frontier, either by the navy or by fortifications. Settled in the fertile valleys of the Ohio and Mississippi, with every blessing about them which heaven can bestow, they apparently care but little for the safety and protection of their brethren upon the rocky and sterile seaboard, knowing full well that the war-cry of the enemy can never reach their ears, until the whole country east of the mountains shall have been covered and fertilized by the blood and bodies of their countrymen. And this, sir, is to be done for the sake of sharing among the States the money which ought to have been applied to far more noble and generous purposes. How far this is the spirit of patriotism, let the people judge. I hope, sir, I shall prove to have been mistaken in my expectations; experience alone can teach me that I am so.

I confess, sir, that I have been astounded, utterly astonished, that any one can be the advocate of or vote for this bill. I impeach the motives of none who differ from me in this matter. Their reasons for the course they take are good ones, probably, but I cannot imagine them. In Maine, at least, we have nothing to gain, but every thing to lose; our commerce probably to be eventually destroyed by an increasing tariff; our whole coast and frontier left without defence; the navy of our country, which might have protected our ships at sea, to be neglected and suffered to decay, and this, too, when we know it to be inferior to that of any third-rate Power in Europe. Sir, it cannot be forgotten, it was during this very session, but a few months since, when a war was feared with France, that it was declared over and over again, and contradicted by no one, that our navy was wholly unprepared to cope with that of France; and now national honor, national safety, the very first duties and obligations of this Government, the protection and defence of its citizens, are to give way, to be sacrificed to the base, grovelling love of money, and are to remain so sacrificed, until this ruinous, corrupting, and degrading system shall be abandoned. I hope, sir, and I but hope, that that may be soon the case; and if it ever be so, God grant that it may be so forever.

Mr. Speaker, I thank the House for the attention with which it has listened to me. I am well aware that I have probably not affected a single vote, but I have justified myself, I trust, to this House and to my constituents. At any rate, Mr. Speaker, I have a higher gratification than either can be to me. I have the consciousness that I am acting right; nor do I believe that there will be any act of my political life which, in after times, I shall reflect on with more pleasure than upon the vote I am now about to give.

Mr. GILLET then moved to amend the amendment by inserting, after the words "five millions of dollars," the words "over and above all unexpended balances of appropriations."

Mr. G. said he rose to offer an amendment in which he hoped to have the concurrence of the House. It was one which had not been discussed since we commenced the consideration of this bill. He well knew the impatience of the House, and its desire to close its action, as speedily as possible, on this interesting bill; and nothing but an imperious sense of duty induced him, at this late hour, even to offer an amendment. He must ask the attention of the House to a short explanation of the amendment. He proposed to insert after the words "five millions of dollars," in the commencement of the amended section, the words "over and above all unexpended appropriations." The object, it would be perceived, was to leave in the Treasury the unexpended appropriations, and also to keep five millions on hand to meet any sudden demand for money. If his memory served him rightly, when our sinking fund system was established, it was then esteemed good policy to keep in the Treasury a very considerable amount of money over and above the unexpended appropriations. It was then deemed important and proper to retain on hand, under the control of the executive branch of the Government, all the appropriated money, which, by virtue of law, became substantially pledged to meet those appropriations. If it was good policy then, it must be so now. He thought the honor and prosperity of the country, and the public service, required us to retain in the Treasury all the moneys which public considerations required us to appropriate. If such moneys are withdrawn from the ordinary depositories, it may occur that these appropriations may be wanted when no money can be controlled by the Treasury Department to meet them. Ought we to trust to any possible contingencies on this subject, when the action of the legislative branches of the Government has set apart certain portions of our treasure for public purposes? He believed there were now over five millions of dollars in the Treasury, being unexpended balances of the last year's appropriations. This sum is liable to be drawn for, at any time, when the proper evidences are furnished at the Department to entitle those rendering service to receive it. A much larger amount remained unexpended on the 1st of January last. It probably amounted to more than twice that sum, but he could not state the sum from memory.

The amount of appropriations this year had been larger than during the preceding one. We have now actually appropriated, including former unexpended appropriations, upwards of thirty millions of dollars; and including what we are bound to pay under recent treaty stipulations, for which appropriations will doubtless be made, the appropriations will amount to upwards of thirty-seven millions of dollars. We also have before us bills making appropriations for the erection of a Treasury building, for the erection of light-houses and the improvements of harbors, for old Indian annuities, for continuing the Cumberland road, for marine hospitals, for paying to French and Neapolitan claimants what will be coming to them under treaties of indemnities, and various other bills appropriating money, in all amounting to some twelve or fifteen millions of dollars. Very many of these bills will doubtless pass. The sums contained in them, added to those he had just enumerated, amounted to between forty and fifty millions of dollars. Now, he would ask, how much of these appropriations would be actually drawn out of the Treasury by the 1st day of January next? Deduct these sums from the whole amount which would then be in the Treasury, and it had been questioned whether any thing would remain to be placed in the new depositories. It was highly probable that the only money then in the Treasury would be what had been duly appropriated by law. Certainly there could not be a large sum without including this money. It was highly probable that, of the appropriated money, some twenty millions or more would remain in the Treasury at the end of this year. But the Treasury might any day be called on for the balance of these appropriations. We were about to leave in it only five millions of dollars to meet this large sum. He would ask if it was true policy to place ourselves in this situation? Was it policy to hazard any thing on this point? He thought it true policy not to be without ample means to meet our engagements, and hoped that so fatal a policy as that proposed would not be entered upon. We were now actually engaged in extensive Indian wars, and he feared the torch of war would light up the whole Indian region. We should doubtless have calls for all appropriations which we had and should make. He thought the calls for money on account of these wars would be very great during the fore part of the coming year. The revenue of the next year might not exceed the current expenses of that year. Was it wise to charge the revenue of that year with not only its own expenses, but also with a very considerable portion of those actually incurred in this? It appeared to him to be quite certain that the five millions proposed to be left in the deposit banks would not meet the outstanding claims arising this year. He would ask, how are these to be met?

Public Deposites.

He was told that all the money, over and above the five millions, would be in the new depositories, subject to be drawn to meet any deficiency that might occur in the Treasury. Should the State treasuries become the agents of the General Government, and receive this, whatever should then be on hand beyond the five millions, he hoped they would honor all drafts made upon them, like other faithful agents. But was the House aware that, under the provisions of this section, it was but a trifling sum that could be drawn per month? Only about one million per quarter could be drawn. This would not meet the outstanding appropriations, as fast as they would be called for. It would take many years to draw from these new depositories the sum of twenty millions of dollars. The money thus deposited cannot be relied upon to meet these appropriations or any other considerable call upon the Treasury. He then submitted to the consideration of the House the propriety of adopting his amendment, and retaining in the Treasury a sufficient sum, at all times at command of the Treasury Department, to meet all our engagements in a prompt manner. He would ask, what objection there could be to leaving these sums in the Treasury?

Under this bill there was a provision requiring the deposit banks to pay two per cent. interest when they had a certain amount of public money in their vaults. If a considerable sum were left with them they must pay interest, which had heretofore been considered, by many, as very right and proper; but these new depositories were not required to pay interest at all. He then would ask, if the section now under consideration made the State treasuries merely depositories, in the ordinary sense of that term, what peculiar advantage was to be derived to any body, in giving the State treasuries a preference over the other depositories? He could not imagine any, except that it might be presumed that there was greater safety in the former than in the latter. He could not imagine any other reason for this preference, unless it was true that this section was to be considered as actually making a distribution, not to be returned, of all that should be found in the Treasury on the 1st of January beyond five millions. Was it really a distribution bill? Has this been avowed? He would ask in what part of the constitution was the power to be found which authorized Congress to distribute? If there is any authority for this bill, it must be under the incidental power to take care of and keep the public money. Then, if both the present and the proposed depositories are to be merely depositories of the public money, why should there be any particular anxiety to give the one a preference over the other, so as to place the appropriations beyond our reach when we wish to use them? He knew the House were desirous of acting, and he would not extend his remarks further at the present time. He had said all that he deemed necessary to enable the House to understand why he wished his amendment adopted. He might hereafter, if an opportunity was allowed him, go into a discussion of the main question; but it was not perhaps proper now to go beyond the consideration of the amendment he had offered. He hoped the House would adopt it.

Mr. HAMER called for the yeas and nays on the amendment of Mr. GILLET; but the House refused to order them, and the amendment to the amendment was then negatived.

The question was then taken on the amendment of the Committee of the Whole, which was the substitute for the 13th section, and decided in the affirmative: Yeas 142, nays 66, as follows:

Thomas, Vinton, Webster, Elisha Whittlesey, Lewis Williams, Sherrod Williams, Wise—66.

Mr. HAWES then moved the previous question; which was seconded by the House: Yeas 87, nays 72.

Mr. RENCHER called for the yeas and nays on ordering the main question; which were not ordered.

Mr. HOPKINS moved to reconsider the vote by which the previous question was seconded; which motion was decided in the negative: Yeas 88, nays 93.

The main question was then ordered to be put without a division.

Mr. PIERCE, of New Hampshire, moved that the House adjourn. Lost.

Mr. GRANGER called for the yeas and nays on the main question, (being on ordering the bill and amendments to be engrossed;) which were ordered, and were: Yeas 163, nays 44, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. John Q. Adams C. Allan, H. Allen, Anthony, Ashley, Bailey, Bell, Bockee, Bond, Boon, Borden, Boyd, Briggs, Buchanan, Bunch, Bynum, John Calhoun, W. B. Calhoun, Carr, Carter, Casey, J. So the bill was passed.

The House then adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 22.

HARBOR BILL.

The House proceeded to the execution of the special order, and went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. LINCOLN in the chair,) and took up the "bill making additional appropriations for the Delaware breakwater, and for certain harbors, and removing obstructions in and at the mouths of certain rivers, and for other purposes, for 1836."

The bill, having been read, was taken up by sections.

Mr. SMITH entered into a succinct explanation in relation to the first clause, appropriating $100,000 for continuing the Delaware breakwater, and gave some reasons why the item should be increased, though he himself did not design to make a motion to that effect.

Mr. HARPER then moved to increase the item to $120,000. Lost.

Mr. HAWES moved to strike out the following clause:

"For continuing the improvement of the navigation of the Hudson river, above and below Albany, in the State of New York, two hundred thousand dollars, to be expended according to the plan and estimates recommended by the Secretary of War."

Mr. H. said, when the first appropriation was made, it was distinctly asserted that the whole cost would not exceed, at the most, $70,000, though Mr. H. said, at the time, that it would be but an entering wedge for larger calls upon the Government. He was, further, convinced that the Hudson river, at this point, did not come within the principles of the rule by which the Federal Government was authorized to expend the public money for works of internal improvement.

Mr. PEARCE, of Rhode Island, supported the clause, and went on to show that the work in question was purely of a national character.

After some remarks from Messrs. MERCER, EVANS, SMITH, and VANDERPOEL,

Mr. HUNT said he did not rise at this period of the session to detain the committee with a speech, but to submit to them a plain, unvarnished statement of facts in reference to the appropriation asked for in the bill under consideration. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Hawes] has based his proposition to strike out the appropriation upon two grounds: First, that the Hudson river lies wholly within the jurisdiction of the State of New York; and, secondly, that the sum required is an entire surprise on the House, and far greater than was ever contemplated by Congress in passing the act of 1834, based upon the survey of Colonel Clinton in 1832. In attempting to answer these objections, I am fully aware of being obnoxious to the charge that I am a son of New York, and one of her representatives upon this floor. The argument (if such it may be called) has more than once been urged during the present session, that New York has forty members in this House—a sixth part of the entire representation. Sir, I deprecate all appeals of this kind, and stop not to answer them, but proceed at once to the objections.

Is, then, the Hudson river the property of the State of New York, in the sense urged by the gentleman from Kentucky? That river, sir, is an arm of the sea, a great highway, not only for this country, but for nations. Your highest judicial tribunal, in the celebrated steamboat controversy, years ago settled this point. Nor is New York alone interested in improving this highway. The great and fertile States of the far West, those bordering upon your inland seas, (called lakes,) and the provinces of a foreign Power, have a deep stake in this matter. Sir, I state, from information derived from sources upon which I fully rely, that the annual tonnage floating upon the Hudson river is 987,500; that the flourishing villages and cities of Waterford, Lansingburg, Troy, and Albany, employ 150 vessels; that from Troy and Albany are sent forth 60 tow boats; that the value of the property transported in these vessels varies from $20 to $1,000 per ton. Lumber may be valued at $20; wheat and flour at $65, and dry goods at $1,000. Before the completion of those splendid works of internal improvement originally projected by a statesman of my own State, and carried through by our own unaided resources, it cost six dollars to transport a hundred weight of goods from Albany to Buffalo; it now costs sixty cents; to which add the tolls, forty cents, and you have a cost of one dollar per hundred weight. Sir, look back to the war of 1812, to the enormous expense incurred by the General Government for transportation of munitions along this very line, and then say to me, if you can, that the nation has no interest in protecting this great thoroughfare.

Again, sir, I say that 300,000 persons annually pass up and down the Hudson river. How readily would these passengers submit (were it admissible) to a tax of 66¢ cents, to raise the $200,000 asked for, rather than undergo the daily and hourly interruptions in travel and business to which they are now necessarily subjected.

Now, sir, as to the second objection. It is true it will cost more to remove the obstructions effectually in the Hudson than was estimated by Colonel Clinton. But, sir, the plan of operations is the same, in substance, as that suggested by him. And it is due to the Department to say that the estimates of Colonel Clinton, as to costs, never received its sanction. The attention of Congress was called to the subject of improving this river in the report from the engineer department, under date of the 1st of November, 1834, and again under date of the 15th of November, 1835. And the various plans of improvement, with the cost, are again distinctly stated by the Secretary of War, in his communication to this House, under date of the 13th of April, 1836. Sir, scientific men have differed as to the best mode of effecting a most desirable object. Your Clintons and Genets gave their powerful minds to this interesting inquiry. By many a canal of larger dimensions has been warmly advocated; whilst others have preferred a different plan, as less expensive, and equally serviceable. According to the report in 1834, the estimated cost of the improvement upon what is designated as

The first plan is	-	-	$819,634 10
The second plan is	-	-	671,134 11
The third plan is	-	-	522,634 11

With these facts before us, with what propriety can it be said that Congress made the original appropriation in 1834, upon the express condition that the work was to cost but $220,000?

The $70,000 appropriated in 1834 was expended in 1835, after the plans of Colonel Clinton had been supervised by the proper authorities; and I have before me the authority of the head of the engineer department for saying that the work of last season has answered the expectations and hopes of its most sanguine friends.

The simple question then is, shall we abandon this great national work, after having expended $70,000; or shall we, with a liberal and enlightened policy, proceed in the work of its completion? Sir, I will not for a moment doubt the response which this committee will, by their vote, give to this question.

Mr. VANDERPOEL said that though it was his misfortune to belong to the State of New York, (for misfortune indeed it seemed to be in relation to appropriations,) yet, in regard to this appropriation, he could safely say that he was entirely disinterested. Nay, he could go a step further, and avow that if he had any direct interest, (for the interest of his constituents was his interest,) it was against the passage of the item of appropriation now under consideration. The whole of his district was below those portions of the river which were proposed to be improved by the appropriation under consideration. There were also in his district towns whose interest might be said, in some measure, to clash with the interest of Troy and Albany, whose prosperity, instead of being crippled, would be enhanced by impassable obstructions in those parts of the Hudson for which the proposed appropriation was designed. Still, he could not, with the knowledge he possessed of the justice and necessity of making the appropriation, refuse to give it his most ardent support.

The honorable gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Hawes] has told the committee that the attempt to get this additional sum of two hundred thousand dollars, was a violation of the understanding which was had here two years ago, when the original sum of seventy thousand dollars was appropriated. For his part, he (Mr. V.) had no recollection of any such promise or pledge. Though he was silent on that occasion, he took a very lively interest in every thing that transpired relative to that appropriation; and had any such promise or pledge been given, he would most probably have remembered it. He flattered himself that he could show most satisfactorily that his friend from Kentucky was entirely mistaken in the idea that there ever was an understanding or promise that the sum of seventy thousand dollars was all that would ever be required or asked for. This supposition was entirely inconsistent with the record. The very phraseology of the act of 1834 virtually and most effectually contradicted it. That act provides that the sum of seventy thousand dollars be appropriated "towards" the improvement of the Hudson river, "according to the plan reported by the War Department in 1832." Now, unless the honorable gentleman could show that the estimate of this plan, to which the act referred, did not exceed the sum of seventy thousand dollars, then he could not surely succeed in showing that Congress, when it passed the act of 1834, intended to limit the expenditure for this object to the sum then appropriated. The plan of the War Department, to which the act refers, was to all intents and purposes part of the act. It adopts the plan, and commits the Government to such expenditures as shall be necessary to carry it into execution. Gentlemen need only refer to the documents of 1832 to be convinced that the plan referred to in the act of 1834 was not satisfied by the appropriation of that year; and it therefore irresistibly resulted that his honorable friend, in the supposition that we were violating any pledge in asking for this appropriation, was entirely mistaken.

Another objection had been urged to this appropriation by the gentleman from Maine, [MR. EVANS.] He says that it does not come from the right committee; that, so far as it regards any portion of the river except the "overslaugh," it was a new work, and therefore the Committee on Commerce, and not the Committee of Ways and Means, ought to have taken cognizance of the subject. In this point he (Mr. V.) was very confident that his honorable friend from Maine was also entirely mistaken. Let him look at the plan of 1832, to which the act of 1834 refers, and upon which it is founded, and he will find that it contains detailed estimates of the expense of clearing out not only the overslaugh, but also the obstructions between Albany and Troy.

He fancied that his friend from Maine adhered now with so much tenacity to the "overslaugh," on account of some reminiscences and associations of a political character. The members of that party to which the honorable gentleman belonged had secured to it a most extended and immortal fame. They had chanted its horrors, and the sin of a distinguished Senator, who had voted against an appropriation to clear it out, because it was in bad company, both in prose and in poetry. They had honored it with a cognomen of which it might well be proud. "Marcy's farm," and Marcy's "INEXPRESSIBLES," formed a political stock by means of which that party to which it was the pride of his friend to belong hoped to revolutionize the empire State. They were talismanic words by which alone thousands were to be lured to the standard of bank whiggery; and it was not, therefore, surprising that they should have made so indelible an impression upon the mind of the honorable gentleman from Maine, as to have induced the oblivion of every other locality in or about the Hudson. He would tell his honorable friend that there were most assuredly other obstructions in the river besides the farm of Governor Marcy; obstructions, too, which this Government, by the act of 1834, stands pledged to remove.

The gentleman from Kentucky [MR. HAWES] cannot see why this river should receive the care and munificence of this Government in preference to hundreds of other streams that he could mention. Let the gentleman return home by the way of Albany, the Erie canal, and the lakes, and then he will be prepared to answer this question without further aid. Is it for New York alone that this appropriation is asked? No, sir. It is for that immense and rapidly growing West, whose abundant productions flow down the Hudson to your great commercial emporium. If it be possible for the mind to conceive a work which is national, in contradistinction to one that is local, this is emphatically that work. Ohio, Michigan, Wisconsin, Illinois, Indiana, Kentucky, are all directly interested in the improvement contemplated by the proposition now under consideration. The North river is the great thoroughfare for the Western world; and tell me not that this work is to be assimilated to a plan of improving some little stream or rivulet, by means of which an extent of country of only forty, fifty, or even an hundred miles is to be benefited. The inconveniences to which the constituents of many Western gentlemen are exposed, by means of the obstructions in the Hudson below Albany, are well worthy of their serious consideration. There are many gentlemen here, who have beheld no less than twenty or thirty, perhaps forty, vessels lying at one time on the overslaugh. A merchant from Ohio or Chicago purchases his goods in New York, and makes his calculation to expose them for sale in his store in a given number of days after he ships them at the place of purchase. The vessel containing them is grounded in the Hudson, and detained there until an extraordinary tide floats her again; and by this means all the sanguine hopes of your Western merchants are frequently frustrated—all their confident calculations are constantly baffled. Are these not evils that will merit the attention of the representatives of this great nation?

Nor, sir, is the West alone interested in the improvement of this great arm of the sea. The East, and most particularly the constituents of the honorable gentleman from Maine, [MR. EVANS,] have a deep interest in the matter. The North river is literally whitened, at particular seasons of the year, with the sails of Eastern vessels, who carry on with Albany and Troy a most profitable trade and barter. They exchange the treasures which their enterprise draws from the deep, for the corn and bread stuffs that descend the great canals of New York. "Easternmen," as they are termed in nautical parlance, are every-day objects on the bosom of the Hudson; and let me tell my friend from Maine, that, with all the "cuteness" of the Yankee nation, they cannot escape the bars and shoals of the overslaugh. They are pretty sure to get aground; and should some of them hereafter be doomed to the annoyance and vexation of a week's detention there, they will not be apt to recur with much complacency to those scruples which deterred the representatives of the people from contributing enough of our overflowing Treasury to remove this annoying impediment in one of the great arteries of the nation.

MR. V. said that no gentleman could fairly pretend that this was not a national work. The commerce of this river is second in magnitude and importance only to the Mississippi. No other river in the confederacy could come near competing with it. It is an arm of the sea, and at the very point where obstructions are proposed to be removed, the tide ebbs and flows. This Government has extended its custom-house laws and regulations over it, and established ports of delivery both at Albany and Troy. Every vessel that navigates it—every vessel at least that has capacity enough to be grounded on the bars which are proposed to be removed—sails under your license, and pays your exactions for this privilege. Will you, then, exercise jurisdiction over it; will you draw revenue from those who float upon its waters, and yet do nothing towards improving it? Give us the license money, the custom-house fees, which all the vessels that have been detained by these obstructions have paid you, and, my word for it, we would have enough to remove all impediments and difficulties. He would put it to honorable gentlemen, no matter how far their constitutional objections to internal improvements extended, was not this river worthy of the care, the aid, and the patronage, of this Government? A river up which nearly or quite one fourth of the imports of this country ascends to the points of their consumption, and down which at least one fourth of the surplus agricultural productions of the nation flows. Does not this gigantic and all-important arm of the sea, from which you directly and indirectly derive such formidable revenues—over whose navigation you exercise control—does not such a river urge an irresistible claim to your care, your patronage, and even munificence? He had no doubt that the vote about to be given would show, that while a majority of this House appreciated its importance, they would yield to its most just and reasonable claims.

MR. CARTER moved to amend the clause by appropriating the sum of $100,000 "to continue the improvement commenced at the Muscle Shoals, by the Government of the United States, in the State of Alabama, up the Tennessee and Holston rivers to Kingsport, in Tennessee."

Mr. DUNLAP said: Mr. Chairman, I shall vote for the amendment of my colleague; not that I believe Congress has the power to appropriate money for any such purposes; but, on the contrary, I am well satisfied that whenever they make appropriations to any such object, it is a usurpation of power on their part. I vote for the amendment alone on the principle that the object for which it is intended to be appropriated is more national than many that are included in the bill. The rivers intended to be improved by the appropriation included in my colleague's amendment run through an extent of country of from twelve to fifteen hundred miles, and in a section of this Union where they never have had any of the public treasure spent in the improvement of their rivers. There is no country that needs the navigation of her rivers improved more than East Tennessee. It is one of the healthiest countries on this continent. The soil is productive. It is settled by the most industrious citizens, and they always have a superabundance of every article of agriculture for market; and all they want, to be the wealthiest and happiest people living in any country, is the navigation of their beautiful rivers improved, so as to afford them greater facilities in taking their surplus produce to market. Notwithstanding, Mr. Chairman, their great want of money to improve the navigation of their rivers, none has ever been spent there by the Federal Government, although millions have been spent in other sections of this Union on rivers less entitled to the notice of the Government. And why has it not been done? Because, sir, Tennessee has sent her sons here as her representatives, who entertained the opinion that it was a violation of the constitution of their country to have money appropriated by the Federal Government for internal improvement in the States; and her proud representatives never asked that the constitution of their country should be violated for the benefit of their constituents: their constituents entertained the same opinion as their representatives, and never required such a thing of them.

But, sir, there are gentlemen who believe Congress have the power to appropriate money for such purposes; and to their votes I object not; I only ask them not to take all the money, and not to let sectional feelings govern their votes; to vote money to improve a river west of the mountains, if they would vote for the improvement of the same river if it lay east of them. I desire that this amendment should be incorporated into the bill, and when on its passage, I shall vote against the bill; but if it is to pass, let those gentlemen who vote for their own rivers, also vote for ours.

Mr. Chairman, I had hoped, after the passage of the deposit bill yesterday, the operation of which is to distribute among the States equally the surplus revenue, that gentlemen on this floor would agree to take their equal part of the money, and be satisfied to let their States appropriate the money thus received to objects of internal improvement within their respective limits; but, sir, it seems that gentlemen are not content to receive their equal proportion of the public revenue, but desire to have all their improvements made out of the common fund before the division takes place. I, for one, am unwilling to give one cent of what is coming to my State to any of the gentlemen, to improve their rivers. Although, sir, I claim no credit in getting the division of the money among the States, (not having voted for the bill, being confined to my room with a burning fever all yesterday,) I will insist on gentlemen making good their arguments on the deposit bill, that when too much money has been collected by a Government of the people, it is but justice that it should be paid back to them.

Now, what more equitable mode is there of paying it back than making an equal distribution to the States? There appears to me to be none. If this bill should pass, there will be manifest injustice done the States; but, sir, I believe the practice is to include just enough rivers to make a majority of votes for the bill, and then its friends vote out all amendments, and pass the bill. I hope the vote on this amendment and the bill will show that that practice has been abandoned, as unworthy of statesmen.

Mr. Chairman, there are other objections to this bill. I will mention one only; the sum of two hundred thousand dollars intended to be appropriated by this bill for the improvement of the Hudson river, is to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, according to the estimates of the engineer department reported to the present session of Congress. Now, sir, according to those estimates, the work is to cost upwards of eight hundred thousand dollars; then the person superintending the work must make the improvements so as to cost this eight hundred thousand dollars, without regard to its necessity or utility.

On looking into the estimates of last year, we find the engineer then estimated the whole improvement necessary on said river to cost two hundred and twelve thousand dollars; and the bill passed at that time, appropriating seventy thousand dollars for the improvement of the navigation of Hudson river, directed the money to be expended according to the estimates then furnished this House; and every gentleman had a right to expect, from the report of the engineer at that time, we never would be called on for more than the two hundred and twelve thousand dollars to complete the improvement of the river. But, sir, to our astonishment, in one short year the estimates have increased upwards of six hundred thousand dollars for this one object; and we are now gravely asked, by the chairman of the committee who reported the bill, if we are going to throw away the seventy thousand dollars heretofore spent in the improvement of said river, or will we go on with the work and complete it? We are told that this is not the time to object to the expediency of the measure; that question has been settled by a former Congress. All we have to do is to make the appropriations to complete the works heretofore commenced. If this position be true, ought not gentlemen to confine themselves to the estimates made to the Congress that commenced the work? I would want nothing more than the facts in this case to prove the fallacy of such a proposition. An engineer reports that a work would cost two hundred and twelve thousand dollars; and Congress appropriates a part of that sum to commence the work; and at the very next session of Congress the engineer reports that the same work will cost over eight hundred thousand dollars. Now, sir, if Congress had been told by the engineer at first, that the work would have cost eight hundred thousand dollars, their prudence might have told them never to have commenced it. Mr. Chairman, what security have we, if the eight hundred thousand dollars should be appropriated, that we will not at a subsequent Congress be called on to appropriate a still larger sum to complete the improvements in the river? We cannot depend on the estimates from the engineer department; they have deceived us to get the work commenced, and I, for one, will not suffer the same person to deceive me twice. Their estimates appear to have been made without any regard to economy; but their object appears to be to show how much money they can spend, not how much is necessary to be spent.

After some further remarks from Messrs. CARTER, PEYTON, SPEIGHT, SMITH, EVANS, and WISE,

The House took the usual recess.

H. of R.]

Harbor Bill.

EVENING SESSION.

The House went into Committee of the Whole again, and resumed the consideration of the clause appropriating $200,000 for Hudson river, and the amendment of Mr. CARTER, to appropriate $100,000 for the Muscle Shoals.

Mr. WISE concluded his remarks in opposition to the principles of the bill passed yesterday in relation to the deposit of the public money.

Mr. PEYTON followed, in support of the general principles of that bill.

Mr. WISE briefly rejoined to the latter gentleman.

The debate was continued by Mr. MANN, of New York.

Mr. HAYNES raised a point of order on the character of the debate. He said he was compelled to be absent last night from indisposition, and he was informed that the Senate deposit bill had then been passed. He wished to know if he had been misinformed; because, if not, a discussion upon a bill already passed must be out of order.

Mr. MANN said a few words more in reply to some remarks of Mr. WISE, when the debate proceeded on the pending question, by that gentleman.

Mr. CARTER then modified his amendment, by inserting a provision at the end, making Kingsport, Sullivan county, Tennessee, a port of entry; and,

After some remarks from Messrs. PEYTON and TURRILL, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. McKAY then moved to reduce the appropriation to $100,000, on the ground that that was as much as could be expended during the working season.

Mr. SMITH said a few words in opposition to the motion, when it was rejected.

Mr. PARKER moved to strike out the words "above and," so as to restrict the expenditure below Albany.

Mr. GILLET said, if he understood the amendment of his friend from New Jersey, [Mr. PARKER,] his object was to limit the improvements in the Hudson river to that portion of it which is below the city of Albany. That gentleman seemed to suppose that public considerations did not require the improvement proposed between Troy and Albany. The fact stated as the ground of his opinion was, that the great New York canal terminated at the city of Albany. It is true that this canal is continued on the western bank of the river to the city of Albany; but he believed it also true that there was a communication from it to the city of Troy. He would further state that the Champlain, or northern canal, which is of such great importance to the northern part of the State and to the State of Vermont, terminates nearly opposite Troy. That city carries on a large business on each of the canals. The business men of that city are extensively engaged in business which requires them to pass from Troy, on the Hudson, to New York.

The failure to improve the river between Troy and Albany would give the latter place an advantage, growing out of our legislation. He was confident this was not desired by any person. Place each on the same footing, so far as you legislate, and leave to natural causes and the enterprise of each to decide the question of superiority. The natural rivalry between these cities would be beneficial to the country. If, by any act of ours, the one receives a favor not given to the other, you destroy competition, and place business within the control of the favored city. Let them go hand in hand, and all will be satisfied.

As he observed many around him who were not in the last Congress, and who may not be acquainted with the history of former legislation on this subject, he wished to occupy the attention of the House for a moment, to make a brief statements of facts. At a session of the twenty-second Congress a bill passed both Houses of Congress, containing, among other appropriations, one for the improvement of the navigation of the Hudson river. He could not say from what committee that bill emanated, but it was fair to presume that it was properly considered by a standing committee and by both Houses of Congress. This bill, owing to other items in it, failed to receive the signature of the President, and consequently did not become a law.

At the first session of the last Congress, a member of the Committee on Commerce, from the city of New York, [Mr. SELDEN,] reported a separate bill on this subject, which passed both Houses, and became a law. Consequently, this cannot be considered a new work; and, under the usual course of business here, it is properly within the jurisdiction of the Committee of Ways and Means, who reported this bill. We have evidence before us that more money is needed for this work, in which several States are interested. It must be known to all, that every State and Territory touching the Western lakes is deeply interested in this work; so is Vermont. It is also conceded that it is not excluded by the principles of the celebrated veto message. The question is, shall we continue the improvement, or abandon it? If any work of this kind is ever to be carried on by the General Government, certainly this should be continued. In his opinion, the amendment should not be agreed to, but the section should be adopted as it now stands.

After a few words from Mr. PARKER, the amendment was rejected.

The motion to strike out the whole clause was then lost.

Mr. HAWES then moved to amend the clause, by striking out the sum of $20,000, and inserting in lieu thereof the sum of $151,504 10, and to add at the end "for the completion of the improvements of the Hudson river;" and proceeded to assign at length his reasons for the motion, which was the balance of the sum, after the $70,000 appropriated last year. The cost of the work was originally estimated at $221,504 10.

The amendment of Mr. HAWES was then rejected: Yeas 47, nays 79.

Mr. ASHLEY then moved to amend the amendment by inserting at the end of it the following: "in such manner, and by the removal of such obstructions, as the Secretary of War shall direct." Agreed to.

After a few remarks by Messrs. SMITH and VINTON,

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee, moved that the committee rise. Lost.

After a few remarks by Mr. DENNY, the question was taken on Mr. VINTON's amendment, as amended; which was agreed to.

Mr. MARTIN then moved an amendment appropriating twenty thousand dollars for the improvement of Tennessee river at Muscle Shoals. Lost.

Mr. VINTON moved to strike out the clause, "For continuing the improvement of the navigation of the Ohio and Mississippi rivers, from Pittsburg, Pennsylvania, to New Orleans, Louisiana, and from the mouth of the Ohio to the mouth of the Missouri river, one hundred and ten thousand dollars," and insert, "for the improvement of the Ohio river, from Pittsburg to the falls, $50,000; for the Mississippi and Ohio, below the falls, $50,000; and for the improvement of the Mississippi and Missouri, above the mouth of the Ohio, $30,000."

After some remarks by Mr. VINTON,

Mr. ASHLEY moved to amend the amendment by increasing the appropriation for the improvement of the Mississippi and Missouri rivers, above the mouth of the Ohio, to $50,000. Lost.

Mr. HAWES then offered an amendment to the above clause, to strike out "Pittsburg, Pennsylvania," and insert "Louisville," and strike out "$110,000," and insert "$75,000." Lost.

Mr. SMITH moved to amend the clause, "For continuing the removal of obstructions in Red river, Louisiana, and Territory of Arkansas, forty thousand eight hundred dollars," by making an additional appropriation of $15,000 for the construction of a steamboat, and $15,000 for the support of the same. Lost.

Mr. GARLAND, of Louisiana, moved to amend the amendment, so as to increase the appropriation to $100,000, for the purpose of continuing the improvements to the navigation of Red river, constructing a steamboat to be used in keeping the river open and continuing the work. This, he stated, was in conformity with the estimates and recommendations from the Department, now in the possession of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. SMITH,] who, as a member of the Committee of Ways and Means, has the bill in charge. Lost.

Mr. CLAIBORNE, of Mississippi, then offered the following:

"And be it further enacted, That the sum of twenty thousand dollars be, and is hereby, appropriated for the improvement of the navigation of the Tombigbee river, in the States of Alabama and Mississippi, and the sum of ten thousand dollars for the improvement of that part of the Mississippi river known as the Yazoo Pass." Lost.

Mr. GRAVES moved an amendment, to appropriate $750,000 for the purchase of the private stock in the Louisville and Portland canal. Lost.

Mr. CARTER moved an amendment, to appropriate $150,000 to connect the Hiwassee and Coosa rivers. Lost.

Mr. UNDERWOOD moved an amendment, to appropriate $6,000 for the construction of coffer-dams on Green Barren river. Lost.

Mr. CHAPIN offered an amendment, for the improvement of Port bay, New York, $10,000. Lost.

Mr. ASHLEY offered an amendment, for the improvement of St. Francis river, $30,000. Lost.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, moved to strike out the clause, "For continuing the improvement of Cumberland river, in Kentucky and Tennessee, thirty thousand dollars," and insert, "For continuing the improvement of Cumberland river, beginning at the mouth of Laurel, which is hereby declared a port of entry;" which was rejected: Yeas 17, nays 99.

Mr. BOYD moved to amend the clause, "For continuing the improvement of the Cumberland river, in Kentucky and Tennessee, thirty thousand dollars," by inserting after the word "Tennessee" the words "commencing at its mouth." Lost.

Mr. HAWES moved to strike out the following clause: "For continuing the removal of obstructions in the Chipola river, in the Territory of Florida, four thousand dollars." Lost.

Mr. SMITH moved an amendment, "for completing improvements between the rivers St. Marys and St. John's, $5,000." Agreed to.

Mr. HAWES moved to strike out the following: "For continuing the removal of obstructions in, and improving the navigation of, the Escambia river, in the Territory of Florida, five thousand five hundred dollars." Lost.

Mr. CORWIN offered an amendment, to appropriate $25,000 for incidental expenses attending future surveys. Lost.

Mr. ROBERTSON offered an amendment, to provide for the removal of obstructions in James river, below Richmond, $50,000. Lost.

Mr. STORER moved to amend the clause, "For the further improvements at the mouth of Huron river, four thousand three hundred dollars," by inserting after the word "river" the words "in the State of Ohio." Lost.

The bill having been read through, on motion of Mr. SMITH, the committee rose, and

The House then adjourned.

THURSDAY, JUNE 23.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

Mr. CONNOR, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported the "bill to change the organization of the Post Office Department, and to provide more effectually for the settlement of the accounts thereof," with the amendments of the Senate thereto, with the recommendation that the House concur in the same. The bill and amendments were committed.

On motion of Mr. CONNOR, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. HOWARD in the chair,) on the above bill.

Some of the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments increasing the salaries of the clerks of the Department were disagreed to.

The question being on the amendment of the Senate, striking out the 43d and 44th sections, which prevent the postmasters from receiving any emolument from pigeon-holes, or boxes,

Some debate took place, in which Messrs. PHILLIPS, MANN of New York, ASH, JOHNSON of Louisiana, EVERETT, and BRIGGS, took part, when the hour of 12 o'clock having arrived, the committee rose.

IMPROVEMENT OF HARBORS, &c.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole, in pursuance of the special order of yesterday, (Mr. LINCOLN in the chair,) when

Mr. VINTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the committee adopted an amendment to the harbor bill, making an appropriation of $50,000 for the improvement of the Ohio river between Pittsburg and the falls, $50,000 from the falls to New Orleans, and $30,000 for the Mississippi and Missouri rivers, above the mouth of the Ohio; which motion was agreed to.

Mr. VINTON then modified his amendment, by inserting an additional clause, appropriating thirty thousand dollars for the improvement of the Ohio river, between Pittsburg and the falls of the Ohio.

After some remarks by Messrs. VINTON, SMITH, UNDERWOOD, ASHLEY, HAWES, LANE, E. WHITTLESEY, HUNTSMAN, BOON, MERCER, DENNY, and CHAMBERS, the amendment of Mr. VINTON was adopted.

Mr. ASHLEY then moved the following, as a modification of the above: "For the improvement of the Ohio and Mississippi, from Louisville to New Orleans, seventy thousand dollars; for the improvement of the Mississippi river, above the mouth of the Ohio, and the Missouri river, to Independence, $50,000, in such manner, and for the removal of such obstructions, as the Secretary of War shall direct;" which was agreed to.

The bill was then laid aside, and the committee proceeded to consider the bill making appropriations for certain harbors therein named, and for other purposes.

The bill having been read through, Mr. BELL moved to strike out the enacting clause of the bill. He did so, he said, for the purpose of trying the sense of the committee on the principles of the bill. Mr. B. then spoke at some length, going fully into the merits of the bill.

Before Mr. BELL had concluded his remarks, the hour having arrived,

The House took the usual recess.

EVENING SESSION.

IMPROVEMENT OF HARBORS.

The House went again into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. LINCOLN in the chair,) on the "bill making appropriations for certain harbors for the year 1836."

The question pending was the motion of Mr. BELL to strike out the enacting clause.

H. of R.]

Improvement of Harbors.

Mr. BELL resumed and concluded his speech, as given entire, as follows:

Mr. Chairman: I look upon the present bill as the result of that disposition, or rather determination, which has been manifested throughout the session, to bring the wants of the Government up to the increased revenue of the country, instead of keeping the public revenue down to the actual demands of the public service, which has always heretofore been regarded as the true policy of the country. It is because I regard this bill as an emanation of this new system of policy, chiefly, that I oppose it. The bill provides for the improvement of a great number of harbors and inlets upon our lake and seacoast, which have heretofore escaped the notice of the Government, although improvements of this nature have, for many years past, been patronised by Congress. I take it for granted that the several items or objects contained in the bill stand upon equal grounds, so far as regards their importance, and the expediency of making the appropriations demanded for them. It will, therefore, follow, that one part of the bill might as well receive the support of Congress as the other; and those who are opposed to it will act more wisely by making opposition to the principle and policy of the measure as a whole; it will also save time, if the strength of the bill can be tested at the outset. If a majority of members shall be in favor of the principle of the bill, then it may be passed without further delay. To effect this object, and to enable me to take that view of the subject which I desire, I move you, sir, that the enacting clause of the bill be stricken out.

I did not think it worth while, Mr. Chairman, to oppose what may be called the old harbor bill, because the public works provided for in it are already commenced, and have been in progress for a series of years, under annual appropriations for their completion; but a hope may be entertained that opposition will not be altogether unsuccessful to this bill, after the experience we have had in relation to the old one. It is the nature of these works never to be completed. Most of the works in the bill which has this moment passed the committee are very old acquaintances of the old members of this House. I remember most of them as far back as the first session I had the honor of a seat in this body. For several years, many of them were reported as only requiring one more appropriation to complete them. When the officers who had charge of them became ashamed of repeated impositions of this kind, the language in which the appropriating clause ran was changed; and works that seemed upon the point of completion eight years ago, now require thousands annually for their permanent construction and preservation! It is notorious, that many of the old works of the kind enumerated in this bill fell into decay before they became useful to any extent, and the first improvements, made at great expense, were either abandoned as useless, or became dilapidated, and required reconstruction. All those harbors may be regarded as bottomless pits of the Treasury. You may expend tens of millions upon them, and still as many will be required; and then no man can see any termination to the demand for further appropriations. Sir, the present bill, although large in amount, would be no cause of alarm to me, if the expenditure now proposed were all that would be required; if, sir, I could foresee that, at the end of five or even of ten years, there would be an end to further demands, I would be less concerned. But, sir, we know from experience, that whatever may be the original estimates of the cost of these works, the actual expenditure is never limited by them. There is not one of the old works, I venture to say, which has not already had expended upon it fifty or a hundred per cent. beyond the original estimate. It may, then, be taken for granted that each of these new works, like the old ones, will be perpetual drains upon the Treasury, not only in our times, but in the generations that are to come, for there is no limit to invention in this business of making artificial harbors. I do not say that, in all cases, these expenditures will be useless. No, sir, money can accomplish any thing in the way of improvement. Harbors may be constructed by skill and capital, where nature seems to have forbidden the undertaking. It is only questionable whether, when we have so many fine harbors on our coast, constructed by the great MAKER of all things, it is wise to drain the pockets of the people, and absorb the Treasury, in adding to their number. Let us look at the progress of this branch of the system of internal improvement, in the amount of expenditure. In the year 1835, the entire amount appropriated to these objects was $505,057. The bill which has already received the sanction of this committee provides an expenditure for the present year of nearly $700,000—[a member said $800,000;] a gentleman near me states the amount at $800,000. The bill under consideration proposes to apply $927,264 to new works, making an aggregate of upwards of $1,700,000—more than three times the amount of any former year! What amendments may yet be made to this bill I cannot foresee, but there is little hope that the amounts will be reduced, unless the entire bill shall fail. Well, sir, do honorable members see nothing alarming in this? Is there no evidence here of that disposition, or rather of that determination, to extravagance which I have charged? If this bill shall pass the present Congress, it will of itself lead to an expenditure of ten millions. Yes, sir, when ten millions have already been expended, in looking forward, we might be cheered with the expectation that yet another ten would close up this gulf of the Treasury.

I have said that I regarded this bill as the result of a deliberate system of extravagance—of a plan for increasing the wants of the Government, and of exhausting the Treasury. Was I not right in this assertion? Look at your increased expenditures in every branch of the public service. But, sir, why descend into particulars? I affirm that your Committee of Ways and Means of this House was organized upon a principle of extravagance. Look at the composition of that committee, sir, and then tell me if it was not constituted with deep design, and expressly with a view to the largest expenditure for which a pretext could be found, in every branch of the public service. Was there ever such a Committee of Ways and Means appointed in this House? Was there ever a more palpable desertion of the principle of representation—a more shameful abandonment of the interests of the entire interior of the country? Who are the members of this committee? At the head of the list we find the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CAMBRELENG,] representing the largest city in the Union, deeply interested in the largest expenditures upon the navy, upon fortifications, and public works of every description. Next we find the gentleman from Baltimore, [Mr. McKIM,] the representative of similar interests, and nearly to as great an extent. Next we have the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. LOXALL,] who represents the Norfolk, or rather the Gosport district, which, besides a navy yard, which may be made to exhaust any amount of money, has within its limits two fortifications, which have already cost the Government nearly three millions of dollars, but are worth—really worth—scarcely one cent in the way of protection; yet they are annually the objects of large appropriations. We next pass to the distinguished gentleman from Maine, [Mr. SMITH,] I say distinguished, because he is distinguished as a gentleman of business habits and intelligence, as a member of this House. This gentleman represents a seaport also, (Portland,) upon a coast of numerous harbors and inlets, all of which could be greatly improved by money, and all of which might plausibly demand to be fortified. We next arrive at my friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. LAWRENCE,] who represents Boston, a place deeply interested in large expenditures upon the navy and fortifications. The next on the list is the learned gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. INGERSOLL.] He, too, like the five already noticed, represents a large commercial city, having all the interests, to a great extent, that the others have, in large expenditures. Last on the list is the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. OWENS.] He also represents a large and important commercial city, (Savannah,) and, like the rest, having a deep interest in large expenditures. Well, sir, to represent the interests of the interior, and of economy, we have two gentlemen, one from Ohio, [Mr. CORWIN,] and one from Tennessee, [Mr. JOHNSON;] two against seven! Seven members of the committee representing districts on the seaboard! I wish every one to draw his own conclusions, but I have seen enough in the action of this House, in the course of the session, to corroborate the inference I have drawn from the peculiar organization of this committee. I must not be understood to impute either a want of integrity or patriotism to the members of this committee. I respect all the gentlemen whom I have described as the representatives of districts on the seaboard. But they are bound, from the very nature of our representative system, to have opinions in common with their constituents, especially upon this subject of expenditure; and I repeat, that this committee was organized upon a principle of increased and extravagant expenditure.

It would seem that this bill is intended to lay the foundation of a permanent system of expenditures of this nature. The preamble alarms me. It is new to me. The annunciation of purpose is imposing and high sounding, and denotes design—"To provide for the protection of the commerce and navigation of the United States." The protection of the commerce of the United States! Would not that grand object embrace improvements in the interior, as well as upon the exterior boundary of the country? This Government is authorized by the constitution to extend the same degree of protection to the inland commerce that it may to foreign trade. The power in the one case is conveyed in the same language that is used in the other; yet all the improvements proposed by this bill are upon the exterior boundary of the Union. I know it may be said that improvements of the interior channels of communication and trade may be properly included in a distinct bill. That is true, and such has been the practice to some extent. But to what will this lead in the end? Without doubt, to a perpetual struggle between the States of the interior and the States upon the lake and seacoast, for an equality of benefits—of expenditures which would exhaust the revenues of any country.

But, in connexion with this view of the subject, consider for a moment the monstrous—I will not say intolerable—inequality of this system of improvement; for, if I were compelled to the act, I might submit to much greater, rather than break up this Union. But is it fair, is it just, necessary, or reasonable, that this inequality shall exist? Some of the large States in these bills receive $50,000, some others $100,000, and one large State (New York) will receive upwards of $200,000 this year, to be expended within its limits, and upon objects calculated to increase its relative advantages over the other States of the Union, while other States do not receive one cent; and this inequality is to be established forever! It cannot be. The States of the interior must look to their interests; they will look to their interests, if this system goes on, to whatever extreme it may lead. My friend from Virginia [Mr. WISE] said, on yesterday, that there will be no more appropriations for these improvements; that there will be an end to all such works now, since we passed the deposit bill. Well, sir, ought this result to be lamented, if it shall turn out to be one of the effects of that bill, which is practically a bill for the distribution of the surplus of the Treasury? Ought the passage of that bill to be deprecated, because it may terminate a system of improvement, which, from the relative locality of the State, must, after all, be unequal and productive of great discontent, and the most wasteful expenditure of the public treasure? Sir, if that bill shall effect no other good but this, it will well deserve the support and approbation of the public. The States, having the means, will be much better judges of the importance of improvements within their limits; and they will be generally more economical and judicious in the management of them than this Government can be. Each one will expend no more than its due proportion, and none will have cause to complain. We shall at the same time escape the disgraceful combinations by which these bills effect their passage through this House. My friend from Virginia also thinks that another effect of the distribution of the surplus will be to revive and uphold the American system, to increase the tariff, and sustain an expensive system of improvements by the States. That gentleman must have forgotten that the feature in the system to which he alludes—I mean the American system, which was thought to be most dangerous, and promised to be most effective in giving it permanency—was the inequality of the distribution of the revenue produced by a high tariff. The States of the Northwest, which were new and susceptible of improvement to any extent, were expected to combine with the manufacturing States, and secure to themselves all, or nearly all, the benefits of the united interests of the system. The States of the West were to have the money expended within their limits, which was paid into the Treasury by the people of all the States; and in this result the South was expected to continue to pay, while others received as well as paid. It was the inequality of the benefits which was expected to give permanence to the system. Where all receive in an equal degree, there is a community of interest in opposing unjust and unreasonable taxation. My friend also contends that the practice of distribution will cripple the operations of this Government; that it will be stripped to the bare poles. The argument is, that the avarice of the States, and the desire to increase the funds at their disposal, will prevent the necessary appropriations for the support of the General Government. Not so, sir. If it be true that the States shall feel a deep interest in a system of distribution, in order to effect those great purposes of education and improvement, the first duties of the local Government, it argues but little foresight or wisdom in them to suppose that they would consent to weaken this Government in any of its essential powers. To enable the Federal Government to raise a large revenue from the customs, or to enable it to preserve and husband the public lands as a source of revenue, all its necessary powers must be maintained in due vigor, and thus the States will be ready enough to concede. We must have a sufficient army and navy, and our civil establishment is never likely to be too small for the service.

My friend also laid down another proposition, in which, I think, he was mistaken. He remarked, in relation to the abuses growing out of the condition of the Treasury, and to the remedy that had been provided for them by the bill for distributing the surplus, that they were both evils; and the difference between them was, that the one might be reduced to a system, and the other never could. The experience of all Governments, the history of the world, is against the correctness of this conclusion. A

Improvement of Harbors.

Government never goes backward in expenditures and extravagance. Great and expensive establishments are never reduced under any Government, except sometimes at the close of a war a military establishment may be reduced; but, sir, as a general principle, the progress of expenditure and profusion in any Government is continued and forward, and revolution alone can terminate it. [Mr. WISE inquired if his friend from Tennessee understood him to advance a different proposition. Mr. B. said he did. Mr. W. then explained, and stated that his argument was, that the present insecure and anomalous condition of the public deposits could not be reduced to a system.] I am glad to find, said Mr. B., that I did my friend injustice in the inference I had drawn from his remarks; but I must take leave to say, that I think the greater evil to be remedied—much the greater calamity which threatened to befall the country by reason of the existing state of the public Treasury, was an increased number of public officers—increased naval and military establishments—an undue increase of Government patronage—and a profuse and profligate waste of the public treasure in every department of the public service; this, sir, was the true disease which called for a prompt and efficient cure. I trust, and confidently believe, that the distribution of the existing surplus in the Treasury will effect this great purpose. I shall be grievously disappointed if we do not, in a very short time, find the country roused to inquiry in regard to the public expenditures, in such a manner as to give an increased efficiency to the Government by salutary curtailments, while, at the same time, the necessary supplies for the support of Government will be liberally granted. I am surprised to find that any gentleman, who claims to belong to the State rights school, should be opposed to this measure of distribution. Why should they be alarmed at the prospect of adding strength and importance to the States? To do this, has, heretofore, been the great aim and the object of most solicitude to the State rights party. How to reduce the power of the Federal Government, has, heretofore, been the great desideratum with that party. It sounds strange to my ears to hear objections from that quarter to the late decisive measure of this House in relation to the surplus. But, sir, I must again revert to what I consider the first and chief good which we may hope will grow out of this measure—the reduction and limitation of the expenditures and patronage of this Government. We have had some experience already of the disastrous, the ruinous consequences of an overflowing Treasury. Look at your more than double appropriations for the present year; your Indian wars, and the enormous expenditures required to carry them on! If the late measure shall have all the effect which I anticipate from it, we shall soon see a spirit of inquiry into every abuse of the Government spreading itself over the country. The true measure of supply for the support of Government, and the various public establishments, will be estimated. The utility of the public works proposed to be constructed will receive its due share of attention, and no longer be regarded as subordinate to the mere object of expenditure. We shall no longer be carelessly and recklessly exposed to the hazard of foreign war, nor to savage massacre, in multiplied Indian hostilities, because our resources are felt to be ample for any emergency, and our Treasury is known to be redundant. Sir, I repeat the idea, that our Indian wars have resulted from a sense of the vast powers and resources of this Government and the abuse of its patronage. While an indifference, and even contempt, of an Indian war, continue to be felt by the Government, neither the vigilance, nor precaution, nor the energy necessary to prevent hostilities, will be applied. Sir, is it not true that Indian wars have been raging within the last six months, which have cost the lives of hundreds of our citizens, and will cost the Government more than ten millions of money, and which have never yet been thought worthy of a communication to Congress by the President? Sir, I congratulate the country that we may look forward, with confidence, to times when there will be some responsibility felt by our public servants, and some accountability exacted from them by the people.

The passage of the bill for the distribution of the surplus revenue among the States has been attributed to various causes of a political nature. The true cause of the great and unexpected favor which that bill found in this House is to be found in the unexampled spirit of extravagance manifested throughout the session, in the appropriations and public expenditures of every kind. Strange, therefore, and paradoxical as it may appear, the Committee of Ways and Means, or rather the chairman of that committee, who has repeatedly avowed himself against it, is yet entitled to the chief merit in passing it. This credit he is justly entitled to, and the country will no doubt, duly appreciate his services.

We are now, Mr. Chairman, near the close of a parliamentary year, one of the most eventful in our history, and one that must be long felt, and remembered for good or for evil, in the further progress of this Government. I wish I could consume the time necessary to a review of all the most remarkable measures and incidents which have distinguished our proceedings during the present session. Such a review from some one more competent than myself would be a public benefit. I cannot refrain from adverting for one moment to the extraordinary disorder and constant violation of all sound parliamentary rule and practice which has prevailed throughout the session. Every member must feel that the character of the House has been deeply affected by those circumstances, in the opinion of the public. Another session of equal length and disorder must end in disorganization, or vest the entire actual power of the Government in the hands of the Executive. If public respect and public confidence shall be lost in the House of Representatives, we shall no longer have it in our power to boast of a free Government. I would not be understood as charging all the disorders of the session to the presiding officer of this House; he, it is true, must come in for his share of responsibility; but to the House itself must attach the greater reproach. It is the absence of a proper regard for the propriety and the order of our proceedings in the members of the House themselves, which alone can account for those repeated scenes of disorder, and the utter contempt for all the laws established by long parliamentary practice, so often manifested in the course of this session.

I do not wish to discriminate between parties in these observations. It is a subject which ought to be felt as far above party feeling and influence. It concerns every patriot of every party to turn his attention to the correction of the evil. I cannot but remember, however, that during the whole period of the session, there has been a labored effort, through the columns of the Government journal, (the Globe,) to identify me, humble as I am, with all the disorders and abuses of the session. I have been constantly held up to the public as an agitator, a disorganizer, and one who deliberately sought to thwart the business of the House, and especially to embarrass the Speaker. That there is great injustice in this charge, that a more gross and unfounded calumny never was propagated, I appeal to the impartial of all parties in this House.

In a late number of the Globe, an article appeared headed "confession of the leader of the White party;" and, in the body of the article, I was represented as having stated, in a speech, that "the minority of the House were tyrannized over, and they were naturally in a refractory, restless, and perturbed condition; and, if they could not be heard orderly, they would do so disorderly." The editor did me over honor in assigning me the rank of leader of the White party; but the injustice and the falsehood of the charge I have stated was felt by every member of the House who heard my remarks in the debate referred to in the Globe. It is true I stated, in that debate, that the minority were tyrannized over in the House; that in the proceedings of a former day they had been compelled to act—to vote—and yet their lips were sealed, by the decision of the Chair, against utterance of complaint or explanation; that they had only desired to state a fact, which had been misstated from the Chair, but that too was denied them; that, to add to the injustice and tyranny of the proceeding, the Globe came out a morning or two after with an article, in which the question was falsely stated, and the most unworthy and disgraceful motives ascribed to every individual, but one, who voted in the minority. It was such injustice, such tyranny as this, which I said naturally tended to produce restlessness, and a violent temper in the minority; and, for this reason, I invoked a spirit of forbearance and moderation on the part of the Chair, and the majority of the House, towards the minority. But, sir, so far was I from giving my countenance and support to the course of the gentlemen who refused to vote when their names were called upon the resolution of the gentleman from South Carolina, [MR. PICKENS,] that I stated explicitly and expressly, if the House passed a vote not to excuse them, and they should, in contempt of the authority of the House, refuse to do so, I should feel myself bound, in vindication of the necessary power of the House, to vote their expulsion from this body, as painful as it might be to my feelings on personal grounds.

In another and later article of the same journal, the minority in the House are charged with having resorted to "every expedient" to thwart the public business; and I am specially referred to as having contributed largely to this object. I take this occasion to say, that every charge of this nature is without the slightest foundation in truth. It is due to myself that I should also avail myself of this occasion to say, that, in regard to the proposition to abolish slavery in this District, and the abolition question generally, I differed with many of my friends in this House, as they very well know, as to the most judicious mode of managing it. In all the discussions which have taken place upon that subject, I have been generally silent; and when I had occasion to take some part in the incidental questions which have grown out of it in the progress of the session, it will be recollected by the members of the House I sought to allay, rather than increase, excitement; though I could not agree with the moderate party in all their views of that question, nor could I vote with those who sought to suppress all discussion by a violation of the right of speech in this House. As to the other expedients for exhausting the time and thwarting the business of the House, I affirm that, upon no occasion, and in no instance, I have lent myself to any such purpose. In the whole course of the session, I do not remember that I have demanded the yeas and nays but once; and that was upon the resolution I offered changing the hour at which this House should meet in the morning from 12 to 11 o'clock.

But, sir, the wide range of debate indulged in by me, and the time I consumed in the discussion of the naval appropriation bill, has been the pretext of the grossest misrepresentation. As humble an individual as I may be, it has been my fortune within the last year or two to have been the object of the most bitter and unqualified denunciation and calumny by the leading journals in the interest of the party in power. I have, at the same time, been the object of unremitted attack and denunciation by those who occupy the highest stations in the Government. My support of a distinguished Senator from Tennessee for the presidency has been ascribed to the most unworthy private motives, and every ground of public principle or of public interest, in justification, has been denied. Sir, these attacks and these misrepresentations have been continued up to this day. It was natural that, upon the meeting of Congress, I should seek the earliest opportunity of giving an exposition of my course, and the motives which led to it; or, at least, to show that the friends of Judge White were at issue with those of the Vice President, [Mr. Van Buren,] in regard to principles of the highest grade and importance. Well, sir, I sat in my seat from the first of the session, and waited patiently for an occasion upon which I could properly, and without seeming to trespass upon any rule of order or propriety, make the remarks which my feelings and judgment both dictated as proper. I had resolutions drawn up which embodied all the propositions I was desirous of establishing; but, sir, no privilege was allowed me of offering them. It is an extraordinary fact, and it is as unprecedented as it is extraordinary, that no member, from the first of the session to this day, has been at liberty to offer a proposition of any kind to the House, without the consent of two thirds of the members. The appropriation bills came up in January, but I declined going into an extended discussion upon them at that time, upon the ground, as I then expressly avowed, that I was unwilling to delay the passage of the bills while there was the remotest prospect of a war with France. But when the naval appropriation bill came up for consideration, about the middle of March, and after the cloud of war which had lowered for a season upon the eastern horizon had passed away, I availed myself of an undoubted parliamentary privilege to discuss fully every question I thought proper to bring to the notice of the House and of the country. But this, again, became the pretext for renewed attacks. After having my lips sealed for four months by the artful and arbitrary course of proceeding of the House, when I at last seized a proper occasion for the expression of my views, I was not only assailed for this act in the most gross and offensive manner, by the official paper of this city, but I was made the subject of repeated attacks in this House. A deliberate attempt was made to insult me by a movement in the House at the close of the discussion upon the naval bill, under circumstances which left me no redress. Those who advised and originated that movement did not dare to show themselves, nor will they. For that speech I have been a standing object of reference and insult by a member from New York, [Mr. MANN.] A member from North Carolina, [Mr. SPEIGHT,] after having been absent a great part of the session, signalized his return to his duty here by spying out the condition of the House at one time when I was speaking; but not supposing that he had sufficiently propitiated those who have the power and the will to reward such services, by catering for the columns of the Globe, he travelled out of his path upon another occasion, with a view to furnish fresh matter of comment upon the subject of my speech upon the bill alluded to. I suppose the gentleman may now feel sure of his aim.

But, sir, besides these instances of gross personal attack in this House, a number of gentlemen followed me in the course of the discussion, both upon the naval bill, and fortification bill which succeeded it, many of whom grossly misrepresented my arguments, and some of whom assailed my motives; but, out of respect for the wishes of the House, and to avoid any just ground to suppose that I desired to delay the business of the House by repeated replies and interruptions, I have forbore to answer or notice what has been said. But we are now drawing near the close of the session, and I appeal to the liberal and generous feelings of honorable members, whether I may not be permitted to reply to so many and such repeated attacks and misrepresentations. [Cries of Go on.]

Against the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. GARLAND,] who followed me in the debate already alluded to, I have no complaint to make, except that in his speech, as it is printed, and no doubt as it was spoken also, he has stated that eleven members of the Tennessee delegation in Congress, of which I was one, held a meeting, and that "they intended to nominate and recommend a candidate for the presidency, and did so."

[Mr. GARLAND explained, and said that he certainly did not intend to misrepresent the motives or objects of the meeting alluded to.]

I know the gentleman did not intend any such thing, for his liberality and courtesy were too manifest throughout his speech to admit such an inference; but I wish now to correct the impression under which he made that statement, by declaring that the Tennessee delegation, at the meeting alluded to, neither intended, nor did they nominate a candidate for the presidency; nor did they even recommend one to the consideration of the people. The next gentleman who did me the honor to notice my remarks was the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. JARVIS.] That gentleman said, in alluding to me and my course as a member of this House, "that having seen in the public journals, during the last year, while he was canvassing for re-election, the professions of his attachment to the administration, I was not prepared for his opposition." The insinuation is, that I obtained my seat here by professing an attachment to an administration which I did not feel. I deny that I have ever, upon any occasion, or for any purpose, professed a greater attachment to the administration than I have manifested upon this floor, by any thing I have either said or done. I consider the man who could practise such a deception upon the people, with a view to a seat here, as unworthy to occupy one. But the charge insinuated against me is false in every particular. I deny that the gentleman from Maine saw in the public journals any professions of attachment made by me, of the nature he leaves it to be inferred he did, during the last year. The gentleman also significantly inquires, "Whence the sudden flood of light which has gushed upon his benighted eye-balls, disclosing deformity, where all before was fair?" I answer the gentleman, by affirming that the time never was when I regarded all as either fair or defensible in the conduct of this administration, as he will find by my votes on many questions, at an early period of its existence. The gentleman does me wilful injustice in imputing to me general opposition to the administration. There is no one principle, or any one measure of general policy, identified in any manner with this administration, and which I have heretofore supported, which I do not now support. But I am willing to answer the gentleman with more candor upon this point than he makes the charge. It is the party association to which he belongs that I have refused to support. It is the party which claims to be the Jackson party; and it is my opposition to this party which has surprised the gentleman; and if he would know why I will not co-operate with them, I answer, because this party, which now claims to be the republican party, is no more like the true old republican party in the United States, than the semblance is like the reality.

A gentleman from New York [Mr. VANDERPOEL] next made some allusions to my course, which require notice: "In the tremendous conflict," said the gentleman, "of the panic session, where was the eloquent and potential voice of the gentleman who represented the Hermitage district?" It was, he continued, "for all the purposes of vindication, as mute as the grave, and much to the wonderment of many gentlemen. If the gentleman had quoted more fully from the columns of that journal from which he must have imbibed the spirit of his remarks, he would have furnished the solution of what he affects to consider a mystery, as given by the editor; and he might, with equal propriety, have adopted the entire slander. The gentleman speaks in perfect consistency with the principles of his party, when he makes the support and praise of General Jackson the true test of patriotism and merit upon every question. But I am surprised that the gentleman from New York should feel at any loss in accounting for my course upon the question of the removal of the deposits; he ought to know that there were sufficient reasons for my course in the character of the measure. But, sir, lest he should be left in ignorance, I will inform him that I happened to know rather too much in relation to the objects and means employed in bringing about that measure. I beg leave to say that I had no information from any high official source, nor from any other of which it is improper for me to speak; but I did know quite too much about the necessity which was supposed to exist for drawing a party line, especially after the delivery of a certain speech at Pittsburg.* I happened to be too well informed of the intrigues by which that measure was brought about; and I am not surprised that three of the gentlemen who had a leading influence in the matter now fill three of the highest stations under the Government. Will the gentleman be satisfied with this answer?

I come now, sir, to notice the remarks of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. Towns,] as I find them in a printed speech, which has been very widely circulated. I must say that the gentleman has surprised me by the general tenor of that part of his printed speech in which he professes to reply to me. I cannot conceive of any personal motive which the gentleman could be actuated by; and I am quite sure that no public consideration could have been so urgent as to call for a representation of my course and my remarks, so entirely different from both. The gentleman charges me, in pretty plain terms, with having calumniated the majority of the House; and that I "make them more servile, dishonored, and disgraced, than slaves." I deny that I have ever imputed such qualities to the members of this House. When I said that if the President had willed that there should be war with France, war we must have had, whatever might be the private opinions of members, I did so in express reference to party obligations, and the nature of the pledges under which the members of Congress were elected in these times of high party excitement; and that was, unqualified support of General Jackson and his administration. I have the happiness to know that, although I spoke with the greatest allowable freedom, many of the most respectable members of the majority acknowledged that I did not fail in the respect and courtesy which are always due to this House and to its members. Sir, whatever I may have thought, whatever I may now think, of individual members of the majority, I am gratified to be able to say that a large portion of them are very far from deserving the character which I have been made to give them. But since the gentleman has become the champion, and volunteered in defence of the party to which he belongs against all charges of a want of independence, I would like to know how he has entitled himself to this pre-eminence among his fellows. By what single act of independence has he asserted his title to the rank which he assumed? I know of none; and, therefore, if I had actually made the

* I ought to have said, after the peace and harmony of the Union were preserved by the compromise tariff bill, and especially after the delivery of a certain speech at Pittsburg.

charge against him which he alleges I made against the majority of the House, he would have had no cause to complain. The gentleman remarks in another part of his speech, in speaking of the supporters of Judge White, that he has "never yet heard an avowal of their creed." "I do not know," he continues, "the principles they profess." I will let the gentleman into the light of some of them before I sit down.

The gentleman from Georgia, in his printed speech, represents that the distinction I had drawn between a caucus and the meeting of the Tennessee delegation in December, 1834, was, "that there was no regular notice given" of the latter; that "there was no chairman, no secretary, no record or minutes kept," leaving it to be inferred that a nomination of a candidate was both intended and actually made. Reference is so often made to this meeting, and so many misrepresentations of the objects of it are abroad, that I will take this occasion to state the real object and character of the meeting. I have already stated that no nomination was made by that meeting, and I now aver that it was the unanimous opinion of the meeting that no nomination should be made. Even the letter addressed some days afterwards by a portion of the delegation to Judge White was not resolved upon at that meeting. [Mr. STANDEER said it was not spoken of.] My colleague reminds me that it was not spoken of at the meeting. I now state, for the information of all whom it may concern, that that meeting was the result of the insinuations and affected doubts of a small number of the delegation, in relation to the course of some of their colleagues who were more honest and candid than themselves. The meeting was gotten up, in fact, though not avowedly, to solve these doubts, and to test the views of those whose sincerity had been questioned. Well, sir, the meeting took place, and was attended by myself and all my colleagues, except three of the House, and one of the Senate, who was expected to attend. In the meeting there appeared to be no disguise or equivocation on the part of those who had, without their knowledge of the object, been brought there to ascertain their real sentiments. They frankly, and without hesitation, avowed their preference for Judge White, and their determination to support him. The next day, to the astonishment of every member of the delegation but themselves, the two gentlemen, one a member of the House and the other of the Senate, whose suggestions had actually brought about the meeting, together with another of their colleagues who attended the meeting, openly changed their ground, after having but the day before expressed an unqualified intention to support Judge White; and two of these gentlemen, [Messrs. FOLK and GRUNDY,] sir, are at this moment in the enjoyment of the rewards of their hypocrisy and their treachery to their colleagues.

The gentleman from Georgia, in another part of his speech, makes the following statement and reference to me: "Of all the charges that have been made against the President, and the party in support of his administration, whether from false friends or open enemies, it has been reserved to the gentleman from Tennessee to go a full bar's length beyond the limits of the most daring; and at one stroke of the pencil to draw the tyrant, the usurper, the crouching sycophant, and the degraded menial." "Could that venerable old man, under whose paternal wing the member from Tennessee has no doubt often felt his greatest security, utter one word of complaint for the injustice done him, might he not, in the language of the poet, exclaim—

"The arrow that deepest in my bosom went, Flew from the bow pretended Friendship bent."

Now, sir, all this is mere fancy work, and no one fact, either openly stated or covertly insinuated in the remarks I have quoted from the gentleman's speech, is founded in truth. The imputation upon my course towards the President I regard as dishonorable in the last degree; and if I felt myself capable of such baseness, I should think myself unworthy of a seat in this House. Whatever I may have thought, or however much opposed to some of the measures and conduct of General Jackson, I have always left it to his enemies to abuse him. Neither in my late speech, nor upon any other occasion, have I said that he was either a tyrant, a usurper, a crouching sycophant, or a degraded slave. The crouching sycophant, or the degraded slave, it is impossible that General Jackson should ever be. He may be the master of slaves and menials, but nature has disqualified him from becoming one himself. The gentleman must have had some other person in view when he drew the picture of the false, ungrateful, and pretended friend; or he must have derived his information in relation to my course from some one who is utterly reckless of the truth of what he stated. He doubtless had in his mind some one of that throng who have been blown into repute and place of late, only in consequence of their unqualified, unscrupulous praise of General Jackson. But, sir, great as General Jackson is, eminent as he is in rank, in station, and in the public mind, he is still but a man; and I have never yet bowed myself down below the level of a man, to win his favor, or that of any other man. My services to him, too, have always gone beyond my professions, both here and before the people. I will also say to the gentleman that I never yet could bring myself to deal in eulogies upon any man in power. The highest rewards he could bestow, I would regard as too small for such service. The gentleman from Georgia could not have been more unfortunate in the invention of a charge to make against me, than he has been in representing me as receiving protection and security under the "paternal wing" of the President. Sir, I venerate the President for his years, and the eminent service he has done his country upon many occasions; yet I must say, in justice to myself, that I never sought, and never received, protection or advancement from him. Though I would not volunteer the declaration, yet, since this occasion is accidentally afforded me, I must say, further, that I feel a just pride, considering the circumstances of my present position, in being able to state that, in every contest in which I have been concerned, whether before the people or in this House, I have ever found the President my most powerful opponent.

Here, sir, I should close my remarks, but I have promised that, before I sit down, I would give some explanation of the grounds and principles upon which those with whom I act in this House, and out of it, have taken their course in relation to the succession. I am also too deeply persuaded that the crisis demands the fullest development in the power of any and every one to give of the dangers which at present beset us.

If ever there was a time in the history of this country which called, imperiously called, for the discussion and settlement in this place, in this hall of the Representatives of the nation, of great and fundamental principles; principles intimately and indissolubly connected with the liberties and happiness of this people, the stability and successful action of our happy system of government, it is at the present juncture. Precedents and doctrines are being established, and ingrafted, not only in the public administration of the Government, but in the minds of the people, upon public sentiment, subversive, in my judgment, of the first and most cherished principles of our Government; precedents and doctrines destructive of all the securities provided in the constitution for the preservation of a free representative Government; precedents and doctrines at war with all that has heretofore been regarded as fundamental and organic in the very existence of a free Government.

It is not only consolidation that is menaced, but a consolidation which ought to be equally odious to the federalist and the republican; a consolidation of the most offensive and revolting nature to the feelings and judgment of every freeman, who has not already become callous to every sentiment associated with the name of a republic—of liberty; who is not already dead to all the cherished recollections of the past, and all the inspiring hopes of the future. Sir, ordinary consolidation, the idea of which has, heretofore, been sufficient to excite the fears of many of the most unquestioned patriots of the land, was nothing more than the concentration of all the powers of sovereignty in the Federal Government, of which Congress might still be regarded as a respected, independent, and efficient department. The idea that the representatives of every part of the Union would still annually assemble to deliberate, with the spirit and independence of freemen, upon all the great interests of the nation, though the State authorities and Government might fall into disuse or contempt, constituted some security against the worst that might happen under such a state of things; but the consolidation which is now threatened through the influence of party machinery, and the new doctrines which are becoming prevalent in regard to the uses to which Government patronage may be properly applied, leads not only to a concentration of all the powers of sovereignty in the federal head, but in a single branch of the National Government—in the Executive. Congress, in all things but in name, is to be annihilated. The two Houses of that body are to be controlled by the same means, by the use of the same party machinery, that make and control the President himself. A political joint stock company, acting through the President as their agent, is intended to rule the whole; and rule it will, until some future President, more ambitious than the past, shall apply the whole capital of the company, of which he is the only trustee, to his own use, and spurn from his favor the disciplined corps which brought him into power, as having no more right to rule jointly with him than he has to govern alone; and thus drops the curtain forever upon what may afterwards be denominated the farce of American liberty!

H. OF R.]

Improvement of Harbors.

But there is a point of delicacy which I must notice before I proceed further with this branch of my remarks. I shall be forced to speak freely of the course of the President in the remarks which I propose to submit. I know that a sort of morbid jealousy and sensibility, in relation to every thing which may be construed into an attack upon the President, is the natural feeling of a House of Representatives composed chiefly of his friends and supporters. The danger is, that this party interest which exists to repel every thing that savors of an attack upon him, may, and will, lead to a spirit of intolerance, and often to a total suppression of all free discussion and inquiry into his conduct. This disposition to intolerance is greatly increased when a President, like the present one, is not only supported by a large majority in this House, but is, besides, a great popular favorite. Yet, it is precisely at such a period that free and rigid inquiry and investigation are of the greatest importance to the public interest. It is at such a time only that Congress can show itself to be the true, and fearless, and faithful guardian of the public liberty. During an unpopular administration, neither courage, nor industry, nor zeal, are wanting to execute the task of inquiry into executive conduct or abuses. All are ready to discharge a duty which is popular, and in which there is no peril. But it is the duty of this House, under all administrations, whether popular or otherwise, to lend a ready ear to discussions and investigations which relate to executive conduct, power, and influence.

But, sir, I am not certain if an opinion is not becoming prevalent, for want of proper reflection and inquiry, that the President is in no way responsible to this House for any thing he may do; that he is an independent co-ordinate department of the Government, who is responsible to "his constituents"—to the people; and that we have only to attend to our ordinary duties as members of the legislative branch of the Government; and to take care to be able to answer to the people for our own conduct, without undertaking to question the propriety of what the President has done, or may do. I say, I am not sure if such a sentiment is not becoming common in the country; and I almost blush to think that such a feeling is not altogether unknown in this House. Sir, it is a great mistake, and may be the source of many errors, and of great mischief to the country. The executive chief of the Government is responsible, not only to his constituents, the people, but he is responsible to this House; and this is a part of the theory of this Government which should never be lost sight of. It is true that the idea, which has grown up of late, of the total independence of the President on this House, has become so common, that I am not certain if the bare suggestion of the constitutional duties and powers of this House will not excite surprise, and startle the more devoted friends of the President. But it is fit that we should not lose all recollection of our powers and privileges. It will have some good effect to make continual claim to our constitutional powers, though we may not think proper to exercise them. I will then take leave to repeat, that the President is responsible to this House, in the only way that he could be made so, without depriving him of the shadow of independence as the head of a separate department of the Government—and that is, by impeachment. Ay, sir, the President may not only be impeached by this House, but it is its bounden and sacred duty actually to impeach him for adequate cause. I do not mean to say that the present incumbent ought to be impeached, but I would have this House to be familiar in the knowledge of its powers. The day may come, in the progress of this Government, when a great example will have to be given to the country of the spirit and power of this House; or the Executive, instead of becoming independent only of the House, will actually govern it and the people into the bargain. Sir, the constitution did not mean that, because the people, by their voice, may elevate a man to the presidency, they do thereby sanction, in advance, and engage to submit to, all that he may do in the four years of his term of service. On the contrary, it supposes that a President, thus chosen, may abuse his powers, and deserve to be removed from office; and the duty of supervising his conduct is given to this House. Yes, sir, we are the constitutional supervisors and overseers of the conduct of the Executive.

Having made these preliminary remarks, I proceed to the subject I am most desirous to bring to the notice of Congress and of the country. I allude to the subject of executive and official interference in elections, and the consequent abuse of executive patronage. I regard this as the subject of all others demanding the greatest attention and scrutiny at the present juncture. It is too late to attempt any remedy by legal enactments at the present session of Congress, but it is not too late to invoke the attention of the country to the existence of the evil, and consequences which must grow out of the toleration of it. We can prepare the public mind for future action upon this subject, if we can do no more. I shall proceed at once to speak of the course of the highest officer in the Government, in connexion with this subject—of the President—of him who holds the power of appointment of all other officers in his hands, and whose duty it is, under the constitution, to supervise their conduct, and, as the guardian of the public liberty and of the constitution, to see that they do not step aside from their official duties, and improperly interfere with the freedom of the elective franchise. If he whose duty it is to watch over and control the conduct of all subordinate officers in this respect, shall himself set the example of interference; if he shall lead the way, and become the first in zeal and activity, as he is first in authority and rank, in carrying the election of a favorite candidate for the succession, it will be in vain that we discuss; it will be in vain that we shall devise legal restraints upon the conduct of subordinate officers. If the executive head of the Government may properly interfere in elections, it is decisive of the whole question; and whatever we may do, whatever we may enact, will not be worth the parchment upon which our proceedings are recorded. I am aware that I am treading upon delicate ground in venturing to speak at all of the President, in connexion with this subject. I know that there are many in this country, and for aught I know in this House, who regard as a sort of holy ground that upon which I am about to tread, and that the shoes should be put from off our feet before we dare to intrude upon it; but this, thank God, is not a part of my superstition. I am aware, at the same time, of the difficulty of my position in speaking as I shall have occasion to do of the present Chief Magistrate. It requires some power of discrimination, not ordinarily possessed, to discriminate between the support of a President and his administration, so far as regards measures properly of an administrative nature, and the measures and conduct of the same administration in regard to subjects and objects not in any manner connected with official duty. I have supported General Jackson's administration in most of its prominent and leading measures, as I have demonstrated during the present session, and I expect still to do so; but I have opposed, and I expect to continue to oppose, a certain scheme of policy of his, in relation to the succession of the presidency, in nowise constituting a part of his official duties. But for this opposition I have been constantly assailed in this House for having changed my party and my politics; and for the same reason the cry of anti-Jacksonism is raised against me out of this House, by every unprincipled partisan and partisan press throughout the country. But while I am conscious of standing upon the same ground, and that I am this day supporting the same principles which I avowed and acted upon from the first moment I had the honor of a seat in this House, neither ignorance nor prejudice on the one hand, nor artifice nor falsehood on the other, shall deter me from doing what I conceive to be my duty. Let no one say, then, that in what I am about to advance upon this subject I am attacking General Jackson, or that I mean to make an issue with him, or that I seek to overthrow his administration. I am too well convinced of his great popularity and influence to suppose that any such attempt would succeed, if I were disposed to make it. My attack (if what I shall say shall be held in the light of an attack at all) will be upon that party and those party leaders who have pushed him far in advance upon this subject, and upon every occasion when there was the least danger. The blows which I shall deal will be aimed and dealt upon them; and if he shall feel the force of any of them, it will be the necessary result of his position, and not of any purpose of mine. For one, sir, I do not mean to relinquish my privilege, my right, and my duty to the country, in opposing the election of any man or party to power, because he or they shall by artifice have so contrived it, that every indignant rebuke of his or their principles and conduct must have some reference to the course of a great popular favorite.

I have said that if the President may properly interfere in elections, it will be of no use to provide a remedy against the interference of subordinate officers. I use the term "properly" advisedly; for the question now is, not whether the President has interfered, but whether it is safe and proper that he should do so.

I need scarcely tell this House that the President has interfered in elections. It is well known, I presume, to every member of this House, that the interest felt by the President in the election of a particular individual (Mr. Van Buren) to succeed him in the executive chair, has, within the last fifteen months, been made known to the country in a variety of ways. This has been done with the decision and boldness characteristic of the man in all his great undertakings. It is not so well or so generally known that the President has, in some of the States at least, interfered in the election of members of both Houses of Congress. The most decisive and unequivocal proofs exist of such interference. That I may not be misunderstood, I will state the nature of the interference to which I allude. The most common mode of interference adopted by the President has been the distribution of an unusual and extraordinary number of newspapers, under his frank, containing the most virulent and inflammatory attacks upon the character and conduct of particular candidates. Another mode was, by writing letters, under his own signature, to various individuals, in which candidates opposed to the election of Mr. Van Buren were denounced, and the motives of their conduct impugned. These letters were, in general, industriously circulated, and, as it was understood and believed, without incurring the censure of the President. In one case, such a letter was written to an officer or agent in the service of the Government, and by him freely communicated. In another instance, such a letter was actually and frequently read from the hustings by a candidate for Congress, to large assemblies of the people. Of all these facts the proofs are now in my possession, or in the knowledge of members of this House; and they will be produced, if any gentleman upon this floor shall question any part of my statement. But the interference of the President in the election of a successor has, in two instances, been of so striking and peculiar a nature as to demand a separate notice. I allude to his attempt to influence the action of the Legislatures of the States of Alabama and Tennessee. Of the facts connected with the case of the Tennessee Legislature I can speak with confidence. It is due to the President to say that he practised no disguise in his interference with the Tennessee Legislature. Letters addressed to several individual members left no doubt of his intention or object. Some of the President's friends in Tennessee supposed that the numerous franks of the President, upon packages containing matter of the most violent and exceptionable kind, were procured by some artful partisan of the Vice President, without the privy of the President to the extent or character of the matter circulated under them; but to dissipate all doubt upon this point, of the three hundred newspapers transmitted to Nashville last fall, addressed to the members of the Legislature, under the President's frank, the entire address or superscription of one hundred was in the well-known handwriting of the President. Those newspapers contained matter having a direct bearing upon each question of importance, expected to come before the Legislature of that State, connected with national politics.

I have thus given a plain statement of facts, which are undeniable. I wish it to be understood that, unless these circumstances, with others of a similar nature, which might be referred to, amount to an interference in elections, I make no such charge against the President. But, sir, if this is not interference, then there can be no such thing as executive interference. But, sir, this is direct interference. It is open, and above disguise; and the question to be hereafter decided is, whether it is allowable and proper. I have met with some respectable persons, (I mean respectable for the honesty of their opinions,) who, without disputing the facts, contend that the President has not done any thing which he might not rightfully and properly do; that he may and ought to interfere in elections, whenever he shall think that the interest of the country will be promoted by his interference. It was from individuals only that the course of the President received any countenance. The mass even of his warmest personal friends at first sought to evade the question—to deny or palliate the facts. But now, whole communities have been brought to acquiesce in, and even to applaud, the course of the Executive in this respect. Such is the power and influence of a popular name! That which a few years ago would have struck the whole community with amazement, and caused the most unscrupulous partisan to falter in his course, is now hailed and defended by thousands. But, what is more to the point, this House, or a large majority of it, has given its sanction to these practices. I feel authorized to say this, from the circumstance that the main facts establishing the direct interference of the President in the election of his successor have been notorious, and have passed uncontradicted in every section of the Union for the last fifteen months; and yet the majority of this House has manifested not a mere acquiescence only, but a decided, thorough, and unequivocal zeal, in sustaining the President in all the results and objects, direct and indirect, immediate and remote, of his interference. Sir, I beg leave to refer to one or two circumstances to show the open, avowed, and notorious character of the President's interference in the election of his successor. It will be remembered that the letter of the President to Parson Gwin, of Nashville, in which he was induced to give the sanction of his great name to the humbug of the Baltimore convention, and to denounce every man who dared to oppose the nomination of that assembly as an enemy of the people, was defended upon the alleged ground that the editor of the Nashville Republican had claimed the President as a friend to the election of Judge White. It is equally well known that this was a mere pretext; and that the editor of that paper had done no such thing. But, if that pretext had really existed, what will be said by those who think that a sufficient reason for the President's avowal of his preference for Mr. Van Buren, to a paragraph which appeared in the New Hampshire Patriot, the standard organ of the democracy of the East, before the Gwin letter had made its appearance in that quarter? In speaking of the prospects of Judge White, the editor of that paper affirmed that "he (Judge White) cannot receive the vote of Tennessee; for even there he must contend, at odds, against the influence of the President, Mr. Grundy, Mr. Polk, and Mr. Johnson, and the genuine democracy of that truly democratic State." Here we find, in one of the leading journals of the party, not only a clear sanction of the practice of interference, but an open avowal of actual interference. But it is preposterous to consume time in attempting to prove an interference, when the President's preference is known to every free-man in the twenty-four States. Was I not right, then, in saying that a majority of this House had sanctioned the practice of executive interference—this new development in the action of this Government? It is true that this sanction has not been given in express terms. It is for that reason that I am the more anxious to press the subject; for, if ever this House, upon a full view of the question, and upon due deliberation, shall give its express sanction to this practice, then all that remains for the friends of the constitution and of the future liberties of the country to do, will be to carry an appeal to the people for their reconsideration and readjudication.

That the President, upon a full consideration, believes that he has a right, and that it is his duty, to interfere, as he has done, I have no doubt. I have as little doubt that he has arrived at this conclusion upon free and full advisement with his leading friends. He has taken his ground too broadly, and too much in the face of day, to doubt his own opinion of his right in this respect. The strongest and most effective argument which I have heard advanced among the people, in favor of the course pursued by the President, is, that it is his, the honest and sagacious statesman as well as warrior—it is the general opinion of his patriotic intentions which prevails—that gives all the weight to his preference for the succession, and all the countenance to his direct interference in that question, which either receives with the people. It is the more unfortunate that it is so. It is not the present contest, or the present day only, that is to be affected by this practice; it is future elections, future times, and the future destiny of the country, that we should look to. It is the precedent that is most to be dreaded, and this derives a tenfold force and mischief from the great and lauded name and character of him who makes it. It is the more important that now, in his own times, and in the pride of his influence and power, that those who see, or think they see, the future disasters to the constitution and liberties of the country which this practice will be likely to generate, should protest against, and do all that determined men can do to prevent a general acquiescence under it. I feel myself called upon to bring to bear upon this question the authorities of the greatest weight—the names of the most beloved and most illustrious men connected with the history of the country. But, first of all, I must quote the President's own opinion against himself. That General Jackson was once as zealous and as honest in his opposition to all executive interference with elections as he is now, when in favor of the practice, I have no doubt. Without trespassing upon the time of the committee, by referring to a great deal more, I will content myself upon the present occasion by reading the sentiment delivered by the President upon the subject in his first inaugural address, as evidence of what his opinion then was. This address was supposed, and was doubtless intended, to give some solemn assurance to the country of the fidelity of the new incumbent of the presidential chair to the main principles upon which he was brought into power.

"The recent demonstration of public sentiment inscribes on the list of executive duties, in characters too legible to be overlooked, the task of reform, which will require, particularly, the correction of those abuses that have brought the patronage of the Federal Government into conflict with the freedom of elections, and the counteraction of those causes which have disturbed the rightful course of appointment, and have placed or continued power in unfaithful or incompetent hands."

Alas, sir, for the dilapidations, not only of matter but of principles, which the lapse of a few years is able to effect! Here, we have avowed the very principles upon which the fate of the late administration turned—reform, and the limitation of executive patronage to prevent undue executive influence upon elections. So intense was the excitement of the public mind upon this subject the last two years of the late administration, that it is my solemn conviction that, for one single act of direct interference in elections on the part of the gentleman who sits before me, [Mr. ADAMS,] he would have been impeached by this House. Yes, sir, I repeat, that for one act of interference of the nature of those which are now frequent and notorious, that gentleman would have been put upon his trial before the Senate of the United States! In proof of this, we have only to remember with what jealous vigilance every movement of the late Chief Magistrate and of every head of a Department was watched by their opponents. Why, sir, even a visit paid by one of them to his own State was made the subject of public reprobation; and the whole land was filled with the indignant murmurings of the stern and honest yeomanry against every act which had the appearance of executive electioneering. It would be a matter of amusing as well as of instructive history to turn over the pages of the opposition or Jackson journals of that day, and compare the principles then avowed by the Jackson party, by a party seeking power, with the practices of the same party after having been in power a few years. But I digress. To corroborate the first opinion of General Jackson upon the subject of executive interference in the election of a successor, we have the practice of every President of the United States, from Washington down to the present incumbent. We have the express authority of President Jefferson for saying that he felt himself restrained by his official station from intimating any preference between his political friends, even in private and confidential intercourse.

But, sir, the times have greatly changed since General Jackson came into power. The spirit of the age, not content with the wonderful advance in the intermediate period in all the arts, has infused itself into politics. The inventive genius of the times has been busy in this department also. New and improved plans of party organization and discipline have been started, and new conceptions formed of the uses to which the spirit of party may be applied. The idea of the existence of a party in the country of undefined and undefinable danger and designs upon the constitution is made at once the raw head and bloody bones to alarm the credulous and ignorant, and the pretext for a vigilant, rigid, and exclusive party association. This dangerous but invisible party may be, not inaptly, called the Devil of this new political system. As this new party is associated upon the alleged principle of preserving the country and the liberties of the people from that destruction which awaits both, if they should fall into the hands of the arch enemy, it is plausibly and conclusively argued that all the offices, emoluments, jobs, contracts, and agencies—in short, the whole revenue of the Government—should be distributed among its members. This party may change or shift its principles of policy or administration with the changing seasons themselves, but it may still maintain its original ground of being the only defenders of the liberties of the people! It may adopt and practise upon principles of ultra-federal policy to-day; it may practise upon the most latitudinarian doctrines to-morrow; it may follow in the narrow path of the straightest sect of the State rights party; it may re-enact the alien and sedition laws; it may commit every abuse known in the administration of the most corrupt Government; but still it will claim to be the exclusive champion of the constitution and the liberties of the people against the unknown and unknowable designs of a dangerous party; and this is sufficient to rally thousands to its standard. Who does not see that all that could justify party divisions in the country is wholly disregarded; that a new party is forming, composed of members of every political hue and complexion, and which must, from its very nature and composition, end in a mere association for sharing the spoils; and that the profession of any particular set of principles is only a device to delude? Sir, it is not General Jackson, then, that has changed, so much as the guiding spirits of that party which now claims to be his exclusive supporters; it is the influence and power of this new principle of party association, which begin to operate at the close of this administration, and which is expected to introduce and govern the course of the next.

But does there not exist at this time, or is there not undergoing the process of organization, a party, one of the fundamental maxims of which is, that all the offices, honors, and emoluments attached to political power belong of right to, and ought in propriety to be awarded to, the victorious in all party conflicts; a party which does not hesitate to avow this to be one of the principles upon which they associate as a party; a party which not only avows this principle as one of the landmarks of their future action, should they conquer in the present contest for the control of the Federal Government, but which, whenever in any State they have heretofore possessed themselves of the reins of power, has actually practised upon this principle. Is this not true of the party now in power in the State of New York, and is not the party now in power in that State the germe and nucleus around which it is proposed to form a great national party? I affirm that it is. And is there any form of military discipline, Russian, Prussian, or Austrian, more degrading and inexorable, and at the same time better calculated to subject the mass—the rank and file of the people—to the absolute control and guidance of a chief or chiefs, than the code of party tactics and discipline enforced by the dominant party in New York? The spirit of freedom and of free deliberation, among the members of the party, are suppressed, not indeed by the bayonet, but by a system scarcely less effective and terrible. While it holds out the lure of office to the obedient and faithful, it ordains extermination to the actual or alleged and arbitrarily proscribed offender. A man who shall have the independence to set the decrees of the party, however obtained, whether by the fiat of a single head or the resolves of a secret junto, at defiance, or shall refuse to support them in the primary assemblies of the people—assemblies called not to be primary in deliberation, but notoriously, as I understand it, called last to council in order to ratify what has been already decided; a man, I say, who dares to oppose the action of this system, no matter to what unjust or mischievous extremes it may lead, is not only stripped of all his privileges, and of whatever portion of the spoils which may have fallen to his lot in former triumphs, but he is to be tabooed—to have a black line drawn around him—in fine, to be shot as a deserter! I know of no parallel or any analogous practice in the history of the country, but what is recorded of the policy of the Five Nations of Indians, who once, from their castles and fastnesses in the country which now forms the State of New York, dictated the conduct of the subject tribes around them, extending at one time nearly a thousand miles to the south and to the west. These conquerors of the forest ordained what they called the law of the hunt, and wo and extermination were the lot of the unhappy tribe that unwittingly or otherwise happened or dared to violate it. The successors of these savages have, it seems, in a spirit of equal address and comprehension of design, established their law of the hunt, but not the hunt of the buffalo, of the bear, and of the beaver, but of the spoils! Those who have driven these savage visitors from their haunts have profited by their policy, and the subtlety and enterprise of the Mohawk are imitated and surpassed by their white invaders. But let them beware, and let those who regard the success of this system of party discipline with the same apprehension that I do, take courage from the historical fact that the Five Nations, terrible and powerful as they were, had bounds set to their ambition and their dominion. The Catawbas of South Carolina staid the torrent of desolation in its progress along the Atlantic border, though they were well nigh exterminated in the conflict; but when they were reduced to a very small number, they still resisted, made rich reprisals of blood upon their numerous and haughty foes, and still triumphantly held their country! But these conquerors of the North were successfully met, beaten, and driven back with slaughter, in frequent rencounters in another quarter. Along that whole line of country running east and west, and constituting what is now the State of Tennessee, the Indian proprietors maintained their ground in a contest of half a century, and still bid defiance to the hunters of all the country to the north and the north-west—ay, sir, and they were ready to submit to extermination rather than political slavery. The analogy might be traced further. In this war for national independence, waged by the natives of this noble tract of country, they had to encounter, not the Five Nations and their allies of the North and West only, but often a combination of some of the tribes of the South—their own natural allies; but still they stood and fought undismayed, and were finally victorious!

Sir, I believe I have not misrepresented the policy and discipline of the party now in power in the State of New York; I mean, in affirming that all the offices of the State are regarded as the property, as of course, of the victorious in a party contest. If I am not mistaken, it is no secret that such is the established policy; nay, that scarcely any man of any party (so well and permanently is this system ingrafted upon the people of that State) ever thinks of questioning or opposing it. It is regarded as a thing not only settled, but admissible and justifiable, by the politicians on both sides. But it is not in the State of New York alone that this system of party tactics has found favor. It prevails, to a considerable extent, in Pennsylvania, in New Jersey, in Maine, and it has absolute control in New Hampshire. In how many other States it has made a successful lodgment, I know not. I am aware that it may be asked, what danger there is in all this, either to the prosperity or the liberties of the country? This is precisely the point to which I invoke the serious attention of those who hear me. I wish I could extend my voice to the utmost bounds of the country in the discussion of this point.

Without intending to impute mercenary motives to all its members, I maintain that such a party must necessarily and inevitably become mercenary, and utterly regardless of all consistency and sound principle. In whatever State this has become the established practice of the dominant or of antagonist parties, there you will find the most flagrant instances of sudden changes, not only in the course of individuals, but of entire parties, whenever party interests are concerned—the most corrupt practices in the public administration, the greatest excesses and abuses in elections, and the most degraded state of public morals. These attributes of a corrupt and vicious party association are more visible and striking in every State where it exists, in proportion to the amount of executive patronage. In some States, in which the judges are appointed for short terms, they are compelled to share the fate of every other official incumbent. But how can any other motive or interest than the success of the party become the leading and governing one, when every officer of the State and of the United States, from the highest to the lowest; in the United States, from the head of a Department down to a petty postmaster, or a gauger in the customs; and in the States, from the judge of a court down to the clerk of an inferior court, or a lock-keeper upon a canal, must be removed to give place to the hungry partisans of a new and triumphant party? No length of service, no degree of fidelity in the discharge of official duties, no state of dependence upon the receipts of an office, however small, can save the wretched incumbent from the general law of the hunt, the fate of the conquered. Besides the general servility and hypocrisy which such a practice cannot fail to introduce, a long train of evils besides is obliged to follow from the success of a political combination of this nature. Incompetent and unfaithful officers and agents are thrust into the most important public stations; the public service and interest suffer accordingly. Subordinate officers, instead of relying upon their diligence, skill, and fidelity in the discharge of their official duties, for their continuance in office, compromise with their consciences for a neglect of duty by contributing largely to the success of the party in the management of caucuses, public meetings, and elections; they look to the chiefs of the party to connive at their delinquencies, and to sustain them in office in consideration of their zeal and activity in the general cause. It follows, for the same reasons, that the first offices in the State and General Governments are liable to be filled by men equally incompetent and unfaithful. It matters not who is Governor of a State or President of the United States, what may be his principles, his personal or political character, provided he possesses what is called party fidelity, and has tact enough to wield the patronage and influence of his office according to party law and usage, and so as to advance, not the cause of the country, but of the party!

If it be true that any party avows the doctrine that to the victors belong the spoils of office; if it be true that it is the practice of that party to put none into office but those of their own party, and suffer none to remain in office but such as are already, or may be willing to become, partisans of those in power, can a President elected by such a party choose to do otherwise than to use the patronage of the Government, intrusted to him by the laws and constitution, according to the same rule? Must he not, in the first place, so distribute it as to secure his own election for a second term; and afterwards, is he not bound by the laws and usages of the party of which he is the official head, to use his whole influence, and the entire means in his hands, to secure the election of that man for his successor who shall be chosen according to the same party usage, to wit, a national caucus, which brought him into power? I repeat the question, can he do otherwise than interfere in elections, and employ the whole patronage of the Government in controlling them? If I am not mistaken in this, a President elected by means of this system is, by the act of his induction into power, by the very terms of his engagement with his political associates, bound to prostitute those great powers and that immense patronage intrusted to him by the constitution, to be administered exclusively for the good of the whole country, to objects of individual aggrandizement and ambition. The seeds, then, of this mischief of executive interference are sown much deeper than one would suppose, upon a superficial view of the subject. They lie deeply imbedded in this new system of party tactics and discipline which threatens to fasten its deadly and corrupting fangs upon every State of this Union. Whatever blame, therefore, may attach, in the mind of any, to the course of the President upon this subject, let the responsibility be attached to the sources of the evil—let it be traced to its proper head. Having shown that this practice of executive interference is a necessary result of a principle of party association, let any one attempt to strain his fancy to conceive all the consequences of the success of this system—the degradation of the national character, the mean grade of ambition which must distinguish the leading men of the country—the general corruption.

Will any man hereafter affirm that the one hundred thousand office-holders, agents, contractors, and dependents upon the Government in some form or other, are any longer to be safely trusted with the right of suffrage in the elections of a free people? Sir, the friends of the purity and freedom of the elective franchise in this country should take a lesson upon this subject from the practice of a Government in form less free than our own—I mean Great Britain; and I beg leave to refer to her statutes, not only for depriving the official dependants upon the Government from voting, but prohibiting, under severe penalties, the slightest interference of public officers in elections. The statutes referred to are the following:

"And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid,

JUNE 23, 1836.]

Improvement of Harbors.

That from and after the nine-and-twentieth day of September, one thousand seven hundred and one, no commissioner, collector, comptroller, searcher, or other officer or person whatsoever, concerned or employed in the charging, collecting, levying, or managing the customs, or any branch or part thereof, shall, by word, message, or writing, or in any other manner whatsoever, endeavor to persuade any elector to give, or dissuade any elector from giving, his vote for the choice of any person to be a knight of the shire, citizen, Burgess, or baron, of any county, city, borough, or cinque port, to serve in Parliament; and every officer or other person offending therein shall forfeit the sum of one hundred pounds, one moiety thereof to the informer, the other moiety to the poor of the parish where such offence shall be committed; to be recovered by any person that shall sue for the same by action of debt, bill, plaint, or information, in any of his Majesty's courts of record at Westminster, in which no esson, protection, or wager of law, of more than one imparence, shall be allowed; and every person convicted on any such suit of the said offence, shall thereby become disabled and incapable of ever bearing or executing any office or place concerning or relating to the customs, or any other office or place of trust whatsoever, under his Majesty, his heirs or successors."—12 and 13 William III, C. 10.

"And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That no commissioner, officer, or other person, concerned or employed in the charging, collecting, receiving, or managing, any of the duties granted by this act, shall, by word, message, or writing, or in any other manner, endeavor to persuade any elector to give, or dissuade any elector from giving, his vote for his choice of any person to be knight of the shire, commissioner, citizen, Burgess, or baron, for any county, city, borough, or cinque port; and every officer or other person offending therein shall forfeit the sum of one hundred pounds, one moiety thereof to the informer, the other moiety thereof to the use of the poor of the parish or place where such offence shall be committed; to be recovered by any person that shall sue for the same, by action of debt, bill, plaint, or information, in any of her Majesty's courts of record at Westminster, or in the court of exchequer in that part of Great Britain called Scotland, in which no esson, protection, privilege, or wager of law, of more than one imparence, shall be allowed; and every person convicted on any such suit shall thereby become disabled and incapable of ever bearing or executing any office or place of trust whatsoever under her Majesty, her heirs, and successors."—10 Anne, C. 19.

"For the better securing the freedom of elections of members to serve in Parliament, be it enacted by the King's Most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, that, from and after the first day of August, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-two, no commissioner, collector, supervisor, gauger, or other officer or person whatsoever, concerned or employed in the charging, collecting, levying, or managing the duties of excise, or any branch or part thereof; nor any commissioner, collector, comptroller, searcher, or other officer or person whatsoever, concerned or employed in the charging, collecting, levying, or managing the customs, or any branch or part thereof; nor any commissioner, officer, or other person concerned or employed in collecting, receiving, or managing any of the duties on stamped vellum, parchment, and paper; nor any person appointed by the commissioners for distributing of stamps; nor any commissioner, officer, or other person employed in collecting, levying, or managing any of the duties on salt; nor any surveyor, collector, comptroller, inspector, officer, or other person employed in collecting, managing, or receiving the duties on windows or houses; nor any postmaster, postmaster general, or his or their deputy or deputies, or any person employed by or under him or them in receiving; nor any captain, master, or mate, of any ship, packet, or other vessel employed by or under the postmaster or postmasters general, in conveying the mail to and from foreign ports, shall be capable of giving his vote for the election of any knight of the shire, commissioner, citizen, Burgess, or baron, to serve in Parliament, for any county, stewardry, city, borough, or cinque port; or for choosing any delegate in whom the right of electing members to serve in Parliament, for that part of Great Britain called Scotland, is vested. And if any person hereby made incapable of voting as aforesaid shall nevertheless presume to give his vote, during the time he shall hold, or within twelve calendar months after he shall cease to hold or execute any of the offices aforesaid, contrary to the true intent and meaning of this act, such votes so given shall be held null and void to all intents and purposes whatsoever; and every person so offending shall forfeit the sum of one hundred pounds."—22 George III, C. 41.

But the obligation of party service which attaches to all office-holders under this new system extends far beyond a mere espousal of the interests of the party in power. Each one is bound to show himself worthy of his station, and to render a full equivalent for his office, by his zeal and success in controlling the sentiments and politics of his particular district or community. But this is not the full extent of the danger which threatens, from this source, the freedom of elections. Besides the corps of actual incumbents and dependants of all sorts upon the Government, there are in the United States, probably, one hundred thousand men who are either actual office-seekers, or who may be induced to give their influence and their votes in favor of the dominant party, by the promise of office, however deceitful that may be, in thousands of instances.

Let any one attempt to calculate the force and influence of a band of two hundred thousand partisans of any man or any party in power in this country, united and goaded on by the hope of reward, or a feeling of dependence for their places, and, in many instances, for the very subsistence of their families, upon the success of their efforts in a common cause. Who will undertake to estimate the effects to be produced, not only upon the spirit, but the very forms of this Government, by the introduction into the service of a successful party, and for its protection and support, of a guard of one hundred thousand men, who hold their employment by the tenure of party service, and these distributed over the whole Union—diffused among the whole people—all acting by one impulse, and with a view to a common end! Sir, these are, hereafter, to constitute the praetorian guards of America, to ratify the appointment of a successor by the Executive. I have read that there was a time, since the Revolution, when there was danger of the ascendancy of monarchical principles; but, sir, never has any thing tended so directly to such a result, and that at no very distant period, as the countenance which is now given by a large proportion of the people to the doctrines and practices of this new party. In one view of the subject, it would be just to denounce every supporter of this new system of party tactics a monarchist, for it is not the intention, but the tendency, the result of measures and practices, which constitute their supporters monarchists, or otherwise. That each successive President will appoint his successor, if this system shall once be firmly established in practice, and fairly ingrafted upon all the States, is as certain as that the sun shines this day in the heavens; and this will continue, until by some terrible shock, by some outrage, most commonly the result of the long continuance of power in the same hands, the people shall be roused to resistance. Even now, sir—even now, when this hydra has shot forth less than half its monstrous progeny, does not every member of this House know and feel, does not every sharp-sighted office-holder and office-seeker throughout the Union know and feel, that the only road to executive patronage and favor lies in an actual or well-affected devotion to the interests of a particular candidate for the presidency? And this has been the state of things for more than a year; and yet there has been no effectual rising of the people! But eight years ago, if such a state of things had been understood to exist, such a burning heat would have been suddenly kindled in this land, such a consuming fire would have raged in this hall, as to have left no vestige of a party which would then have dared to practice upon such a principle. I entreat the House, I conjure the country, to look to the future results of this state of things. Nay, sir, I conjure them to look to present results. Have not the power and influence of the Executive been felt in the elections of members of this House? Has not the power of the Executive been felt in the deliberations and action of this House? How long will it be before the practice of appointing the presiding officer of this House by the President shall be ripened into usage? How long before the Speakership shall be but an appendage of executive patronage, to be disposed of like every other office or station, for the benefit of the party? When these things shall come to pass, where then will be those divisions of the powers of sovereignty into separate departments, which have ever been regarded as the greatest safeguards of our liberties? Where will be your separate and independent legislative department—where your judiciary, for that too must soon yield under the present pressure? Sir, with the powers and influence of the Executive, as at present exercised, this Government is an elective monarchy. It is well that we no longer deceive ourselves with names. It is this day an elective monarchy. The sum of executive power and patronage justifies this appellation. The consideration and circumstance of state conceded to the President justify this new cognomen. I beg leave to refer to several passages of the report made by a leading member of the party in 1826, [Mr. BENTON,] in the Senate of the United States, upon the subject of executive power and patronage, as strongly corroborative of these views:

“Although the impression was nearly universal, that a Government of more energetic character had become indispensably necessary, yet even under the influence of this conviction—such was the dread of power and patronage—that the States with extreme reluctance yielded their assent to the establishment of the Federal Government. Nor was this the effect of idle and visionary fears on the part of an ignorant multitude, without knowledge of the nature and tendency of power. On the contrary, it resulted from the most extensive and profound political knowledge—from the heads of statesmen unsurpassed, in any age, in sagacity and patriotism. Nothing could reconcile the great men of that day to a constitution of so much power, but the guards which were put upon it against the abuse of power. Dread and jealousy of this abuse displayed itself throughout the instrument. To this spirit we are indebted for the freedom of the press, trial by jury, liberty of conscience, freedom of debate, responsibility to constituents, power of impeachment, the control of the Senate in appointments to office.”

“The action of such a body of men, supposing them to be animated by one spirit, must be tremendous in an election; and that they will be so animated, is a proposition too plain to need demonstration. Power over a man's support has always been held and admitted to be power over his will. The President has ‘power’ over the ‘support’ of all these officers; and they again have ‘power’ over the ‘support’ of debtor merchants to the amount of ten millions of dollars per annum, and over the daily support of an immense number of individuals, professional, mechanical, and day-laboring, to whom they can and will extend or deny a valuable private as well as public patronage, according to the part which they shall act in State as well as in Federal elections. Still this is only a branch, a mere prong, of federal patronage in the city of New York.”

“Every where, to the extreme frontier of the remotest State or Territory, federal patronage will be found, in degree and force, proportionate to the population of the place, and forever augmented with the increasing power of the Government. Diminution of patronage is not thought of; the state of the custom-house in Norfolk is already pregnant proof of this. This power of patronage, unless checked by the vigorous interposition of Congress, must go on increasing until federal influence, in many parts of this confederation, will predominate in elections as completely as British influence predominates in the elections of Scotland and Ireland, in rotten borough towns, and in the great naval stations of Portsmouth and Plymouth. In no part of the practical operation of the Federal Government have the predictions of its ablest advocates been more completely falsified than on this subject of patronage.”

“The whole of this great power will centre in the President. The King of England is the ‘fountain of honor;’ the President of the United States is the source of patronage. He presides over the entire system of federal appointments, jobs, and contracts. He has ‘power’ over the ‘support’ of the individuals who administer the system. He makes and unmakes them. He chooses from the circle of his friends and supporters, and may dismiss them, and, upon all the principles of human action, will dismiss them as often as they disappoint his expectations. His spirit animates their actions in all the elections to State and Federal offices. There may be exceptions, but the truth of a general rule is proved by the exception. The intended check and control of the Senate, without new constitutional or statutory provisions, will cease to operate. Patronage will penetrate this body, subdue its capacity of resistance, chain it to the car of power, and enable the President to rule as easily, and much more securely with than without the nominal check of the Senate.”

“We must then look forward to the time when the public revenue will be doubled; when the civil and military officers of the Federal Government will be quadrupled; when its influence over individuals will be multiplied to an indefinite extent; when the nomination by the President can carry any man through the Senate, and his recommendation can carry any measure through the two Houses of Congress; when the principle of public action will be open and avowed—the President wants my vote, and I want his patronage; I will vote as he wishes, and he will give me the office I wish for. What will this be but the government of one man? And what is the government of one man but a monarchy? Names are nothing. The nature of a thing is in its substance, and the name soon accommodates itself to the substance. The first Roman Emperor was styled Emperor of the Republic, and the last French Emperor took the same title; and their respective countries were just as essentially monarchical before as after the assumption of these titles. It cannot be denied or dissembled but that this Federal Government gravitates to the same point, and that the election of the Executive by the Legislature quickens the impulsion.”

When, by the use of the enormous amount of patronage vested in the President, he shall be able to control the elections of a majority of the members of both Houses of Congress, the Government of the United States will not only be an elective monarchy, but the monarch so elected will be absolute; and when a President shall establish the practice of appointing his successor, either directly or indirectly, it will be, in substance, an hereditary monarchy. Why, sir, the evil of consolidation, the stumbling-block of the old Virginia school of politicians—that consolidation the fear of which operated so powerfully at one time in that ancient Commonwealth as to endanger the adoption of the constitution, and often afterwards threatened to paralyze the action of the Government—is upon the eve of being realized! But where now are the spirit and eloquence of her Henrys—where sleep her Pendletons, her Nicholases, her Masons, her Roanes, and her Jeffersons, in this day, when the crisis has actually come? Where are the successors and descendants of those illustrious champions of free government that the country might expect to see leading the van—standing, like their sires of old, in the front of the battle, and urging on their countrymen to the charge, against every advance of the Executive to increased or absolute power? Sir, when the President openly throws the whole weight of his authority and influence into the scale of a particular candidate for the succession—when the patronage connected with all the public establishments, when the millions of money annually at the disposal of the Executive, are to be administered and distributed for the purpose of controlling the legislative department of the Government, and of securing the presidency to a succession of designated political adventurers, and of consolidating all power in the hands of a chief of a party, with one or two distinguished exceptions, we find the lineal party descendants in this House of the most illustrious band of patriots and statesmen that ever, at any one time, adorned a single Commonwealth, lending the honors of their ancestry, the fame of their patriot sires, the glorious recollections of their stern republican principles and virtues, to gild over the deformities and to promote the success of a party which, from its very nature and fundamental doctrines, leads inevitably to the catastrophe which was ever the source of the greatest dread and consternation to their fathers!

The accelerated and downward course of sound maxims and principles in a free Government, when once the impulse is given in that direction, was never more strongly illustrated than in the change which has taken place in the principles and practices of the original Jackson party, and the party now in power, and which claims to be identical with it. It is but a few brief years since, that an infant effort of that party which afterwards with a giant's strength overthrew every thing that opposed it, did as much to accomplish the final undoing of the late administration as any other movement of the most vigilant and energetic combinations ever formed in this country: and pray, sir, what do you suppose that infant effort was? Simply a resolution offered to this House by a gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. Saunders,] calling upon the Secretary of State to inform the House of the reasons which had impelled him to take the printing of the laws from certain publishers of newspapers who had long performed that service for the Government, and to give it to his own political friends. This proceeding was contemporaneous with the report of a distinguished Senator from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] upon the subject of executive patronage, to which I have already referred. The report deprecated the further increase of the patronage of the Government, and was accompanied by six bills to limit and prevent the abuse of it. This movement was followed up at the succeeding Congress by the celebrated debate and report, founded upon the retrenchment resolutions introduced into this House by a member from Kentucky.

These, sir, were the sources from which the Jackson party at that day drew its principal nutriment. This was the milk upon which the young Hercules was fed, who sat out with the professed determination of clearing the land of all political robbers and impostors, but who, now that he is full grown, and without a rival, threatens to become himself the greatest impostor and robber of the age. I speak of the party, not of its head. Suppose, sir, that any member of the House should, at this day, bring forward a resolution calling upon the President or any of the heads of Departments for his reasons for withholding the patronage within his control from an opponent who had long enjoyed it, and bestowing it upon a political favorite, would he not be considered a man demented by every member of the party which now assumes the name, and professes to act upon the principles, of the true Jackson party? The mover of such a resolution would be regarded as a second Rip Van Winkle—one who had just awaked after a sleep of years, and found himself far in the rear of the improvement of the age. But, sir, who could have supposed that so great a change in public sentiment could have taken place in the space of six or seven years? Who could have supposed that this change could have been produced in the same nominal party? A party, too, which, in the face of the whole people of the United States, claims to be identical with the party which differed so widely from them a few years ago! This question of patronage was not then a subordinate one; it was first and chief; it was regarded as vital.

But these proceedings do not afford the most striking evidence which exists of the singularly opposite sentiment which prevailed at that day, from those which are avowed and practised upon by the same nominal party at this day. The member from North Carolina, [Mr. Saunders,] who brought forward the resolution of inquiry to which I have adverted, complained that the Secretary of State had violated a sound principle in taking from an individual, not an office, but a job, the publishing of the laws, who had before that time performed that duty faithfully, to confer it upon a political partisan; but the idea that the Executive would ever dare to vacate an office, or remove an officer, for opinion's sake, never entered the imagination of that gentleman, as may be fairly inferred from his argument. That gentleman was then so great a puritan upon that subject, that he shrunk with horror from the idea that any President would ever dare to remove a faithful public officer; yet we find that identical person, while enjoying a salary of three thousand a year as an officer of the Government, lately attending a political meeting at Baltimore, and becoming the second person at that meeting in activity and zeal, in order to promote the success of a party which openly avows the justice and propriety of the practice of making all offices in the control of the Executive the prizes and rewards of party service and party triumphs! That gentleman does not appear to me to have improved his political principles as he has grown older. His early principles were the best; and so well am I convinced that the day that the new doctrines espoused by him shall be established and acquiesced in by the people will be near the last days of the republic, that, for the first instance which shall occur of the removal of a faithful public officer by a President of the United States, to make a place for a political partisan, while I have the honor of a seat upon this floor, I will vote his impeachment by this House, as for an abuse of power, a misdemeanor the most dangerous which can exist under the Government. Mr. Jefferson, sir, had as good a will to do an act of this kind as any man who was ever President; but his patriotism, his principles, and his sense of duty, restrained him. He saw and he shrunk from the consequences of such a practice. Mr. Jefferson made the proper distinction, and took the true ground, when he declared that any interference of a public officer in the elections would be good cause for removal.

Sr, I put the question, what difference can there be between the appointment of a successor, by the use of executive patronage and influence, in the name of a party, and as the head of a party, and the appointment of the President, as, and in the name of, the President, in virtue of his office? No practical statesman will say there is any difference in substance and effect.

But it is said—I have heard it repeatedly said, and it is the drift of one half the canting matter which fills the columns of the party press—that the principles which are at stake in the present contest for political power in the United States are of such vital importance to the rights and liberties of the people, and to the preservation of our free institutions, that every influence, whether strictly regular or not, ought to be brought to bear, in order to insure the success of the republican party; and it is clamorously urged, that certain usages of the party are important to be preserved, in order to keep the party together. What all those usages are I do not certainly know. Some of them are avowed. The first and most important appears to be the practice of caucus nominations. Another one is, that all offices are of right the property of and ought to be given to the professing members of that party. It follows, that removals from office for opinion sake are justifiable and proper, in order to conform to this usage. Upon the same principle, and for the same reason, the patronage and influence of the President, he being the official head of the party, ought to be thrown into the scale of the candidate for the succession selected according to the party usage of caucus nomination. The sum of the argument is, that the present political condition of the country is like the case of an invasion by a public enemy—that the crisis is extraordinary, and demands extraordinary remedies, and that a regard for safe precedents or constitutional restraints ought not to stand in the way of the salvation of the country; in other words, that we have arrived at such a crisis in our civil affairs, that, if a similar state of things were to occur in time of war, martial law ought to be declared. Whether the condition of the country—whether the principles and designs of any party in this country, are of a nature so wicked and mischievous as to justify such a remedy or not, the fact is, that a sort of law martial has been proclaimed, and the proper officers and authorities are actively engaged in carrying it into execution in every part of the Union. Without pausing to inquire to what catastrophe the success of any of the obnoxious and so much dreaded parties in this country could lead, more disastrous, more directly subversive of the very foundation-stones of our glorious political edifice, than the establishment of these new and unwarrantable doctrines and practices, I propose to inquire, for a moment, what the principles of this party are, which thus generously steps forward and proceeds to officiate as the only safe guardian of our dearest rights. I mean to inquire what the principles of this party are, not what the members of it profess. I wish also to inquire what assurances, what guarantees, it can give, from the past conduct and principles of its leaders, that it is fit to be trusted with the entire political power of the country. As this party claims to be the Jackson party, I propose to apply the proper tests upon this point also.

The first and most decisive ground assumed by the original Jackson party was against caucus nominations. The most fatal blow aimed at Mr. Crawford was this denunciation of the alleged usage of the old republican party. Mr. Crawford fell under it; but I do not intend to dwell further upon this point now.

Next to the attack made upon the caucus system, the original Jackson party profited most by the principles it professed upon the subject of Government patronage. The original Jackson party held that the patronage of the Government was a trust for the public good and service, and that an administration which should deliberately seek to punish its opponents by removing them from office, and to reward its partisans by bestowing the vacant employments upon them, deserved to be degraded and expelled from their station, and to receive the execrations of an indignant people. These, sir, were the doctrines and sentiments of the true and genuine Jackson party, and they were held to be vital in the creed of that party. What are the doctrines and practices now of the party which claims to be the same? Why, sir, that the spoils of office are the rightful property of the victors—that the patronage is what they have a title to—that this is one of the usages which it is essential to the preservation of the party to observe. As a natural and inevitable result of this usage, it is the duty of the President to administer the patronage of the Government so as to advance the interests of the party. So much for executive patronage, and the doctrines of this new republican party in respect to the manner in which it shall be distributed. It seems that all the old notions of the republican party, in relation to the proper end and use of patronage, are now regarded as old fashioned, exploded, and, in fact, anti-republican!

I now proceed to notice some of the more important questions, which may be regarded as testing the principles of the party, in the order in which they have arisen for the decision of Congress. The first which presented itself was the subject of internal improvement by the General Government, involving both the expediency of the system proposed and the constitutional power of Congress over the subject. In the South and Southwest, with few exceptions, the members of the Jackson party were strenuously opposed to the whole scheme; in Virginia, South Carolina, and Georgia, upon constitutional grounds. This was supposed to be a fair test question between the republican and federal parties; the great line of principle which separated them being the proper rule of interpreting the constitution—whether strictly, and with a view to limit the power and patronage of the Government; or liberally, with a view to enlarge its powers and give greater strength to its action. In the North and West, however, the members of the Jackson party differed from their political allies of the other sections, and strenuously maintained both the expediency of a system of internal improvement, and the power of the Government to carry it into effect. The Jackson party in Kentucky, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Pennsylvania, were the leading patrons and advocates of the system. Even after the veto of the Maysville road bill, the party in the States north of the Ohio continued to support the administration, upon the ground of the exception made in the veto message in favor of the Cumberland road; and the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, have continued their allegiance upon the condition that large annual appropriations should be made to complete that great highway. So far, then, as regards those States and that great and splendid work, the projected system of internal improvement has been sanctioned by the General Government. It is pretended that this exception is justified by the compact between the Federal Government and the States north of the Ohio, which stipulated that a certain proportion of the proceeds of the public lands in those States should be applied to the construction of a road from the Atlantic to those States. Is it not so? When the stipulated proportion of the proceeds of the public lands was applied from time to time, the terms of the compact were fulfilled, and the power of the Federal Government ceased. A question might be made, whether the Federal Government had any authority under the constitution to enter into such a com-fact; but, admitting that it had, still the truth is, that a system of internal improvement has been sustained by the present administration, however partial the execution of it may have been. There has not been a single appropriation to that road made since General Jackson came into power, which could be justified by the compact. The practical and effective compact under which these appropriations have been made, is the tacit one, that the moment appropriations for this road cease, the States concerned will no longer give their support to the administration. Such, sir, from the first, have been the loose principles of the party upon this question—a question which, I think, Virginia and Georgia will admit to be a test question. All, or nearly all, the gentlemen of the Northwest who belong to the dominant party in this House are to this day the advocates of a system of internal improvement. So are those from Pennsylvania; and so from Kentucky: all good internal improvement men. Let us test the pretensions of that party which unites with such hearty good will upon all questions of a party nature in this House, to be regarded as the exclusive depositaries of republican principles, by circumstances a little more specific and particular. I may be too particular to be altogether agreeable to individuals, but this is a question of high principle, and it is necessary to be explicit.

I suppose no one will question but that the principles of the two distinguished gentlemen selected by the dominant party to fill the two highest offices in the Government may be truly and fairly held to be the principles of the party, as such, which supports them. Well, sir, the gentleman from Kentucky, who has been selected to bet he candidate of the party for the vice presidency, leaves us nothing to doubt as to his opinions upon the subject of internal improvement. He avows his views upon this subject candidly, and as becomes a man, in his letter accepting the nomination of the Baltimore convention. That distinguished gentleman thinks that all works of internal improvement should, for various sound reasons, which he enumerates, be carried on by the States, except such as are universally admitted to be of a national character. This is going quite as far as any advocate of internal improvement has ever gone in this House. No man, nor any party, has, in my knowledge, ever contended that the Federal Government ought to construct any works except such as are of a national character. It is true that Virginia appears to hesitate a little at the idea of giving its support to this nomination, but my friend from Kentucky need not be uneasy at this; the party in that State are only preparing to take him with a better grace, or to connive at his election. That State has given her sanction to principles and practices far more odious and monstrous to the sense of the real republicans of the country, than any principle of his to which they have taken exception. But a more important inquiry is, what are the principles of the nominee of the Baltimore convention for the presidency, (Mr. Van Buren,) and what is to be his course upon the subject of internal improvement? If any man knows what his principles are, or what his course is likely to be upon this subject, from any thing he has explicitly stated or avowed, he is more fortunate than myself. If there is any friend of his in this House who is better informed than myself, I hope he will do that gentleman the justice to let us know what his principles really are in relation to this subject. But, sir, I do know what the principles of that gentleman are understood to be, and what his course is expected to be in the States north of the Ohio. There, sir, he is represented by his friends, and is believed by the people, to be in favor of a system of internal improvement by the General Government. This is the general belief in those States. Some of his more judicious friends, I understand, represent that he is an advocate for internal improvement so far as relates to the interests and wants of those States; and this satisfies the people. Now, sir, I call upon the members of this House who represent any of those States, and are friendly to the election of that gentleman, to correct me, if I have misstated or misconceived the belief which prevails in that section of the Union in relation to the principles and probable course of Mr. Van Buren upon the subject of internal improvement. It is due alike to him and to themselves that they should state whether these things be true or not. It is needless to say that in the South that gentleman is understood to entertain principles directly the opposite of those ascribed to him north of the Ohio. Sir, it is a singular fact that, in the exposition of the relative prospects of Mr. Van Buren and Judge White for the presidency, contained in an early and ably written article of the Nashville Union, a newspaper got up for the express purpose of advancing the interests of the Vice President in Tennessee, the ground was openly assumed, and, considering where it was done, and under whose auspices, it was most audaciously assumed, that Judge White could not get the votes of the States north of the Ohio, by reason of his rigid course and opinions upon the subject of internal improvement, but Mr. Van Buren, it was left to be inferred, might. And why, sir, could this representative head, that is to be, of the exclusive republican party in this country, get the votes of those States? Let the Southern gentlemen who support him answer this question. It is worthy of notice, because very small circumstances sometimes indicate the most important results, that this article of the Nashville Union was republished in the Richmond Enquirer, and, as I remember, without comment upon this point. I have said enough upon this subject to show that a system of internal improvement by the Federal Government will find no impediment in the principles of the two gentlemen who are supported for the two highest offices of the Government.

The next question which was presented under the present administration, and which was regarded as in any degree a test of parties, was the high tariff policy—a policy thought to be so intimately connected with a system of internal improvement as to constitute one great and united system of national policy, called the American system: a system which was the perfect abomination of the South, and to no party apparently more so than to that party in Virginia which now claims to number in its ranks the only genuine republicans of that far-famed Commonwealth. Well, sir, both the candidates of that party to which Virginia adheres for the two highest offices known to the constitution voted for the tariff of 1828—the most odious, and, upon every principle, the most indefensible act of legislation which grew out of the combined and mutual interests of the so-called American system. It may be, and it has a thousand times been said, that those gentlemen voted as they did upon that question to sustain their party. That may be true; but that is precisely the objection I have to them, or, rather, to the party of which they are the leaders. These gentlemen will do the same thing again, or any thing else equally or more obnoxious, to sustain their party. This is the true objection to the party which is now forming in the United States, and to any party whose only bond of union is the expectation of sharing the patronage of the Government. Interests, purely of a party nature, are obliged to subvert all regard for sound principles, and to become paramount to them. When such a party shall obtain power, even the obligations of law and duty become subordinate considerations. A general relaxation of morals, and of all the ties which give security to society, ensues.

I shall notice the question of nullification but briefly. The country found itself, in relation to that subject, in a new and extreme emergency: and extreme remedies were the natural consequence. In the decision to which Congress came upon that lamented contest between the authorities of the Federal Government and the State of South Carolina, those who now call themselves the exclusive republican party were found acting in concert and harmony with ultra federalists. So far, therefore, as regards the subject of nullification, the present exclusive and proscriptive party in power can claim to have won no new laurels for the brow of democracy. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Towns] has thought proper to taunt me upon the subject of my vote upon this subject. Sir, I do not regret, nor would I recall, my vote upon that subject, however much I regretted the occasion of it. I lamented the errors of South Carolina as much as I disapproved the policy which provoked her to extremes.

I have omitted to notice, in its proper order, the question of the relative jurisdiction and sovereignty of the States and Federal Government over the Indian tribes and territories within the limits of the States. I intend, however, to pass it over with a remark or two only. This, it is well known, was one of the most delicate and difficult questions which has arisen under this Government. The Jackson party was divided upon the policy of removal—an expedient adopted by the administration in order to avoid greater embarrassments, which were likely to arise in our Indian relations. With a few exceptions, the entire Pennsylvania delegation were opposed to the administration upon this subject, yet Georgia and Pennsylvania are equally united and zealous in proscribing and exterminating, according to party law and usage, the very man [Judge White] who contributed more than any other single member of Congress to carry that question in favor of Georgia! Can this be a party founded upon principle?

I come now to the last great test question, the Bank of the United States, and propose to inquire briefly into the consistency and principles of the party in relation to that subject. A full and candid history of this question would be a most interesting and instructive acquisition to the country. I do not mean to become the advocate or apologist of the bank. I notice the subject merely as a means of illustrating the true character of the party which now assumes exclusive pretensions to orthodox and consistent principles. In the first place, it is proper to be remarked that the gentleman who has been designated to head this self-styled republican party, or exquisites, as they really hold themselves, for the next eight years, (Mr. Van Buren,) in his celebrated speech upon the rules of the Senate, which he intended to be a full exposition of his political opinions, kept himself so neatly and exactly balanced upon the question of the bank, as to be able to fall with grace and safety either way, according to the exigency of his affairs. That I may not appear to do him injustice upon this point, I will read from his speech what he says upon this point.

After referring to the former opinions of Mr. Madison upon the question of constitutional power, and stating that he had yielded a reluctant assent to the late charter, Mr. Van Buren, in the speech alluded to, proceeds thus:

"His assent was now placed on the express ground that the recognition of the authority of the Government, in relation to the old bank, by the State Governments and the courts, as well as the people, had precluded the question of constitutionality. Thus, the power in question must stand as a successful interpolation of the constitution." * * * "For his departure in that particular, (if departure it was,) his reasons have been seen." * * * "It is not, at this time, my official duty to pass upon their sufficiency; and I am wholly unwilling to volunteer a denunciation of any opinion, deliberately formed, by one of the most, if not the most, accomplished statesmen that our country has produced."

It is manifest from these passages that the Vice President has laid aside all constitutional scruples upon the constitutional question. He regards the power to establish a bank as a successful interpolation upon the constitution. It is in relation to the sufficiency of the reasons upon which Mr. Madison acted, in thus interpolating a new power, which he (Mr. Van Buren) will not volunteer an opinion; his opinion was volunteered, and expressed plainly enough, as to the effect of Mr. Madison's course in giving his sanction to the bill chartering the late United States Bank. In his opinion, the power can no longer be questioned. But the President himself, (General Jackson,) although he was known by his particular friends to entertain opinions unfavorable to the bank, and these were communicated to Congress in his first message, yet this communication, and all succeeding ones, were so cautiously and oracularly worded, that his best friends could not, with certainty, infer what his course would be upon the question of recharter, until 1832, when the passage of the bill for that purpose compelled him to act unequivocally. From various facts and circumstances, I feel authorized to say that, notwithstanding the President's early prejudices against the bank, he had made up his mind either to recharter the late one, with some modifications, or, at all events, to charter a new one as a substitute for it. I had various reasons for this opinion, and besides the evidence I had of the fact, a circumstance entitled to no little weight was, that certain gentlemen, who have always been distinguished for a sort of intuitive tact in never forming any opinion in advance of those in power, even upon the most important and vital questions, and certain others who, I knew, could never differ with General Jackson upon any subject, were at fault upon this question. You may remember, sir, that in all the discussions which grew out of the resolutions of a gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. Clayton,] proposing an examination into the affairs of the bank; ay, sir, even in the very elaborate report of the minority of the Committee of Ways and Means, in 1832, upon this subject, not a single remark could be detected which indicated how either of these classes of gentlemen, to whom I have alluded, would vote upon the question of recharter. On the contrary, it was evident that those wary gentlemen studiously kept the door wide open, and reserved to themselves the utmost freedom of action, so far as regarded any committal in this House. But the messages of the President are decisive on this point, and leave no doubt that the President had determined, if all circumstances had been favorable, to recharter the late bank.

The language of the first message, in 1829, was, that "both the constitutionality and expediency of the law creating the present bank had been well questioned by a large portion of our fellow-citizens." In the same message he suggested the establishment of a national bank, "founded upon the credit of the Government and its revenues." In his annual message, in 1830, he stated "that nothing had occurred to lessen the dangers to be apprehended from the bank, as at present organized;" and he again suggested the inquiry, "whether it was not possible to secure all the advantages of the present bank, through the agency of a Bank of the United States, so modified in its principles and structure as to obviate all constitutional and other objections." In 1831 he referred to the opinions before expressed in relation to "the Bank of the United States, as at present organized." This was the last message which preceded the passage of the bill to recharter the bank. But this is not the last proof which the President gave that he had made up his mind to recharter the late bank. In his veto of the bill of 1832 he expresses himself in the following language: "I sincerely regret that, in the act before me, I can perceive none of those modifications of the bank charter which are necessary, in my opinion, to make it compatible with justice, with sound policy, or with the constitution of our country." Who now shall say that the President was not himself a bank man, or that he had not determined to recharter the late bank, had it received some modifications conformable to his views? But I am able to refer to some further evidence of the flexibility of the principles of the party upon this subject. The gentleman [Mr. Johnson] who was selected by the Baltimore convention to fill the second office in the Government, and to wear the second honor in the gift of the party, was notoriously an advocate of a bank, at the time he was nominated by the convention, whatever may be his views at this time of such an institution. The President himself has furnished the world with evidence which I have not yet noticed, that he is neither so much opposed to a bank, or to bank men, as the public have been made to believe. It is well known that, after the settlement of the deposite question, in 1834, the President had expressed a desire to reorganize his cabinet, so as to make it a unit, and, consequently, impart to it greater energy in carrying out the policy of his administration. Mr. McLane, of the State Department, was generally supposed to differ with the President in his views upon the subject of a bank, if not of the bank. He retired. Well, sir, how was his place filled? By a gentleman [Mr. Forsyth] distinguished enough, it is true, for his talents and services, but not at all remarkable for orthodox opinions upon the subject of the bank. That gentleman, in the debate upon the removal of the deposites, expressed a decided opinion in favor of the expediency of rechartering the bank, with some modifications! What, sir, are we to understand now, with all these facts before us, are the real doctrines and policy of the party in relation to this question of a bank? One thing at least is certain; and that is, that where there has been so much inconsistency, and so little regard for candor or principle heretofore, there can be no ground of confidence for the future. It will scarcely surprise this House, after what I have shown in relation to the opinions of the first men in the party, that this is the point upon which I have been most pressed, not only by the common pack of pursuers, but by the President himself. He who had far outstripped me in his views upon the subject of a bank—being willing to establish one at the seat of Government—a national bank, founded upon the public credit—such a bank as I would have sanctioned only when I was prepared to surrender every guarantee of liberty in the constitution—condescended to denounce me for entertaining opinions favorable to a bank! And hundreds of honest citizens have, in this way, been made to believe that my politics are of a most pernicious and monstrous character.

But to come down to the rank-and-file of the party. Did not the whole of the Pennsylvania delegation vote for the bank charter in 1832; and was not the Legislature of that great and patriotic State unanimously in favor of the bank in that year? As to the gentlemen of the party from New York, what pledge, what evidence, have they ever given to the country that they are not ready any day to support a bank charter, when it shall be recommended as a party measure by the leaders of the party? The members of the party from Virginia I exonerate from a charge of such gross disregard of principle; but there is one charge from which I cannot exonerate them; it is, that, with their eyes open, and when they see and know that a majority of their party associates in this House, and in the country, are prepared to sanction a bank, and every other measure which they profess to condemn, yet they still profess to take their present course in politics upon the ground of principle!

I have done, Mr. Chairman, with this enumeration of test questions. The enumeration may not be complete, but I think I have omitted none of a permanent and enduring nature. Well, sir, what conclusions may we justly draw from this brief review of the course of the party which, it is said, must be upheld?—those principles which, like the Union itself, "must be preserved?"—those principles which justify a resort to such a miserable cheat, so gross a device as the Baltimore convention, for the election of a President, instead of the regular constitutional mode of electing that high officer? Where are those principles which justify the open and direct interference of the Executive in the election of his successor, and the consequent prostitution of the whole patronage of the Government to that object? Where, I repeat, and what are those principles which are endangered by dividing the party? What are those principles which a learned judge of Virginia [Mr. Barbour] fears will be endangered by dividing the party? What are those principles which another learned associate judge of the Supreme Court of the United States [Mr. Wayne] had in his mind when he gave the sentiment last summer in favor of the practice of caucus nominations? I have shown that the principles of the dominant party sanction removals from office for opinion's sake, and justify the use of executive patronage in controlling elections as a necessary cement of union among the members of it. I have shown that a majority of the party are prepared to support a system of internal improvement by the Federal Government; that the moment it becomes expedient, in reference to party interests, they are ready to establish a national bank; that they are in favor of increasing the expenditures and patronage of the Government in every branch of the public service; and, above all, I have shown that they are prepared to sanction and justify the direct and open interference of the President in the election of his successor. Now, sir, what party in this country would go further? Are these the principles which are so important to be preserved, that every other consideration, sound doctrine, and practice, must be disregarded and trampled upon? What are those principles and practices of the federal party which the people are taught deserve their abhorrence, and how do they differ from those of the party in power? Will some member of the House do me the favor—will he do the country the favor—to point them out? Are they worse than the principles and practices which I have proved to belong to the self-styled republican party?

I cannot conclude my remarks upon the shameful disregard and contempt of all consistency manifest in the course of the leaders of this party, without some notice of a practice that deserves the most pointed rebuke from every friend of popular rights and free government. Since the beginning of time, there has not been a more gross and systematic attempt to excite and delude the people by false professions and pretences, or, to use a popular term, by humbugging them. I am sorry to say that the heads—the first men in the party—are most distinguished in the practice of this method of leading, and thereby governing, the people. Such a practice, in any Government, in the leaders of any party, is disgraceful; but it is especially so when resorted to by republican statesmen, because it is absolutely subversive of the principles and theory of a free Government. It is founded and adopted upon the idea that in no other way can the people be governed; in truth, that they have not capacity or information sufficient for self-government. It is the method adopted by all arbitrary and unjust Governments, from the earliest times, to maintain their authority among the people. It is the essence of all state-craft, as well as priest-craft, to take advantage of the ignorance of the people, and wheedle them into a reverence for unjust authority, by every species of fraud and imposture—a system always adapted in each country to the peculiar prejudices, civil and religious, of the people. The introduction, at this time, of a system of this kind, open and gross as it has been of late, must have the most unhappy effect upon the cause of free institutions everywhere. While it proceeds upon the hypothesis that the mass of the people are little better than children in the grade of their intellect, and possessing all their credulity and waywardness, it leads directly to the suppression of the truth, as you may see daily exemplified in the columns of the newspaper organ of the party, (the Globe.) I need scarcely say that the characteristic feature of this practice, and its first requisite, is impudence. It is a singular fact in the history of the human mind, that the most uncommon and unaccountable deceptions which have been practised upon it have ever succeeded, chiefly by the boldness, by the sheer impudence, with which they have been attempted. But, that I may not be charged with making loose and unsupported declarations, I propose to array a few of the proofs which exist of a successful resort to this system by the gentlemen who now control the administration of public affairs in this country.

The first grand deception which was played off upon the honest and confiding people of this country was the early announcement that retrenchment and reform were to be the cardinal points in the policy, and the most cherished objects, of the present administration. Well, sir, the first act of retrenchment which took place, I believe, was perpetrated by the present Postmaster General, (Mr. Kendall,) when Fourth Auditor of the Treasury. One of the first acts of his official duty was to decline taking certain newspapers, at the public charge; an extravagance which his predecessor had indulged in. It would be really amusing now to run over the pages of the then official organ of the party, and remark the consequence which was imparted to this act; but this was declared to be but a grain of sand upon the seashore in comparison of what was to follow. If there was any repetition of this example of retrenchment more notable than this one, I do not now recollect it. Whether the expenditures of the Government have been retrenched or not, I refer to the public documents to answer. I will merely state, upon this head, that the regular appropriations for the service of the present year, exclusive of the expenses of Indian wars, exceed the expenditures of any former year of the late administration more than one hundred per cent. This is certainly an extraordinary evidence of increased economy and retrenchment! Now, sir, as to the other branch of the reform which was announced as the great purpose of the present administration, I mean the reform of those abuses which had brought the patronage of the Government in conflict with the freedom of elections, I have already alluded to the language of the inaugural address upon this subject. This was, as interpreted at the time, a proclamation and interdict to all public officers, after the manner of Mr. Jefferson's circular, to abstain from all interference in elections. Whenever the subject of executive interference, or the perversion and abuse of executive patronage, and the interference of public officers in elections, have been noticed or complained of, the President, by his usual organs of communication with the public, has been held up to the people as decidedly adverse in his principles and feelings to any such practices. About two years ago, I believe it was, upon some complaint that a public officer had interfered in an election in the Territory of Florida, the official organ announced to the country that no such interference could have been authorized by the Executive, inasmuch as he had expressly interdicted all such practices in his first inaugural address. Even as late as last summer, his principles, in relation to this practice, were declared in his favorite organ to be well known, and that they had never been changed! Sir, thousands of honest men of the party receive all this with the same degree of faith that they read the Bible. But what are the facts; and what were the facts at the time these hypocritical declarations were made? Sir, the President himself had, at that time, not only taken an open and decided part in the election of his successor, even as between two of his own political friends, but he had interfered, and was then actively and zealously employed in operating upon the elections of members of both Houses of Congress. But this is not all: so far was he from interdicting the interference of public officers in elections, that he is known to have given his countenance to such interference in more than one instance; and every public officer in the United States now knows that he cannot do a more acceptable service to the Executive than to devote himself to the cause of the Vice President. As to the course of subordinate public officers generally, the humbug of reform is, if possible, more striking and complete. Is there a member of this House who does not know that in every public meeting, particularly in the North and Northwest, connected with the presidential elections, the officers of this Government and the State Governments, of the same politics, are the most active agents concerned in them; signaling themselves by their zeal in drilling or drumming in advance, or as members of the meeting—surveyors, registers and receivers of land offices, postmasters, custom-house officers, and mail contractors! But a few facts are of more value than a great deal of mere assertion. It has been stated, upon good authority, and never contradicted, that in the convention which met at Albany last year, to appoint delegates to represent the State of New York in the Baltimore convention, there were forty-eight public officers of the State and Federal Governments, and among the number eighteen postmasters and thirteen judges of courts! Of the committee raised to select the delegates, eighteen were public officers, and among the number twelve postmasters. Of the whole number of delegates to the convention at Baltimore, forty-two in number, twenty were public officers of the State or National Governments, and of these five were postmasters, and five others judges of courts!

In the convention which sat on the 8th day of January, 1834, at Columbus, Ohio, to appoint delegates to meet in the national convention at Baltimore, 47 were public officers; and among others, 13 postmasters. How many public officers there were in the late Baltimore convention, from all the States, I know not; but what is most to the point is, that there were some there so notorious and prominent in their connexion with this Government, that the fact that they were members of that convention could not have been unknown to the President at the time. But why mince this question? Why take time to prove what has been notorious for years? The interference of public officers has been common, and is as open and notorious as it has been common. If any proof were wanting to show that the interference of public officers in elections has not only been permitted, but even encouraged, by the Executive, it might be found in the fact that, in the late Baltimore convention, a surveyor general of a large State of the West was a member, within so short a time after the date of his appointment, that I doubt whether he had actually been installed in office before he made his appearance as an active member of that body. Again, sir: a gentleman who had spent the preceding winter in close connexion with the Executive, as one of the commissioners for the adjudication of claims under the French treaty, at a salary of three thousand dollars a year, was one of the most efficient members of that convention. The secretary of that commission was also a member. In fact, without the contingency of that commission, I do not see how the convention could have gotten along at all. Yet, sir, when this practice was so notorious—so approved as it must have been—in the face, I say, of all these facts, the official organ (the Globe) continues to announce, for the edification of those of its readers who stand aloof from all the active scenes of party strife, and who read the Globe only, that the President is, in principle, opposed to all interference of public officers in elections, and that he interdicted the practice in his inaugural address!

The next most remarkable humbug grew out of the contest between the administration and the United States Bank. I pass over some of the smaller and more disreputable deceptions practised upon the people in this conflict; such as the alarm that was gotten up at the idea of using the capital of foreigners, and the apprehensions created that we would soon be under the government of the nobility of England, unless the bank was put down. But the one which answered the purposes of the party more effectually than the rest was the project of a gold and silver currency. This was urged with all the apparent zeal of candor, and all the confidence of success. It took for its hour, and did more to secure the triumph of the party than all the other devices to which they have resorted. In many large States, in many entire sections of the Union, in 1834, and until the elections were over in the fall of that year, it was the engrossing topic, and the confident belief that the administration of General Jackson had matured a scheme of policy which only required the support of the people to enable them to carry it into effect, which would restore the golden age. There was really something more fascinating in this scheme to the fancy of the people than the mere substituting gold and silver for bank paper. The idea of increased means, and new sources of enjoyment, were associated with the new policy in their minds. The effect was great. I remember well the sensation produced in the State of Tennessee upon this subject. We had the honor of a visit from our respected Chief Magistrate that year, about the time of the first issue of the new gold coin; and the attentive and vigilant Secretary of the Treasury did the President the honor to forward to him a few of the first new and shining pieces which dropped from the mint. I believe I would not err, if I were to say that these beautiful and attractive evidences of the wisdom and patriotism of the administration in its struggle against the Bank of the United States, and its alleged corrupt supporters, were exhibited by the President to thousands, and to some with the intended effect. At the same time, the proposition that gold and silver were the only constitutional currency, stated by the President in the form of a sentiment at a public dinner, which he gratified the people of Nashville by accepting, was arrayed before the public with all the consequence and effect his great name and official station could give it. From that time forward, any man who held opinions favorable to a bank was denounced as an enemy to the new and glorious project of General Jackson in relation to a gold and silver currency. The subject became the burden of public addresses to the people. A Senator from the State of Tennessee [Mr. GRUNDY] distinguished himself that year by bolstering up this humbug. Well, sir, at that moment there were four hundred and fifty banks chartered by the States, and more than four hundred actually in operation, and all of them authorized to issue notes. But what marks the peculiar grossness and profligacy of the imposture practised upon the people, is the fact that the official journal of the same party which resorted to this shameful artifice had, up to that time, earnestly recommended the establishment of new and additional State banks. This fact is so striking an illustration of the principles and character of the party, that I beg leave to read an article or two upon this subject from the Globe.

with which the respective Legislatures of Kentucky, Indiana, and Ohio, entered upon the duty of establishing State institutions, to secure to the State Governments the emoluments growing out of the banking business, that each, by this time, would have had a local system in full operation. This seemed indispensable, as well to meet the necessities of the people, incident to the winding up of the United States Bank, as to enable the States to appropriate to themselves, respectively, the benefits resulting from that event. The general wish of the people seemed to require of their representatives the prompt accomplishment of this important object. How deeply the people have been disappointed appears from the demands now made, through public meetings, for an immediate act of the Legislatures in some of these States, to resume the business of the chartering State banks."

Not a word about the limitation of notes above five or ten dollars.

If the committee will indulge me I will now read an article from the same paper, urging, in the strongest terms, and by the most persuasive argument, the establishment of a bank, with large capital, by the State of Pennsylvania! I see surprise in the countenances of many honorable members, but I hold the article in my hand. [Cries of read, read, from many members.]

"Pennsylvania has incurred immense expenditure, and accumulated a large debt, in expanding her improvements and giving an impulse to her commercial enterprise, which, in connexion with her central position, will serve to make her commercial mart a sort of reservoir into which, and from which, the currency of the country will flow; and why should not the State profit by its internal advantages, and by the artificial aids which have cost so much? Why should she not establish a bank of a large capital, in which she should be interested as the principal stockholder? Such a bank, especially if the faith of the State were pledged for the redemption of its paper, would command universal confidence, and would, doubtless, become the depository of the public funds accumulated at Philadelphia. The stock of a State bank, thus holding relations with the Treasury, (necessarily resulting from the closing of the foreign brokers' office, misnamed the Bank of the United States,) would be of incalculable value to the Commonwealth. Under proper management, its dividends would relieve the State from the interest of its debt, and the people from the burden of taxation. It would, in effect, wipe out the debt which has cast a shadow over the bright prospects of the State, and remove the feeling of discontent which manifested itself in the late election of Governor."

Here, sir, we have a direct offer of a combination between the Treasury of the United States and this new Bank of Pennsylvania, or, in other words, a union of the State and federal patronage, for the purpose of securing the permanent ascendancy of the party in that great State; and this from the acknowledged organ of the party, and the protegee of the majority of this House at this moment! But I have not yet said all I intended to say upon the subject of the gold and silver humbug. It is well known that, in 1834, the people of the great State of Pennsylvania, as well as some others, were in perfect ecstasies at the idea that an exclusive gold and silver currency was to be one of the glorious results of the sound principles and energy of the present administration. I have been informed that pieces of the new coin were actually exhibited from the hustings and at the polls, in the elections of that year, as a specimen of the new currency, which was soon to supply the place of bank rags. At the same time a general prejudice, or rather indignation, was excited among the people against all incorporations. All stockholders in banks were stigmatized as monopolists and aristocrats. It is certain that the elections in many districts were controlled by the cant of the party press and party leaders upon these topics. It will not astonish those who have observed the blindness and devotion of party zeal within the last two or three years, to find that these very doctrines and sentiments were considered and repudiated by the then Secretary of the Treasury, then and since one of the greatest favorites of the President. I allude to Roger B. Taney, who has since, in consideration of his devotion to the principles which, as it is alleged, have been the great object of the present administration to carry out and to perpetuate, been appointed Chief Justice of the Supreme Court—in my opinion the very first and most desirable office under this Government. This circumstance is so very singular in the history of the gold and silver humbug, as to deserve a more particular notice. The favorite minister was never more explicit and positive than in his opinions upon the questions which were still made the party hobbies or humbug of the season. For the edification of those who have not observed the course of the party as closely as I have, I will read a few passages from the letter of the late Secretary of the Treasury of the 15th April, 1834, to the Committee of Ways and Means, upon this subject:

"It is evident that the chief part of the paper currency of the United States must always be furnished by the State banks."

"The notes of the different local banks form the ordinary circulating medium for the great body our citizens, and it would be unjust to them to disregard its condition."

"It will be seen, from this statement, that it is no part of the proposed plan to dispense with the State banks. It obviously is not in the power of Congress (if it desired to do so) to take any measures for that purpose without an amendment to the constitution. And the States would not, and ought not, to surrender the power of chartering banking companies. The State banks are now so numerous, and are so intimately connected with our habits and pursuits, that it is impossible to suppose that the system can ever be entirely abandoned. Nor is it desirable that it should be. They are often abused, like all other human institutions. Yet their advantages are many, and under proper regulations, and with the metallic basis now proposed for their paper issues, they will be found of much public advantage."

"If there were no State banks, the profitable business of banking and exchange would be monopolized by the great capitalists. Operations of this sort require capital and credit to a great extent, and a private individual, in moderate circumstances, would be unable to conduct them with any advantage. Yet there is, perhaps, no business which yields a profit so certain and liberal as the business of banking and exchange; and it is proper that it should be open, as far as practicable, to the most free competition, and its advantages shared by all classes of society. Individuals of moderate means cannot participate in them, unless they combine together, and, by the union of many small sums, create a large capital, and establish an extensive credit. It is impossible to accomplish this object without the aid of acts of incorporation, so as to give to the company the security of unity of action, and save it from the disadvantage of frequent changes in the partnership, by the death or retirement of some one of the numerous partners. The incorporated banks, moreover, under proper regulations, will offer a safe and convenient investment of small sums to persons whose situations and pursuits disable them from employing the money profitably in any other mode. It is not more liable to be lost when vested in the stock of a bank than when loaned to individuals. The interest on it is paid with more punctuality, and it can be sold and converted into cash whenever the owner desires to employ it in any other way."

"For these reasons, it is neither practicable nor desirable to discountenance the continuance of the State banks. They are convenient and useful, also, for the purposes of commerce. No commercial or manufacturing community could conduct its business to any advantage without a liberal system of credits and a facility of obtaining money on loan when the exigencies of their business may require it. This cannot be obtained without the aid of a paper circulation founded on credit."

Would any one have supposed that at this time, and during the remainder of that year, the project of a gold and silver currency as a substitute for bank notes was the most powerful and effective weapon ever wielded by the party? Yet such was the fact. But, what is quite as remarkable, it was, I believe, in the same year that Mr. Benton (who would be greatly offended if any one questioned the sincerity of his views in relation to the policy as well as the practicability of establishing a gold and silver currency as a substitute for bank paper in this country) published a long and elaborate letter, vindicating the late Secretary Taney, and placing him upon the highest ground as a statesman and minister of finance!

The next in order, and the last but one of the series of impostures practised upon the people of late, which I shall notice, was the alleged danger of an election by the House of Representatives, by which members of Congress would have it in their power to make a President; and hence the necessity of a national convention or caucus of the party to select a candidate who will be able to unite the support of a majority of the people. An election by the House of Representatives, it was said, will always be made upon corrupt motives. Bargain and intrigue would carry every thing in the House, and those members who could not be brought to stipulate for offices, in consideration of their votes, might and would be bought up by the ample means of the Bank of the United States. Well, sir, what was the remedy for this great mischief? An election; yes, sir, an election; for, when this practice of caucus nominations becomes the established usage of a dominant party in this country, the election of President will always be by a convention or caucus; that is, in order to avoid the intrigue and corruption of an election by this House, we must resort to a convention composed of gentlemen who cannot be seduced by the offer either of offices or bribes in money—pure patriots, who will only have the interest of their country in view! Such was the cant of the whole party, and the people in many of the States were taken by it. Well, sir, the Baltimore convention was held—a convention of immaculates, truly! The constitution, from a proper jealousy of executive power and influence, studiously excluded all office-holders from a seat in this House, supposing them always exposed to influences which would cause them to be unsafe legislators or electors. But in this new Congress, chosen for the election of a President of a party, the officers of the Government were actually the most active, leading, and managing men of the body; and, as if to show their utter contempt of the cant of their own party, about the necessity of choosing a President under circumstances totally free from any suspicion of sinister or selfish motives, the members of the Baltimore convention elected a distinguished gentleman to preside over their deliberations, who had, for more than a year, had a contingent commission in his pocket for one of the highest stations under the Government. But the extent of the imposture will only be fully developed, when it is known that this identical party, which, during the last year, kept up such an alarm about the danger of an election by the House, actually defeated a proposition in this House the winter before to amend the constitution so as to prevent the election of a President at any future time from devolving upon the House.

But a word or two upon the subject of the alleged re-

nality and corruption of this House. How dare any man who is a friend to the constitution—who is sincerely an advocate of a free representative government—with what consistency, I say, can such a man affirm, and proclaim to the world, that the members of this House, elected in pursuance of the laws and constitution, and the representatives of a clear majority of the American people, are more liable to be influenced by corrupt and venal considerations, than the members of such a motley assembly as that which lately sat at Baltimore? Were they more honest than the members of this House? Had they more elevation of character? Were they more clearly and decidedly the representatives of the feelings, intelligence, and principles, of the people of the United States? Were they less given to intrigue? Could not offices be promised to members of that body as well as to members of Congress? Could not bribes be given, and received, with as much facility there as here? Were the members of that assembly less needy, or more indifferent to office, than the members of this House? But, sir, why should the party of the Baltimore nominee fear an election by this House, if it is really believed to be so easily won from its duty by the corrupting influence either of money or of office? Sir, it is all the merest pretence and imposture that was ever attempted to mislead the people. That party dreads a contest upon equal grounds, and without the aid of false pretences, both before the people and this House. The free and unbiased choice of the people is not less dreaded than the integrity of an American House of Representatives. Sir, if this House is to be swayed in an election by bribery and corruption, does not every one know that, in the means of corruption and bribery, there is one candidate for the presidency rich beyond the possibility of rivalry or competition? The gold of the United States Bank is constantly held up before the people as the dreaded source of the corruption of members of Congress. It is supposed that that institution could afford a few millions for the sake of a recharter. Suppose, sir, that the directors of that institution were profligate enough to lend, and the members of this House were base enough to borrow, its entire capital as the wages of their corruption, the bank would be but an humble competitor in the market of this House for votes, in a conflict with the Government, backed by a capital of thirty millions per annum! Yes, sir, even supposing that this House was composed of the vile and unprincipled wretches which it has been represented to be, and the Bank of the United States were to enter the market with its whole resources of capital and credit, it could not maintain a competition with the Government for one moment. The Government may distribute its bribes in the disguise of rewards for public services, and so avoid any wound to the consciences of the honest patriots of the House. The bribes which the Government can offer are also solid and lasting. The bank is generally supposed to administer its bribes in the shape of loans, upon security, which the borrower must repay with interest; but the Government can vest estates for life, and bestow its millions per annum, without interest, and never to be reimbursed. If, sir, I repeat, the members of this House be the corrupt and corruptible representatives of the people which thousands have been made to believe, and the next election should devolve upon them, there need no ghost rise from the grave to tell us who will be elected! Why, sir, the forty deposite or pet banks, or rather Government banks, will be more than an over-match for the United States Bank in the work of bribery and corruption; and the vast patronage of the Government will be a clear surplus of means in the hands of the Government candidate. Let it be remembered that it is not the revenue of a single year which may be made available by the candidate who has the favor of the Executive. The revenues and patronage of the Government may be mortgaged by pledges and promises for the succeeding four, or even eight years. I reaffirm that under the circumstances supposed, there could be no doubt who would be the next President; and the party and its leaders know this full well. But, sir, they dare not risk an election by the House, with all their ample means. I call upon honorable gentlemen of this House to say if they are not upholding the nomination of the Baltimore convention, at the sacrifice of the character of the House of Representatives for honor, integrity, and independence. I call upon them to say, further, whether there has not been a labored and systematic attempt to disparage and degrade the National Legislature, in order to accomplish mere party ends.

But, sir, the crowning humbug of all is to be noticed yet. As if determined to give an example of impudence and absurdity, which might, under favorable auspices, prove successful in practising upon the credulity of a people said to be the most enlightened in the world, which should never be surpassed, the party which thus get up one humbug after another, and which scarcely allows one to pass away until it has another still more absurd treading upon its heels, making the people the dupes of a series of state tricks and impositions of the grossest character, assume, in their public addresses and journals, that they are the only champions of the rights of the people; the only orthodox believers in their perfect competency for self-government; and they allege that they are warring against a party which entertains doubts upon this question! If this is not entitled to become a premium specimen of impudence and absurdity, I can conceive of nothing that would. I have done, sir, with this part of my subject.

There is one apology, or rather justification, Mr. Chairman, which I have often heard urged for all that has been done by the party, in the course of the present administration, which is so objectionable that I feel constrained to notice it upon this occasion. It is, that the people have approved every thing that has been said or done. It is one of the most fallacious and insidious doctrines that can be started in a free Government. The idea that the people can never do or sanction any wrong, I believe may be regarded as one of the dogmas of the dominant party, or, rather, one of their professed principles. Thus, sir, if General Jackson is arraigned for the doctrines of his veto message upon the Maysville road bill, the answer is, that the people, by his re-election, have sanctioned his course upon this subject. If he is charged with the avowal of dangerous doctrines in his celebrated proclamation, the charge is answered by averring that the people have approved them. If it is alleged that he abused his powers under the constitution and laws, in the removal of the public depositories, he is defended by showing that the people have applauded and sustained what he has done. If the President shall openly interfere in elections, and attempt to secure the election of a favorite for his successor, the cry will still be, that, by returning a majority of the members of this House favorable to his wishes upon this point, the people have stamped his interference with their approbation. Thus, whether the question be one of constitutional power or of mere expediency—whether it be an abuse or a usurpation of power—it is all one, while the people applaud and sanction; the argument is, that all is right, and it is anti-republican to raise objections. This is a most flagrant error, and, if sustained by general acquiescence, it must prove fatal to the constitution. Why, sir, if the people can never err, why have a constitution? why place any restrictions upon the action of Congress or of the Executive? why not leave both to be governed by the will of the people, as expressed at their elections and through their representatives—the President in the executive department and the members of Congress in the legislative department? If whatever the people may, at any time, do or approve, must be right, and cannot be questioned, then, I say, the constitution is an idle piece of state mummery—a mockery!

Sir, it is because it was known by the framers of the constitution that the people could err; that the representatives of their feelings and wishes would often err, if left free to do as they thought proper; it is for this very reason, that the people may err, that a constitution or fundamental law was invented, and is accounted of infinite value. It is for this reason that it is considered the glory of the last century and of the American States to have reconciled the idea of a free Government with perfect security to the rights, both of person and of property, against the capricious impulses, sudden excitements, and prejudices, of the people, by the invention of that great improvement in government—a written constitution. Those who hold the doctrine that the people cannot err, are foes to all constitutional Governments. Sir, so far is it from being true that the people cannot err, that, from the foundation of the world, the most enlightened people that have existed in the different ages of it are admitted by all historians, whether republicans or monarchists, to have erred—erred grievously for the liberties and happiness of themselves and of mankind! Yes, sir, from the days of Moses to the present day, the people have erred. The proofs may be found in Holy Writ; and it is contrary to our religious faith to affirm that a whole people, a prosperous and happy people, may not err. We are bound to believe that a whole people, with the clearest light to guide them, but seduced by their passions, and misled by the arts of pretended prophets and ambitious knaves, have repeatedly deserted the worship of the living God, and given themselves over to the adoration of idols. This same people, not content with the simple government of the law under the auspices of which they passed the perils of forty years' sojourn in the wilderness, and took possession of a land flowing with milk and honey, would insist upon a change of government. They then conceived a fancy for a government of judges; and, finally, they would have a king! The enlightened people of the States of ancient Greece, skilled in the knowledge of government in all its forms, and most of them, at one time, in the enjoyment of Governments as free as our own, and for a long period filling the world with the fame of their triumphs in arts and in arms, yet fell from their high estate by the errors of the people.

The people of republican Rome erred when they deserted the standard of the republican leaders, and went over in crowds to shout in the train of Cæsar. The people of England erred when they set aside the honest men of their party, and mistook that hypocrite and tyrant, Cromwell, for a republican patriot and statesman. The people of France, of free and regenerated France, of republican France, erred, first in voting Napoleon to be Consul for life, and afterwards in voting that he should be Emperor. It is not true, then, that the people cannot err; but it is true that those who in every age have been most forward and zealous in flattering the people with the idea that they cannot err, have been the first to take advantage of their errors, and to betray their liberties. But though the people may, and often do, err—though they may be, and often are, led astray by false friends and false pretences—yet our happiness and our security consists in the further truth, that the great body of the people, especially of an agricultural people, are honest; and as long as the forms of a free Government are permitted to remain, and the power of the ballot-box is not superseded by the power of the sword, they may be recalled from their errors—the artifices of the impostors who have misled them may be unveiled. This is the true basis of the value of a free representative Government. It never was founded upon the idea that the people cannot err. The people sometimes do err; but the moment they are made sensible of their error, they do not hesitate to retrace their steps. This will be our hope in much worse times than these. I am not certain that things will not have to grow worse in this country than they are even now, before they can be better. But let us hear no more of the argument that, because the people have elected any man President, and sent a majority of the members of this House to support him, all is right. Thank God, this is no certain test, either of right, of truth, or of patriotism.

There is another argument, or rather another gross error, prevalent upon this subject. It is not uncommon to hear it said that the country is unusually prosperous and flourishing, in all the departments of industry—agriculture, commerce, and manufactures; that the revenues exceed the wants of Government; and, what is more than all, the national character abroad was never so respectable, or more respected; and it is asked, how can these circumstances, so gratifying to the pride of every American heart, exist under an administration the principles and practices of which are alleged to be so much at war with the public welfare and liberties? Every member present has no doubt heard the prosperous condition of this country repeatedly appealed to, in order to give a color of prejudice and untruth to the charge of vicious practices in the administration. It is as surprising as it must be mortifying to the pride of those who regard the people of the United States as the most enlightened in the world, to observe with how large a proportion of them the fact of the general prosperity is a sufficient answer to all that can be said and all that can be proved against the principles and conduct of the dominant party. Yet who is there that is really enlightened, and well informed in the nature and history of government, who does not know that great and general prosperity, in arts, in trade, and in arms, so far from being inconsistent with a corrupt and unprincipled administration, that it is at such periods that dangerous principles and practices take their deepest and most fatal hold; that the seeds of future misrule, of corruption, and a vicious action of the Government, are most widely sown; for then it is that that jealousy and watchfulness of the people over the conduct of those in power, so necessary to preserve the purity of the public administration, are almost sure to slumber. In such a period the malepractices of the administration incur the contempt or escape the notice of the people. Principles are avowed and acted upon, of the most dangerous tendency, without attracting observation. The people, industriously employed in profiting by the general harvest, or steeped in the enjoyment of stores already accumulated, are deaf to the warnings of patriotism. But there is another truth connected with this subject, which ought to be noticed. There is no well-informed man in the country who does not know that a temporary condition of prosperity and general happiness among the people may exist under a Government of any form. Proofs innumerable of this position might be drawn from history. At no period was there more general happiness among the people of Athens and of Attica, in ancient Greece, and a state of more general prosperity, both in agricultural and commercial pursuits, than under the sway of one man; nor was there ever a public administration of the affairs of a State more satisfactory to the people generally than the administration of that man; yet contemporary and all subsequent historians have denounced Pisistratus a tyrant—that is, a man whose will was supreme. The reign of the family of the Medici, in Florence, may be cited as an instance of the same kind, and both perfectly applicable, for in both instances all the forms of a free Government were strictly observed. One of the most learned and accomplished historians of any age (Gibbon) has said, that if he were required to point to the period in the history of the world at which the greatest degree of human happiness was enjoyed by the greatest number of the human race, he would designate the reign of three successive Emperors of Rome, who happened to be equally distinguished for their talents and their virtues. When was England more prosperous as a nation, when her name and her might more respectable or actually more respected and feared all over Europe, than under the administration of Cromwell? Yet even a British House of Commons disdained to be his supple tools in the execution of all his plans and wishes, and for that reason he finally kicked them all out of their seats, and ruled with absolute sway. All this was done in the name of liberty and of the Commonwealth. Again, sir: in what period in the history of France were the French people more generally prosperous, and when was France more terrible to her enemies, or more potent in the protection of her own interests, than under the administration of Napoleon? But it is useless to multiply examples. I have said enough to demonstrate that it is no argument to say, that because there is a season of general prosperity, there is nothing rotten or dangerous in the principles and practices of the party which now governs this country.

When Mr. BELL had concluded his remarks,

Mr. SUTHERLAND remarked that it was his wish that the bill under consideration should be got through the committee to-night, and he hoped that gentlemen who might desire to reply to the gentleman from Tennessee would wait until to-morrow, when the committee would take up another bill, on which they would have an opportunity to speak. It might be possible that he should make some remarks in reply to the gentleman from Tennessee; but he would for the present forego replying, with the hope that the question would be taken, and that the bill might be gotten through with.

Mr. BELL concurred with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and hoped that the committee would not rise until they got through with the bill. Mr. B. concluded by withdrawing his motion to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. MERCER said he had not examined the bill until within a short time, and he could not consent that it should be hurried through the committee to-night. Mr. M. concluded by moving that the committee rise; but withdrew the motion at the request of

Mr. SUTHERLAND, who briefly replied to the gentleman from Virginia and the gentleman from Tennessee. He contended that the improvements contemplated by the bill were clearly constitutional, and stated that he was favorable to those improvements, and to all similar improvements, let them be in what section of the country they might. The State he in part represented was but very little interested in the improvements contemplated by this bill, yet that circumstance did not make him any the less favorable to it. He would vote for them, and he would vote for similar ones, whether in the West or the East.

After a few remarks by Messrs. PEYTON, SUTHERLAND, MERCER, PHILLIPS, and JOHNSON of Louisiana,

Mr. LANE moved that the committee rise; which was agreed to.

The House then adjourned.

FRIDAY, JUNE 24.

DISTRICT BANKS.

Mr. W. B. SHEPARD, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported Senate bill to extend the charters of the banks of the District, without amendment, and moved that it be read a third time now.

After a few remarks by Messrs. W. B. SHEPARD, PIERCE of New Hampshire, and THOMAS,

Mr. BOON moved to postpone the subject until to-morrow.

Mr. LANE said he trusted, as one of the members of the Committee on the District of Columbia, that the bill would not be postponed to any future period; that every member of the House must be sensible of the importance of the bill to the people of the District, to the Treasury, and to the officers of the Government, and to the members of this House; that if any action is intended during the present session, that action must be prompt—now, not hereafter. This is a bill matured by the Senate, and passed that body by a large majority. As an individual, I have more confidence in the action of the Senate than that of the select committee. Nor is this all: the Committee on the District, to whom that bill was referred, have examined and reported it to the House without amendment. Thus we have the judgment of the Committee on the District in the Senate, of the Senate themselves, and of this House.

Sir, the objection comes with an ill grace from the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. THOMAS,] the chairman of the select committee. The House cannot have forgotten that that honorable gentleman, in the third week of the session, submitted the motion to raise the select committee, taking this subject from the District Committee; and urged as a reason, that the subject called for prompt and speedy action—that the Committee on the District would not have it in their power to give it that attention—that two weeks had transpired, and they had done nothing. Now, sir, how stands the account with the select committee? Six months have elapsed, and as yet no report has been laid on our tables. We have seen, it is true, something in the shape of a report published in the Globe; but, as the gentleman says, not a report.

Sir, what had the House a right to expect from the high-sounding pretensions of the gentleman from Maryland? A speedy, a voluminous report; one that would have instructed, nay, astonished, the House; a report that would have placed the banking and commercial interest of the District on high and elevated ground; that would have cheered every heart, and brightened the prospects of this interesting and intelligent community.

If any thing is intended to be done upon this subject, the House is as well prepared now as they will be during the session. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. THOMAS] says he has made no report, nor can he say when he will. Why, then, wait? What object is to be obtained by delay, other than a total prostration of the entire commercial interest of this District?

Mr. GARLAND, of Virginia, briefly replied to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. BOULDIN said he was a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia. He hoped that the people of the District would not be made to suffer on account of any jealousy of committees in regard to preference or honor, whether any body was in fault or not. We are now near the close of a long session. If we did not pass the bill now, we could not pass it this session. The people would suffer, not only for banking capital, but for attention to their ordinary business. There were several private matters that would take no more time for justice to be done them than it would take to render judgment on a plain bond in court. There were several bills of this kind he had reported, that he knew were of this character. We had got a day or two for the District, and the whole time had been taken up by the Dutch loan, a thing that the people had very little interest in. A few very rich people, he supposed, held the most of it. Now, if these banks are to be laid over until to-morrow, we should have no chance for that business, which individuals had a right to expect.

Alexandria had a bill that it would take but a few moments to pass. No doubt, he thought, it would pass. If gentlemen really felt an interest for the District, why would they put over for to-morrow more than could be done on that day? Did gentlemen not know that if the few hours we had obtained from the favor of the House were taken up by these banks, that all the balance of the business would go undone? Did they not know that we would adjourn in a few days? Would we be justified, while we are the only power that the people of the District have to look to, should we pass over their interest and their complaints, their grievances and their needs, and take up the whole session in vain debates about things past or things that may never come to pass?

Mr. JENIFER hoped the House would take the vote on this bill at the present time, because to postpone it until to-morrow might defeat it.

Mr. VANDERPOEL said that he had the honor of being a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia, and he had at the commencement of the present session of Congress voted for the resolution to appoint a select committee for the purpose of examining into the doings of the banks in this District that apply to us for a recharter; and he regretted that that committee had not yet been able to complete its labors. They had made a report to us a few days ago, which they told us was imperfect, as it embodied only the facts which they had been able to elicit before their examination was thorough and complete. A portion of that report was yesterday published in one of the daily papers of this city; and though, in its imperfect form, it did not profess to give a full revelation of the past operations of the banks in question, yet, as to some of them, it made disclosures that were truly startling! It was certainly very important that we should know whether these institutions had faithfully, fully, and fairly, executed the trust heretofore confided to them by Congress, before we gave them a renewed pledge of our confidence. Some of them had here, under our very eyes, suspended specie payments a few years ago; and from the skeleton of the select committee's report, which he had very hastily read, it would indeed seem that the suspension of specie payments, and the consequent depreciation of the stock of the banks suspending specie payments (or at least one of them) had been a source of profit to some who were connected with the institutions. He did not mean to inculpate any gentleman; but if it were true that the notes or stock of any of these institutions had depreciated, and any of the directors of that institution, by the direct or indirect purchase of stock or the bills of the banks, had profited by such depreciation, he would no sooner vote to renew the charter of such a bank than he would vote to legalize or sanctify the most nefarious frauds and most unhalloved speculations. Let us, then, (said Mr. V.,) have all the light that we can command—let the report of the select committee be printed and laid on our tables before we prolong the existence of these institutions, either for good or for evil.

Mr. V. said that the bill from the Senate came before us in a very strange, if not a very objectionable, form. It proposes by one bill, one act and deed, to recharter a whole batch of banks. For his part, he would rather take them in broken doses. This mode was perhaps very unjust to some of the banks, against whom no imputation of unfairness could justly be made. There was at least one, against which he believed nothing had been discovered. It was, perhaps, confounding the innocent with the guilty. He was for letting each institution stand or fall by its own merits; and rather than sanction this practice of ushering into existence a whole brood at a time, and giving a triumph to what was evil, by yo-king it with what was good, when we entered upon the consideration of the Senate's bill, if no other gentleman would attempt to secure the separate action of this House upon each bank, he was not sure but he would do it. At present, he was in favor of postponing the consideration of the Senate bill till after the report of the select committee of this House was printed.

After a few remarks by Messrs. HARDIN and W. B. SHEPARD,

Mr. BOON withdrew the motion to postpone.

Mr. HAWES then moved to commit the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; which was disagreed to.

Mr. GILLET then moved to postpone the bill until to-morrow, and proceeded very briefly to give his reasons for making the motion.

After some further remarks by Messrs. THOMAS, GARLAND of Virginia, MERCER, JENIFER, PEARCE of Rhode Island, HOAR, and WM. B. SHEPARD, the hour arrived for proceeding to the special order of the day.

IMPROVEMENT OF HARBORS.

Mr. PATTON said he agreed with his colleague that all these measures ought to be put by their friends in the same bill. They all belonged to the same family; constituted branches of the same system of internal improvements; rested upon the same kind of interpretation of the constitutional powers of the Congress of the United States; were to be defended by the same arguments, or could not be defended at all; all the various parts of this system were liable also to the same objections on the score of expediency, productive of the same odious inequality in reference to the various parts of the Union, of the same kind of pernicious increase of the patronage of the Government, tending irresistibly to the same extravagant and injudicious expenditure, or rather waste, of the public money, and depending more or less for their success upon a species of log-rolling, or, as they call it in the Western country, "coboging," most disreputable and corrupting. Being thus joined together in principle, or want of principle, he was at a loss to understand how the friends of all should be willing to have them put asunder, especially after the remark made yesterday by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that they must stand or fall together; by which it now seems he meant that the friends of each must go for all, as being bound together by the same interests, though he seems to apprehend that there must be danger of the whole being sunk if they were embarked in the same vessel—an apprehension which has some foundation in the danger of the public sense being shocked by the enormous amount and partial distribution of the appropriations asked for by these various bills from the Committee on Commerce and on Roads and Canals.

Mr. PATTON said that he had no stomach for any of them; that he had a mortal aversion to physic of every kind, and especially in broken doses. He was opposed to swallowing these doses in any form in which they could be administered; but if we are to be forced to take them, if they must be gulped down, he thought they ought all to go together.

I did not expect (said Mr. P.) to have said any thing in opposition to these bills. I know, from the experience I have had here, how hopeless it is to make any resistance to them, or to any bills framed as these are—containing appropriations for a majority of the States of the Union, and confined almost exclusively to those States whose representatives have no constitutional scruples against them, and whose constituents have a direct pecuniary interest in their passage. I had therefore made up my mind to submit in silence to the infliction of this wound upon the constitution, and to the large draught upon the common Treasury made by these bills for local objects and partial benefits. After the remark made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, on yesterday, that every body admitted the constitutional authority of Congress to appropriate money for clearing out and making harbors, for clearing out rivers, and removing sandbars, and making surveys preparatory to such works, I felt bound to speak, at least for the purpose of "excluding the conclusion" that this sweeping claim of undisputed power was acquiesced in. I enter my protest against it. These measures are put distinctly in the preamble to the bill upon the ground of security and extension of commerce; and for such a purpose I deny the authority of Congress to appropriate money for harbors, rivers, and surveys. I can very well conceive that it may be competent for Congress, in reference to the safety and useful operations of our naval force, and as incidental to the authority to raise and support a navy, to deepen the harbors on our seacoast and the lakes, connected with our navy yards, naval depots, &c., or even to clear out and make harbors, with a view to be used by our ships of war as places of safe anchorage and security from storms of wind, or to guard our maritime cities in time of war. That such improvements, made with these objects, and authorized by this obvious deduction from the power to sustain a navy, should indirectly increase the facilities and promote the interests of commerce, constitutes no objection to the exercise of the power in proper places, and to a proper extent; indeed, such incidental benefits to commerce are subjects of felicitation whenever they occur.

The broad ground assumed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SUTHERLAND], and carried out practically in the provisions of these bills, in my humble judgment, cannot be maintained upon any fair reading of the constitution, and without opening a door wide enough for the admission of all the various sorts of internal improvement which have ever been claimed, whether upon land or water, whether national or local, whether above or below ports of entry. Whence is the power derived? From that clause of the constitution which gives Congress power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States," &c.

The whole authority conferred by this clause obviously is to give Congress the right to prescribe the terms upon which trade shall be carried on; the tax which shall be imposed upon imports and exports; and the discriminating duties upon home and foreign tonnage; and all the various regulations for entering goods, vessels, &c. &c. upon importation, and of registering, clearance, &c. upon exportation. The regulation of commerce between foreign States has nothing to do with making the harbors, clearing out the rivers, and removing obstructions, any more than the right to regulate commerce among the several States confers the right to make roads and canals on which the people may travel in carrying on their trade. The constitution, in each case, presupposes the existence of channels of communication, and only intends to give Congress the right to make regulations, by means of which trade may be carried on upon known fixed principles. To suppose that this gave Congress the right to legislate upon every matter and in any way which would improve the facilities and increase the profits of trade between us and foreign nations, or between the several States, would launch us into a boundless ocean of power never yet claimed or even dreamed of by the most latitudinous expounders of our constitution. It involves an utter perversion of the letter and meaning of the constitution to construe an authority to make a regulation into one to make a harbor or to make a road or a canal, or to clear out obstructions from a river. The constitution gives Congress the right to "regulate the value of coin." Upon the interpretation now contended for, this would have given the right to coin money, to build establishments for individuals or States to coin money at, and even to furnish the metal out of which the coin should be made. But the framers of the constitution thought it necessary to give the power expressly "to coin money," as well as the power to "regulate the value" of it. This interpretation of the power to regulate commerce is infinitely more questionable than the one under which the power to protect domestic manufactures was claimed. There the means by which the end was effected were regulations of commerce; here, the means resorted to have nothing to do with regulations, according to any meaning attached to that word, as it is used in the English language. It is not my purpose, however, to go into an elaborate argument upon this often-contested question.

If, however, Mr. Chairman, the powers claimed by this bill be legitimate, what becomes of the principles laid down in the veto message of the President in regard to the Maysville road? Many of the appropriations in these bills are for harbors and rivers where no ship of war, or sloop, or even barge from a man of war, is ever expected to be seen. They are wholly unconnected with the object of providing and maintaining a navy; in many cases, for places of very limited trade, and wholly within the jurisdiction of a single State. I call, then, upon all those who united with me in hailing the Maysville veto as constituting a new era in our affairs, and as putting a very material check, though not entire end, to the system of extravagant and unconstitutional appropriations, under the name of internal improvements, to stand their ground, and maintain the principles then proclaimed. No man can prove that, while an appropriation for a turnpike road from Maysville to Lexington is unconstitutional, appropriations for clearing out every little harbor and every navigable river on the Atlantic and the lakes are constitutional. What is it which stamps the character of nationality upon the latter, and dubs the former as local? I am not sufficiently learned in the science of political distinctions to perceive the difference. If many people engaged in trade from a distance, and from other States, are interested in each of these appropriations, why, it is equally true that many people of different States, engaged in trade, were interested in the making the turnpike road from Maysville to Lexington; and if this is all that is necessary to give a character of nationality to any work, why, upon the same principle, Gadsby's hotel, or Walker's eating-house, would be entitled to the fostering care of the Government, as "national establishments." The President repudiated all such considerations in his Maysville veto; and I hope he, and all who agreed with him then, and who rejoiced with me in the prospect held out in that message that we were about to recover "the lost rights of the States," will repudiate them now, and give a quietus to these harbor and river bills.

There is another idea which is frequently thrown out in regard to these appropriations for harbors, which is wholly unfounded. It is frequently said that measures of this description are coeval with the Government; that they have gone on with all parties, and must soon be regarded as not open to objections of power or principle. This is a mistake in fact, although it seems to have received countenance, to some extent, from the President, in his remarks upon the bill containing the appropriation for the Wabash, which he refused to sign. It is true only to this extent: that, among the first acts of the Government, was one which assumed jurisdiction of, and exercised the power of building, light-houses, piers, buoys, &c. That may be justified; and confined to the sea and bay coast, and to our large seaport harbors, I think is justified by the authority expressly given to provide and maintain a navy, as fairly incidental to that power, when bona fide exercised, in reference to the safety and utility of the navy; at all events, to that extent the power has been uniformly, and without dispute, assumed and exercised, and I, for one, should not be disposed now to disturb it. But not so with this authority to make and deepen harbors, and clear out rivers. That has been, comparatively, of recent origin, and uniformly contested. To be sure, its approaches were very gradual, and the extent to which it was at first exercised so inconsiderable as to attract at first very little notice, and occasion not very serious dispute. I propose to look a little into its history and progress. These appropriations took their rise in 1816, the era of the tariff of duties with a view to protection, the era of the commencement of the general system of internal improvements, and the era of the revival of the Bank of the United States. The very first bill that I have been able to find, under the head of appropriations "for surveys, preservation and repairs of islands, harbors, and rivers," was passed in April, 1816.

[Mr. MEXCE here said that his colleague was mistaken; that Mr. Madison had very early in the Government proposed to have a road made from Georgia to Maine, and that during General Washington's administration an appropriation had been made for improving a harbor at Marcus Hook.]

Mr. PARROX resumed, and said he was well acquainted with the history of that resolution, introduced by Mr. Madison in 1796, which proposed to inquire into the propriety of making a continuous road from Maine to Georgia, for conveying the mail. I remember, too, that Mr. Jefferson immediately wrote Mr. Madison a letter, in which he earnestly remonstrated against the power recognised in the resolution, and pointed out the objections to it, both on grounds of want of constitutional power and on grounds of inexpediency, and Mr. Madison did not press the resolution, and nothing was ever done under it.

As to the harbor at Marcus Hook, this is the first time I have heard of it. What were the circumstances under which the appropriation was made, whether it was founded upon a claim of power such as that I am now considering, or as incidental to the navy power, I know not. It was, at all events, a single case, standing alone from 1789 to 1816, and surely not much to be weighed as an authoritative precedent. I repeat that nothing like regular legislation upon subjects of this sort is to be found until 1816, and, indeed, until 1823; and for many years, down even to 1827, the appropriations for objects of this kind were so inconsiderable in amount, and so few in number, as to warrant the belief that the attention of Congress was never attracted very strongly to the questionable character of the power exercised, or the dangerous lengths to which it might be pushed.

I have not the means or time to trace the progress of this thing since 1827; but the above presents sufficient matter for reflection. The gross amount of all the appropriations between 1816 and 1827, a period of eleven years, amounts to a little upwards of $300,000; and these bills which we are now passing through, without a hope of resisting them, contain appropriations for old and new works, amounting to about ($1,700,000) one million seven hundred thousand dollars for one single year. Such is the encroaching character of this kind of legislation; so extravagant and enormous are the appropriations which we are called on to sanction. But how desperate, in the very nature of the thing, must be in general any efforts to defeat such a measure. Here you have a bill proposing appropriations for a large number of the States, enlisting thus in its support so many representatives as can conscientiously support a measure of the kind. Those States the support of whose representatives cannot be obtained, from constitutional scruples, or something else, get no portion of this large expenditure. By way of illustration of this, look at the fact, that out of the vast appropriation contained in these bills, exceeding a million and a half, there is but $500 for Virginia, with all her extent of seacoast, of baycoast, her numerous harbors, and noble rivers. This unequal distribution of the benefits of the Government in this form is perhaps unavoidable, and constitutes one of the great objections to the exercise of the jurisdiction over subjects local in their character, and necessarily partial in their operation.

These are some of the general objections to this system of internal improvements, even when the expenditure is entirely judicious, and all the benefits expected by the friends of the system are realized. And now, having appealed to all those who sustained the Maysville veto to carry out their own principles, and resist this vast expenditure of money for objects, nine tenths of which are, in every point of view, merely local in their character, I now ask all those gentlemen who disapproved the Maysville veto, and who derive no benefit from this new mode of making internal improvements—upon all gentlemen from the interior favorable to the general system of internal improvements—whether they will give their sanction to these measures? Can they reconcile it to themselves to unite in making appropriations for internal improvements by water, when it is estopped by land—that the money of their constituents shall be taken in these large amounts to improve harbors, rivers, and islands, in which they are in no way interested, when they and their constituents are not allowed, either because they travel by land, or because they are situated above a port of entry, to participate in any way in the benefit of these appropriations? If the power was clear, if it were possible for the Government of the United States to exercise such powers judiciously and economically, the inequality of the distribution of the benefits of such appropriations would prevent me from giving them my approbation.

Reduction of Duties.

But there is another point of view in which this subject is worthy of the serious consideration of the House. The bill making appropriations for old works was presented to the House accompanied by a report from the Committee of Ways and Means, to which I wish earnestly to solicit the attention of the House. It will be seen from that report, made by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. SMITH,] who reported the bill, that that committee are by no means anxious for the passage of the bill, but, on the contrary, it is evident that the committee doubted very much the expediency of passing the bill, even if they were not decidedly opposed to it. It will be very extraordinary if this House can consent to pass either of these bills in the face of the facts stated in that report.

The committee say, they cannot "but yield, in a measure, to the apprehension that there is a real necessity for hesitation, if not of actual reform, in the further prosecution of public works upon the same system which has of late years obtained under the Government. The commentary upon it, which is furnished in the naked history of nearly every work brought before your committee for additional appropriations, characterizes this system as expensive, yet feeble; flattering, and yet uncertain in all its operations and results; unless it be viewed only with reference to its fitness to the purposes, to the individual wealth and profit, of the agents and contractors immediately concerned. To test the justness of this remark, reference is made to the connected history of these several works, extracted from the annual reports of the engineer department, and appended to this report. The same reference will demonstrate that in none of these works has the original estimate of cost, or of the probable effects of each expenditure, been verified by experience; but, on the contrary, in most of them a very wide result from the original estimates has already been exhibited, and without furnishing a certain accomplishment of the object desired in a single case. In many of these works, moreover, the appropriations already made and expended have not been confined within an excess of one hundred per cent. above the original estimate of their cost, respectively. [It is printed "fifty per cent." in the document, but Mr. SMITH says it ought to be one hundred.] In some of them the appropriations now asked, in order to continue them in progress through only a single coming year, actually exceeds the aggregate original estimate of the cost of their entire construction, and this notwithstanding a series of annual appropriations have heretofore been made for them, also far exceeding in amount such original estimate. To add to our wonder, in neither class of the last-described works is there any good degree of certainty held out to Congress that such additional expenditures, enormous as they are becoming, will secure a successful termination of the enterprise."

However much we may wonder that the committee could have been prevailed upon to report a bill to continue works thus described, it will be still more extraordinary, if, with such facts staring us in the face, presented to us by our own committee, we can pass a bill appropriating nearly a million of dollars to works on which so much has already been expended, and of which we have no hope of a successful termination at any time; but, on the contrary, the appropriations required for which become larger and larger the longer they get on. How forcibly does the report illustrate the truth of the remark of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BELL] on yesterday, that this kind of legislation was "a bottomless pit of expenditure!" More than that, it is a pit into which the stream of public appropriation is flowing in a stream of perpetually increasing force and volume.

Let us examine this report a little further, to see the character of these works, and what encouragement we have to go on, either with the old works, or to begin new ones. After speaking of the miscalculations as to the times these works were to take to be completed, and the overthrow of the original plans in many cases, the report proceeds: "In some cases the effect of these miscalculations has been a total abandonment of the original plan for some untried substitute, as in the report of the works at Cunningham creek in 1828, and of Red river in 1832, and of Marcus Hook, &c. in 1834: in others a greater depth of water than was anticipated or consistent with the permanency of the work, requiring in consequence a filling up, with new materials, of the excavations caused by the earlier expenditures of labor and money, as in the report on the works at Presque Isle in 1827, and in fact that on the works at Grand river in 1833; in other instances, new and unexpected channels, endangering the whole improvement, as in the case of Presque Isle, have been caused, or new deposits of sand, threatening to destroy all the natural advantages with which the plan of promised improvements was blessed before the work of alleged improvement was commenced," &c. &c.

What an encouraging account here is to go on with our improvements, and begin new ones! In some cases, the whole money wasted and thrown away, and the whole plan abandoned; in others, a sort of weaving of Penelope's web—filling up this year what had been dug out the year before; in others, the effect of our miscalculation, causing new obstructions and sandbars, to the serious detriment of those interested in the navigation, which we have destroyed, in our feeble and injudicious efforts to improve.

I conclude by moving to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

REDUCTION OF DUTIES, &c.

Mr. McKAY moved the suspension of the rules for the purpose of enabling him to offer the following resolutions; which were read:

Resolved, That the power of taking money from the people, by laying and collecting duties, imposts, and excises, is one of the most sacred of the trusts vested in the General Government; that it is enforced solely to enable it to command the necessary means to execute the objects for which it was instituted, and that to exact money from the people when not necessary for those objects, or more than may be necessary, would be, on the part of the Government, a manifest breach of trust, and to the people unjust and oppressive.

Resolved, That the revenue receivable under the present laws is, and will be, more than is required for the fair and legitimate wants of the Government, and that provision ought to be made for its reduction.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury report to this House, at the commencement of the next session, what alteration can be made in the existing tariff of duties, consistently with the principles of the several acts imposing duties upon imports, with a view to reduction.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury also report upon the best mode of diminishing the revenue arising from the public lands, without retarding the settlement of the new States, or impairing the interests of the General Government; and, generally, his views as to the best mode of reducing the revenue to the fair and constitutional wants of the Government.

Mr. MANN, of New York, called for the yeas and nays on the motion, and they were ordered.

Mr. McKAY moved a call of the House, in order that the House might at once express their sentiments on the subject, and not be troubled any more with it; and upon this motion he asked the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

Improvement of Harbors.

The question being taken, the motion for a call of the House was agreed to: Yeas 105, nays 74.

After some time, on motion of Mr. HESTER, all further proceeding in the call was dispensed with.

The question was taken on the motion to suspend the rules, and decided in the negative: Yeas 124, nays 66—not quite two thirds.

Mr. McKAY gave notice that, on Monday morning, he would offer the same motion, and he hoped that there would then be a full House.

IMPROVEMENT OF HARBORS.

The House, in pursuance of the special order, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, (Mr. LINCOLN in the chair,) for the further consideration of the bill making appropriations for certain harbors for the year 1836.

Mr. LANE deprecated the delay which would be caused by a long political discussion upon all the exciting topics of the last ten years. He hoped the bill itself would be acted upon; and if such was the wish of the House, he would waive his right to the floor; though, if such a discussion should take place, he should like to reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. BELL.]

Mr. VINTON proposed an amendment for the improvement of the Maumee river.

Mr. CRANE, after some remarks, called for the reading of some papers recommending the appropriation, and then proceeded to argue in its behalf.

Some remarks were made upon the proposed amendment by Messrs. CHAMBERS, VANDERPOEL, and SUTHERLAND.

Mr. MERCER objected to the bill that it contained items of appropriation upon subjects not within the scope of the Committee on Commerce, and which had been referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals. He said such a practice would lead to very loose legislation. It was the duty of the Committee on Roads and Canals to survey the whole country, to understand the wants of the whole, and to see that the public funds were fairly apportioned.

- As an instance, he referred to the clause appropriating $150,000 for deepening the mouth of the Mississippi, by stopping some of the outlets, or constructing a ship channel, or by such other means as the Secretary of War may direct. He said no information was given whether such a scheme was practicable, no survey had been made of the depth of water in the Gulf of Mexico, nor was any estimate made of the probable cost of the improvement. He said the Committee on Roads and Canals had already reported in favor of an appropriation of $13,000 for improvements on the Mississippi, founded on the survey and report of a competent engineer, and he was willing to go for any amount gentlemen might name for the improvement of the Mississippi, provided he could be assured that the money would be profitably expended. He also pointed out other parts of the bill embracing subjects not within the action of the Committee on Commerce, by the rules of the House, such as the Overslaugh in the Hudson river, and all the surveys of rivers provided for in the bill. He said he did not wish to oppose the bill, for he was in favor of many of its objects, but he wished to insure safe and correct legislation. He wanted to have a number of the appropriations stricken out, and others combined with the bill. He hoped the proposed appropriation for the Maumee river would be made, for that river had already been considered a public work, and expenditures had been made for its improvement. At a proper time, he said, he should offer some amendments.

Mr. GALBRAITH moved to amend Mr. VINTON'S amendment by making an appropriation for the improvement of the Allegany river above Pittsburg.

Mr. HAWES stated that the port of entry at Maumee bay had yielded, in 1832, the gross revenue of $12.50, and had cost the Government over $700 for the salaries of the custom-house officers. Yet, he said, the House was now called upon to pay $51,000 for the improvement of that bay.

Mr. WHITTLESEY, of Ohio, said the gentleman from Kentucky was grossly deceived in relation to the business of that port, or he had attempted to palm off a gross imposition upon the committee; and he went on to show that a vast proportion of the commerce of the West with New York and the seaboard found its way to Buffalo and the lakes, and rendered these collection districts necessary. The business at these ports was great and increasing, and did not depend upon a foreign or Canadian commerce, upon which revenue could be collected; still the ports were no less useful and necessary.

Mr. SUTHERLAND begged gentlemen of the committee not to press each particular improvement of a river for which an interest might be felt. The bill had been complained of as already too large; and if gentlemen went on to introduce appropriations for every river in the country, the whole would be lost. He hoped the bill would be allowed to pass as it was, and that the consideration of other rivers would be taken up in their turn.

EVENING SESSION.

The committee again took up the bill making appropriations for the improvement of certain harbors therein named for the year 1836.

The question pending was the amendment of Mr. VINTON, for the improvement of the Maumee river, $51,000, and Mr. GALBRAITH'S amendment to the amendment, for the improvement of the Allegany river from Pittsburg to the New York State line, $50,000.

Mr. PATTON moved to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

Mr. GILLET said it was with unfeigned reluctance that he rose, at this period of the session, to participate in debate; and he would not now do so, did he not fully believe that his duty to himself, and some of his friends, rendered the obligation imperative upon him. He considered it due to himself to defend measures of high moment, which he had aided in bringing before the House; and also to repel the charges which had been made against the committee of which he was a member. He also deemed it his duty to defend his friends, and particularly those whose position precluded them from replying in proper person, here or elsewhere. He could assure the committee that he would not occupy one moment of their attention beyond what was necessary for these objects.

If I understand the question, (said Mr. G.,) it is on a motion made by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. PATTON] to strike from this bill its enacting clause. Should this motion prevail, and be concurred in by the House, it will defeat the whole bill. This is the object of the motion. If I rightly understand the rules of the House, this motion opens the whole merits of the bill. Incidentally the policy of raising revenue, and the best method of disposing of it when raised, whether for such or other objects, may also be discussed. When we are considering the question of constructing light-houses and harbors, for aiding our commerce, and protecting the lives of our fellow-citizens, we may also very properly examine the question, whether, under the forms of the constitution, a better and more politic disposition can be made of our revenue. If such a discussion could be carried on for the sole purpose of arriving at the true national policy, uninfluenced by expected partisan results, we might fairly expect that beneficial consequences would flow from it. But when the interests of political aspirants are interwoven with, and their prospects likely to be influenced by, the result, we may well fear that much of the light shed on the subject proceeds from the torch of interest and ambition, instead of the lamp of truth and safety. Immediate results being more prominent, are more likely to influence conclusions than remote consequences, though the latter may be of the most vital importance, affecting the stability of our institutions, and the future glory of our republic. When changes are proposed in our national policy, it is due to the subject, and to those we represent, to examine them closely; weigh the advantages and disadvantages, both present and future; and unless we are convinced, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the permanent interests of the country are to be benefited by their adoption, we should reject them. We are now pursuing a course of policy, on this subject, long since settled and acquiesced in by the country, which has proved beneficial to all, and injurious to none; and we are now invited suddenly to stop, and enter upon one entirely the reverse. We are solicited to abandon the wisdom of our fathers in applying a portion of our revenues to such national objects as lighting the path of the mariner, and preparing a haven for his safety, and to trust the lives and property of our fellow-citizens to the hazard of darkness and storms, to enter upon the uncertainty of untried experiment. It is not the items in this bill that are objected to, but the system of making such improvements. The friends of the administration, I believe, are very generally content to pursue the old path, which it is known leads to safety, prosperity, and happiness, while a portion, at least, of its opponents, with the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BELL] at their head, call upon us to abandon it for the dark one of doubtful experiment. The views of the President upon this subject are to be found in his message of December, 1830, in which he says:

"The practice of defraying out of the Treasury of the United States the expenses incurred by the establishment and support of light-houses, beacons, buoys, and public piers, within the bays, inlets, harbors, and ports, of the United States, to render the navigation thereof safe and easy, is coeval with the adoption of the constitution, and has been continued without interruption or dispute. As our foreign commerce increased and was extended into the interior of the country, by the establishment of ports of entry and delivery upon our navigable rivers, the sphere of those expenditures received a corresponding enlargement. Light-houses, beacons, buoys, public piers, and the removal of sandbars, sawyers, and other partial or temporary impediments in the navigable rivers and harbors which were embraced in the revenue districts from time to time established by law, were authorized upon the same principle, and the expense defrayed in the same manner."

"It is indisputable that whatever gives facility and security to navigation cheapens imports; and all who consume them are alike interested in whatever produces this effect. If they consume, they ought, as they now do, to pay—otherwise they do not pay. The consumer in the most inland States derives the same advantage from every necessary and prudent expenditure for the facility and security of foreign commerce and navigation that he does who resides in a maritime town. Local expenditures have not of themselves a correspondent operation."

I concur in these views of the President.

At the opening of the discussion on this bill the gentleman from Tennessee made a motion like the present. What new advantage did he indicate, as likely to flow from the proposed change in our national policy? Did he tell us that the lives and wealth of our citizens, engaged in commerce, were to be better protected? Did he propose to tax the people less, as an equivalent for diminished improvement? He did not propose to reduce either the direct or indirect taxes, or in any way lighten the burdens now imposed in raising our revenue. That gentleman alluded to the deposite bill recently passed, and made it a prominent item of consideration, and informed us that it had been sustained by his vote. I understood him as referring to the thirteenth section of that bill, which provides a distribution of the federal treasure among the States, as therein provided, as one great cause for the proposed change in public policy, whereby such works as are provided for in the bill now under consideration are not to be made by the General Government. He seemed to consider that measure as disposing of the federal revenues, and placing them beyond the reach and use of the General Government for such purposes as these, if not for all purposes whatever. He told us how advantageously the several States could use this treasure, and appeared to treat that act as making a real distribution, instead of merely creating new depositories for the public money. That bill, I am free to say, received less discussion in this House than its merits deserved. Even now, its object and effect are matters about which we ourselves differ. Some say its object is solely to keep the public treasure for the use of the General Government, and that it will have this and no other effect; while others declare that its object is to distribute the revenues of the General Government among the States for their own use, and that such will be its undoubted effect. Gentlemen of high intelligence seemed to differ about its construction and effect. My friends differed in opinion on this subject. The President has repeatedly called our attention to the subject of the safe keeping of the public treasures, and I have no doubt that every one of his friends in this House felt a deep anxiety on that subject. In the last Congress a bill much like the present law, except the thirteenth section, passed this House, and a similar one has been reported this session. I have not heard a single friend of the administration object to passing a law to regulate the public depositories; all agreed to that measure, when stripped of this questionable attribute.

I can say for myself, that I am strongly opposed to accumulating immense masses of the public money in local banks. No one acquainted with my views on the subject of banks and the currency will for one moment believe that I desire the continuance of such a state of things. That bill makes two classes of depositories, the State banks and State treasuries. The first had been voted for by nearly all, and therefore cannot be called, by those who thus voted, either unsafe or inconvenient. Such a vote clearly implies the necessity and propriety of such agents. No one, I believe, in this House opposed that part of the bill on any ground. Those who contended for the necessity of rechartering the United States Bank, as a safe and convenient agent of the Treasury Department, cannot now well contend that State banks, while they promptly perform a like agency, are not proper fiscal agents of that Department. If they are safe and convenient agents, why, when we are establishing and adopting them, should we make other agents, who are not required or expected to aid either in collecting or disbursing the public money? Why create an agent over whom you can exercise no control, and who is not amenable for violating any law, you may pass? Why make one class of agents pay interest, and not the other; and why take all but five millions from your agents who pay interest, and give it to those who do not? Why place the appropriations, even those for your Indian wars, in hands from which you cannot draw them for years? If these new agents use these funds, as many say they will, under the law, to make railroads, &c., and these wars continue, or others come upon us, and require all our means, how are they to refund, or we to get along without them? If this measure is truly a deposite of the public money, I am at a loss to know what necessity there is for two sets of agents, and why such an extraordinary preference is given to the one not paying interest; and why the appropriations are taken from the only class which can disburse them, and given to the one which cannot. If the State banks are unsafe agents, why use them at all—why leave the moneys with them until next year, before they are withdrawn? I should further like to know why the provision taking these moneys from the old depositories, and giving them to the new, is not made permanent, as well as that part which leaves a part now with the State banks, and all of it after next year. If there is a great necessity for these new depositories, it seems to me the law ought to be permanent for retaining them in the service of the General Government, as well as the one under which the State banks are employed. If this law is a mere matter of deposit, as is contended by some, then it confers little or no benefit upon the States, but merely makes them the agents or servants of the General Government, for a particular purpose, and for a limited period. If this is so, then I cannot understand how it can fairly be made the foundation of such a radical change as that proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. BELL,] in relation to light-houses and harbors. If this is the true construction of that measure, the policy of the Government is not changed, and the States are not to use this money, and it is not placed beyond our control any more than it is with the other agents. Admit this, and I can see no reason why the States should desire this agency. It is not returning to the people what has been drawn from them in taxes. Depositing money with an agent is not giving him the money. If you collect money from sixteen millions of persons, and employ a few of them as your agents to keep it, you do not return it to those from whom you collected it. Many dollars of this money are drawn indirectly from the pockets of my constituents; and if that money is placed in the hands of the treasurer at Albany merely as a depository, to be called for at the pleasure of this Government, I cannot understand how it is to find its way back to their pockets. I cannot understand in what possible way such a measure would return this money to their pockets. If it could reach them, then I should esteem it safe, and in a proper place. It would be the next best thing to never having taken it from them, with all the vast expense of collection. As a measure of deposit, I cannot see that my constituents would derive from this measure one particle of benefit.

Improvement of Harbors.

On the other hand, is it really a distribution bill? Does it give the revenues of the General Government to the State Governments? Are they to use, and not return it? I have never heard of any gentleman, in either end of this Capitol, an argument to prove that Congress had power to do so, except with the revenues derived from the sale of public land. This was expressly disavowed by many in the Senate. So far from believing that Congress has this power, a distinguished Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] deemed it necessary to amend the constitution to accomplish that object. His resolution is in these words:

"Resolution proposing an amendment to the constitution of the United States, providing for a distribution of the surplus revenues among the several States and Territories, until the year eighteen hundred and forty-three.

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, two thirds of both Houses concurring, That the following amendment to the constitution of the United States be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States, which, when ratified by three fourths of said Legislatures, shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as part of the constitution; that the money remaining in the Treasury at the end of each year till the first of January, eighteen hundred and forty-three, after deducting therefrom the sum of ——— dollars, shall be annually distributed among the several States and Territories, including the District of Columbia; and that, for this purpose, the sum to be annually distributed shall be divided into a number of shares, equal to the number of Senators and Representatives in Congress for the time being, with the addition of two for each Territory, and two for the District of Columbia; and there shall be allotted to each State a number of shares equal to the number of Senators and Representatives to which it is at the time entitled in Congress; and to the Territories, including the District of Columbia, two shares each."

Certainly that gentleman could not believe it constitutional to distribute under our present constitution. No man has pointed out, or attempted to do so, the clause in our present constitution which confers such authority. Congress has no power, except what it derives under the constitution; and if this power is not there, then it does not exist. I then ask, where is the power which authorizes Congress to give away, or distribute, the money raised for the purposes enumerated in the constitution? Sir, no such power exists in this Government. Allow me to refer to an authority which no republican will dispute, being entitled to high consideration on constitutional and political questions. Mr. Jefferson, in his message to Congress in December, 1806, speaking of the revenues derived from the customs and public lands, and the proper disposition of them, said:

"When both of these branches of revenue shall in this way be relinquished, there will still, ere long, be an accumulation of moneys in the Treasury, beyond the instalments of public debt which we are permitted, by contract, to pay. They cannot, then, without a modification, assented to by the public creditors, be applied to the extinguishment of this debt, and the complete liberation of our revenues, the most desirable of all objects; nor, if our peace continues, will they be wanting for any other existing purpose. The question, therefore, now comes forward, to what other objects shall these surpluses be appropriated, and the whole surplus of impost, after the entire discharge of the public debt, and during those intervals when the purposes of war shall not call for them? Shall we suppress the impost, and give that advantage to foreign over domestic manufactures? On a few articles of more general and necessary use, the suppression, in due season, will doubtless be right; but the great mass of the articles on which impost is paid are foreign luxuries, purchased by those only who are rich enough to afford themselves the use of them. Their patriotism would certainly prefer its continuance, and application to the great purposes of the public education, roads, rivers, canals, and such other objects of public improvements as it may be thought proper to add to the constitutional enumeration of federal powers. By these operations, new channels of communication will be opened between the States; the lines of separation will disappear; their interest will be identified, and their union be cemented by new and indissoluble ties. Education is here placed among the articles of public care; not that it would be proposed to take its ordinary branches out of the hands of private enterprise, which manages so much better all the concerns to which it is equal, but a public institution can alone supply those sciences which, though rarely called for, are yet necessary to complete the circle, all the parts of which contribute to the improvement of the country, and some of them to its preservation.

"The subject is now proposed for the consideration of Congress, because, if approved by the time the State Legislatures shall have deliberated on this extension of the federal trusts, and the laws shall be passed and other arrangements made for their extension, the necessary funds will be on hand and without employment. I suppose an amendment to the constitution, by consent of the States, necessary, because the objects now recommended are not among those enumerated in the constitution, and to which it permits the public moneys to be applied."

Is there any doubt of the correctness of Mr. Jefferson's position, that the objects are not among the powers enumerated in the constitution? I am sustained by his opinion, that we have no right to distribute the national treasure under the present constitution. I think that question conclusively and irrevocably settled.

But if we have the authority to give, why not do so in a frank, manly, and undisguised manner? Why not take the surplus, if there is a real one, and make the gift by name? If Congress is invested with that power in any shape, it has the power to do so in terms. It may make a gift, donation, or distribution, by name. If the power really exists, the genius and spirit of our institutions, and candor, and good faith, require, if we divide, to do so openly and distinctly, so that our action may be presented to our constituents in its true light. If we have not the power, then our duty to the constitution, to them, and to ourselves, require that we should not attempt it by any indirection, under any disguise in name or form. I know of no reason why an American Congress should resort to indirection to do what the constitution and duty require it to do directly and openly.

But it may be said that Congress cannot give, because the constitution does not permit it; and that the money must be kept where it can be called for to meet any emergency. If this is so, and it is in fact to be returned, I again ask, how are the people to be benefited? This would not be returning to them their own money, as we have been told was the object. If it is the people's own money returned to them, then the General Government has no right hereafter to call for it. On the contrary, if it is the money of the Government, then it cannot be returned to the people's pockets for their own use. It would be of little advantage to them to receive it, and be liable to have it called for on any day, at the will of others. It is entirely impracticable to restore this money to the pockets of the people, from which it has been drawn by indirect taxation. They never can receive it directly. But if it were possible to accomplish such a purpose, it would not do away the constitutional objection. The want of constitutional power is a full answer to the whole scheme of distribution. I then submit whether a due regard for the constitution and our constituents does not require of us an application to the true source of power for a constitutional extension of legislative authority, according to the suggestion of Mr. Jefferson, authorizing it, before we attempt a division of the revenues of the General Government among the States? And allow me to suggest, if this power is ever to be conferred, that, as far as practicable, except in cases of war, Congress should have the least possible control over the amount of the dividends, by giving a certain per cent. of the revenues, or a certain gross sum; and their use by the States should be confined to the purposes of education, and such other specific objects as shall equally benefit all, lest we realize those difficulties which I shall hereafter suggest. Still this measure is commented upon, and conclusions drawn from it, as if it were really a distribution. We are advised of the great advantages that are to flow from the distribution. I think I have shown that, if it is a distribution, the measure is unconstitutional; and if it is not a distribution, that then it is not returning to the people their own money, or benefiting them at all. What, then, is this measure? This is an important question, which has produced different answers. I believe there is not a friend of the administration who will not repudiate the idea of sustaining it as a distribution. I do not know the man among them who would not pronounce it unconstitutional. Those who voted for it, so far as I know their views, considered it a mere deposit measure. As such, I have shown that what relates to the new depositories is valueless to the people. But among the various opinions which are entertained of this measure, there were those who viewed it as an indirect distribution, and as much a violation of the constitution as if it were a direct and open distribution. Those who originated it treated it as a distribution in its consequences. The consequences which they enumerated were such as could not result from a deposit; they could only flow from a distribution; from a free gift of the money, not to be returned. Those friends of the administration who considered it a distribution in fact, voted against it, in obedience to their sense of duty under the constitution. They believed it not less a distribution, for its being covered with the deposit mantle; no less a violation of the constitution, because the word "deposit" occupies the place of "distribute," in the structure of the section. They feared that the consequences would be injurious to the best interests of the country. Many thought they foresaw an increase of indirect taxation, to swell up a fund for distribution. If it was not a gift, they doubted the propriety of each of the independent States becoming debtors to the General Government, liable to be called upon at the pleasure of the creditor. It was apprehended it would weaken the independence of the States, without producing a corresponding benefit to the General Government or the people. They feared that it might lead to extravagant and often useless expenditures, on the part of the State Governments; that they might conform, in an evil hour, to the will of the Federal Government, to avoid paying old debts; and that they might become prostrate, and dependent on the great central power for means to sustain their institutions. They feared that, in the words of the old adage, the debtor would become the slave of the creditor; they feared that the State dividends might be seized by knots of politicians in the different States, and used, not for the benefit of all, but to build up private fortunes, or perpetuate political power; that they might be used "to make the rich richer and the poor poorer;" that it might sever the link of accountability which now binds the political agents of the State Governments to their constituents. They feared that, under pretence of public good, projects might be set on foot, and works be commenced, which might result in little except the aggrandizement of the sagacious or influential speculator; that in time a sovereign State might not dare to enter upon a noble enterprise, for the benefit of her citizens, without sacrificing to political deities, and consulting the Treasury oracles. They feared that, instead of devoting our federal revenues to the objects pointed out in the constitution, the defences of the country, they might be diverted to objects of less national character. They feared that our navy might cease to be an admired and cherished object; that our fortifications might crumble into ruins, and our harbors and rivers might remain choked up and obstructed, to the hazard of our ships of war and the prejudice of commerce. They feared that our militia might not be armed, equipped, and disciplined, by the General Government, as they ought, to relieve them from unnecessary burdens, and to insure quiet and protection. They feared that the arm of public defence might be palsied by withholding appropriations for that purpose; that commerce might be left to perish on the hidden shoals of the ocean, or dashed to ruin on the unlighted shore. I voted with these, and participated in their views. I may have been mistaken in my views and fears. If so, it is an error of the head, and not of the heart. Time will test the whole. I may have looked with too great apprehension upon the future. A proper degree of solicitude, however, on such a subject, is not among the unpardonable offences.

It has been asked, with an air of triumph, if it were really feared that Congress and the State Legislatures would not promptly perform all their duties. I will answer by asking other questions. Did the Senate of Massachusetts, when it resolved, during the last war, that it was unbecoming a moral and religious people to rejoice at our victories, perform its duty? Would gentlemen be willing to rely upon the action of such a body for the money necessary to prosecute a war? Were there not other legislative bodies that exerted all their efforts to oppose the last war, and cripple Mr. Madison's administration? Do gentlemen believe that, if money, the sinews of war, had then depended upon the vote of Massachusetts, we could have procured it to defend the country? In what State, where the federalists were in power, did the General Government receive prompt and efficient aid? Now, as to Congress. I ask, did Congress perform its duty, in passing the alien and sedition laws? Who will, here or elsewhere, defend those measures? Will any friend of the administration say it did so, when it passed the bill to recharter the United States Bank, Mr. Clay's land bill, and the Maysville road bill? Will the gentleman from Tennessee say the Senate was doing its duty in trying and condemning the President in 1834, without the authority of law? Will any one say that it was performing its duty, when members here resisted appropriations for the last war? The people have passed judgment in these cases, and the history of the times tells us what the answer is. Sir, we have been told on this floor, when considering an appropriation to repress Indian hostilities, that if we were not more economical and rigid in our appropriations, we should have nothing left to divide. Those who were opposed to the Government during the last war may hereafter have it in their power to control the destinies of this nation, and we may have as little to approve of in their acts as we had in their gag-law and their war patriotism. My fears as to the fate of the bills in aid of commerce are about to be realized. The harbor bill is attempted to be defeated, to aid in the work of distribution.* The gentleman from Tennessee has raised his powerful arm against works of improvement by the General Government; works which vitally affect the lives and fortunes of a large number of our fellow-citizens.

I ask, are all such improvements to be abandoned? If such changes follow that measure, it will present itself in a new and interesting light. If the arm of this Government is to be rendered nerveless as to breakwaters and harbors, may it not become equally so as to light-houses, forts, and other national objects? I have not heard the gentleman from Tennessee allege that the items in this bill were not such as, under the constitution, are proper objects of the fostering hand of the General Government. The question is narrowed down to one of mere expediency. Shall we, under the new state of things, engage in these improvements or not? The argument used by that gentleman, it seems to me, will extend with undiminished force against all national works, designed to foster commerce and preserve the mariner. Why shall we change the tried and approved policy of the Government? Who seeks it? and for what purpose? Sir, we are pointed to the deposite bill as the cause for a change in policy, and it is sought for by the opponents of the administration, and for the purpose of increasing the amount to be distributed during the coming year. This is the great hinge on which the whole turns. While the friends of the administration desire to collect no more revenue than is required to pay the necessary expenses of Government, and make such works as are strictly of a national character, it is a favorite purpose of its opponents to pave the avenues to political distinction and power with gold from the National Treasury; to appeal to selfish, instead of patriotic considerations; nay, sir, I venture the prediction, that the party who refused to aid in raising means to defend the country in the last war, will now claim high consideration because they wish to divide the Treasury. Roman conquerors and demagogues divided first the grain from the public stores, then the lands, and then came the downfall. If you can divide the contents of the Treasury, why not divide the lands before sale, and give direct to each citizen his due proportion? Why not carry out the movement, and divide the whole property in the Union equally? The people may be deceived and misled for a day, but they will not long follow golden lights in the hands of demagogues. They only ask of Government good wholesome laws, protecting them in their lawful pursuits, punishing offenders—laws which shall confer equal advantages upon all; defend the ignorant and the feeble against the craft of the subtle and selfish, and the violence and oppression of the strong and powerful.

I hope, sir, that this House is not prepared to follow the lead of the gentleman from Tennessee. I am confident that a majority do not entertain his views on this subject, nor the one adverted to. If a radical change in our national policy is not to take place, then it becomes our duty to consider whether it is proper to undertake any or all the works enumerated in this bill. Those who are against all such improvements will, of course, vote for striking out the enacting clause, to defeat the whole bill. On the contrary, those who believe it the duty of this Government to carry on any one of those included in it, will vote against the motion. Subsequently such items can be stricken from it as may be considered as improperly included. I will not go into an argument to prove the utility of such works as those included in this bill. All must concede their importance. Unless we foster and protect commerce, that bountiful source of revenue must dry up and disappoint us. I am desirous of correcting what seems to be an erroneous impression of some in relation to a portion of these works. I refer to those on the lakes. They have been spoken of in terms of disparagement, and as not being within the avenues of commerce, or the sphere of naval operations. Those who entertain these views follow false lights. The history of the last war will shed some light on this subject. Three of these lakes were then skirted by settlements, and two of them will ever be remembered as the theatre of the achievements of Perry and McDonough. The victories of Erie and Champlain will never be forgotten while valor is cherished by our citizens. The Ontario fleet was not unimportant; and at the close of the war your navy yard at Sackett's harbor showed two ships of the largest class on the stocks, while several smaller ones were afloat. One, if not both, of the former, are still owned and preserved by the Government. There are now five of these inland seas studded with cities, villages, and settlements, rivalling those on the Atlantic; each of them important to present commercial and future naval operations. Our next war for "free trade and sailors' rights" may be on those lakes. An enemy will find more there to destroy than in 1812. Commerce has sprung up on them, and these lakes are now covered with steamboats and vessels, freighted with thousands of our citizens and millions of our commerce. The want of searoom and natural harbors renders the navigation of the lakes hazardous, and hence it becomes a matter of strict duty to light the coast and construct artificial harbors. Shall we refuse this, when the Government has more money than it can use for other purposes—when there is a surplus? Thousands of people leave Buffalo every day for the West, to settle on the public lands; vast numbers leave other places. Boats are crowded with men, women, and children, and their very numbers increase their perils in case of danger. Patriotism and duty point to them as objects of national protection. These lakes, at this time, require more of the attention of this Government than the Atlantic, which has long felt its fostering care. The wilderness on the lakes has disappeared, and given place to cultivation and thrift, that will not suffer by comparison with any part of the Union. The region which was borne down and buried in distress and poverty in a war growing out of commercial operations on the Atlantic, is now the abode of health and plenty; and I ask you to cherish its interests in the same liberal spirit that you do the older regions. Let the benign influences of this Government fall equally upon all, as far as a strict adherence to the constitution will permit.

The commerce on the Atlantic now has not only all that is asked for the lakes, but we float a navy at the cost of annual millions to protect it. Every hundred millions of that commerce costs this Government several to guard and protect it abroad, as well as at home. Shall we, then, grudge a small pittance for the home protection of that on our own inland seas? I hope not. This would not be liberal or just, or worthy of the American character. I think I have shown these improvements to be within the constitutional power of Congress; that they are so received by the executive branch of this Government, and have received the sanction of every Congress for many years. That these works are necessary is admitted by all. I then appeal to this House to provide for them before we dispose of a surplus, which can only exist, as the word implies, after all necessary constitutional works are fully provided for. When all is done that ought to be done for all national purposes, if a real surplus is found to exist, the people, whose interests alone are affected by it, will decide whether the taxes shall be reduced to the necessities of the Government, or whether the constitution shall be altered, so as to raise money for distribution. Until then let us continue our public works with a spirit worthy of Americans.

Mr. Chairman, I should here have concluded my remarks, but for the extraordinary attack of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BELL] on two of the committees of this House—the Committee of Ways and Means and Committee on Commerce—and, through them, upon the presiding officer of this House. I am a member of the latter committee, and feel it my duty to repel the charge so distinctly and confidently made. That gentleman distinctly and confidently stated that these two committees “were organized on the principle of extravagance;” but added, however, “that it was not the fault of the members composing these committees, or their constituents, that they were thus organized.” This is but a feeble attempt to blunt the edge of the charge of extravagance made against the members of these committees, but it serves to give direction and point to the charge made against the Speaker, who appointed them. The charge proclaims wrong somewhere; and if it does not rest with the members of the committees, nor their constituents, it must of necessity rest upon the Speaker. In order to sustain his imputation against the Speaker for censurable appointments, he must first fasten the charge of extravagance upon the individual members of these committees. In proof of the truth of his assertion, he took up a list of the committees, and read most, if not all, of the names of those of the Ways and Means, and commented separately on them, and attempted to prove, from their location alone, that they were liable to his charge of extravagance in public expenditures. He abandoned his undertaking before he finished the first committee, and despatched the other (in a lump) by bold assertion alone.

I have an answer to most of the gentleman's charge, which, being a matter of record in this House, cannot be the subject of dispute or cavil. At the last session, that gentleman was Speaker, and appointed the committees. Here is a list of these two committees, as then and now appointed:

COMMITTEE OF WAYS AND MEANS.

Appointed by Mr. Bell.

Polk, Tennessee, chairman.
Wilde, Georgia.
Cambreleng, N. Y.
McKim, Maryland.
Binney, Pennsylvania.
Loyal, Virginia.
McKinley, Alabama.
Hubbard, N. H.
Corwin, Ohio.

Appointed by Mr. Polk.

Johnson, Tennessee.
Owens, Georgia.
Cambreleng, N. Y., ch'n.
McKim, Maryland.
Ingersoll, Pennsylvania.
Loyal, Virginia.
Lawrence, Mass.
Smith, Maine.
Corwin, Ohio.

It is known to us all, that but five of the former committee are now members of this House. The late chairman is now Speaker. The other four are retained on this committee, where the late Speaker placed them. To supply his own place, so far as location is concerned, the present Speaker selected his own colleague, [Mr. CAYE JOHNSON,] whom the gentleman placed, at the last session, at the head of a very important committee. Every member of this House knows that he is one of the most thorough opponents to extravagance in it. He is a rigid economist with the public money, and his voice and his vote are always against profuse expenditures. I always consider him a safe guide when he goes for a public expenditure. If there is a thorough radical in this House, he is one. In place of Mr. Binney we have Mr. Ingersoll, his successor, and in place of Mr. Wilde, Mr. Owens, from the same State. I believe the honorable gentleman will be troubled to prove them more extravagant than their predecessors, who were of his own selecting. I believe he did not continue his charge when he reached their names. The next change is placing Mr. Smith in place of Mr. Hubbard, who is now in the Senate. So far from making a charge of extravagance against him, he spoke of that gentleman's report on harbors, and paid his economy a compliment. The only remaining change is that of Mr. Lawrence in place of Mr. McKinley. Mr. Lawrence comes from the same district formerly represented by Mr. Gorham, who occupied the same place on the committee. I am not aware that he is particularly liable to this charge of extravagance. He is, however, a political associate of the honorable gentleman, and I leave them to settle the matter between them.

Here is a list of the former and present Committee on Commerce:

Appointed by Mr. Bell.

Sutherland, Pa., chairman.
Harper, N. H.
Pinckney, S. C.
Heath, Md.
Pearce, R. I.
Gillet, N. Y.
Phillips, Mass.
Johnson, La.
Morgan, N. Y.

Appointed by Mr. Polk.

Sutherland, Pa., chairman.
Cushman, N. H.
Pinckney, S. C.
Ingham, Ct.
Pearce, R. I.
Gillet, N. Y.
Phillips, Mass.
Johnson, La.
McKeon, N. Y.

From this it will be seen that six out of nine (all that are now members) are precisely the same persons appointed by the gentleman himself. The changes are, Mr. Cushman in place of Mr. Harper, from the same State; and Mr. McKeon in place of Mr. Morgan, from the same district; and Mr. Ingham, from Saybrook, Connecticut, instead of Mr. Heath, of Baltimore. Messrs. Cushman, Ingham, and McKeon, will not suffer by a comparison with their predecessors on the committee, who were honorable men. The warm effort of Mr. Heath to procure a large subscription to the stock of the railroad from Baltimore to Washington cannot have been forgotten by many present. I will add, as it relates to myself, that there is not even an application from my district for an appropriation for any public purpose. There is not a man in my district, to my knowledge, who is interested in any Western land speculation. I will now ask, with what propriety does the honorable gentleman charge that this committee was formed on the principle of extravagance? The present Speaker had his own authority for appointing two thirds of them, and for the location, which seems to be his principal proof, of all except one. The gentleman shrunk from the task of pointing out, on this committee, the names of those who, from location or other cause, were tainted with extravagance. Sir, the charge is unfounded, both as it relates to the members of the committee and the Speaker. That gentleman needs some proof besides location and naked assertion, to sustain his charge against either. He will find the votes of the members of the present committees are as free from censure as those of persons differently located, and as free as those who were appointed by him. A proper sense of what is due to the members of this House, and the country, ought to have induced him to have withheld his charge until he could have sustained it by better evidence.

But, sir, these committees were not, in my judgment, the principal objects of attack. He could have had but little object in dealing blows at them. To him it is far more important, and it is more consonant with the drift of his labors during this session, to make the Speaker's seat an uneasy one—to make it totter under him. His rival occupies that station, which is the highest in this House, and one of the most honorable in the nation. He failed to unite with the honorable gentleman in the celebrated caucus at the last session. He stood, in 1834, almost the sole champion of the President from Tennessee. He resisted, with all the force of strong argument, the multiplied attacks on the President for removing the deposits. He is now his fast friend. He has been elected Speaker by the votes of the friends of the administration; by the votes of those who then sustained the President, and who now sustain him. The honorable gentleman, though almost the sole opposing candidate, failed of success. I leave him to tell by the votes of what party he was sustained. If the national republicans, nullifiers, and abolitionists, had any candidate but himself, he can name him. If, in 1834, or since, he has uttered a word in defence of the Hero of New Orleans, he will confer an obligation by pointing it out. This session, the journals will show how often the honorable gentleman has followed the lead of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] and voted with the special friends of Messrs. Clay and Calhoun and the abolitionists, and in opposition to the friends of the President. When a member of the party with which he is acting, in the last Congress, called his constituent (the President) a toothless tyrant, I ask, did he raise his voice to resent it? Did he hurl back the slander, as honorable gentlemen usually do, when their constituents are attacked? If he did, I did not hear it. It is the present Speaker who repelled all such attacks. Unless defending the President, and declining to attend the caucus, are crimes, I know not what offence the Speaker has been guilty of, that he should be hunted down by his colleague. If, before he refused to attend that caucus, he was known to the ex-Speaker to have been of such doubtful integrity as his present charge implies, how did he reconcile it with the dictates of duty to appoint him chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, the most prominent place he could assign him in the organization of the House? Spectators view the honorable gentleman's course, at this session, as designed to hurl his successful rival from the chair, and prostrate him in disgrace. How was this to be done? Not by open and bold attack at the commencement, which could be repelled, but by the subtlety of indirection. What has been his course this session towards his colleague, who must occupy the chair in silence? At the very outset of this session, while smarting under the sting of defeat, he began his complaints about the rules of order; they were wrong. He would not say that the present incumbent did actually abuse his power under them, but he might do so; they were liable to great abuse; the freedom of speech and of the people depended upon taking away the vast and frightful power collected in the hands of the Speaker. Yes, sir, as soon as his rival became the expounder of these rules, which have been in use for years, he desires them altered. But while he was in the chair, the Speaker's power under them excited no terror, no alarm, in his bosom. The power was safe in his hands, when he was applying the rules to his rival and others; but when taken from him, and given to another, this hall echoes with the notes of his fears. Years have rolled by without an effort, so far as I can learn, on his part, to limit this dreaded power. Now, its safety is doubted in the hands of one whom the majority preferred over him for Speaker. The generosity and nobleness of all this I will not now comment upon. I will here remark, that those who have abandoned the Chief Magistrate, and joined the standard of his enemies, usually remove the mask by degrees. They usually commence by throwing out insinuations, and end in the use of assertion. The effort is first to induce a belief that there is something wrong in the President known to them; next, that he is changing; then changed; and all ends in pronouncing him entirely unworthy of support. They never commence boldly, and admit their own change, but slip off by degrees, like deserters. The public mind must first be prepared by insinuation and suspicion, before it will believe a charge not fully sustained by proof.

Sir, if the people could be led to doubt whether the rules were fairly applied and properly executed, they might then the more readily believe the charge that they actually had not been. Settle this belief firmly, and then they would the more readily believe the allegation that the committees were appointed on the principle of extravagance. Without these preliminary steps, this charge would find few believers. What is here mere insinuation in these things, swelling with the distance it travels, when it reaches Tennessee, becomes matter of positive allegation and belief.

Sir, I know the presiding officer of this House well. I have for three years been a witness to his manly and honorable course in defence of the administration, the constitution, and rights of the people; and until the honorable gentleman opened his batteries upon him, I never heard even an insinuation breathed against him. Even his political opponents bear testimony to his capacity, honesty, and impartiality. The honorable testimony of Mr. Banks, on resigning his seat here, to this effect, is a matter of record on the files of the House. The witnesses of his liberality, ability, firmness, and honesty, are on every side of me. I can hardly imagine that any thing short of deep-rooted personal hostility could induce any man, an observer of his acts, to charge him with official misconduct, either in executing the rules and orders of the House, or in the formation of the committees. If record evidence is needed as to the correctness and propriety of his decisions, we have it in the strong and decisive vote by which his decisions are uniformly sustained. The names of his political opponents, as well as his friends, are found sustaining these decisions. At this session thirty-three appeals have been taken. Three of them were laid on the table, which is equivalent to sustaining him; nine of them were withdrawn by those who appealed; twenty affirmed, and but one reversed. In the latter case, he gave a more liberal construction to a new order than the House decided it was its intention it should bear. In this decision the Speaker was sustained by the voice and vote of the honorable gentleman. Certainly he cannot complain of that decision. If the Speaker's decisions had not been characterized by sound judgment and great fairness, he never would have been so triumphantly sustained.

The honorable gentleman makes another charge, which, in its consequences, is calculated to injure the Speaker. He says, at this session there has been great disorder in the House. This seems intended to convey the idea that he is not competent to preserve order. This is not a reproach upon his honesty, but a disparagement of his capacity, and is calculated to have effect out of this House. It seems to be designed to have the order of this session contrasted with the past. I must confess that this effort of the ex-Speaker to show his successor to disadvantage, by comparison with himself, is an interesting specimen of modesty. That there has been disorder in the House, I do not deny; but I deny that it is the fault of the presiding officer. That gentleman told us long since, that the minority were always restive and uneasy, and if they could not accomplish their objects orderly, they would do so disorderly; and that it was natural for those who were restrained to find fault. I leave others to say whether his is not a fair illustration of this last position. He knows full well that the disorders have proceeded mostly from those whom he described as restrained. When gentlemen were out of order, I should like to know how often he has voted them to be so, and to prevent their going on. I should be happy to learn that he had, even for once, endeavored to use his influence to check disorders. The commanding position of that gentleman would enable him to effect much in quieting those who were restrained, if he chose to do so. But the journals will show, that he had even moved to allow a member, decided to be out of order by a vote of the House, to proceed. I will not name those from whom the disorder proceeds, but this House and the country know who they are, and their relation to that gentleman. I hope he will now allow the Speaker a respite, and that he will turn his attention to those who have been the authors of the disorders complained of, and read them such a lesson as shall prevent like future occurrences.

The gentleman is sorely annoyed with the Globe and several other papers, and occasionally occupies the attention of the House with a chapter of griefs on their account. I know little of the merits of his controversies with them, and shall not attempt their defence while they are so able to defend themselves. It is not beyond probability that we should hear little on this score, if he was altogether victorious in his conflicts with them. It is not usually the victor who complains of his antagonist.

The gentleman has often complained, this session, of the rule of the House which authorizes the demand of the previous question. He and his friends have heaped showers of epithets upon it, calling it the engine of tyranny, gag-law, &c., until an old and valuable rule of the House is in danger of being considered highly exceptionable and improper. I will here take occasion to make a few remarks on the previous question. The constitution authorizes each House to make rules for the government of its own proceedings. This House long since adopted rules which are now in operation. These rules have in view the order and despatch of business. Among them is the rule giving the previous question, which terminates debate. I am informed that in the British Parliament no such rule exists, and the only way to stop debate is to cough down whoever attempts to speak against the will of a majority. Our rule is liable to fewer objections, and is better adapted to the promotion of order and good feeling. Without it, a small number may control the action of the House, and defeat all business. The country might look in vain for the transaction of public business, if a minority could defeat it by constant talking. The previous question is seldom called until the main question is understood. All parties, when in a majority, resort to its use. It is true it may be abused, as it was, in my judgment, by the present minority (then in the majority) in 1832, on the bank question. It is not the use, but the abuse of it, that can ever properly be objected to. Nearly every old member here, as the journals show, has voted for it. The bill to recharter the United States Bank, and Mr. Clay's land bill, passed this House by the use of the previous question, nearly every opponent of the administration voting for it. The gentleman from Tennessee has voted for this motion. The journals show that in one of the votes connected with the passage of the "bloody bill," as it is called, he voted for it. They also show that, on the celebrated resolutions concerning the removal of the public deposits, and the recharter of the United States Bank, in 1834, he voted for the previous question. The journal of this session shows him voting for that question on the pension bill, which was very little discussed. This motion is now often made by his own friends. It was demanded the other day by the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. Lewis,] who very pertinently remarked to his friends, that it was not their speeches, but their votes, that he wanted. If it is wrong to vote for this question, the gentleman and his associates are as guilty as others. If it is right, I really hope he will cease his complaints concerning it.

The gentleman complains that there has been no opportunity for political discussion this session. This is a strange complaint to come from that quarter. To give other members, all of whom have the same right to claim that he has, the same time at political discussion which he has taken on two bills this session, would require a session of about three years. On the 9th of February, when the navy appropriation bill came up, he moved to reduce the appropriations, I believe, one half, and opened a political discussion on it, which terminated the 7th of April. The gentleman then occupied the time of the House about four days. In the end, on a motion in the same words as his own, although sitting in the House, he was silent and did not vote for it. But six voted for that reduction. Why he made a motion that he did not vote for, I cannot say. If the motion was made with the view of having it prevail, I should have expected him to have voted for it; but if merely to allow him a chance at political discussion, which he actually enjoyed, then this complaint is groundless. When this bill came up, he made a motion to strike out the enacting clause, and followed up his motion by a six hours' speech, entirely political, relating to almost every thing but the question before the House, and at the end of it withdrew his motion. This is a practical commentary upon his complaints. The country will decide whether President-making is the business which they send us here to transact, to the neglect of all other business, and whether he has had a sufficient opportunity at it. The gentleman, though hard pressed for time for political discussion, has nevertheless found enough to enable him to visit New York, to study her institutions, and particularly her politics. His discoveries are important, and deserve to be recorded, to show his good will towards us. He has compared my fellow-citizens to the ruthless savages, who, by deeds of blood and violence, were a terror to all who surrounded them. I envy not the feelings of a statesman who allows himself to make such comparisons of a virtuous and good people. My native State manages her affairs in a manner satisfactory to herself, and consistent with her prosperity; and the shaft of envy, by whatever arm it may be hurled, will fall harmless at her feet. She neither offers nor receives dictation; and if he is really a State rights man, we shall expect he will allow us the privilege, which other States enjoy, of managing our own affairs in our own way. We shall not quarrel with Tennessee, because about a dozen of her members of Congress, through a caucus, attempted to bring out a presidential candidate; and I hope he will allow us the privilege of selecting candidates in our own way, by conventions of the people, as has been the custom of both parties for many years. In connexion with this subject, he spoke of a system of rewards and punishments, and that it extended to the operations of the Federal Government. He told us partisans were rewarded and punished according to their compliance with, or resistance to, dictation. He referred to our minister to England, (Mr. Stevenson,) to Mr. Taney, Mr. Barbour, the Speaker, and others, to illustrate and prove his position. If he intends to convey the idea that either of these gentlemen have abandoned their republican principles, or acted contrary to their own sense of public duty, at the bidding of any one, I take issue with him, and challenge his proofs. The President, as well as a majority of this House, has selected able and competent friends for high stations, instead of opponents. In this, the President followed the course of Mr. Jefferson and our other Presidents. The gentleman selects from his friends, and is supported by his friends. But why does he refer to the Speaker as having received his reward? He has, with great energy and success, sustained the present administration, and continues steady in its support. Is there any thing wrong in this? In the last Congress, the gentleman generally voted with him; but with whom does he now vote? The journals show the House divided now, as it was then, except the gentleman and some of his colleagues are found voting with the nullifiers, federalists, and bank men, all of whom are, and have been, the President's ardent and bitter opponents. In selecting a Speaker, the majority gave the known friend of the President a preference over one who was supported by his opponents, and one whose friendship was justly doubted. If this is a reward, it is the reward of merit, honestly and intelligently bestowed. But how stands his own case? He was once made Speaker by opposition votes, and was the candidate of that party this session. Was there any reward, actual or attempted, on either of these occasions? Does he not see that his charge may be turned upon himself? If one, continuing with his friends, receives a mark of distinguished consideration from them, and it is called a reward, what term shall we apply to one, when a similar favor is shown or attempted, when he changes sides?

The gentleman exclaims vehemently against those in power; his indictment is general, embracing all who differ with him in opinion, but is always without specifications. Will he ever specify the wrongs, and the criminals, so that the latter may be arraigned, tried, convicted, and punished? Duty requires specific exposures, if he is apprized of these alleged wrongs. He who conceals a crime known to him has a heavy responsibility on his shoulders. The gentleman has told us that the power of the Executive in this House controlled the majority. This is the charge, stripped of all verbiage. Many of his friends have sought to establish it. If it is true, this charge is a serious one, deserving high consideration. If such influence is exercised to promote laudable purposes, he of course will not object to the end, but deprecate the means only. If it is exercised for bad purposes, he ought to complain, and duty requires him to expose it. He will perceive that he makes a serious charge, not only against the President, but against the members of this House. Is he prepared to sustain it? If so, I hope he will give us his proof. He has also told us, in another part of the speech, that the President and his party were against the election of President and Vice President coming into this House. He informed us that this was an effort to gull the people, and then gravely inquired if the representatives of the people were not to be trusted with the power conferred on them by the constitution? Now, it is quite certain, if the President has and can exercise the alarming and tremendous power over this House which he has described to us, then they are not to be trusted. He told us the President was attempting to appoint a successor. If the election comes into the House, and he desires thus to appoint, then, on the gentleman's own ground, he will be certain to do it, and the people should guard against the possibility of his exercising this power. It is very certain that the President either has not the power over the House which he ascribes to him, or the House is not to be trusted; and I leave the gentleman to reconcile his different positions. If the President has this power, and wishes to appoint a successor, I cannot perceive how the gentleman can be willing to trust the election to this House, nor how the President and his friends can object to its coming into the House, if it is certain that the former has and exercises the influence here which the gentleman ascribes to him.

If I can understand another of his charges, he alleges that one of the reasons why large appropriations are sought to be made is, to increase the patronage of the General Government, so that it can control the elections. The President, in vetoing the Maysville road bill, the bill to recharter the United States Bank, and other bills, desired to limit executive patronage. You, sir, and every person who has held an executive station, must know that the dispensation of patronage is the most troublesome of all executive duties. I will ask the gentleman if the President has changed his views on this subject since he gave those vetoes? If he has changed his opinions, I ask for the proof. He often entertains us with an account of the alarming numbers of office-holders; and on one occasion, by including among them the pensioners, swelled their numbers to sixty thousand. Whether the war-worn soldier is an officer, or not, I leave others to decide. They were enumerated to swell the number of those whom he alleges conform their acts to the executive will. If he really feared that the Executive would abuse his trust in this respect, how did it happen that the other day he voted for a pension bill which is likely to add thousands to the list, extending the system beyond all former precedent? Yes, sir; he not only voted for that bill, but, when the discussion had hardly commenced, voted for the previous question on it. Why did he vote for the previous question? Was it to save time? If so, why, a week afterwards, at the heel of the session, did he speak six hours on this bill, and then withdraw his motion at the end of his speech?

My colleague, [Mr. VANDEBROECK,] on a former occasion, commented upon the gentleman's course, in not raising his voice in defence of the President for removing the deposits. He assigned, in reply, this extraordinary reason: that he knew too much of the secret springs which produced that measure. The meaning of this is, that there was something wrong and censurable at the bottom of this measure, which he knew and condemned; and we may infer the public would have done so, if it had known it. I ask why, if there was any thing wrong known to him, he did not disclose it? As an honest and fearless representative, it was his duty to have done so; but if there was nothing wrong, why assign such a reason for his silence? He has either assigned a bad, incorrect, and useless reason, or he has neglected his duty to the public in not apprizing others of the reason which operated upon him, and which might have changed their views, and the decision of that subject. In one part of his speech he told us that the President was a high-minded, honorable, independent man; in another he informed us that he had violated his pledges, by interfering in the freedom of elections, and was ruled by bad, dishonest men. If the President is honest, then he has not violated his pledges; and if he is independent, then he is not controlled by others. I will thank him to inform us which of these positions are to be relied upon as correct? He further told us, that although the President and his friends were committed against the old United States Bank, they were not as to a new one. This is a strange declaration to proceed from that gentleman. The President is known to be opposed to all chartered monopolies. This is the leading opinion among the friends of the administration in this House. No friend of republican principles and equal rights will ever vote for another United States Bank. Those who have read that gentleman's published speech on the subject of the recharter will, however, be surprised that he should deem it censurable to vote for a United States Bank.

The gentleman has talked much of the acts and professions of the President and his friends, by which the people were "gulled." He told us that when it was objected to the election of President coming into the House of Representatives, it was an effort to "gull the people." I understand it to be the settled opinion of the democracy of this country that an election ought never to come into the House. But let us look back to 1824. What then was the almost united voice of Tennessee? What said the gentleman and his friends on this subject then? Was there then an attempt to gull the people? General Jackson then had a large plurality of the votes of the people, but was defeated in the House. His friends cried out bribery and corruption, and the House-President and his associates were expelled from power, and the people's President came into office. The gentleman will hardly admit that General Jackson's friends were then gulling the people. Have principles changed, or has the gentleman changed? He has led us to Greece and Rome to witness the operations of tyranny. He has held up to our view Cromwell kicking Parliament out of doors, and Napoleon ruling France at his discretion, and then warned us against the encroachments of executive power. Comparing the President with tyranny is a new way of demonstrating friendship. It will require something beyond the force of comparison either to make the President a tyrant, or cause the people to believe him one. If the gentleman still insists that he is a friend of the President, why make these allusions and comparisons? If an opponent, will he admit it? Why has he changed?

In a subsequent part of his speech, the gentleman told us that the President and his friends professed to be in favor of a gold and silver currency, which, on a former occasion, the gentleman called the "gold and silver humbug," and remarked that this was another effort to gull the people. He also remarked that success in such efforts seemed to depend upon the boldness with which they were made. I know that the President and the great body of his friends are in favor of a constitutional currency; one which possesses intrinsic and uniform value in all parts of the world; one which gives the mammoth speculators no preference over the rest of the community; and one which is opposed to those monopolies which are injurious to the true interests of the people. If it is wrong to entertain such constitutional opinions, and publish them boldly, then indeed he and they are guilty. That gentleman, I presume, has great confidence in this matter of boldness and apparent confidence; and, from his free use of them, one might conclude that with him much depended upon them; for no one has ever exceeded him in bold and confident assertion. It seems to be one of the great weapons which he uses on nearly all occasions. I might pursue the gentleman throughout several of his speeches, and show that many of his positions concerning the President have little but this boldness of assertion to sustain them; but, as my friend from Virginia [Mr. GARLAND] suggests, the President does not need defence from these oft-repulsed attacks. I am conscious that the arrows from the gentleman's quiver will fall harmless at the President's feet. The nation will protect his honor with the same sacred honesty of purpose as he protected New Orleans and now protects the constitution. I will leave to time the recording his deeds of valor, and to dispel any clouds that may be attempted to be raised to obscure or destroy his fame, whether they are the works of pretended friends or real enemies.

When Mr. GILLET had concluded,

Mr. SMITH said it had not been his intention to have uttered a word, nor have detained the committee a single moment upon the subject of either the pending bill, or the other bill of a kindred nature, reported by himself from the Committee of Ways and Means, except to make such explanations in relation to the latter as should be called for relative to facts which might, from his peculiar situation, be supposed within his own possession, and not in possession of members generally. Nor would he have risen against his intention, at this time, had he not discovered, or thought that he could discover, a somewhat prevalent inclination in this committee, now in session, to draw a distinction between the merits of the bill reported by the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SUTHERLAND], and which is technically called the new harbor bill, and the bill which had been laid aside, reported by himself, and which is called the old harbor bill. I have (said Mr. S.) explained and defended the purposes of this last-named bill to the best of my feeble abilities, and this committee have substantially and in effect adopted it, with very slight additions. In view of this fact, I deem it my duty, a duty which I owe to this committee and to the nation, now that I see an attempt made to discriminate between the purposes and works embraced by these two bills, and to sustain the one at the expense of the other, to lay before this committee and the nation such facts and views as are at once suggested to my mind by such a course of procedure, illustrative of the relative merits and claims of the bill reported by myself, and the bill now pending, reported by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. Chairman, these bills embrace objects of precisely one and the same classification. It is the purpose of each to secure appropriations for the construction and improvement of harbors upon the seacoast, upon the interior lakes, and rivers in the Western States. The one is confined to works of this description already commenced and partially completed; and the other is confined to works of the same description, that have been projected at different dates, surveyed, but never commenced otherwise. The appropriations of the one bill (that reported by myself) amount to $939,384 43, with the amendments thereto, and the aggregate of the other is $931,265 51, making a total of $1,860,649 94. Now, it is contended that the superior merit of the former bill—the only distinctive merit, in truth, of that bill, over the latter bill—consists in the fact that they are works that have been heretofore commenced—works upon which large sums of money have already been expended—works that are in a state of advancement and partial completion; while those in the other bill are altogether new. And hence it is, as the argument runs, that they are entitled to a preference; and hence it is that gentlemen upon this floor are predisposed to award to them a preference, in making appropriations from the public Treasury, over the works enumerated in the other bill. But, sir, when the whole history of these old works is considered, and when the condition of them is taken into a just account, this consideration to which I have just adverted, so far from attaching to them pre-eminence in point of merit over the new works, absolutely furnishes a very strong if not conclusive argument, to my mind, in favor of the new works, even to the neglect of the old works. At all events, Mr. Chairman, I undertake to say, and to proclaim to the nation, that if there be any considerations that will justify any gentleman upon this floor to his constituents and to the country, for voting the large sum to which I have alluded, contained in the old harbor bill for the works there mentioned, there are equally strong and imperious considerations to justify his voting the large sums specified in the new harbor bill, for the works there enumerated. Sir, the bills are of equal merit in all respects, if it be not true, for the reason I have already mentioned, that the new bill has the strongest claims at this time upon the indulgence of Congress. Let us look at history and facts.

By adverting to the report accompanying the old bill, and which has been advertised to by the honorable gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. PATTON,] every line, word, and figure of which, as contained in the appendix, has been derived from the annual reports of the War and Engineer Departments, it will be seen that many of the works contained in the old bill have been several years quartered upon the national Treasury. Many of them have, year after year, been reported in a state of completion, insomuch that only one additional appropriation has repeatedly been represented as all that was necessary to secure their completion beyond question. It cannot be doubted by any gentleman who will investigate their history, that again and again has Congress added a yearly appropriation for many, and I think I may say for a majority, of these works, under the full, confident, and honest expectation at each time that it would be the last appropriation needed, or to be asked for in their behalf. It is curious to look through the appropriation bills of this kind, to trace almost any of these works, and observe the language used in describing the object and purpose of the appropriations made for them. It is alternately "to complete," and "to continue," and "to secure," and then "to complete" and "to continue" again, almost with the regularity of the meetings of Congress. Sometimes the story is omitted for a year, and no appropriation is required, perhaps to render this singular alternation of purpose and promises less observable by the watchful guardians of the public Treasury. But what, sir, does all this history argue? That you should stop this system of expenditure. This was a grave question which presented itself to my mind, on looking carefully into the subject. It is a question which was presented in the facts brought by such examination before the Committee of Ways and Means. Enormous sums had been expended by Government upon these works, and to say that they should now be abandoned, and that no appropriation for them should be now made, was a responsibility, sir, too great for any committee, composed of a part only of this House, to assume, objectionable as the history of these works rendered them. The result was, sir, to report to the House, in the bill which I reported, the several appropriations asked for by the engineer department, and with the bill to report a succinct history of the several works, and of the annual expenditures and progress thereon, as has been done; leaving it to the whole House to determine upon the course which the interest of the nation would justify, under the embarrassing circumstances of the subject. And it is now for the House to determine, in view of the facts disclosed to them, whether they will pursue further this course of expenditure that has been found productive, to say the least, of no very great beneficial results as yet, or whether they will pause until some more economical system of expenditure can be devised.

But, sir, to return to the comparative merits of the works contained in the two bills, now in effect alike before this committee. It is demonstrated in the history of the old works, that although expenditures have been made upon them year after year, and they are seemingly in a state of partial completion, no human foresight can tell, nor ingenuity prophesy, when they will or can be completed. The repeated promises of their completion, (made in honesty of purpose, I am willing to concede, in every instance,) and the no less frequently returning failures, only prove the utter uncertainty upon the subject of their completion, and that human skill cannot guaranty any thing, in this particular, respecting them. Now, sir, who can rise upon this floor and say, in the face of facts like these to which I have adverted, derived from the records of the engineer department, that the new works—those contained in the new bill—are not equally certain of being executed at as early a period as these old works, if the appropriations asked for them are granted by Congress. Who, sir, can undertake in confidence to determine which class of works is most distant from and difficult of execution? No mortal calculation can determine this point; and hence I say it is demonstrated that, taking this view of the bills, there is no justification for the one that is not equally applicable to the support of the other. It is upon this principle that I will vote for both, or against both. These bills must stand or fall, in the eyes of this nation, whatever may be the difference in their destinies in this House, side by side and together.

Sir, let us come for a moment to the matter of cost. I find eighteen of the twenty-six works, harbors and rivers, embraced by the old bill, which number (eighteen is all that I could trace satisfactorily through the documents of Congress) were, by their original estimates, to cost five hundred and sixty-nine thousand four hundred and thirty dollars. I find that the appropriations already made to execute these works, embracing the modifications, enlargements, repairs, and securing of them thus far, amount to one million two hundred and thirty-eight thousand eight hundred and thirty-two dollars; being an excess over the estimates of $669,402, or ninety-nine thousand nine hundred and seventy-two dollars more than one hundred per cent. beyond the original estimates; and yet the works are incomplete, and God only knows when they will be completed; for, as I have before remarked, human foresight cannot calculate the end of them, either in regard to time or cost. Hence my argument is, that in view of either the probable time requisite to the completion, or the probable costs, of the two series of works embraced in these two bills, the one has no merit or claim over the other, but both have equal claims upon the Government, if it be determined that Government will progress further in such a system. To me, sir, it is apparent that, on the score of cost, those who take the responsibility of carrying out the one set can find no sufficient justification for neglecting the other set of these works. I am willing to let those assume the responsibility of this partiality in sustaining the one to the neglect of the other, who may choose so to do. But it should be understood that these are not the only works of the same description that are in contemplation. By reference to House Document No. 18, vol. 1, for 1834-'35, it will be found that the estimated cost of works surveyed, but not commenced, to January, 1831, is no less than forty-nine millions two hundred and fifty-one thousand three hundred and fifty-nine dollars; and that the cost of other works, surveyed subsequently to that date, under the act of 1824, is estimated, as appears by the same document, at upwards of eighteen millions of dollars; making an aggregate of upwards of fifty-seven millions of dollars, laid out in contemplation, under this system of expenditure. Many millions more have been added, no doubt, by the surveys of the last year, including in this aggregate the new works now before the committee; and these are only original estimates, let it be remembered. It appears by House Document No. 89, for the session of 1834-'35, that, as far as could be ascertained, ten millions eight hundred and eighty-six thousand seven hundred and three dollars had been expended up to that time on similar works. Who, sir, can look through this nation, and discover results from this enormous expenditure corresponding to the amount? That some portions of it have been profitable and useful I doubt not. But I call the attention of members of this committee, and the attention of this nation, to the subject, as a general system, which, if meriting their continued support, also demands the hand of extensive reform. If, upon mature consideration, it is to be persisted in, without some new and yet undevise method of economizing in relation to it, so be it. It is time that the history of its works were known and understood, that Congress and the nation may act upon them understandingly. I do not say they can be suddenly abandoned, but I do say they demand some new system of execution.

Sir, the inquiry is made by some gentlemen into the causes of these extensive expenditures, and the rapid enlargement of these public works, at such cost to the Treasury. Some gentlemen attributed this result to one cause, and some to another. I, too, have examined, to my own satisfaction at least, into the cause, or rather causes, of these results. They are not to be found, as some gentlemen have charged, in the predisposition of the present administration to extravagant expenditures, nor to its devotion to the oft-repudiated system of internal improvements. They are to be found, sir, in the combined influences of the act of 1824, appropriating $30,000 per annum for surveys of new works, and of your system of civil and military engineering, emanating from the Academy at West Point. It is from these small and apparently unobtrusive beginnings that these enormous expenditures are entailed upon the public Treasury, with so little prospect of a termination. What, sir, is the operation, what the practical influences, laudable influences, (if gentlemen will call them so,) upon the people, of these combined causes to which I have adverted? I beg this committee to consider this point for a moment.

Under the law of 1824, the comparatively small sum of $30,000 is appropriated for new surveys here, there, and everywhere in the land. It becomes known, shortly, to every town and village, that, on the application of any number of their respectable citizens, any project of improvement in their village may be surveyed at the public expense, from this annual appropriation. An application by some few is accordingly made. The Government have a large number of second lieutenants by brevet, being supernumeraries in the army, in pay, and without employment—fresh from the Military Academy at West Point. The responsible men of the Government are ever anxious to have employment for all the supernumeraries thus attached to the public Treasury, and are thus predisposed to favor every demand for their services. All influences, then, favor the application of the little village. It is granted. The young engineer, in his panoply of office, and with his glittering instruments, is soon upon the theatre of action. He is looked upon with admiration by the village people—his formal preparations and parade of accoutrements are watched by every eye. The boys and the men, and the women, too, perhaps, in some instances, of the astounded town or village, follow in his train, each wondering at the magnificent revolution that is about to be wrought in the condition of their village. The survey is completed. The whole project is most favorably and encouragingly spoken of by the young engineer. The people are delighted with the prospect of the improved and enlarged resources of the place, and the back grounds and pastures, that have laid idle and in waste before, for a wide circle upon the outskirts of the village, are converted and with beautiful regularity laid out into sites for new edifices of business and habitation. An official report, accompanied by a beautifully drawn plan or map of the work, correctly executed, no doubt, as well as beautifully, so far as the topography of the plan is concerned, (for all such things are well drawn up by our corps of engineers,) is formally deposited in the appropriate department in this city.

Now for the next step. All citizens, without distinction of party, impelled by the same impulse of seeming patriotism, and without stopping to examine nicely into the principles of Government that may be involved by the measure, unite in a petition to Congress for a publication of the survey and plans, and for an appropriation to carry the work into execution. The Representative upon this floor from the district which embraces the projected improvement is pressed on all sides, by political friends and political foes, to urge the petition upon the consideration of Congress, and to secure the appropriation. There is no resisting it: all parties are united in it; the people are unanimous for it; and in not one instance of twenty upon this floor can the Representative summon up confidence enough in himself, however mad the scheme may be considered by him, to decline pressing upon Congress a compliance with the petition thus pushed forward. Nay, sir, upon the principle that the Representative is bound to obey the will and voice of his constituents, he is compelled to go ahead with the application, and to do every thing in his power for its success. Well, sir, the appropriation is secured, year after year it is repeated, and it is not until hundreds and thousands of dollars beyond the original estimate of the young engineer have been expended, and no apparent prospect of a successful completion of the work is manifest, that the true character of the enterprise is seen and appreciated.

Mr. Chairman, this is no fancy sketch that I have been portraying. It is the common operation and result of your law of 1824, and annual appropriation for new and indiscriminate surveys, and of your system of engineering fostered by the West Point Academy. Their combined influences and facilities for engendering wild schemes of improvement excite a false and unprofitable cupidity among the people. They excite expectations that are scarcely ever realized. They lead expectants, thus aroused, from one step to another, until the aggregate of public works projected press upon the national Treasury with claims amounting to millions of dollars annually. Sir, the law of 1824, effecting an annual appropriation of $30,000, for the purposes I have described, entails upon the Government a greater expense, insignificant as that sum is, than would an annual appropriation of forty times thirty thousand dollars, to be expended in enlarging your navy, or in the construction of fortifications. The Committee of Ways and Means have discharged their duty, in bringing the subject before the House and country, in the report which has been lying upon our tables for some months, and it is for Congress to decide whether the same system shall be persisted in or not, or what ulterior measures of reform in it shall be adopted. I assume not that there is any distinction to be made between the several works embraced by either of these bills. I take it for granted that they are regarded as of public utility by the local population that press them on. I wish not to discriminate between them, without some positive information to guide me, nor to advance one to the neglect of the other. The exact local information essential to judge them rightly in this respect, I pretend not to possess, nor to have inquired into. It is not easily to be obtained by any one man. But what I do maintain is, that the two bills are equally meritorious. I maintain this, not because I feel any more interest in the one than the other. The people of the State which I have the honor in part to represent upon this floor have an interest in each of these bills. I may vote for them both; I may vote against both bills; but I would not vote for either, to the neglect of the other. Nor would I vote for either, because I can see much to encourage the hope of public benefit corresponding with the large amount of expenditure which they involve, unless there will grow up at no distant day some new system of execution and economy on the part of the Government in relation to works of this class. I, sir, would greatly prefer a repeal, for a season at least, of the annual appropriation under the law of 1824, for new surveys, to which I have adverted. It was attempted in the last Congress, and for a season the attempt was successful. Many gentlemen now upon this floor will recollect by what means the attempt was finally defeated. It is the fountain of madness upon the subject of these improvements. But, sir, I will not detain the committee at this time to discuss that proposition, and will only add that I hope the two bills now before the committee may sink or swim together.

Mr. SUTHERLAND briefly stated the reasons why these bills should pass. The bill under consideration was no partial bill; it commenced at Maine, and went through the whole Union. He briefly replied to the remarks of the gentleman from Maine, and said that he could go through the whole bill, and give reasons for every appropriation contained in it; but time would not permit. He hoped the committee would take the question, and let the bill be disposed of.

Mr. WHITTLESEY replied to the remarks of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. SMITH,] and said that the report of the Committee of Ways and Means, alluded to by the gentleman from Maine, was, in many respects, false, and inquired of the chairman of that committee whether that report had ever received the sanction of the committee.

Mr. CAMBRELENG replied that the report alluded to had been brought before the committee, and in the main had met the approbation of the committee, and stated that the appropriations in bills under consideration was much larger than he had anticipated.

Mr. WHITTLESEY then went on to show that the improvements in the West had fully come up to the expectations of their friends; and hoped gentlemen would act consistently in their expenditures. He went on to point out the importance of the improvements to the West; showing the amount of produce that passed the Western lakes in the course of the year, and concluded by stating that the expenditures in Ohio were conducted by the same regard to economy as though they were made out of the private funds of individuals.

Mr. TURRILL said he was in hopes that he should not have felt himself called upon during this session, and particularly so near its termination, to address the House or its committee, upon this or any other subject. It was with great reluctance that he ever attempted to address a deliberative body, and that reluctance was increased on the present occasion, because (said Mr. T.) I am aware that the committee are already wearied with this discussion, and I know that gentlemen are desirous of proceeding with the mass of business which remains unacted upon. But, sir, the extraordinary course taken by the honorable gentleman from Maine, [Mr. SMITH,] both in the remarks he has just submitted, and in his report accompanying the other harbor bill, which report has been quoted in this debate as authority, and liberally commented upon, compels me to ask the indulgence of the committee for a short time. I repeat, sir, that I do it with reluctance; but my constituents have an interest in some of the improvements contemplated in this bill, and particularly in that at the mouth of Salmon river, on Lake Ontario; and notwithstanding any embarrassment under which I labor, and any reluctance I feel at taking up the time of this committee, I should be recreant to their interest if I omitted on this occasion to make an effort to remove any unfavorable impression which that report and those remarks may have made, and also to exhibit some few facts showing the expediency and necessity of constructing convenient harbors on our lakes.

Sir, with the honorable gentleman from Ohio who has just taken his seat, [Mr. WHITTLESEY,] I feel that it is a matter of regret that the important public works embraced in the bill, reported by the gentleman from Maine, should have fallen into the hands of one whose mind appears to have been too strongly prejudiced against them to permit a full, fair, and impartial examination into their merits; and I fully concur with him in the opinion that the statements contained in the report are incorrect, and not to be relied upon. I know them to be so in one instance at least.

[Mr. SMITH. To what case do you allude?]

Mr. TURRILL. I allude to the public works at Oswego, which appear to have received the especial attention of the honorable gentleman from Maine. Sir, the effort of the gentleman, throughout the whole report, appears to have been to prove that the costs of the various works have so much exceeded the original estimates, that it is impossible to form a correct opinion as to the amount of money or the extent of time which will be required to complete them, and thus to create alarm by producing an impression that we are launching upon an ocean of expenditure without chart or compass. Sir, the honorable gentleman in his report concludes his remarks upon the Oswego harbor with the following statement:

Aggregate of appropriations	- - -	$126,404 03
Original estimates	- - -	33,348 64
Excess of appropriations over estimated costs	- - -	93,055 36
Proposed appropriation	- - -	30,600 00

Now, what are the facts? Why, sir, the estimates for these works, which have, at different times, been submitted to and approved of by Congress, amount to $196,958 32, while the whole appropriations amount only to $149,820 87. These facts appear from the printed document which is now before me, and from the documents from which the honorable gentleman has taken such liberal extracts.

[Mr. SMITH here explained, and stated that the first appropriation was for a little over $33,000, and the law granting the appropriation required that no part of the money should be expended until a contract should be entered into to construct the work for a sum not exceeding the appropriation, and that security should be given for the faithful performance of it.]

Sir, (said Mr. T.) I was aware of the fact stated by the honorable gentleman, and he has given me no additional information. It is true, sir, that the law making the first appropriation contained a provision that no portion of the money should be expended until security should be given for the completion of the work, upon the plan adopted by the War Department, and submitted to Congress. It is also true that such a contract was entered into, and security given for its faithful execution; and it is also true, sir, that, with the exception of grants made by Congress, upon a full representation of the facts, to indemnify the contractor for losses sustained by severe gales on the lakes, the work was completed in the manner specified, was approved of and accepted by the Government, and the contract was cancelled. After this work had thus been completed, other erections in that harbor were projected at different times, the object of which was to secure and make permanent the original work. Plans and estimates were made for these additional works, and submitted to and approved of by Congress, and the subsequent appropriations have been made to finish these works upon the plans thus submitted and approved.

Improvement of Harbors.

[Mr. SMITH here asked who made the last estimate.]

Mr. TURNILL. The last estimate was made by Colonel Totten, of the engineers, and submitted to Congress under date of 23d November, 1833; and so far from the appropriations exceeding the estimates, as set forth in the report, the estimates exceed the appropriations more than $47,000. Now, sir, when all these facts appear in the printed documents from which the honorable gentleman took his extracts, I am at a loss to discover how they could have escaped his notice. I have not examined minutely other parts of his report, and therefore I will not notice them, for I intend to be brief. I will dismiss this report by merely remarking that if the honorable gentleman has been as erroneous in his views, and as much mistaken in his facts, in relation to other works, as he has been in regard to these, his report should be received with many grains of allowance; for it is deceptive, and eminently calculated to mislead the committee.

I will now proceed very briefly to state a few facts showing the importance of all the public works upon the lakes which have already been commenced, or which are contemplated by this bill. And, sir, what has already been the effects produced upon your commerce by the harbors which have been constructed on the lakes? I will cite a single instance by way of illustration. I allude to the harbor at Oswego. When these improvements were commenced, there was little or no foreign commerce carried on at that place. Your custom-house establishment was a burden upon your Treasury, and required an annual tax of 6 or $7,000 to sustain it. As late as 1833 the whole revenue collected at that port amounted only to $832, while in 1835 it had increased to $36,068 91, which, after deducting the expenses of the custom-house, will leave a balance of about $30,000. Thus it is, sir, that the Government is not only relieved from an annual tax of about six thousand dollars, but is actually receiving; even from the present commerce, a net income that will, in a very few years, pay, the whole amount of $200,000, proposed to be expended there, with full interest. Why, sir, this fact alone shows that the outlay of this money for the improvement of that harbor will be a most profitable investment to the Government. Supposing no increase of commerce at that port, even with the present revenue, every dollar taken from your Treasury to construct these works, will be returned to it, with interest, dollar for dollar. And this too, sir, is assuming no augmentation of your commerce. But the business operations with Canada cannot remain stationary. They will increase with great rapidity, as strenuous efforts are making, at this time, to remove the impediments to the trade between that province and the United States, and sooner or later these efforts will be crowned with success. I will take the liberty of calling the attention of the committee to some proceedings on this subject in Upper Canada.

The board of trade of the city of Toronto, impressed with the great importance of this subject, caused a meeting of the principal merchants of that city to be convened on the 17th of December last, at which the following resolutions were passed:

"Resolved, That this meeting has much satisfaction in returning its best thanks to the honorable chairman, and the members of the committee of the board of trade, for the attention they have evinced for the interest of the commerce of Upper Canada, on the subject of the importation of goods through the United States from Europe, and agree with them in the opinion that the subject which has induced them to convene this meeting is one of the greatest importance, and which they would recommend to the favorable attention of others throughout the province.

"Resolved, That, considering the subject as one inviting very general and extensive consideration, as applying to all classes of the community, the chairman of this meeting be requested to call a general meeting of the inhabitants of the district on Tuesday the 29th next, at the city hall, at 12 o'clock, for the purpose of a full expression of public sentiment on this important subject.

"Resolved, That the committee of the board of trade are requested, with such assistance as they may think necessary, to prepare the draught of a memorial to be presented to the several branches of the Legislature, to be laid before the said general meeting for approval and signature, with the view of bringing the subject under the notice of the colonial authorities, and for reference to the imperial Government."

The Kingston Chronicle, in commenting upon these proceedings, uses the following language:

"From the well known intelligence and enterprise of many of the gentlemen who compose the board of trade of that city, we feel satisfied that the question will be ably and fairly brought before the public.

"We hope soon to see this measure attracting the attention of the commercial community of Kingston, and other places throughout the province."

The Commons House of Assembly, in consequence of these indications of public sentiment, on the 16th of February last, adopted, by an almost unanimous vote, an address to the King, in which the following language is used:

"Situated as Upper Canada is, at a great distance from the sea, the communication with which by the St. Lawrence is interrupted for a great part of the year, our interests would be best promoted by the adoption of such commercial regulations as would enable our agriculturists, merchants, and manufacturers, to obtain free access to the ocean through every channel by means of which they could safely convey those articles of which this province possesses a superfluity, to the best markets, and through which they might bring back the goods and merchandise of other lands according to their means, without such imports being subjected to the present heavy tariff of discriminating duties, the operation of which is, to add materially to the many natural obstructions incidental to our inland situation, and to retard the settlement of the waste lands of the province by the more wealthy, intelligent, and persevering class of emigrants, who are induced to settle and invest their capital in the States of Ohio, Michigan, Pennsylvania, and New York, the citizens of which have at all times the free choice of three markets, namely, the St. Lawrence, foreign States through their own seaboard, and the markets of the Southern States, while we of Upper Canada are restricted to the channel of the St. Lawrence only.

"We humbly request that your Majesty will be pleased to cause such representations to be made to the Government at Washington as shall appear to be best calculated to induce Congress to admit the goods and merchandise of Great Britain or other nations to pass through the United States into Upper Canada, subject only to the duties which are or may be payable within this province, and without being liable to the payment of any tax or impost in or to the said States, and also to permit the goods, wares, and merchandise of this province to be transported through the said States to other countries beyond the seas, free of duty, and subject only to such regulations as may be found necessary for the prevention of infractions of the revenue laws of the American Union."

Sir, the objects embraced in this address are of great importance to this Government, as well as to the province of Canada; and there can be no doubt, therefore, that the existing obstacles to the commerce will soon be removed, since it is so decidedly for the interest of both countries to accomplish that object. In the United States, public attention has not yet been directed to this important subject. But little is known of this province, and its natural advantages are not understood. Sir, the peninsula of Upper Canada, in location, in fertility of soil, and salubrity of climate, is not surpassed by any portion of the United States. It is true that this province is now comparatively a wilderness, having a very sparse population; but still the spirit of enterprise, as exhibited in works of internal improvement, would do honor to an older and wealthier country. The Canadians have wisely adopted the plan of uniting and using, wherever practicable, the great watercourses of the country. Their effort has been to improve upon the works of nature, and not vainly attempt to outdo them. By means of the Rideau canal, a steamboat navigation has already been opened between Lake Ontario and Montreal, and the improvements now in progress on the St. Lawrence will open another communication between the same points for steamboats of the largest class, thus making a good ship navigation from Lake Ontario to the ocean. The Welland canal, which will soon be enlarged and made permanent, now affords a schooner navigation between Lake Erie and Lake Ontario. A railroad is now being constructed between Hamilton, on Lake Ontario, and Port Dover, on Lake Erie. And the day is not far distant when Lakes Huron and Ontario will be united by a ship canal. Sir, it requires but a mere glance at the map of Upper Canada to convince any one that, when these improvements shall have been completed, when the vast resources of that province shall have been developed, there will be an extensive commerce carried on upon Lake Ontario, a portion of which will find its way down the St. Lawrence to Montreal; and should Ogdensburg be connected with Vermont and New Hampshire by means of railroads, a portion will take that direction to Boston, while all destined to New York must pass through the Oswego and Erie canals, to the Hudson.

Mr. Chairman, I have thus far confined my remarks exclusively to the foreign commerce carried on upon the lakes, and I will now briefly draw the attention of the committee to the extent of domestic commerce; for that branch of commerce is of far more importance to my constituents, and to this Government, than the other.

Sir, let me ask if the gentleman from Maine can be aware even of the extent of these inland seas, or of the commerce carried on upon them? Why, sir, the extent of coasts on these waters is 5,719 miles, while the whole coast from the Passamaquoddy bay to the river Sabine is only 3,690 miles; making an excess of lake, over the whole seacoast of the United States, of 2,029 miles. The lands bordering these waters are of the best quality, and in fertility are not surpassed by any on the habitable globe. It may be truly said of them that they constitute the garden of North America. The population is as yet but thinly sprinkled over this vast extent of fertile country; but it is increasing with a rapidity that exceeds all calculation, while the increase of business more than keeps pace with the increase of population. Property going from the Hudson to the upper lakes passes either through Oswego or through Buffalo; and a statement of the amount of property passing these two ports during the last year, and its destination, will convey some idea of the amount of commerce, and will also show what States have a direct interest in it.

The amount of property shipped from Buffalo in 1835, and its destination, is as follows, viz:

	Merchandise.	Furniture.
Virginia,	2,763 lbs.
Missouri,	58,846	18,425
Alabama,	59,831
Tennessee,	333,766	8,470
Upper Canada,	95,768	122,679
Pennsylvania,	139,319	128,834
Michigan,	13,253,589	1,198,326
Indiana,	3,254,986	136,403
Illinois,	3,320,718	945,263
Ohio,	14,229,961	3,732,409
Kentucky,	918,915	57,580
	36,921,662	9,348,389

I have no means of ascertaining what quantity of merchandise passed through Oswego to Upper Canada during the last year, neither can I tell the amount of furniture which was sent to the upper lakes; but the merchandise, including salt, shipped from that port through the Welland canal, destined to the above States, amounted to 39,798,290 pounds. Thus, sir, we see that ten States west and south of the State of New York, including Michigan, have a direct interest in the commerce carried on upon the lakes, and this interest is constantly and rapidly increasing. To show what interest the agriculturists of the Western States have in its trade, I might proceed to enumerate some of the products of the soil which constitute the return cargoes. I will, however, only name one, the article of wheat. There were 624,733 bushels of wheat received at Oswego from the lakes during the last year, 275,362 bushels of which were the produce of farms in Ohio, Michigan, Indiana, and Illinois. The New England States are also interested in ameliorating the commerce of the lakes; for while this commerce opens a better and more extensive market for their fabrics, it, in return, furnishes cotton, tobacco, and all kinds of bread stuffs, at a much lower rate than they can be obtained from any other quarter.

Sir, the immense tides of emigration which annually flow from the North and the East, to people and make valuable your public lands, pass on these lakes. The enterprising yeomanry of the country embark upon these waters with their little all, to "seek a habitation and a home" in the wilds of the West. Thousands and tens of thousands of lives, and property to the amount of millions, are annually exposed to the dangers of this navigation. And will the Government refuse to render the lives and property of its citizens safe, by neglecting or refusing to appropriate the small sum which may be necessary to construct suitable harbors wherever they are required?

Sir, it is expedient and indispensable that every harbor already commenced should be completed in a permanent manner, and that some of the harbors contemplated in this bill should be constructed with as little delay as possible. The harbor at the mouth of Salmon river, on Lake Ontario, for the improvement of which this bill provides, is of the utmost importance. There is, perhaps, no place on the lake where a good harbor is so much needed; and safety of life and of property require that it should be improved and made accessible in all weather. Many lives have been lost, and many vessels wrecked, in Mexico bay, for the want of a convenient harbor at that place; and, sir, it is the interest, it is the duty of this Government, to protect the commerce by which its citizens thrive, and from which it derives its revenue. The money thus expended in giving protection to the lives and property of those engaged in carrying on the great commercial operations of the country, is amply repaid by the increase of population, of wealth, of enterprise, and by the extension of that commerce which sustains and invigorates the nation.

But, sir, in ascertaining the number or importance of the harbors required for the protection of that commerce, our views ought not to be limited to the present period, or to the business which is now carried on in that region. We should look forward to the time when the enterprise and the spirit of internal improvement which everywhere exists, shall have developed the vast and unlimited resources of that country. Sir, this is truly called "the age of improvement." It has no parallel in history. Canals, the magnitude of which, when commenced, excited the wonder and admiration of the world, are scarcely completed, before they are found to be altogether too limited for the immediate wants of the country; and they are doomed to be abandoned for new and more extensive works, or to be enlarged under every disadvantage, at enormous expense, and at the sacrifice of individual interest, which must always follow the interruption of the regular channels of business even for a limited period. The time is at hand when, profiting by experience and the examples set us by our Canadian neighbors, the internal improvements of this country will be conducted on a scale the magnitude of which will be equal to the increasing business of the country. The doctrine that artificial is cheaper or better than natural navigation, or, in other words, that rivers were only made to feed canals, has been exploded; and the civil engineer who would now attempt seriously to advocate that doctrine would be considered better qualified to become the inmate of a lunatic asylum, than to superintend public works of any description. Wherever, under the influence of this false theory, canals have been built along the margin of navigable waters, they will remain, in all time to come, enduring monuments of the ignorance and the folly of their projectors. The natural watercourses of the country must ever constitute the great channels of our internal commerce. The Falls of Niagara will be overcome by a ship canal on the American side. The military defence of the country requires it; the agricultural and commercial interest of the whole West demands it, and the work will be constructed. Nor will the march of internal improvement be limited to this magnificent work. A steamboat navigation will be opened from Chicago to the Mississippi, and an enlarged communication from Oswego to the Hudson. Nature has marked out this as the great highway of commerce, with lines too distinct to be obliterated or even obscured by the utmost efforts of art. By making these improvements, a steamboat navigation will be opened from New York, through the lakes, to New Orleans—a shorter (and our relations with foreign countries may, at times, be such as to render it a much better) and safer route than the one coastwise. The whole valley of the Mississippi, and the vast extent of country bordering on the lakes, would feel the beneficial effects of these improvements. A new impetus would be given to the rapid growth of Oswego, Buffalo, Cleveland, Detroit, and Chicago. Other important towns will spring into existence, as if by magic, along this great commercial highway; and in a few years you will behold along the coasts of these inland seas, cities which, in splendor, in wealth, in commercial enterprise, in moral and intellectual resources, will equal your proudest Atlantic cities. The lakes, and the three rivers thus connected with them, will constitute the main arteries through which will flow, during all time, a great portion of the commerce of North America—a commerce which will regulate the exports and imports of the country—a commerce from which the revenue of the nation is to be derived, its citizens enriched, and every section of the Union strengthened and invigorated.

Sir, while we are appropriating millions annually to protect our commerce in every quarter of the globe, shall we withhold the small sum required to guard and cherish it, when it receives its first flow from the heart of your country? While such large sums are expended every year to render property safe on every ocean, when at the risk of our wealthy importing merchants, can we refuse the amount necessary to protect it, when exposed to the dangers of these inland seas, and when, if destroyed, the loss will fall upon your agriculturists and country dealers? I trust not, sir; I trust that, upon this occasion, the same liberal policy, which should always be pursued by an enlightened and powerful nation in regard to its commerce, will be adopted.

I conclude my remarks, Mr. Chairman, by expressing the hope that the enacting clause of this bill will not be stricken out, but that every meritorious work, for the construction of which this bill is intended to provide, will receive the favorable consideration of Congress.

Mr. CAMBRELENG did not rise to make a speech. He hoped gentlemen who had long speeches on hand, at this late period of the session, would follow the example of a member from Louisiana, of a former Congress, who, after struggling six weeks for the floor, and threatening the House with a speech of a week in length, finished it in fifteen minutes—having, as he said, put forth the heads, intending to write it out. He recommended to gentlemen who had long speeches on hand, in consideration of the public business, to give the committee nothing but the heads. I have not, said Mr. C., any such speech on hand, and should not have said one word upon the question, had I not been compelled to reply to the renewed and unexpected attack made upon me yesterday by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. BELL.]

That gentleman, Mr. Chairman, seems to fancy himself the most persecuted man in the nation. He complains of having been attacked for months past by public journals—by the President of the United States—by the great Globe itself. I have certainly a right, if any one on this floor has, to sympathize with the gentleman; for no one has been, throughout this session, more honored by the assiduous attention of the opposition journals, from the highest to the lowest, with very few exceptions. I have not only met with scurrility abroad, but it has been my fortune to encounter even on this floor the most vulgar abuse. I could not, sir, consider such attacks, whether in this House or out of it, as in any degree worthy of notice, much less of complaint. Far from it; it would be ungenerous indeed in me to withhold my gratitude for this solitary but profitable evidence of the friendship of my political opponents.

The gentleman from Tennessee attacks the Speaker for the organization of the committees, and especially of the Committee of Ways and Means. Politically, there is no change. Besides those who were continued on the committee, we have, as we had last year, a member from Georgia and Tennessee, and one from Maine in place of a gentleman from New Hampshire, now of the Senate. The only change of any importance was in substituting the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. LAWRENCE,] a member of the opposition, for a gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. MCKINLEY,] a friend of the administration, not now a member of the House. But the gentleman charges that the committee has been organized "on the principle of extravagance;" and that its chairman represents a city "most interested in appropriations." Whatever interest, sir, the city of New York may have in our appropriations, as the principal depository of the public money, she certainly has none in making them extravagant. On the contrary, if, in discharging my duty as chairman of that committee, I had consulted the interest of New York only, I should have united with the gentleman from Tennessee and his friends, and, by retarding the appropriations for the public service, have added some two or three millions to the amount of the public money remaining in our banks.

The gentleman from Tennessee has animadverted on the extravagance of the Committee of Ways and Means, and has done me the honor to ascribe that extravagance chiefly to my efforts. "The credit," he says, "of passing the deposit bill is due to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means"—to those extravagant measures proposed by me. Sir, the gentleman from Tennessee is not the only member of either House, or of either party, who will find it necessary to offer some apology to the country for voting for what he calls "substantial distribution." This argument about extravagant appropriations has been urged elsewhere, and even by some who are friendly to this administration. But on what foundation does this apology rest? What are these extravagant appropriations for the public service which have compelled gentlemen to vote for a measure that cannot be defended? I speak not now of the multiplicity of bills which are reported at this, as they have been at every session, by the various committees of this House and the other, embracing new and extravagant appropriations; I refer not to what has been projected, but to what has been done by a majority of both Houses.

What has been done for the navy, the idol of all parties? How many millions of our immense surplus have we appropriated to strengthen this right arm of our defence? Not two, sir; all the excess for every naval purpose is only about seventeen hundred thousand dollars, and a portion even of that amount is to be applied to other purposes than the increase of the navy. But even this appropriation, small as it is, was not the proposition of the Committee of Ways and Means, or of its chairman, but was reported by a member of the opposition in the other House, as an amendment to the naval appropriation bill. Surely, sir, the gentleman from Tennessee cannot refer to this as an extravagant appropriation, come from whence it may, after expressing himself strongly in favor of this branch of the public service, and his determination to go even beyond the recommendation of the Secretary of the Navy.

What, sir, have we done for our fortifications? The entire appropriation for this branch of expenditure is $1,860,000, being one million more than has been usually appropriated for some years past. In the fortification bill of last year, $869,000 were proposed to be appropriated, besides the addition of $300,000. Twenty years ago, when we had a surplus, though we had a public debt, funded and unfunded, of one hundred and fifty millions, we appropriated annually $833,000 to this branch of service. There is not a dollar of the money appropriated to be applied to any but works actually under construction—fortifications which have been admitted by the gentleman from Tennessee, and by every other gentleman, to be necessary for our defence, and which would have been completed ten years ago, had we had, as we now have, a surplus revenue. We have not appropriated one cent for new fortifications. We have, it is true, a bill from the Senate, not from the Committee of Ways and Means, proposing over a million for new works; but that bill, since the passage of the act depositing our money in the State treasuries, will not be adopted by this House.* No, sir, our surplus will be applied to no such national purpose, but to others in no way connected with the defence of the country. All we shall get is the million extraordinary for fortifications which are already commenced, and are designed for the defence of a few prominent points on our extensive maritime frontier, the importance of which has been admitted by the gentleman from Tennessee himself.

What more have we done in this course of extravagant measures for the defence of the country? Four hundred thousand dollars additional for arming our fortifications. Does the gentleman from Tennessee complain of this extravagance? Why, sir, he himself, in quoting the opinions of the inspector general, which I had also occasion to notice, gave us a wretched picture of our fortifications, without guns, and very justly described the utterly defenceless condition of our coast. Surely the gentleman will not denounce appropriations designed to protect those very cities which he told us could be easily taken, and by a very insignificant force, because we had fortifications without armament.

For the army, sir, we have literally done nothing. We have made an insignificant appropriation for the improvement of our armories, and others for supplying munitions which had been exhausted by our Indian wars. Not a dollar of extraordinary expenditure has been authorized for the army, exclusively, except so far as the service was connected with the suppression of Indian hostilities.

And what, Mr. Chairman, is the aggregate of these appropriations, proposed by the Committee of Ways and Means, the extravagance of which has driven gentlemen to the necessity of distributing our surplus revenue? The whole amount—for the navy, army, fortifications, armament, armories, and extraordinary supplies, and including the $1,700,000 added by the Senate to the navy bill—is less than four millions of dollars. Yes, sir, this is all that we have saved of that immense surplus of sixty or seventy millions which gentlemen tell us of; all that we have applied to measures of defence which, at the commencement of this session, were advocated by the representatives of the East, West, North, and South. They were all then ready to appropriate five, six, or seven millions extraordinary for these purposes. Nay, the gentleman from Maine [Mr. EVANS] declared, no doubt honestly, that he was willing to appropriate for the defence of the country an amount equal to the sum heretofore appropriated to the sinking fund—that is, ten millions annually, and for ten years. Now, sir, notwithstanding these declarations from all sides of the House, we have applied less than four millions to our defence; and yet the extravagant appropriations proposed by the Committee of Ways and Means is now urged as an apology for a measure which gentlemen themselves denominate as "substantial distribution."

There is, sir, another class of appropriations which were introduced by the Committee of Ways and Means, including a small portion reported by the gentleman from Tennessee himself, of an extraordinary character, though they cannot be denounced as extravagant, for they were indispensable. I mean our large appropriations for Indian treaties and Indian wars; more than seven millions and a half for the former—near three millions for the latter; and we have yet to provide some three or four millions, making an aggregate of near fourteen millions. Here are fourteen millions of dollars in a single year, of extraordinary appropriations for the West, notwithstanding all the declamation we have heard about expending the whole Treasury on the Atlantic border. I care not where the public money is spent, when applied, as in this instance, to national purposes. I notice it only to show gentlemen how utterly unfounded their statements are. Out of more than twenty millions of appropriations for extraordinary purposes, in 1836, near fourteen millions are for our Indian treaties and Indian wars—those "scalping-knife and tomahawk appropriations," as they have been denounced by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS.] Does the gentleman from Tennessee mean to echo that sentiment? Does he mean to charge the Committee of Ways and Means with extravagance in recommending measures for the protection of the lives and property of our fellow-citizens, in Florida, Georgia, Alabama, Louisiana, Mississippi; ay, sir, even in Tennessee? Is the gentleman for or against these appropriations? [Mr. BELL replied.] Sir, I am sorry to have ruffled the temper of the gentleman; I have not misrepresented him. I noted his language yesterday, and it is to that I am replying. In enumerating the extravagant appropriations I have reported from the Ways and Means, the gentleman referred expressly to these Indian appropriations, and animadverted on the course of the administration in regard to Indian affairs. Nor is it the first time he has objected to them. On a former occasion he deprecated the passage of one of them as premature, and under a panic, without satisfactory information of the existence of the war.

* This bill was not even acted upon.—Note by Mr. C.

Such, Mr. Chairman, is the character and amount of these extravagant appropriations for which the Committee of Ways and Means has been arraigned; appropriations for the navy, army, fortifications, and for the peace and protection of the West; almost all of which have been sanctioned by a large majority of both Houses, and the larger portion, those relating to Indian wars and treaties, by an almost unanimous vote.

Thus much for the extravagance of the Committee of Ways and Means; now for the extraordinary expenditures sanctioned by the gentleman from Tennessee. On Saturday last that gentleman voted for a pension bill, which, if it becomes a law, will create an annual demand upon the Treasury estimated at five millions, by a member of the committee. Sir, I respect the gallantry of our Indian warriors, and am grateful for their services; but if we are to extend the principle of pensioning to all who are engaged in our wars, internal and external, where are the expenditures of this Government to stop? If this Government is to be administered upon such extravagant principles, we shall very soon have a pension roll extending to every branch of the public service and involving an expenditure of 50 to 60 millions annually.

Gentlemen, sir, to whatever party they may belong, who have anticipated that, by distributing the public revenue, they were to arrest extravagant appropriations, have deceived themselves, and sacrificed the great interests of the country. They have stopped the appropriations for the army, navy, and fortifications. The bill for the increase of the army sent to us from the Senate will not be acted upon, however urgently it may be required for the protection of our Western frontiers—not a navy bill reported by the Committee on Naval Affairs will command the attention of either House; nor shall we condescend to notice the new fortification bill sent to us by the Senate. Such appropriations appeal only to the patriotism of Congress—they are sustained alone by great considerations of national policy and common defence. These, the revolutionary system of gentlemen has effectually arrested. Not so, sir, with the appropriations for rivers and harbors, which depend upon local and private interests, reaching our congressional districts and our own political interests. The contest which we have just witnessed between the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. SMITH,] and from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SUTHERLAND,] who reported these two harbor bills, is an admirable illustration of the whole system. The former reported the old, the latter the new bill. The bill reported by the gentleman from Maine did not pass without some difficulty; but when the new bill came before us, it was violently attacked, and in some danger. The gentleman from Maine, perceiving the danger, rises and defends the bill reported by the gentleman from Pennsylvania with great zeal and energy; gives it a much higher rank and character than his own bill, and declares that if either is to be reduced or rejected, a preference ought undoubtedly to be given to the bill embracing new works, and reported by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. The latter gentleman rises indignantly to repel the attack made by the gentleman from Maine upon his own bill, and deprecates any comparison between the merits of the two bills; but if there was a difference, the works already commenced ought not to be left unfinished, and therefore the gentleman from Maine's bill ought to have priority. This awkward contest between these two gentlemen, each defending with energy the bill reported by the other in preference to the bills reported by themselves, may appear mysterious; but the mystery is easily solved. The appropriation for the Delaware breakwater was embraced in the bill reported by the gentleman from Maine; that for the Portland breakwater was in the bill reported by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. Such, sir, is the origin and character of this species of legislation. You cannot stop it by distribution, for it is sustained by the same corrupting principle of compromise. But you do arrest appropriations for national objects—for all such we are worse off than we were under the old confederation. Then we made requisitions upon the States for their money for common defence; now, we may make requisitions for our own for the same common purpose, without having the slightest attention paid to our requisitions.

The bill under consideration is the one reported by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and for new works. These appropriations are of recent origin, but of rapid growth, and deserve more attention than they have hitherto received. The following statement shows their progress:

These expenditures were scarcely known till 1827, the second year of the late administration of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS.] In that year they amounted to about eighty-two thousand dollars, and in two years they increased to four and five hundred thousand dollars. We have now before us two bills, each amounting to near a million. We have already expended in nine years more than four millions. We are asked for a million to continue our old works in the present year. And here we have another bill proposing a million for commencing new improvements. We are laying the foundation of an additional expenditure of ten millions.

But I have another and an important objection to the passage of this bill. We have commenced a new era in our financial concerns, and in the practical operation of our Government. We have directed all the money in the Treasury on the 1st of January next, over five millions, whether appropriated or not, to be distributed among and deposited in the treasuries of the several States, in 1837. That is, we have appropriated all the money in the Treasury over five millions; whether it is ever to be returned, will be decided hereafter. We have not only, in any event, temporarily at least, disposed of our surplus, but of all the money which may be in the Treasury, and which has been already appropriated for the expenditures of the present year. We have directed that this money, previously appropriated, shall be distributed among the States during the next year.

And now, sir, what is the operation of this deposite or distribution bill? (I care not by which name it is called.) We have made at the present session very large appropriations for Indian wars, Indian treaties, &c., and we may have in the Treasury, on the 1st of January next, some fifteen millions of dollars, pledged for these purposes, and for other objects which will then be actually under contract. We divide the ten millions thus pledged, and throw upon the revenue of 1837 that amount, in addition to the current expenditures of that year, and to all extraordinary demands, which must, in the present unsettled state of our Indian relations, be estimated at no inconsiderable sum, if only required for the purpose of preventing hostilities. Under the operation of the deposite bill, the revenue of 1837 will not meet the aggregate amount of all these appropriations.

The bill now under consideration, being exclusively for new works, requiring surveys or examinations, proposes another million, which will be added to the unexpended appropriations for 1836, and will fall almost entirely on the revenue for 1837. Whatever amount we now add to our appropriations must, under our new deposite system, be supplied by recourse to taxation, by an increase of the tariff. Such, sir, is the operation of your deposite bill, whether the honor of its paternity belongs to the Senate or the House—to either or both parties. The minority who voted against that measure will long have occasion to be proud of their vote, while those friends of the constitution who yielded to their apprehensions will remember but to regret it. It is in vain to disguise the matter; the friends of the constitution have been defeated. I was not surprised to witness the air of triumph displayed on that occasion by the friends of the tariff and of federal internal improvements. The advocates of the American system had just reason to exult.

They saw, in an instant, the work of years of reformation swept away, the barriers of the constitution overthrown, and the American system restored in a more formidable shape than had ever been contemplated, even by its projectors. I trust, sir, that though defeated, we are not ready to surrender principles for which we have been so long and, till now, so successfully contending. I hope the contest will be renewed in December; for, if your deposite law remains, you must again have recourse to taxation, and our constitution will be effectually annulled. For all national purposes it will be more inefficient than the old articles of confederation, while this Government will be converted into an oppressive and rapacious tax-gatherer for the support of the States, depending, as they will in every branch of their expenditures, on the federal Treasury. Our whole political system will be reversed—we shall exhibit the extraordinary spectacle of a Government consolidated for all purposes but that great object for which our confederation was formed—common defence. I regret that on so great a question the enemies of exorbitant and unjust taxation, the friends of a rigid boundary between State and federal duties and powers, should have been separated. I hope we shall be more united hereafter; but, whatever may be the event, the contest must come, though we go into the fight crippled and wounded by an arrow "feathered from our own wing."

Such is one of the great motives for striking out the enacting clause of this bill. Every appropriation now made is not to be taken from your surplus, but will be so much added to the taxes of the country. There are some appropriations in the bill which I shall vote for, as connected with our national concerns; but most of them are local, and some of them should fall, not even upon the treasuries of the States, but upon assessments upon the towns for whose improvement they are designed. These are local, not national expenditures; and if we are to carry out this system, improve every petty harbor, and, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SUTHERLAND] says, "our hundred rivers," we shall open a theatre of expenditure beyond any thing ever contemplated by those who framed or by others who have given the broadest construction to the constitution.

On this question I wish to be frankly understood. While I have always considered the Mississippi, with its giant arms stretching through vast regions of our public domain, as objects in the improvement of which the States have a direct interest, I have never considered it a federal duty to provide for improving the navigation of every creek and river in the country. Sir, even the improvement of the Hudson I have always thought more a State than a national concern. I have never heard the appropriation for that river mentioned in this House, without feeling that the character of our State was degraded; that a State like ours, great in population and powerful in resources, equal to many of the kingdoms of Europe, should be petitioning here for the means of removing an obstruction in a river near the head of navigation. I trust it will not be long before the pride of our fellow-citizens, from the Atlantic to the lakes, will be roused, when we shall draw upon our own vast resources, and not annually present our petitions here. Under the auspices of the State, this improvement might be soon accomplished; but so long as we depend upon our federal Treasury, we cannot anticipate when it will be finished. But, however that may be, this branch of our federal expenditure should be rigidly examined before we proceed further in it; for if we go on as we have done, or as is proposed in this new bill, we shall be called upon to improve every harbor and river in the country, involve our Treasury in millions of expenditures not to be estimated, and in an annual increase of taxation, without the aid even of a deposite or distribution bill.

Mr. BOON said, when they were about fixing a day of adjournment, they were told, that after that should be done, speaking was to cease, and the business of the country was to be disposed of. He had voted against fixing a day of adjournment, because he was fearful that speaking would not cease; and they now had evidence that it was not to cease. On yesterday, the whole day was occupied in discussion, and the same thing had occurred to-day. We now had but seven or eight days left to transact all the business yet unacted on; and he hoped gentlemen would not continue to discuss matters foreign from the subject under consideration, but would allow the very important business of the country to be disposed of without further delay.

Mr. UNDERWOOD went into an examination of the appropriations proposed by this bill, and made a comparison between the amount of the appropriations proposed at the different harbors and the amount of postage received at those harbors, for the purpose of showing the insignificance of many of those harbors.

Mr. SUTHERLAND briefly replied to the arguments of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. CAMBRELENG].

[H. OF R.]

HARPER, ROBERTSON, PEARCE of Rhode Island, LOVE, and WISE,

The motion to strike out the enacting clause of the bill was decided in the negative: Yeas 59, nays 89.

The question was then taken on the amendment to the amendment; which was disagreed to.

The question then recurred on the amendment of Mr. VINTON; which was disagreed to.

Mr. MERCER offered an amendment, for improvements in the vicinity of the Dismal Swamp canal, $20,000. Agreed to: Yeas 64, nays 57.

Mr. MERCER then offered an amendment, for continuing the improvements of Tennessee river, by the construction of a canal around Calvert shoals, $100,000. Agreed to: Yeas 73, nays 57.

Mr. HARD offered an amendment, for improvements at the mouth of Eighteen Mile creek. Lost.

Mr. CLAIBORNE, of Mississippi, offered an amendment, for a survey of the coast, from the Rigolets, at the mouth of Pearl river, to Mobile Point, $1,000. Adopted.

Mr. SUTHERLAND offered an amendment, for the improvement of the Thames river, Connecticut, $13,000. Lost.

Mr. SUTHERLAND offered an amendment, to increase the appropriations for the Cochecho branch of the Piscataqua river to $10,000. Agreed to.

Mr. SUTHERLAND then moved to strike out the appropriation for a pier at Delaware city. Agreed to.

Mr. MERCER offered an amendment, for the improvement of Cumberland river, $30,000. Lost.

Mr. CARTER offered an amendment, to provide for a survey of the tract of country between the Coosa and Hiwassee rivers. Agreed to.

Mr. TURNER submitted the following amendment, for the improvement of the harbor at and near Havre de Grace, Maryland: "For clearing out and removing a bar between the harbor of Havre de Grace and Spesutie island, $5,000," and urged the same by a few very forcible remarks.

Objection was made to the amendment, on the ground that a survey had not yet been made, and that the bill contained a provision appropriating five hundred dollars for causing a survey of the same to be made.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. SUTHERLAND offered an amendment, for a survey of James river, Maine, $3,000. Lost.

Mr. ROBERTSON offered an amendment, for improvement of James river below Richmond, $50,000. Lost.

Mr. MERCER offered an amendment making an appropriation for a survey of Allegany river, from Pittsburg to Olean, New York. Lost.

Mr. DENNY offered an amendment, for improvement of Allegany river, $50,000. Lost.

Mr. ASH offered an amendment, for the improvement of Frankfort creek, in the county of Philadelphia, $10,000. Lost.

Mr. CHAPIN offered an amendment, for the improvement of the harbor of Port Bay, New York, $5,000. Lost.

Mr. HARLAN offered an amendment, for the improvement of Kentucky river, $30,000. Lost.

Mr. STORER offered an amendment to provide for the survey of a site for a bridge across the Ohio river. Lost.

Mr. CARTER offered an amendment, for continuing the improvements at Muscle Shoals, Tennessee river, $30,000. Lost.

Mr. SUTHERLAND offered an amendment, for the survey of the Rappahannock river, $350. Lost.

Mr. DENNY offered an amendment, for the improvement of the Monongahela river, $10,000. Lost.

Mr. MERCER moved an additional section to the bill, providing that the several sums appropriated should remain in the Treasury until called for, to be expended on works already made. Lost.

Mr. HAWES offered an amendment, for the improvement of Green river, $50,000. Lost.

Mr. HAWES then offered an amendment appropriating $20,000 for the improvement of Rough and Panther creeks. Lost.

Mr. SUTHERLAND offered an amendment, for the improvement of the harbor at Norfolk, $5,000. Lost.

Mr. PEYTON moved to amend the bill by an additional section, for continuing the improvements of Cumberland river below the mouth of Laurel, which is hereby declared a port of entry, $50,000.

Mr. P. spoke at some length in support of his amendment, when

Mr. McCOMAS offered the following amendments to the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee:

Mr. McC. said that it appeared to him that we had fallen on strange times. It has been but a few days (said Mr. McC.) since we passed a bill regulating the public deposits in certain local banks, and for depositing the surplus revenue, over and above five millions, with the several States, agreeably to the number of their Representatives and Senators in Congress. It was thought that a measure that passed both branches of Congress with such unanimity would have given quiet to the distracted councils of the nation, at least for the present session; but, to my great astonishment, these sanguine expectations have not been realized. The bill now under consideration seeks to appropriate upwards of a million of dollars to the improvement of the harbors and rivers in the United States, and principally all new works, as I am informed. The artful manner of connecting the various interests of the country together in this bill cannot fail to strike the most superficial observer. Does any gentleman on this floor believe there are five of these points that could receive the votes of a majority of this House for the sums proposed in this bill, if the question was taken upon their merits separately? This, sir, is the proper test. No appropriation of the people's money should be made, unless a majority of the people's representatives shall think it right. Sir, I have no notion of swallowing this gilded pill, by uniting the good and the bad together; I want to vote on each proposition separately. This course of legislation has been truly denominated log-rolling; a system corrupt and demoralizing in its tendency, and, if persevered in, will, in my judgment, overturn the principles of this Government.

Sir, I had flattered myself that each State would have been permitted to make its own improvements; that the late division of the surplus revenue was to effect that object, by carrying out the views of the President on that subject. But, sir, if this mode of legislation prevail, it is vain to talk of a division of the surplus revenue, as there will be none to divide. Upwards of twenty millions have already been appropriated, and your table yet groans under the weight of bills containing multiplied millions more. Sir, there is one single bill on your table that will and must pass, containing six or seven millions for Indian treaties.

This bill, sir, had its origin at a time that renders its passage questionable. Sir, it is one of that litter of bills that was prepared at a time when it was thought wise legislation to appropriate the whole surplus revenue to some object, in preference of giving it back to the people. To do this, it was necessary to increase the objects of appropriation, and multiply bills on the subject, as it would not do to present this enormous sum on the Atlantic seacoast in one bill, lest the appalling sight might shock the nerves of the House. Hence we find a harbor bill, a light-house bill, and a fortification bill, all seeking to spend millions of money in the same region of country, and at the same points; and in addition to this, we find ourselves placed in the ridiculous attitude of having a conflict of jurisdiction between the Committee of Internal Improvement and the Committee on Commerce, both claiming to exercise jurisdiction over the same objects; each presenting to this House bills appropriating money for the same purpose. How, sir, is this question to be settled? Are we to recognise the right in both these committees to levy money from the people's pockets to effect the same object? or how is this dispute to be settled? What, sir, is external, and what is internal? I am answered by some, that all above ports of entry is internal, and all below is external; that it is constitutional to spend the people's money to make improvements below ports of entry, and that it is unconstitutional to spend above ports of entry. I cannot perceive any good reason for such a distinction. To establish a port of entry is to fix a suitable point for exterior and interior commerce to meet. If it is necessary to improve the river below, to enable vessels to come to the port to receive the interior commerce, I am at a loss to perceive why it is not necessary to remove the obstructions above, to enable commerce to be brought down to the port. If this power is claimed under that feature in the constitution conferring on Congress the right to regulate commerce with foreign nations and between the several States, why should the improvement stop at any particular point on a river that may run through several States? If to regulate commerce carries with it a right to make internal improvements, the power is not confined to ports of entry, but is coextensive with the United States. I am aware, sir, that this is a difficult subject; but whatever may be the true definition of the constitution, it cannot be made to embrace a proposition so absurd in itself.

I have long been of opinion, in point of expediency, that the subject of internal improvement should be left to the States. But seeing that this bill embraced objects having not half the claim to nationality as the main turnpike road leading from Eastern to Western Virginia, I was induced to ask for the sum of $500,000 for Macadamizing the same; but, sir, to be candid with you, if the amendment be adopted, I should still, under a sense of duty, vote against the bill. I could not sanction the principles of that bill, if it brought a railroad through my yard. Sir, the honorable member from Tennessee [Mr. PEYTON] has moved to amend the bill by establishing a port of entry above Nashville, some distance, in order to avail himself of the benefit of some of the surplus revenue. I was induced to offer an amendment to the amendment, to establish a port of entry at the falls of Kanawha. He placed the claim of his constituents upon the ground of the rich mineral productions of that country, that would find their way to market through that source, and the fact that many of the veteran soldiers that were in the battle of New Orleans were brought in flat-bottom boats from that point. Mr. McC. said it was true he could not say to the committee that an army had ever been brought down the Kanawha river, but he would say that upwards of two millions of bushels of salt floated annually upon its bosom to the West; and as to mineral productions, he was certain the claim was equal, if not superior—that a finer coal region was not to be found any where; and if the gentleman intends to bring his district within the limits of the constitution, it was but fair that his constituents should be placed on the same ground. He said he wished to represent his district impartially; but he found, by casting his eye upon the map, a portion of his district lay upon the Allegany mountains, a point at which he could not fix a port of entry, and bring it within the limits of the constitution, and thus change its relation from external to that of internal, so as to profit by this new doctrine. He said every gentleman must admit, that to give the constitution that construction, would be to make the constitution to depend entirely upon the action of Congress. If so, I should tremble for the fate of my country. This bill itself, connecting the Northern frontier with the Atlantic seaboard, from Maine to New Orleans, combining in one bill the various interests, is a sufficient commentary itself upon that point. Sir, the same combination of interest can, if they choose, establish a port of entry any where. Yes, sir, they may bring the balance of my constituents within the limits of the constitution, by fixing ports of entry high up the New and Greenbrier rivers. Mr. McC. said he hoped that gentlemen would cease to press these extravagant and wasteful appropriations; that more money had already been appropriated than could be prudently expended in two years; that it was unwise for the Government, this season, to commence any new works, as the season was far advanced, and labor and provision uncommonly high; and that it must be evident to every man that these high prices could not long continue. They have been produced by the unprecedented amount of local banking capital thrown into the money market, giving a fictitious and false value to labor, as well as that of agriculture, which must soon regulate itself by the standard value. He said much had been said on the subject of the tariff; great fears had been entertained by some that if the surplus revenue was divided among the States, it would revive the tariff and internal improvements; but, for his part, he could see no way better calculated to effect that object than to make these large appropriations, and swell the ordinary expenditures of the Government far above what the last provision of the compromise act will produce in 1842. These are the advocates of raising the tariff, not those who wish to arrest the system of improvement by this Government, and give it to the States; and, with all their prating upon that subject, the people will understand the matter. They underrate the intelligence of the people, if they think they can cram these absurd doctrines down their throats.

The people will look to the acts of men, and not their professions. They will examine the journals, and find the names of these strict constructionists and economists all voting for the most wasteful and extravagant expenditures of the public money; their names will be principally found enrolled on every amendment against reduction; and yet nothing dwells upon their lips but the tariff and internal improvement. It is strange that this new light of breaking up the compromise bill never broke upon their benighted vision till the very moment the public money was about to be wrung from their hands by a large majority of all parties. The plain man, of common sense, will require of these gentlemen why they did not propose this inquiry at the first of the session, before they voted for all these extravagant expenditures, and how it happened that the tariff fever, just at that time, began to rage with such unabating fury? Those gentlemen who voted for these extravagant appropriations will find it difficult to prove to the people that they are the only political economists in this land. The plain man will not readily believe that to take large sums of money from his pocket will add greatly to his wealth. However, Mr. Chairman, it is now ten o'clock at night; I will not pursue the subject further, but will leave this question to the people to say who has represented their interests; for his own part, he thought the expenditures of this Government should be confined to a strict revenue standard.

After some remarks by Messrs. PEYTON and Potomac Fire Insurance Company—Monument to Washington.

[H. OF R.]

SUTHERLAND, the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The question recurred on the amendment of Mr. PEYTON; and the question being taken, it appeared there was no quorum voting.

On motion of Mr. SUTHERLAND, the committee rose, and

The House then adjourned.

SATURDAY, JUNE 25.

POTOMAC FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY.

The "bill to amend the charter of the Potomac Fire Insurance Company" coming up for consideration—

Mr. FAIRFIELD moved the following amendment:

"Provided, further, That said company shall not exercise any of the powers herein granted until after the whole amount of capital, viz: two hundred thousand dollars, shall have been paid into the treasury of said company."

Mr. FAIRFIELD said that, having been on the committee a majority of which reported this bill, his attention had been particularly called to what he regarded as objectionable in it, and to which a sense of duty now impelled him to direct the attention of the House.

To understand the objections, however, and see the propriety of adopting the amendment proposed, he said it would be necessary briefly to advert to a few facts connected with the charter, organization, and past operations, of this company.

By the volume which he held in his hand, it appeared that this company was incorporated in 1831, with a capital of $300,000, which was divided into 8,000 shares, at $25 each. By information derived from the officers of the company, he learned that but 3,020 shares, less than one half of the whole number, had been subscribed for; that one fifth of this amount, viz: $15,100, had been paid in cash, and four fifths, or $60,400, had been paid by the endorsed notes of the stockholders; and these two sums constituted the present capital of the company, with the exception of a small portion of the profits, which had been reserved and added to the capital.

The present extent of the liabilities of the company on contracts of insurance was something over a million of dollars, its actual capital, as before stated, including the notes of stockholders, being only $75,500.

Semi-annual dividends had been made, with the exception of one year, and the whole nett profits he found to have averaged 29 per centum on $75,500, or $1.50 annual profits on one dollar of capital actually paid in.

This company now ask, (said Mr. F.,) by the bill before the House, for the additional power to take marine risks, to insure on lives, and to grant annuities, and all this without restriction as to amount, without increasing the capital, or providing even for the payment of the stock subscribed for, and without any new guards whatever being thrown around the public interest. For one, sir, (said Mr. F.,) I cannot consent to it.

He did not wish to say any thing to injure this company in public estimation; he had no object to accomplish by it; its members were all strangers to him; but he could not avoid saying that in the North this capital would be regarded as all moonshine. It would do very well for dividends, but not quite so well for losses. While the company is prosperous, and no losses occur, or but slight ones, all works well. The capital is sufficient, because there are no draughts upon it. But let there be an extensive conflagration, one that would destroy one tenth of the property insured, and the capital, unless this should constitute an exception to all like cases, would be nowhere to be found.

But the propriety of requiring some further security to the public, and of making this capital somewhat more substantial, will appear, if we inquire for a moment what would be the legal remedy of the assured on his policy, in case of a loss, as the act of incorporation now stands. We will suppose that the officers of the company refuse to pay; the assured then commences his action, recovers judgment, and takes out his execution. But what will he do with it? How will he procure it to be satisfied? Arrest the bodies of the corporators? No, sir; they are expressly exempted from arrest by the terms of the charter. Will he attach the private property of the members of the company? No, sir; that is also expressly exempted. Can he take the corporate property? That, sir, is legally intangible, consisting principally of notes of hand, which cannot be attached and sold on execution. In what way, then, can he procure a satisfaction of his judgment? If there be any way, without the voluntary payment by the officers of the company, I am unacquainted with it.

The unsubstantiality of this capital will still more forcibly appear by looking at another provision of the charter. The fourth section contains the following provision: "That every stockholder neglecting or refusing to renew his notes, or neglecting or refusing to pay any instalments when required by the president and directors so to do, shall forfeit all his interest in this company, and be held liable for his proportion of any loss which may have occurred previous to such neglect and refusal."

Now, suppose a stockholder refused to pay or renew his notes; what is the consequence? Why, he ceases ipso facto to be a member of the corporation, and forfeits the glorious privilege of paying his stock notes! For he cannot be expelled from the company, and compelled to pay his notes, too; the charter expressly providing that he shall be held liable only "for his proportion of any loss that may have occurred." So that if no loss has occurred, why, he has nothing to pay. But, it may be asked, what harm is done in this case? I answer that, by these provisions, a stockholder may receive his share of premiums, which are usually paid in advance, and then withdraw from the company, relieving himself entirely from the burden of fulfilling the contracts which the company have entered into. This would not only be monstrously unjust toward the remaining members, but might work very great injustice to the persons assured, by leaving them no responsible persons to call upon in case of a loss. Besides, if one may thus withdraw from the company, why not all? and thus leave the assured entirely without remedy. Now, sir, to obviate, in some measure, these defects in the act of incorporation, I have proposed this amendment. The whole amount of the capital should be paid in, which, by a provision in the original charter of the company, can invest in bank stock. There would then be a substantial capital, something to which the assured, in case of a loss, might look with confidence for that which they had bought and paid for, viz: indemnity.

After some further remarks by Mr. LAWRENCE and Mr. WASHINGTON, the bill, on the motion of the latter gentleman, was laid aside for further consideration.

MONUMENT TO WASHINGTON.

The "bill authorizing the officers and managers of the Washington Monumental Society to erect a monument to the memory of George Washington, on the public mall," was next taken up.

Mr. HAWES inquired how much land would be required for the purpose.

Mr. LANE supposed about ten acres.

Mr. HAWES objected to passing bills of this indefinite character; there was no limit to the amount of land that might be taken.

Improvement of Harbors.

Mr. LANE remarked that it was intended for a public promenade. He had no objection to five or four acres.

Mr. MASON proposed an amendment, in the following words: "to be laid off under the direction of the President of the United States." Agreed to.

After some remarks from Messrs. D. J. PEARCE, BOULDIN, LANE, and HARPER, the bill was further amended by limiting the time to twenty years, otherwise the right and title to the grant of land should revert back to the United States, and that the location should be between 7th street west and the Potomac.

Mr. JARVIS moved to limit the quantity to one acre; and, after a few words from Messrs. LANE, VINTON, and BOULDIN,

Mr. LANE moved to amend the amendment as follows: "not exceeding five acres."

The amendment was briefly discussed by Messrs. CHILDS, REED, LANE, VINTON, ANTHONY, and JARVIS, when the bill was laid aside for future consideration.

HARBOR BILL.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. LINCOLN in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the "bill making appropriations for the improvement of certain harbors therein mentioned, for the year 1836."

The question pending was the motion of Mr. PAXTON to insert an additional section in the bill, "for continuing the improvements of Cumberland river below the mouth of Laurel, which is hereby declared a port of entry, $50,000."

The question being taken on the above amendment, it was negatived.

Mr. LEONARD offered an amendment, for the improvement of the Susquehanna river, near Oswego, with a view to the improvement of steam navigation thereon, $5,000. Lost.

Mr. HAWES moved to strike out the following section: "For improving the harbor at the mouth of Cataraugus creek, on Lake Erie, $40,000."

After some remarks from Messrs. HAWES, SUTHERLAND and HAZELTINE,

Mr. SUTHERLAND moved to reduce the sum in the original clause to $20,000; which was agreed to.

After some remarks from Mr. GALBRAITH, the motion of Mr. HAWES was disagreed to: Ayes 63, noes 79.

Mr. CARTER proposed an appropriation of $10,000 for the continuation of the improvement of the Muscle Shoals; which was agreed to.

Mr. SUTHERLAND submitted an amendment appropriating the sum of $300 for an examination and survey of the passage of Cobscook bay, in the State of Maine; which was agreed to.

Mr. PARKER made some remarks in reference to the appropriation of $8,000 for improving Whitehall harbor on Lake Champlain, which he said was only the outlet or termination of a small creek, and then moved to strike out the following: "for building an ice-breaker on Staten Island, $19,500," on the ground that New York ought herself construct such work.

Mr. GIDEON LEE said the pointed call of the gentleman from New Jersey compelled him to give the reasons why his motion should not prevail.

But first, of Whitehall: the gentleman from New Jersey says that Whitehall is nothing more nor less than the termination of a little creek—that he has been there, and understands the matter.

Why, Mr. Chairman, it is most astonishing that a gentleman of threescore should have fallen into so great an error. Did the gentleman never hear of Skenesborough during the Revolution? of the armament, the arms, and the men, which fitted out at the harbor of Skenesborough?

Well, sir, this is precisely the harbor of Whitehall. Had the gentleman never heard of the fleet of McDonough, the battle of Plattsburgh, and that glorious victory? Has the gentleman yet to learn that this victorious fleet was built, fitted out, and sailed from this same Whitehall harbor which he deems unworthy of the care of this Government? Is he yet to learn that this same Whitehall, which he calls "the termination of a little creek," is the best if not the only good harbor on Lake Champlain? and the very appropriation which he proposes to strike out is intended to raise and clear the obstructions caused by the sunken navy taken from the enemy by McDonough, and brought into this harbor? Does not the gentleman know that there is a continuous navigation from New York through this lake to Quebec? and hence to China, if you please? So much for the little creek, sir.

But I rose, Mr. Chairman, to put the gentleman right as to the improvement at Staten Island, which he proposes to strike out; and I am utterly astonished to find the gentleman wrong in this matter. Sir, no man on this floor has a more critical knowledge of the bay and harbor of New York than that gentleman. He knows that the United States have a depot at Staten Island, a great commercial station, requiring not less than six custom-house officers to take charge of the revenue. He knows that during four months at least of each summer every vessel that enters the port must stop at that station, and a large portion of them are compelled to discharge there. He knows that this station is at the Narrows between the upper and the lower harbor; that during the winter many vessels are compelled to come to here, by reason of the ice above; and that the ships of the navy, as well as those of merchants, are frequently in danger at this point, and that the protection proposed by this appropriation is indispensable. But, sir, the gentleman asks, "why don't the great State of New York do it herself?" Why, sir, she would have no objection to do it if you will permit her to derive the revenue from it. Why, sir, is it asked why? It is because she has patriotically relinquished the legitimate means, in that glorious compact of confederation, when every State glowed with the fire of patriotism, when no selfish principle ruled the State of New York, relinquished the great boon which the God of nature gave her, to the confederated States; and she sacrificed and transferred to the Federal Government the great thrift of her incomparable harbor. She cannot, since that compact, levy a single dollar of revenue on exports or imports with which to improve the slight defects of her harbor which nature left unfinished; and most prophetic was the declaration of the patriot, George Clinton, that the relinquishment of the impost revenue to the Federal Government was the sacrifice of many annual millions on the part of the State of New York; "but were it fifty millions, patriotism demanded it."

Sir, examine the document laid on your table this morning. Ninety millions of imports into that port alone, yielding to the federal Treasury probably fifteen millions of dollars! And permit me to say, sir, that nature has decreed an augmentation of this trade to that port. Does the gentleman still ask, "why don't New York improve her own harbor?"

Sir, I do apologize for detaining the committee. I avoid speaking when I can, because speeches delay proper legislation, and because I am not an orator. I feel sorry, and do regret, that while we have but six remaining legislative days, I have been compelled to delay the committee even but a few moments.

Mr. GILLET said that his friend before him [Mr. PARKER] showed a commendable zeal in protecting the interests of the country against improvident expenditures of all kinds, and he should be the last to object to his vigilance. He had a right to ask for, and ought to receive, full information in relation to all the calls for expenditures like those to which he had objected. If those objections are obviated, as he thought they could be, of course he would sustain the appropriations. He would leave his colleague from the city of New York [Mr. LEE] to defend the proposed improvements at the quarantine near the city. He would only say that, on full examination in the Committee on Commerce, he had assented to that measure, as being highly proper. His colleague had not, however, said as much in favor of the proposed improvement near Whitehall as he might have done consistently with the truth of the case. Although he resided some two hundred miles from Whitehall, still he was somewhat personally acquainted with the situation of the obstructions proposed to be removed. He saw them on his way to this place last fall.

It was true that the passage from the broad part of Lake Champlain to this place was very narrow; still it was not a creek. It was a part of the lake, and without any more apparent current than in other parts of the lake. Above Ticonderoga, toward Whitehall, the lake in some parts was little wider than the canal in sight of us; still a very extensive commerce passed on these waters. It was the thoroughfare for a large number of schooners, steam and other boats, and led to the northern termination of the Champlain canal. A portion of New York and nearly all Vermont were deeply interested in this commerce on these waters. During the last war this place was a thoroughfare to the frontier. We had on that lake, as all must know, during that war, a fleet that covered itself with glory. At the close of that war, a portion, at least, of our national vessels were taken into Whitehall. They were there dismantled and broken up, as he had been informed, and sunk down in this narrow passage. Since then, deposits have collected around these old wrecks, which, together with the wrecks themselves, form a portion of the obstructions proposed to be removed by this appropriation. Hence it will be seen that a very considerable portion of these obstructions came there by the hand of the General Government itself. The jurisdiction then was in the people of the State, and the title in individuals. The Government had no right to leave any of its property there, so as to interfere with the interests of those concerned in the free and safe navigation of those waters. It even might be again wanted by the General Government for the use of another navy.

No one could object to this Government making full restitution for all injuries of this kind. It was right and just that it should do so. He must say if there could be an instance where this Government ought to clear out a harbor, he was confident this was one. He had seen the difficulty of getting in with steam and other boats, and with vessels; if every member here could see the place for himself, and become acquainted with the causes which occasioned the obstructions, he was confident there would be no objection to this appropriation. Certainly no gentleman will consent that this Government shall occasion an injury to any portion of our citizens, without redressing the wrong. There is now an opportunity to do an act of justice, in this respect, and he hoped all would consent that it should be speedily done.

The House then, according to order, took a recess.

EVENING SESSION.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the "harbor bill," the question pending being the motion of Mr. PARKER, as stated above.

After a few remarks from Mr. RUSSELL, the motion was disagreed to, without a count.

Mr. VINTON moved an amendment, for the improvement of the Maumee river, below the Rapids, $20,000.

Mr. HAMER hoped the amendment would be agreed to, inasmuch as it was below a port of entry, and had been favorably reported on by a committee.

The amendment was agreed to: Ayes 79, noes 44.

Mr. ROBERTSON then submitted a proviso that the sums appropriated by this bill, to be expended in the different States, should be paid out of the amount of the public money deposited in such States, respectively, under the bill passed regulating the deposits of the public money; which, after a few words from Messrs. WISE and HARPER, was disagreed to: Ayes 48, noes 95.

Mr. LYON moved a sum of $20,000 for improving the harbor at Mobile bay. Lost.

The bill was then laid aside, to be reported to the House.

LIGHT-HOUSE BILL.

The committee then took up the "bill making appropriations for building light-houses, light-boats, beacon-lights, buoys, and making surveys, for the year 1836."

The bill having been read, was taken up by sections.

Mr. SUTHERLAND offered an amendment, for the survey of the Kennebec river, Maine, $300. Agreed to.

Mr. PHILLIPS offered an amendment to the clause for a survey of Salem harbor, Massachusetts, by adding "Lynn," and increasing the appropriation $500. Agreed to.

Mr. PEARCE, of Rhode Island, offered an amendment to increase the appropriation for the light-house on Block Island, Rhode Island, to $5,000. Agreed to.

Mr. SUTHERLAND offered an amendment, for a floating light in or near the Middle Ground on Long Island Sound, $10,000; which was agreed to: Ayes 114, noes not counted.

Mr. PARKER moved an amendment, to insert after the word "Delaware," the words "and Schuylkill." Agreed to.

Mr. REYNOLDS, of Illinois, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, offered an amendment making an appropriation for the improvement of the Alleghany river between Pittsburg and Olean. Lost.

Mr. HAWES offered an amendment making an appropriation for erecting a light-house at Henderson's, in the State of Kentucky. Lost.

Mr. SUTHERLAND offered an amendment, for a light-house on James river, Virginia, $5,000. Agreed to.

Mr. SUTHERLAND also offered an amendment, for a survey of Manhattan harbor, on Maumee bay, $250. Agreed to.

Mr. REYNOLDS offered an amendment, for a survey of the Illinois river, from its mouth, $600. Lost.

Mr. OWENS offered the following:

"For the placing a floating light on the Savannah bar, near a shoal called Martin's Industry, twenty thousand dollars." Lost.

Mr. REYNOLDS, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, moved an item of $300 for the survey of a site for a bridge across the Ohio at Cincinnati. Agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, offered an amendment, for a survey of Perdido and Pearl rivers, Louisiana, $300. Agreed to.

Mr. CHAPIN offered the following new section:

"Be it further enacted, That the reports upon all the aforesaid surveys shall contain a statement of all such facts within the knowledge of the engineers, respectively, making the surveys, as are or may be materially connected with the proposed improvements, and also estimates, in detail, of the sums of money necessary for such improvements, respectively."

Mr. CHAPIN said a similar provision is contained in the harbor bill, which had been before the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. If such a provision could be necessary in the harbor bill, it was much more important in this bill, as it contained a much larger number of appropriations for surveys. Besides, Congress looked to the reports of the engineers to establish the importance and utility of the proposed improvements. These reports came from men of science and experience, employed by the Government, who were entirely disinterested, and should embody all the facts within the knowledge of the engineers, materially connected with the proposed improvements, to enable Congress to come to correct conclusions in regard to them.

The section was then adopted.

Mr. HAWES moved that the committee rise. Lost.

Mr. JARVIS offered an additional section, providing that none of the light-houses should be commenced until the proper examinations be made by the Secretary of the Treasury. Agreed to.

The bill was then laid aside, to be reported to the House.

CUMBERLAND ROAD.

The committee next took up the bill from the Senate to continue the Cumberland road in the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois.

The question pending was on an amendment to the bill reported by the Committee on Roads and Canals, to change the road from a Macadamized road to a railroad.

Mr. JACKSON said that, having urged upon the Committee on Roads and Canals the expediency of changing the plan of this road from that of Macadam, and substituting therefor, in that part of the Cumberland road not yet completed, a railroad; and having, as I think, given the subject a careful investigation, I feel desirous, notwithstanding my usual repugnance to addressing this House on any subject, of presenting some of the reasons which have operated to produce entire conviction on my mind of the expediency of making this change.

I have always been in favor of this enterprise, and urge this change because I wish to continue to act with its supporters, but cannot consistently do so unless the change takes place. The motives and reasons for undertaking this great work in 1820, and which characterized it as a national road, have for some years ceased to have any existence at all. At that time it was urged, and urged with great force and propriety, that it opened an indispensably necessary communication between the Atlantic seaboard and the great West—a facility in the benefits of which a large proportion of the nation would participate; and that, by thus facilitating this intercourse, it would bring these remote parts of our wide-extended country into a nearer and more profitable intercourse, and operate as a bond of union between them. But it is now perfectly obvious to me, and I think must be so to all who will give to this subject but a slight examination, that these considerations do not now exist, and that this Congress have none of the motives to prompt them to the continued support of this road which induced the Congress of 1820 to commence it. The mode of travel and exportation have, since that time, undergone an entire change. Science and ingenuity have opened a far better mode of communication between these two extremities of the nation than the most sanguine dreamer could have anticipated from the construction of this road. It is now no longer a connecting link between the Atlantic and the West; nor would it, during a great proportion of the year, be used at all by the travelling community in passing from Wheeling to St. Louis, even if it were finished and in perfect order throughout its whole extent. The Ohio and Mississippi rivers are now the great travelled routes, and far superior in point of convenience, speed, and economy, to any thing which a Macadam road ever can be. Vandalia, the capital of Illinois, is more than 460 miles from Wheeling, by the way of this road, and less than 100 from the Ohio river, and to that part of the river, too, which is five or six hundred miles nearer to her market than Wheeling. Not a pound of her foreign supplies or home productions will ever reach their respective destinations by a transit over this road; nor would any trader, in view of his own ease or interest, think of passing over this road from one of these places to the other. The same is true with regard to Indianapolis, the capital of Indiana. This city is only about 100 miles from Cincinnati, and more than 300 from Wheeling. In fact, neither Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, nor any other State in the Union, have any more interest in that part of the Cumberland road located within the limits of Ohio than they have in any of the other roads in that State; and so long as it remains a Macadamized road, the nature of the case forbids the expectation that they ever should have. Nor can it with any more propriety be denominated a State road than a hundred others in Ohio. The communications of its own capital (Columbus) are not, to any considerable extent, with Wheeling. The latter is a Virginia city, on the other side of the river, and considerably farther from them than their own Cincinnati, itself three hundred miles nearer the great mart to which all the surplus produce of that part of Ohio must go for a market, and from which their foreign necessities must be procured. If the three per cent. reservation from the sales of public lands is the property of and rightfully belongs to Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, so narrow is the extent of the circle of the benefits of this road, that I should not expect one in a dozen of the Representatives of these States to be willing to have it expended on this road; and, in my opinion, the time is coming, and not far distant either, when the Representatives of those three States will stand in one undivided phalanx on this floor, and tell Congress the construction of this road through their territories has done them, as States, no good, and that the money so prodigally expended upon it ought not to be considered as a payment of the three per cent. reservation. What is more, such a statement will be true to the letter, and the inference just and inevitable. But change the plan of the road, make it a railroad, and it becomes national again, by becoming the shortest and speediest, the most convenient and the most economical route by which the Atlantic and Western extremities of this great and growing nation can reach each other. When this road was commenced there was almost no practicable way by which the farthest West could be reached by land, and the passage by water from Wheeling to St. Louis was dangerous, tedious, and expensive. Now it requires, and would require, if the Cumberland road was completed on the present plan, two or three days longer, much more labor and fatigue, and nearly double the expense, to go by land which it would do by water; neither way, however, could it be done in less than six days. By a railroad, forty hours, stops included, will be time enough. Some of our railroad engines travel at a rate, ordinarily, which would pass over this whole route in thirty hours, and this, too, over so much of the road as is built by the United States at an expense only sufficient to keep it in repair and pay for transportation—probably about two cents per mile.

These facts, and this view of the subject, left no doubt on the minds of a large majority of the Committee on Roads and Canals that a change in your policy was highly expedient and necessary, provided the railroad could be constructed at a reasonable cost, compared with a Macadamized road. They accordingly applied to the Department for information touching this matter, and received therefrom a report and estimate made out by Mr. Brewerton, the engineer who now has charge of the Cumberland road, and whose recent position in relation thereto entitles his opinions and estimates to much confidence.

Cumberland Road.

[H. OF R.]

From this report we learn that the whole length of this road, within the limits of Ohio, is two hundred and twenty-four miles. The entire cost, including what has been and what must yet be expended for construction, but not including repairs, will amount to $2,345,989, equal to $10,473 per mile.

He also estimates the annual cost for repairs at $189,296.

For that part of this route on which a change is proposed, that is, from Columbus to Indiana line, ninety-eight and a quarter miles, the estimated cost of a railroad, with a double track, is $1,005,002, equal to $10,204 per mile. The annual repairs are estimated at $66,121.

One hundred and forty-eight miles of this road is in Indiana, upon which the sum expended, and to be expended, amounts to $2,349,573, equal to $15,875 per mile; and its annual repairs are estimated at $189,788.

The cost of this part of the railroad Mr. Brewerton estimates at $2,176,611, equal to $14,707 per mile; and its annual repairs at $98,976.

The continuance of this road has not yet been authorized in Illinois farther than from Indiana line to Vandalia, ninety miles, the total cost of which, including the amount necessary for its completion, is $1,217,002, equal to $13,411 per mile. Annual repairs, $113,365.

His estimated cost of the railroad is $1,100,926, equal to $12,238 per mile. Annual repairs, $58,945.

The result of the whole of which is, a railroad, with a double track, may be constructed for less money than a Macadamized road, and be kept in repair at half the expense.

The truth is, there are few places in the United States where it would be more expensive to construct a Macadamized road, owing to the great scarcity of gravel and stone, and consequent long and expensive hauling; and as few places where a railroad can be constructed at a less expense, arising from the extraordinary level character of the country over which it passes throughout nearly the whole distance from Columbus to St. Louis.

In connexion with these facts, altogether conclusive in themselves, it should also be remembered that, except from Vandalia to St. Louis, and on about the same or less distance from Wheeling toward Columbus, this road will never be extensively used for the transportation of goods.

The seat of Government in Ohio will doubtless soon be united to its commercial capital, Cincinnati, by a railroad, over which the products of this part of the State and their foreign necessities will continue to pass. For the transportation of passengers and light goods a single track will for a long time afford ample accommodation. This would diminish this estimate for the construction of a railroad about four thousand dollars per mile, and reduce the annual expense for repairs full one third.

In view of these facts and considerations, can it be that the congregated wisdom of this nation, at this time of day, will determine to continue this extravagant expenditure in the way and on the plan they have heretofore done?

The Legislature of Ohio, if I am rightly informed, have already granted a charter for a railroad from Wheeling to Columbus; and the Lake Erie and Mad river railroad, now in the process of construction, runs parallel and near to the line of the Cumberland road, west of Columbus, ——— miles. When these roads are finished, what will that part of the Cumberland road be worth to this nation? Nothing, absolutely nothing. It must be abandoned by the United States and the State of Ohio, and repaired, if repaired at all, as all other mere neighborhood roads are. Of this we have a complete demonstration and illustration immediately before our eyes, and under our own noses, in the present situation of the turnpike between this city and Baltimore.

The franchise of that turnpike, which cost such an immense sum of money, is not now worth one dollar. The same is true of the old road from Baltimore to Frederick, and of every other turnpike in the Union which runs parallel with a railroad to and from the same places.

Viewed in the light of truth, upon its own merits, and apart from all extraneous circumstances, the soundness and propriety of the measure now recommended are absolutely incontrovertible. And nothing is more surprising to me than the strange determination manifested by intelligent gentlemen on this floor, to throw dust into each others' eyes, in relation to this very important subject. A railroad is a monopoly!—not so democratic! They are willing that gentlemen of wealth, and aristocrats, should build railroads, and travel on them if they choose! But their constituents are all democratic republicans!—plain men—and want a road on which they can all travel together: no toll, no monopoly, nothing exclusive—a real "people's" road!

Mr. Chairman, I do not think this a fair representation of the democracy of the West. It requires something more than the mere looking with contempt upon the pride, luxury, and extravagance of wealth, to make an American democrat. He is himself intelligent, and his means are chosen with a wise adaptation to the end he has in view. The fare on the railroad from this city to Baltimore is higher, in proportion to distance, than upon any other in the Union—the cost of construction being four times as great as it need be in Illinois and Indiana. Now, I would ask honorable gentlemen if they can fix their thoughts upon one of their intelligent democratic constituents, who would carry his no-monopoly doctrine into practice so far as to pay three dollars and fifty cents for his fare to Baltimore on the turnpike, and be six or eight hours on the road, in preference to paying two dollars and fifty cents in the cars, and be set down in Baltimore after a very comfortable ride of less than three hours? The truth is, none but men of wealth can afford to travel upon the gentlemen's democratic people's road.

The honorable gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LANE] says, "What if a railroad is better?"—and intimates that if the people prefer a common road, it being for their use, gentlemen from other parts of the Union ought not to interfere in the matter—ought not to deny them such a road as they choose.

Mr. Chairman, if this doctrine is true, and the position here assumed tenable, it is a mere local road, and upon no proper rule of action can Congress appropriate another dollar for its continuation or support. But, sir, this road was undertaken and laid out as a national one; has been uniformly defended on this floor on the ground of its generally beneficial and national character, and every dollar expended in Indiana and Illinois has been from the funds of the nation, the reserved fund having long since been exhausted; and I suspect that the honorable gentleman himself will, when the main question on this bill comes up, defend it on the same ground.

After some remarks by Messrs. MERCER, LANE, VINTON, CAMBRELENG, HANNEGAN, REYNOLDS of Illinois, KINNARD, and CRANE,

Mr. OWENS moved that the committee rise; which motion was disagreed to: Ayes 58, noes 65.

After some further remarks by Messrs. McCARTY and MERCER, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CORWIN offered as an amendment to the bill the appropriations contained in the bill from the Committee of Ways and Means, for roads in the Territories of Michigan, Arkansas, and Florida.

After a few remarks by Messrs. LANE, REYNOLDS, CORWIN, and MASON of Virginia, the amendment was rejected.

The bill was then laid aside, to be reported to the House.

H. OF R.]

Texas—Alteration of the Rules.

[JUNE 27, 1836.]

Mr. HAWES then moved that the committee rise; which was decided in the affirmative: Ayes 64, noes 57. On motion of Mr. WISE, The House then adjourned.

MONDAY, JUNE 27.

TEXAS.

Mr. BELL presented a memorial from a large and respectable meeting at Nashville, in Tennessee, praying Congress to recognise the independence of Texas, and, in relation thereto, asked leave to submit the following resolution; which was read:

Resolved, That an appropriation be made for the outfit and salary of a minister to the republic of Texas, to be appointed by the President at as early a day as shall appear to him to be expedient and proper.

Objections being made, Mr. BELL moved to suspend the rules to enable him to offer the resolution.

Mr. BOYD asked for the yeas and nays thereon.

Mr. MANN, of New York, moved to lay the whole subject on the table; upon which motion

Mr. HUNTSMAN called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered; and

Mr. MANN then withdrew the motion to lay on the table.

The question being on the motion to suspend the rules, the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MASON, of Virginia, suggested that the subject had been under consideration in the Committee on Foreign Relations, and that the committee would, in a few days, report a bill in relation to it. He hoped, therefore, the gentleman would waive the motion for the present.

Mr. BELL said the suggestion was certainly entitled to weight, but, as he had no knowledge from any quarter in regard to the nature of the report to be made from the Committee on Foreign Relations, as the sentiment in favor of some action on this subject was very general in the country, and as he had been requested by a large body of his constituents to bring the subject before the House, he did not feel at liberty to withdraw the motion.

The question being taken, the motion to lay on the table was decided in the affirmative: Yeas 135, nays 56.

So the whole subject, as well as Mr. BELL's motion, was ordered to lie on the table.

ALTERATION OF THE RULES.

Mr. VINTON moved a suspension of the rules, for the purpose of offering the following resolution:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the following shall be a standing joint rule of the two Houses, viz: That after six days from the commencement of a second or other subsequent session of any Congress, except the final session of such Congress, all bills and joint resolutions, which originated in and had passed either House, and at the close of the next preceding session remained undetermined in the other House, shall be resumed and acted on in the House where it remained undetermined, in the same manner as if an adjournment had not taken place.

The motion to suspend was agreed to: Yeas 113, nays 45.

Mr. HAWES moved to postpone the further consideration of the resolution till Friday next.

After a few words from Mr. VINTON, the motion was disagreed to; and, after some remarks from Messrs. MASON of Virginia, VINTON, MILLER, and SPEIGHT, Mr. THOMAS expressed an earnest hope that the rule would be adopted. He had some experience on this subject. The rule, if adopted, would operate chiefly on bills providing for the payment of private claims.

Bills of a general character, which had passed one branch of Congress, were nearly all disposed of by the other House before an adjournment; because they did not fail to create sufficient interest to insure such action. It is otherwise with private bills. Many of them are acted on in one or the other House, without being finally disposed of before an adjournment. By our rules, as they now are, bills in this condition are in effect rejected. And at the next session the petitions which gave origin to them are to be presented anew, and the claims are to undergo a new examination. This proceeding imposes on the members of the House unnecessary labor. It often happens that the committees are changed in the mean time; and if only one new member is placed on a committee, the whole matter is to be re-examined, that he may act understandingly. By this means, members who pay attention to business in a committee-room are engaged in maturing these private bills for the action of the House, and must necessarily be deprived of a large proportion of that time needed to be prepared to take part in the proceedings of Congress on subjects of a more general character. The great mass of private business before Congress unavoidably prolongs greatly its sessions. If members could be relieved from the labor of examining and re-examining those private claims, by a rule which would insure final action on all which have been passed by either House, they could then lend their aid to give impulse to the proceedings of Congress on business of a public character. The rule ought to be adopted, not only to relieve the members of the House from unnecessary labor, but to insure a speedy payment to all claimants of their just dues.

Mr. SUTHERLAND moved the previous question; which was seconded by the House: Yeas 100, nays not counted; and the main question being ordered,

Mr. HOWARD asked for the yeas and nays, but the House refused to order them, and the resolution was adopted without a count.

HARBORS, &c.

On motion of Mr. SUTHERLAND, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. LINCOLN in the chair.

Mr. OWENS rose to make an appeal to the House, which, when he stated the reasons for, he was sure the committee would attend to. He rose to move to give priority in the committee to the bill reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, making appropriations to carry into effect certain Indian treaties. Mr. O. conceived it to be the duty of the committee to take up the bill at once; and the reason he would give, he was satisfied, would induce them to act upon it without delay. He (Mr. O.) had received information from Georgia, from individuals of all parties, that the Cherokees were in a very distressed condition, being destitute of food; that many of them, men, women, and children, were traversing the country fifty and sixty miles from their residence in search of subsistence—those having means purchasing it; others depending on the charity of the people. At the time of the negotiation of the treaty, the condition of the Cherokee people was well known, they having lost their crops during the last fall by the early frosts. The exigency was provided for by the 18th clause of the treaty, stipulating that provisions be furnished them. Mr. O. therefore urged his motion, and regarded its adoption not as a matter of policy or political expediency, but as one of humanity, and could not anticipate its rejection.

Mr. ASHLEY objected, on the ground that he wished the Cumberland road bills first disposed of, as they had precedence in the order of the House.

Mr. OWENS's motion was then negatived.

The committee then took up the "bill making appropriations for certain military and other roads, and for examinations and surveys, for the year 1836."

Mr. CORWIN moved to strike out the items in this bill for continuing the Cumberland road in the States of Ohio and Indiana, on the ground that they were embraced in another bill; which was agreed to.

Mr. CORWIN moved an amendment, for a road from La Plaisance bay to Chicago, $7,000. Agreed to.

Mr. ASHLEY proposed to amend the item in the bill providing for the construction of a road from the southern boundary of Missouri to Red river, by striking out the words "southern boundary of Missouri," and inserting "as the place of beginning, on the Mississippi, at New Madrid." Agreed to.

Various other amendments were submitted by Messrs. REYNOLDS of Illinois, ASHLEY, HARPER, MERCER, MASON of Virginia, JACKSON of Massachusetts, and GARLAND of Virginia, some of which were agreed to and others rejected; and after some remarks from Messrs. SUTHERLAND, ASHLEY, JACKSON of Massachusetts, KINNARD, MERCER, CORWIN, LANE, HARPER, PATTON, and GARLAND of Virginia, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House.

The committee next took up the bill for the erection of a bridge across the river Ohio, on the route of the Cumberland road; which was considered, and the blanks filled up.

The bill to continue the national road from Vandalia to the Mississippi river, in the State of Illinois, and from the Mississippi river to Jefferson city, in the State of Missouri, was then taken up; and after some discussion between Messrs. REYNOLDS of Illinois, HAWES, MERCER, BOON, KINNARD, and VINTON, the committee rose without taking the question; and

The House took a recess till 4 o'clock

EVENING SESSION.

CUMBERLAND ROAD.

The House again went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. LINCOLN in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill to continue the national road from Vandalia to the Mississippi river, in the State of Illinois.

The question pending was the motion of Mr. HAWES to strike out that part of the bill which provided that the road should be so graded as to permit hereafter the laying of rails thereon.

After some remarks from Messrs. HARDIN, ASHLEY, LANE, and MERCER, the amendment was agreed to: Ayes 92, noes 38.

The bill was then laid aside, to be reported to the House.

The committee next took up the bill to continue the national road from the Mississippi river to Jefferson city, in the State of Missouri.

Mr. HAWES moved to strike out the clause in relation to grading the road with a view to lay rails thereon; which was agreed to.

The bill was then laid aside.

INDIAN TREATIES.

The bill making appropriations to carry into effect certain Indian treaties was next taken up.

The bill having been read through by sections,

Mr. ADAMS wished to be informed why the treaty had not been communicated to the House by the President, as had been customary. He had been told that it was contained in a document, and he should like to know what document it was, for he had not seen it.

Mr. CAMBRELENG rose, and gave the number and title of the document.

Mr. ADAMS said he had not seen that document, and he thought there were not many of the members of the House who had. He said it had been remarked that it was not customary for the President to communicate such treaties; and, in reply, he referred to the journals of preceding sessions, and read a message of President Jackson, to show that he had communicated a similar treaty with the Choctaws, to the end that Congress might make the appropriations necessary to carry it into effect. He said it was important that the document should be examined, not only to the members of the House, but because a large portion of the Cherokee nation protested that the treaty was not made by any competent authority. He had presented a memorial from that nation a few days ago, against the treaty, the reading of which he called for.

After the reading had been proceeded in for some time,

Mr. HOWARD objected to the further reading, saying it was a printed document.

Mr. ADAMS said it had not been laid on the tables till this day, and now the House was called upon to vote upon it.

[Cries of "go on, go on."]

The Clerk continued the reading of the memorial.

After some time, Mr. CAMBRELENG asked how much more was to be read, and if it was not the same document presented to the Senate when the treaty was before them.

Mr. ADAMS said, no; it was a document presented by him to the House.

Mr. WISE said he would call for the reading of every document that was before the Senate. If there was a charge that the treaty had been obtained by fraud, he would never vote a dollar to carry it into effect till that charge was removed. He would not aid in carrying into effect a fraudulent treaty against an ignorant and savage people.

The Clerk proceeded, and concluded the reading of the memorial.

Mr. ADAMS then moved that the committee rise and report the other bills, leaving this bill to be acted upon hereafter, when the House should be in possession of documents, they had not seen, and which would fully confirm all the declarations of the memorial. He thought the House would perceive that this subject ought not to be decided hastily and without examination.

Mr. ADAMS moved to strike out the first appropriation for the Cherokee treaty.

Mr. WISE asked if the documents which were before the Senate had been before the House.

Mr. ADAMS said they were communicated with the memorial by him; they were confidentially communicated to the Senate by the President; and after the treaty was passed, and the injunction had been taken off, he obtained a copy by sending to the President. They were ordered by the House to be printed with the memorial, and why it had not been done he did not know.

Mr. WISE said he understood the gentleman, and he wanted to know if those documents had been communicated in any other way than by the gentleman himself.

Mr. ADAMS said, that was what he had complained of last week—that the President had not communicated the treaty and the documents connected with it, according to custom.

Mr. WISE said that, for one, then, he would agree with the gentleman from Massachusetts, never to vote one dollar to carry this treaty into effect; a treaty thus impeached by a memorial ably, reasonably drawn. Neither would he rely upon the documents in support of it, thus informally communicated by one of the Cherokee delegation to a member of the House. He wanted the documents from the President himself. The Senate had ratified the treaty, and had the documents in its favor; and it was the duty of this House to look into the causes and effects, especially the causes which had led to it. It was the duty of the House to look to the money of the nation; above all, to the honor of the nation; and in their action to see that they did not debase the character of the nation by the infliction of frauds upon the ignorant, and violence upon the helpless. Let him know that the honor of the nation is safe, that our character is not to be implicated by the execution of the treaty, and he did not believe any question of mere interest would prevent his voting the appropriation. He believed, he said, that, under these circumstances, the Georgia delegation, the honorable Representatives from that State, would let the House wait till it could see that the honor of the nation is not to be tarnished, now and hereafter, at home and abroad, by carrying this treaty into effect.

Indian Treaties.

Mr. CAMBRELENG stated that it had not been customary for the President to communicate such treaties to the House, though it had sometimes been done upon a call of the House upon the Executive therefor.

Mr. OWENS urged the committee not to delay their action upon the bill. If the committee intended to defeat the appropriation, they would agree to the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts, that the committee should rise. He thought, if the appropriation was delayed four-and-twenty or eight-and-forty hours, it would be defeated inevitably. The documents, he said, had been before the House some time, and gentlemen could have informed themselves sufficiently upon the subject. If gentlemen would look at them, they would find that the wrongs set forth in the memorial were only imaginary wrongs; and that the treaty had been negotiated in an open, fair, and honorable manner. He then went at length into an examination of the history and details of the treaty, and called for the reading of two documents in opposition to the statements of the memorials. He argued that the memorial was not true in facts or principles, and was an attempt to impose upon the Senate and the House.

Mr. WISE replied at some length to the remarks of Mr. OWENS. He said this was a treaty alleged to have been obtained by fraud, from a portion only of the Cherokee nation; and he would not vote to carry it into execution, till the allegation was fully answered by the documents in possession of the Executive. He spoke of the partial council by which the treaty had been agreed to, while many of the nation had been kept away by force; and asked if such a treaty, so obtained, was to be taken by the people of this country as one to be enforced, against the protest of a large portion of the Cherokee nation. He examined the character of some of the delegates, and particularly defended the character of John Ross, one of the delegates, who came on to oppose the ratification of the treaty by the Senate; and commented severely upon the character and conduct of Ridge, Schermerhorn, and others, who had made it. He spoke at length upon the treatment John Ross had received from the Georgia guard, as set forth in the memorial. He was the man who had swam the river at the battle of the Horse-shoe, and at the risk of his life brought away the canoes of the hostile Indians; and he it was who had been turned out of his own dwelling, out of the house he had built; at an expense of ten or fifteen thousand dollars, by a Georgia guard, and his property was all given to others. This, he said, was the faith and humanity of a Christian, civilized nation! He said John Ross was well known to many members of the House to be an honest, intelligent man, worthy to sit in the councils of the nation, letting alone the councils of an Indian tribe; and his objection to the treaty, and he believed it to be an honest one, was, that it would goad on the people of his nation to resistance, which would sacrifice their lives, as well as those of many of the whites. He hoped the House would pause, and not appropriate the money till they had ascertained that it would be properly applied, consistently with the honor of the nation.

Mr. WISE then renewed the motion that the committee rise, and report the bills upon which they had passed to the House.

Mr. OWENS requested him to withdraw the motion, to let a document be read, showing the number of persons present at the making of the treaties.

Mr. WISE said, if that document was to be read, he must call for the reading of others.

Mr. ADAMS said, if that course was pursued, he should call for the reading of a document that would be found to have some point in it.

Mr. WISE then insisted upon his motion.

Before the committee rose, the Indian treaty bill having been laid aside,

Mr. MERCER moved some amendments to one or two of the bills heretofore acted upon; which were agreed to.

The committee having risen, and reported the several bills upon which they had concluded,

Mr. WISE asked leave to submit a resolution calling upon the President of the United States to communicate to this House the same information in relation to the Cherokee treaty, lately ratified, which was laid before the Senate.

Mr. GILLET objected, and Mr. WISE moved the suspension of the rules; which was agreed to.

The resolution being taken up for consideration,

Mr. HAYNES rose and said he had hoped that he should never again be involved in a general discussion of the Indian question; but the allegations, violent, gratuitous, and unjust, which had been preferred against the State of which he had the honor to be a Representative, by an honorable member from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] made it his solemn duty to repel the assault, and to roll it back upon the assailant. I regret exceedingly, said Mr. H., that the honorable gentleman, whatever may have been his motive, (and that motive I shall not now attempt to investigate,) should have thought it necessary, in the discussion of a bill providing for the faithful performance of the treaty with the Creek Indians of the 24th March, 1832, to revive the exploded charges of injustice and oppression on the part of Georgia towards those Indians. Before proceeding to the discussion of the subject, I may be permitted to say, that the regret expressed by the honorable gentleman reminded me strongly of the occasion on which he uttered the same sentiment because he could not again throw back upon the people the choice of Chief Magistrate. As this historical reminiscence was involuntary, I trust the committee will bear with me for expressing it, not intending to inquire into his motive at the one time or the other. It is impossible to do justice to the defence in which I have been most reluctantly involved, without presenting a brief outline of the political history of this country in its colonial, revolutionary, and present state. The colonies, which afterwards became the original thirteen States of this Union, were either settled or acquired by the Government or people of Great Britain. Deriving their origin principally from a common ancestry, similar institutions were common to them all. Among the number, Georgia, as is well known to every one familiar with American history, was the last colony planted by the mother country.

In all the charters granted by Great Britain to the colonies, the principle was assumed, if not directly expressed, of the absolute right of the colonizing nation both to soil and jurisdiction of the countries thus colonized. It may, perhaps, have been heretofore contended, that the question of limits between the European discoverers of this continent had no reference to their right of soil or jurisdiction in respect to the aboriginal inhabitants.

Indian Treaties.

[H. OF R.]

But the slightest examination of the colonial charters will dissipate such an assertion in a moment. In no one instance, is it believed, did the Government or colonists of Great Britain base their right to settle this continent on the previous permission of its original possessors. Not intending to trouble the House any longer than may be indispensable to the performance of my present duty, I forbear such references to the colonial charters as would clear my position of the slightest reasonable doubt. The colony of Georgia, then, was placed on the same footing with her elder sisters in respect to the right of her people to a residence on this continent. As there were aboriginal inhabitants in all the original colonies, it became necessary at an early period of the existence of those colonies to establish some general principle of action towards them. And it is believed by the present speaker that the principle generally adopted by the colonies on that subject cannot be better illustrated than by reference to the doctrine said to have been delivered by a distinguished citizen of Massachusetts, on the anniversary commemoration of the landing of the Pilgrims at Plymouth, in Massachusetts, on the 22d day of December 1802. That distinguished individual is reported to have said, on the occasion referred to, that "The Indian right of possession itself stands, with regard to the greatest part of the country, upon a questionable foundation. Their cultivated fields, their constructed habitations, a space of ample sufficiency for their subsistence, and what they had annexed to themselves by their personal labor, was undoubtedly, by the laws of nature, theirs. But what is the right of a huntsman to the forest of a thousand miles, over which he has accidentally ranged in quest of prey? Shall the liberal bounties of Providence to the race of man be monopolized by one of a thousand for whom they were created? Shall the exuberant bosom of the common mother, amply adequate to the nourishment of millions, be claimed exclusively by a few hundreds of her offspring? Shall the lordly savage not only disdain the virtues and enjoyments of civilization himself, but shall he control the civilization of the world? Shall he forbid the wilderness to blossom like the rose? Shall he forbid the oaks of the forest to fall before the axe of industry, and rise again transformed into the habitations of ease and elegance? Shall he doom an immense region of the globe to perpetual desolation, and to bear the howling of the tiger and the wolf silence forever the voice of human gladness? Shall the hills and valleys, which a beneficent God has formed to teem with the life of innumerable multitudes, be condemned to everlasting barrenness? Shall the mighty rivers, poured out by the hand of nature, as channels of communication between numerous nations, roll their waters in sullen silence and eternal solitude to the deep? Have hundreds of commodious harbors, a thousand leagues of coast, and a boundless ocean, been spread in front of this land, and shall every purpose of utility to which they could apply be prohibited by the tenant of the woods? No, generous philanthropists! Heaven has not thus placed at irreconcilable strife its moral laws with its physical creation!"

Could the principle which regulated the colonies from their earliest day of strength, and beyond which Georgia has never gone, have been more forcibly expressed, or eloquently illustrated, than in what I have just quoted? Can it be that in such wide-sweeping assertion of colonial right, the mind of the orator had narrowed its vision to the horizon of New England, and the defence of his own puritan ancestors? Who, that has heard the announcement of such a principle, could for a moment imagine that the mind which had adopted, and the tongue which expressed it with such eloquence and force, should now utter unmeasured denunciation against Georgia for having acted short of the extent of his own principle? That principle, if his illustrations are entitled to any weight, goes the whole length, not only of the forcible dispossession of the savage of every thing but his home and little spot of cultivation, together with such personal trifles as his labor has appropriated, but sanctions his entire ejection from it all. But it is not here necessary to dwell longer on the abstract doctrine of the honorable member from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] as contained in his anniversary oration at Plymouth in 1802.

I shall now turn my attention, after a word or two upon the subject of the territorial limits created and established by the several colonial charters of the old thirteen States, and as confirmed by various public acts since the commencement of the Revolution, to the manner in which various colonies, particularly those in the middle and northern portions of this country, carried out the doctrine maintained by the honorable gentleman in 1802, in their legislative enactments for the government of the Indian tribes within their several limits. In proof of this assertion it is only necessary to advert to the statutes of a majority of the colonies on this subject. That Massachusetts considered Indians only entitled to the land improved and inhabited by them, is shown by a colonial law of 1633, "For settling the Indians' titles to lands in this (that) jurisdiction," in which it is enacted, "That what lands any of the Indians in this jurisdiction have possessed and improved, by subduing the same, they have just right unto."

"And be it further ordered by this court and the authority thereof, and be it hereby enacted, That all that tract of land within this jurisdiction, whether already granted to any English plantations or persons, or to be granted by this court, (not being under the qualification of right to the Indians,) is and shall be accounted the just right of such English as already have, or hereafter shall have, grant of lands from this court, and the authority thereof." Various other acts were passed by the colonial Legislature of Massachusetts from the year 1633 downward to 1747, in no one of which is the jurisdiction, entire and complete, over all the rights of the Indians, believed to have been in any manner relinquished, restrained, or diminished. Being necessarily obliged to go over a great deal of ground for the complete vindication of Georgia, the foregoing evidence from the colonial laws of Massachusetts is deemed sufficient to show that she claimed perfect and entire sovereignty over all the Indians and Indian lands within her limits. Next in order of time, I come to the colonial legislation of Virginia. So early as the year 1658, I find in her records the following provision: "Be it hereby ordained and enacted, That all the Indians of this colony shall and may keep those seats of land which they now have; and that no person or persons whatsoever be suffered to entrench or plant upon such places as the said Indians claim or desire, until full leave from the Governor and councillor commissioners for the place." Several other laws, regulating Indian affairs, were passed at different times between the years 1658 and 1705, inclusive, by the colonial Legislature of Virginia; but the extract just presented will suffice to show that the colony claimed and exercised entire jurisdiction over the Indians within her limits. In the year 1663, the colony of Rhode Island seems first to have exercised jurisdiction over Indians; and from the tenor of her enactment in that year, in regard to their lands, and the act of 1696, for restraining and governing their persons, she seems to have exercised as unlimited control over them as she could have done over her white inhabitants. By the act of 1663, it is ordained, "that no person or persons, for the future, shall purchase any lands or islands within this colony, of or from the native Indians within the same, but such only as are allowed to do so by the General Assembly, upon penalty of forfeiting all such lands or islands so purchased to the colony." By an act passed in the year 1696, it is provided, "that if any negroes or Indians, freemen or slaves, shall be found abroad after nine o'clock at night, at any time throughout the year, without a certificate from the masters, or some other English person of the family to which he, she, or they, belong, or some lawful excuse for the same, that then it shall and may be lawful for any person or persons to take, seize, and secure the same till next morning, and then bring them before an assistant or justice of the peace of such town, who shall, upon due proof thereof, cause said negro or negroes, Indian or Indians, to be publicly whipped at the public whipping-post of such town."

In the year 1672, the colonial Legislature of Connecticut adopted numerous regulations for the restraint and government of her Indians; among which was one providing "that no Indian or Indians shall, at any time, pawaw, or perform outward worship to false gods, or to the devil, within this colony, on pain of forfeiting the sum of five pounds to the public treasury of this colony, for any time any Indian or Indians shall be convicted of performing the same."

As further evidence of the criminal jurisdiction exercised by Connecticut over Indians, and especially for the benefit of those who have made such outcry because Georgia, of late years, has exercised similar justice towards them, I will offer one further extract from her act of 1672: "And whereas it is too manifest that the Indians, notwithstanding all counsel and advice to the contrary, have committed and still do commit murder, and kill one another, within the English plantations in this colony, and take no course that such justice be executed on such malefactors as may take off the guilt of blood from the land; which to prevent,

"It is further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That if any Indian or Indians within this colony shall wilfully and violently fall upon any Indian or Indians within this colony, and upon the English land, (except it be such as they are at open war with,) and murder him or them, and be thereof legally convicted, every such Indian or Indians shall suffer death."

In addition to the highest criminal jurisdiction thus exercised by Connecticut, the last extract contains the singular provision of legalizing Indian wars within her limits. One more reference to the colonial law of Connecticut, and I shall pass to another colony.

In 1717, the Legislature of Connecticut passed "An act concerning purchases of native rights to land."

"This Assembly, observing many difficulties and perplexities arising in this Government, by reason of many purchases of land made of Indian titles, without the preceding allowance or subsequent approbation of this Assembly; which to remove, it is hereby enacted and declared by this Assembly, and the authority thereof, that all lands in this Government are holden of the King of Great Britain as the lord of the fee, and that no title to any lands in this colony can accrue by any purchase made of Indians, on pretence of their being native proprietors thereof, without the allowance and approbation of this Assembly." Other acts were passed by the colonial Legislature of Connecticut, relative to Indians, in 1717, 1722, and 1750, but the foregoing will show most clearly that the colony assumed unlimited control over them and their lands.

In the year 1700, the colony of Pennsylvania is believed first to have exercised her jurisdiction over the Indian lands, and her legal records show under that date "An act against buying land of the Indians," which contains the provision, "that if any person presume to buy any land of the natives within the limits of this province and territories, without leave from the proprietors thereof, every such bargain of purchase shall be void, and of no effect." In 1721, she passed "An act to prohibit the selling of rum, and other strong liquors, to Indians, and to prevent the abuses that may happen thereby," reserving "that the Governor and council, or persons by them authorized and appointed to hold treaties with any nation of Indians, may, at such treaties, give any reasonable quantity of rum, as by them shall be thought necessary, any thing herein contained to the contrary notwithstanding."

And I find that, in the year 1744, colonial Pennsylvania assumed the jurisdiction for which Georgia has within the last six or seven years been so much derided by some, and passed "An act for the speedy trial of capital offences, committed by any Indian or Indians in the remote parts of the province." In this act it is provided "that all murders, manslaughters, homicides, felonies, and offences, whatsoever, and accessaries of the same, which by the laws or acts of Assembly of this province are declared capital, or felonies punishable by death, which already have been committed, perpetrated, or done, or shall hereafter be committed, perpetrated or done, by any Indian or Indians, within this province, in places remote from inhabitants, as aforesaid, all and every such offence and offences, in whatsoever place and county the same hath happened, or shall happen, shall henceforth be inquired of, heard, adjudged, and determined, before the justices of the supreme court, or the justices of the courts of oyer and terminer and general gaol delivery, to be held in the county of Philadelphia, by indictments, inquests, and verdicts, to be taken of good and lawful men, inhabitants of the same county, in like manner and form as if such capital offence or offences had been committed, perpetrated, or done, within the said county, any law or usage to the contrary thereof in anywise notwithstanding."

There is in this last act of the colonial Legislature of Pennsylvania one feature, which shows, that however well the general doctrines of criminal law might have been understood in that day, the injustice of passing ex post facto laws does not seem to have been duly considered. New Jersey entertained and exercised jurisdiction over Indian lands so early as 1703, as appeared by an act of her Legislature, passed on the 13th of December, of that year, entitled "An act for regulating the purchasing of land from the Indians," by the second section of which it is enacted, "that if any person or persons shall presume to buy, purchase, take gift, or mortgage, or lease, of any land, contrary to this present act, he or they so offending shall forfeit forty shillings, money of this province, for each acre of land so obtained," &c. &c. Maryland exercised jurisdiction over the Indians within her limits, by legislative action, at different times between the years 1704 and 1723, inclusive. North Carolina, 1715 and 1748; and New Hampshire also in 1715. The latter State, in the year 1715, passed "An act to prevent and make void clandestine and illegal purchases of lands from the Indians," by which it was enacted, "that all deeds of bargain, sale, lease, release, or quit-claim titles, and conveyances whatsoever, at any time or times since the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred, without the license or approbation of the General Assembly of this province; and all deeds of bargain and sale, titles, and conveyances whatsoever, of any lands within this province, which hereafter shall be had, made, obtained, gotten, or procured, from any Indian or Indians, by any person or persons whatsoever, without the license, approbation, or allowance, of the General Assembly of this province, for the same, shall be judged in the law to be null, void, and of none effect, to all intents and purposes, as though they had never been made." South Carolina exercised jurisdiction over the whole Indian country within her limits as early as the year 1739, by enacting that no purchase of lands from the Indians should be made but by the King of Great Britain or the colonial Government, on the pain of forfeiture. In 1786, that jurisdiction was enforced towards the Cherokees, by assigning them, temporarily, a tract of country for their occupancy; and in 1808, entire sovereignty was exercised by that State over the Catawba Indians.

Thus stood the jurisdiction of the colonies which have been mentioned, in reference to the Indians within their several limits, at the commencement of the American Revolution. This subject has not been passed in review before the committee in an unfriendly spirit, or for the purpose of recriminating any one of the States to the early legislation of which I have thought it necessary to advert, but to show, from the most unanswerable evidence, that the same jurisdiction, and in some instances more, than is exercised by Georgia, was exercised and enforced by the early legislation of a large number of the original colonies. I do not know, if the proper means had been within my reach, that I might not have discovered similar evidence in the history of all. It cannot matter in what manner entire sovereignty and jurisdiction may have been exercised by any one of the States in her colonial or present condition; the fact of its exercise is all that is wanting to justify Georgia in exercising her rightful jurisdiction by their example. It thus appears that the American Revolution found the colonies in unrestrained exercise of jurisdiction over the Indians within their respective limits. I will now proceed to show that such jurisdiction has not been limited or restrained in any manner, either by the articles of confederation or the present constitution, except in the single particular of regulating commerce with the Indian tribes; and that if the claim to exclusive legislation over them is set up under that grant of power, it may with equal propriety be set up as against the States of this Union; and if it can be supported against them, this is indeed a Government without limitation of powers.

It might be sufficient for my argument, to show that, although Indians have remained embodied in most of the original thirteen States ever since the declaration of independence, no authority has been claimed for the General Government, either under the articles of confederation or the present constitution, even for the exercise of the commercial power over them, much less the odious usurpation of exclusive legislation, as attempted to be set up against the State of Georgia. It has been already shown that many of the colonies exercised, under the authority of their charters, entire powers of legislation over the whole extent of their limits, long before the declaration of independence; that they derived these powers over the countries included in their charters from the British Crown; and it is fearlessly asserted that the jurisdiction of Georgia, under her charter, was as unlimited as the rest. To show this, it is only necessary to refer to the proclamation of the King of Great Britain in 1763, wherein the countries in possession of Great Britain, within her colonies, and occupied by Indians, were reserved under "her sovereignty, protection, and dominion." It is true, that the "sovereignty, protection, and dominion," claimed by the King of Britain, were said to be for the benefit of the Indians; but it is not the mode of its assertion and exercise that is at issue between Georgia and her enemies, but the sovereignty actually asserted and exercised by Great Britain throughout the whole extent of her American colonies, and which passed to each, respectively, fully, and completely, upon the establishment of their independence, and its acknowledgment by Great Britain, saving and excepting as it had been curtailed and abridged by the articles of confederation, and subsequently by the constitution.

But how have the original powers of the respective States been affected by the various acts which, for all external and many internal purposes, have made us one people? The first act of union was the declaration of independence,* and as its acknowledgment by Great Britain operates retroactively, it will be proper to inquire whether the declaration of independence modified in any manner the power or authority of the several colonies within their limits. It bound the colonies to a common and the holiest cause—the vindication of their liberties—against the odious oppression of the mother country. But, except this pledge to fight out the battle of liberty to the last, it is not perceived that the declaration of independence modified in the slightest degree the internal jurisdiction of the several States, nor do I believe that the contrary opinion can be sustained for a moment. Then, agreeably to what has already been shown, the power and jurisdiction of the several States, at the acknowledgment of their independence by Great Britain, was precisely what had been asserted and exercised by her authority within their limits, except so far as they had been limited and restrained by the articles of confederation. I will now endeavor to show how far the entire sovereignty, conquered for the several States from Great Britain, has been affected by the articles of confederation, or the constitution which has since been substituted for it. But as the subject under consideration relates exclusively to the jurisdiction rightfully belonging to the State and Federal Governments with respect to Indians, I shall confine my inquiries and illustrations to that subject, adverting to other portions of our organic law only so far as it may serve to throw light upon this.

In illustration of my subject, I shall remind this House, that, by the second article of confederation, "each State retains its sovereignty, freedom, and independence, and every power, jurisdiction, and right, which is not by this confederation expressly delegated to the United States in Congress assembled." In the distribution of powers conferred by that instrument upon the United States, it is further provided in the fourth paragraph of the ninth article, that "the United States in Congress assembled shall also have the sole and exclusive right and power of regulating the trade and managing all affairs with the Indians not members of any of the States: Provided, that the legislative right of any State within its own limits be not infringed or violated." Thus, in point of principle, was the power of the confederation over the Indian tribes, with respect to their government within the States, left precisely as the parties found it. Great Britain claimed, and, for every purpose of her interest or convenience, exercised entire sovereignty over Indians within the limits of her colonies; and most of the colonies, with or without reference to her sovereignty, exercised unlimited control over them; and the declaration of independence and its acknowledgment by Great Britain, placed the respective States in possession of all the power ever claimed and asked by her. That power was entire sovereignty and legislation over the Indians, which, within the States, was not impaired or diminished by the articles of confederation, but is expressly saved by the proviso to the power conferred on the Union in respect to the Indians. The best exposition of a law is to be found in the uniform and long-continued mode of its enforcement. Applying this rule, there is no difficulty in determining that the several States understood the articles of confederation in the sense which I have given to it, as they continued to exercise the same jurisdiction over Indians which they had exercised in their colonial state, and that was complete and entire sovereignty. In addition to the numerous examples of colonial legislation already brought to the notice of the House, it may be further established by reference to the legislation of Virginia in her constitution of 1776, an act of the Legislature of 1777 for establishing a general court; by the constitution of New York in 1777, her act for Indian affairs passed in 1783, and her more recent legislation on the subject in 1813 and 1822, as well as her judicial decisions; by the Legislature of Rhode Island in 1783; of North Carolina in 1778 and 1783; and of Georgia in 1789 and 1796, as well as more recently. It is obvious, from these illustrations, drawn from the colonial and State legislation prior to the establishment of the federal constitution, that the several colonies and States claimed and exercised entire jurisdiction over Indian affairs. Nor is it believed that any attempt has ever been made to interfere with either of the old thirteen States on this subject, so as to control her municipal regulations, but the State of Georgia.

Indian Treaties.

Desiring to despatch this subject, which can be but of little interest to this House, compared to what I feel in it as a Georgian, I will now pass to a very brief inquiry into the powers conferred by the States in the federal constitution, for the regulation of Indian affairs, and the manner in which those powers have been executed. It will be recollected, that whatever power or jurisdiction may have been claimed by the Government of the confederation on one side, or the respective States on the other, in regard to Indians, the subject is now entirely regulated by the constitution.

In examining the present constitution, it is found that it contains a single grant of power over Indians to the Federal Government, and a single restriction upon the States. The grant of power is to be found in the third clause of the eighth section of the first article of the constitution: "To regulate commerce with foreign nations, among the several States, and with the Indian tribes." It is of the last importance, in considering this clause of the constitution, to bear in mind that the commercial power, in its three several branches, is conferred in the same terms, so far as regards their import, and that the power is commercial only. It is also of the greatest importance to remember, that as it embraces all foreign nations with which we may desire or must carry on commercial intercourse, so it embraces all the States of this Union, and all the Indian tribes within the whole range of the United States. In the further investigation of the subject, it should be recollected that the same uniform course has been pursued in the establishment and maintenance of commercial intercourse with foreign nations; they have been treated as equal and independent communities, and trade and commerce with them regulated by treaty stipulations. A similar principle has been acted upon towards the States of this Union; they have been treated as a community of equals, and the commercial intercourse between them regulated by the principles of the constitution. Nothing else has been mixed up with it; because mistaken or vicious politicians did not find it necessary to derive from it a pretext for intermeddling with their internal jurisdiction over their own people. Nor has the enforcement, or attempted enforcement, of the commercial power over the Indian tribes, in its general operation upon the original States of this Union within which such tribes are or have been situated, been carried beyond the letter or spirit of the constitution. Indeed, in all of them, except the States of North Carolina and Georgia, there has never been any attempt to exercise even the naked power to regulate commerce with an Indian tribe within their limits, much less any attempt to derive from this commercial grant the power of exclusive legislation over them. From the examples shown of the mode of enforcing the commercial power, by the Federal Government, towards foreign nations and among the States, it is obvious that no attempt has ever been made to derive, by any implication whatsoever, any other power from that grant.

It is, therefore, inconceivable, how such an attempt should ever have been made to extract from the grant of the naked power "to regulate commerce with the Indian tribes," the power of exclusive legislation over the persons and territory of any one of these States, especially when the commercial power itself has never been attempted to be exercised; but by at least one act of Congress, and that the act by which the various acts of usurpation towards Georgia have been attempted to be justified, has been expressly reserved from exercise in all the old States containing Indian tribes, but North Carolina and Georgia: I mean the intercourse law of 1802. If the power to regulate commerce with the Indian tribes confers on Congress exclusive legislation over persons and things in the countries occupied by them, it confers equally exclusive powers within the respective States of this Union; as exclusive power over white men at Milledgeville, or over red men at New Echota or elsewhere, in the Cherokee nation. The power in each case is conferred in the same clause of the constitution, and in terms equally comprehensive and unlimited. How, then, can it be pretended that Congress possesses it, in every thing relating to Indians and the territory occupied by them within a State, without carrying along with it the claim to exclusive jurisdiction of the citizens of the several States? The claim is as monstrous and absurd in the one case as the other. I know it may be said, as it has been, that the older States have acquired jurisdiction over the Indians within their limits at an early period, by their voluntary consent; and therefore may have rightfully exercised it, forasmuch as such tribes were not contemplated at the formation of the articles of confederation, or afterwards, when the present constitution was framed. I deny this; for the grant of power in reference to Indians in both instruments is general and unrestricted as it respects the States; and if such voluntary surrender had been previously made by the Indians, by these grants of commercial powers the respective States delegated so much of the Indian jurisdiction to the Union. Either it was the duty of the Federal Government to have exercised the jurisdiction heretofore claimed towards Georgia over the Indians in every State of this Union, or a gross usurpation has been attempted towards Georgia in the efforts heretofore made to enforce such power upon her. It may be said that the exercise of the commercial power towards the States is restrained and limited by the guaranty of a republican government to each of the States of this Union, and by that amendment which declares "that the powers not granted by the constitution to the United States, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people." If this be so, and it is admitted, the same provisions of the constitution afford equal protection to the States against the exercise by the Federal Government of exclusive jurisdiction over Indians within their limits. But there are other provisions of the constitution which bear with peculiar force upon this subject. It is declared that "no new State shall be formed or erected within the jurisdiction of any other State." Yet, according to the honorable gentleman, Congress had the right to erect the Cherokee State within the jurisdiction of Georgia, without her consent, and against her most solemn declarations to the contrary. But I may, before I conclude, show another and not less glaring attempt to trample upon the rights of Georgia, by an ancestor of the honorable gentleman, when he filled a high place in this Government. To return to the subject immediately before me. As the power conferred upon Congress to regulate commerce among the States has been justly so interpreted as to include nothing else, and to leave them in the possession and exercise of all powers not granted to the Federal Government, nor prohibited by the constitution over their white citizens, it is equally clear that it includes nothing else in reference to Indians, and that they are as fair and constitutional objects of the legislation of the States for every thing else, as any other description of persons within their limits. I will now turn for a moment to the only direct restriction which the constitution imposes upon the States, with regard to Indians, having disposed of the indirect restriction growing out of the power conferred on Congress to regulate commerce with the Indian tribes. It is this; that in making up their representative numbers, the several States shall not include "Indians not taxed."

If the States only possessed such powers as had been conferred upon them by the constitution, it would be an irresistible inference, from the terms of this restriction, that the States may include, in their representative numbers, Indians who are taxed; and of consequence that they may tax them for that purpose. But the rule of interpreting the constitution is this, and it is emphatically established by the tenth amendment: "That the respective States retain every power which they have neither delegated to the Federal Government nor prohibited to themselves." They have not done the one or the other with regard to the government of the Indians; they have conferred the same commercial power, and no more, in the one case as the other; they have the right to tax white men, and they have an equal right to tax Indians; and the constitution places taxed white men and taxed Indians on the same footing of federal enumeration. Will the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, or any other gentleman, inform this House whether, at the formation of the federal constitution, there was one taxed Indian in the United States? I have not yet learned that there was one; and if not, it goes most strongly to support my argument on the subject. So far as I know or believe, the first serious attempt that was persevered in, which has ever been made to interfere with the territorial rights or jurisdiction of Georgia with respect to Indians within her limits, was made by the immediate successor of General Washington—for what cause I know not, unless it was that she gave her electoral vote, in 1796, to Thomas Jefferson; and attempts of a similar character were revived and attempted to be enforced upon her in 1825 by the then President of the United States. Georgia then stood in a similar attitude, having given her presidential vote in 1824, and her vote in this House in 1825, in favor of another individual, one of her own distinguished sons. I have shown, by reference to the legislative and other historical memorials of this country, that the several States in nowise impaired or restricted their jurisdiction over Indians by the adoption of the federal constitution, than they impaired and restricted their jurisdiction over any other description of persons within their several limits; and that a large number of them, so large as to establish the rule under the constitution, have continued to exercise unlimited and undisturbed authority over them, while attempts have been made, for what purpose I shall not here inquire, to make Georgia an exception to that rule.

Notwithstanding the attempts which have been made from time to time to interfere with the jurisdiction of Georgia over the Indians within her limits, she has not ceased to claim, until finally she has been permitted, without further molestation, to exercise her unquestionable right.

In 1796, it is well known that the United States, by commissioners, entered into what was called the treaty of Colerain, with the Creek Indians; but it may not be equally well known that the State of Georgia appropriated money to defray the expenses of that treaty, and for carrying its provisions into effect, (as will be seen by the act of her Legislature passed in the year 1796,) to an amount exceeding thirty-five thousand dollars.

It may not be generally known that the commissioners who negotiated that treaty entered into stipulations with the Indians which were derogatory to the territorial rights and jurisdiction of Georgia; that the Legislature of Georgia protested most solemnly against those stipulations, and that upon its ratification the Senate of the United States expressly excepted and reserved to Georgia her claim of territorial right and jurisdiction; yet such were the facts.

From the date of the treaty of Colerain, and the protest of Georgia, and the recognition of the principles of that protest by the Senate, no new occasion is believed to have occurred to produce collision between Georgia and this Government until the year 1825. But, as formerly hinted, very soon after the first President of the United States closed his second term of office, his successor turned his eye to the wild lands of Georgia; and although the southern boundary of the United States had been settled by the treaty of San Lorenzo el Real, according to the southern boundary of Georgia, as defined in the proclamation of George the third, in 1763, and reaffirmed in the preliminary articles of peace with Great Britain in 1782, and finally by the definitive treaty with that Power in 1783, within a short period after the conclusion of the treaty with Spain by which the question had been thus settled, the then President of the United States recommended, and Congress passed, acts creating a Territorial Government within the limits of Georgia. That President was a distinguished citizen of Massachusetts, and not unknown to the member who now arraigns the conduct of Georgia in terms of such unmeasured condemnation. Why did not the same President recommend the establishment of a Territorial Government upon the wild lands of Massachusetts, now within the State of Maine? The southern boundary of the Union was settled according to the chartered limits of Georgia, and the northern and northeastern boundary in conformity with the original charters of the colonies there situated, now members of the Union. What better right could exist for usurping and tyrannizing over Georgia than the rest, it cannot be possible for the human mind to conceive. This outrageous and unjust oppression of Georgia was finally settled and disposed of by her compact with the United States in 1802. I will here, sir, once for all, before going further with any other branch of my inquiry, show the ground upon which that compact placed the relations of the United States and Georgia. By it Georgia yielded no right previously asserted or exercised by her, but she acquired from the United States the obligation on their part, on certain conditions, to remove the Indians from within her limits. It is worthy of remark, that the subject of that compact was the transfer by Georgia of a large portion of her southern territory to the United States.

It should be further observed, that the intercourse law, as it has been generally termed, which in its provisions exempted the Indians, in all the States which had claimed or exercised jurisdiction over them, from its operation, except in North Carolina and Georgia, was passed on the 30th of March, 1802, and that the compact with Georgia was entered into on the 24th of April, 1802—twenty-five days afterwards. Why the intercourse law should, by its provisions, have exempted the Indians, in a large number of States, from its operation, without giving to the two States mentioned the same exemption, it is not necessary to inquire, nor can it be explained upon any just principle. This is the act by which most or all the attempts to deprive the State of Georgia of her rightful jurisdiction over all the soil and all the people within her limits have been justified.

The compact between the United States and Georgia was entered into after the passage of the act regulating trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, as I have already shown; and if it contains any thing incompatible with that compact, leaving any constitutional question out of view, it must so far repeal that act.

Indian Treaties.

By the compact, as has been already stated, Georgia ceded to the United States "all the right, title, and claim, which the said State has to the jurisdiction and soil of the land situated," &c., (describing the land thus ceded to the United States.) "The United States accept the cession above mentioned, and on the conditions therein expressed; and they cede to the State of Georgia whatever claim, right, or title, they may have to the jurisdiction or soil of any lands," &c., (describing the lands which Georgia reserved to herself.) Can plain, practical common sense discern the slightest difference between the respective stipulations of the parties? It would be impossible. How, then, does it happen, when the United States, from the day this compact was ratified by the Legislature of Georgia in June, 1802, have been in undisturbed possession and enjoyment of "soil and jurisdiction," as ceded by Georgia, and have actually erected two States thereon, and Georgia shall not have and exercise the "soil and jurisdiction" ceded to her, particularly as the terms of the cession from the United States are so broad, and the designation of the country so general in its terms, as to embrace the whole territory of Georgia? From the period just mentioned, I do not now remember that Georgia had any difficulty with the Indians, or their white champions, until the year 1825, except their hostility during the late war with Great Britain.

Cessions of land were obtained from time to time by the United States, from the Creek and Cherokee Indians, in compliance with the obligations of the United States to Georgia; and however irregular her Government might have thought it to form treaties with Indian tribes, as they were made in fulfilment of obligations to herself, she did not throw any obstruction in their way, on account of the mode in which the General Government might fulfil its stipulation with her. Taking the subject as much as I can in chronological order, it may be most proper for me here to repel a portion of the charge made by the member from Massachusetts. That member would have it believed that the course of Georgia towards the Indians within her limits has been uniformly cruel and unjust.

Sir, the Indians themselves, and the archives of this Government, prove the contrary. So early as the year 1790, the Creek Indians, by the treaty of New York, stipulated to return to the State of Georgia its citizens who had been carried prisoners into their nation, and the property which they had taken from the people of Georgia. In 1796, by the treaty of Colerain, they again bound themselves to restore prisoners and property which they had carried away from Georgia. By the treaty of Fort Wilkinson, in 1802, they appropriated five thousand dollars for the indemnification of citizens of Georgia, upon whom their people had committed depredations subsequent to the treaty of Colerain, in 1796. More than this. So far from war with them having been provoked by the people of Georgia between 1790 and 1796, the history of the times shows that Georgia was not in a condition to have provoked it. That President Washington ordered the Governor of South Carolina to aid in the defence of Georgia, if it should be necessary, as it was certainly believed to be, or no such orders would have been given. In truth, and in fact, it was but part of that general Indian war which involved so much, if not all, our Western frontier, and which was brought to a conclusion mainly by Wayne's victory at the falls of the Miami, in August, 1794. It is unnecessary to dwell on the treaties made with the Creeks and Cherokees, between 1802 and 1821. It is important to give a passing notice to this latter treaty, inasmuch as it recognised the justice of the claims of the people of Georgia, for indemnification of the losses sustained by the incursions of the Creek Indians, previous to the 30th of March, 1802, and provided the sum of $250,000 for their payment, without interest. But that sum was considerably less than the aggregate of losses actually sustained by the people of Georgia, at the hands of the Creek Indians. I have no doubt, that if all the just claims could be paid, with interest, from the time the depredations were committed, the aggregate would not fall short of a million of dollars. If I have shown a voluntary acknowledgment by the Creek Indians, so late as 1821, of a debt due the citizens of Georgia for spoliation committed upon them by those Indians prior to 1802, I think the charge of the member from Massachusetts is fully answered, and overthrown, down to that period. I will now examine a portion of the history of this subject, in which the honorable member may feel a deeper interest than in any portion of the long and uninteresting detail which I have felt it my duty to offer to the House for the full and perfect illustration of the subject. I speak of the treaty concluded by commissioners of the United States with the Creek Indians, at the Indian Spring, in February, 1825, and ratified early in the month of March thereafter. This treaty had the singular fortune to be communicated to the Senate by Mr. Monroe, and officially promulgated after its ratification by his successor. I presume it is in reference to this treaty that the honorable gentleman says of Georgia, "She bade defiance to the authority of the Government of the nation; she nullified your laws; she set at naught your executive and judicial guardians of the common constitution of the land." Sir, I have shown that, in all she has done in reference to Indians, Georgia has kept herself within the pale of the "common constitution of the land," as the same has been understood or acted upon by a large majority, indeed nearly all her sister States, with whom she concurred in its establishment; and the facts and arguments which I have presented entirely overthrow the unsustainable assertion, even of an ex-President of the United States. But to return to the treaty. By the second article of that treaty, among other things, there is this stipulation: "The United States agree to pay to the nation emigrating from the lands herein ceded, the sum of four hundred thousand dollars, of which amount there shall be paid to the said party of the second part, (the Indians,) as soon as practicable after the ratification of this treaty, the sum of two hundred thousand dollars." And it was further stipulated, in the fifth article, "at the particular request of the said parties of the second part, that the payment and disbursement of the first sum herein provided for shall be made by the present commissioners negotiating this treaty." The necessary appropriation was made, at the same session of Congress at which the treaty was ratified, to carry it into effect. In compliance with the provision of the treaty requiring the sum of two hundred thousand dollars, to be paid "as soon as practicable after the ratification of this treaty," and to be paid by the "commissioners negotiating it," that sum was placed in the hands of Duncan G. Campbell and James Merriwether, the commissioners, to be paid over according to the provisions of the treaty. As the cession of land obtained by the treaty was for the use, benefit, and occupancy, of the people of Georgia, the Governor of that State issued his proclamation on the 22d of the same month, (of March,) "warning all persons, citizens of Georgia, or others, against trespassing or intruding upon the lands occupied by the Indians within the limits of this State," although the treaty surrendered all the lands claimed by the Creeks within the limits of Georgia. On the 18th of April, 1825, Governor Troup issued his proclamation convening the Legislature, to take into consideration the disposal of the lands acquired by the then late treaty with the Creek Indians. The Legislature convened on the 23d of May thereafter, and within a few days passed an act disposing of the acquired territory by lottery, the mode of distribution which had been pursued for more than twenty years.

This act did not authorize the immediate occupancy of the lands, but provided for its survey at an early period. Was there a subsisting treaty with the Creek Indians to all the lands then occupied by them within the limits of Georgia? There was, as I have already shown, and money appropriated and placed in the hands of the commissioners for making payment of the first instalment stipulated by it. Who, then, nullified the treaty? Georgia, by her act to survey the land, and draw a lottery for it, when the consummation of that treaty made the land the rightful property of her citizens? Certainly not. Who, then, was the nullifier? The then President of the United States; for it was he who arrested this treaty, this supreme law of the land, on his mere motion, his own will and pleasure, and not the Government or people of Georgia. The constitution makes all treaties a portion of the supreme law of the land, with which the President of the United States has nothing to do but to execute them. But, as I have said, the President of the United States did arrest the operation of the treaty of 1825, by arbitrarily withdrawing from the commissioners the money which had been appropriated by Congress, and placed in their hands to be paid over "as soon as practicable," under the provisions of the treaty. It matters not what was the pretext for so doing; the act was done, and done for the purpose of arresting the operation of a supreme law of the land. I again say, that in the contest which occurred between the Government of Georgia and the Executive of the United States, in 1825, and what grew out of it, John Quincy Adams, the then President of the United States, was the nullifier, and that the authorities of Georgia were only struggling to sustain a "supreme law of the land." I know that this course has its attempted justification of fraud or irregularity in the making of the treaty referred to, but I also know that a President of the United States must execute the law as he finds it, allowing to him a just exercise of his judgment whether it violates the federal constitution. I very well remember the principal incidents of a public nature which occurred at the time referred to, and within the following years of the presidential term of the then Chief Magistrate. The plea of fraud was set up to cover his nullification, under which he attempts to justify his charges against Georgia. I will inquire into some of the incidents connected with the honest treaty concluded by him with a Creek delegation at this place early in the year 1826, and ratified on the 24th of April of that year. But, before proceeding, permit me to remark that the land acquired by the treaty of 1825 passed immediately to Georgia, and that she had a perfect right to adopt her own legislation over her own property, subject only to the temporary occupancy secured by the treaty to the Indians. The treaty of 1826 was ratified on the 24th of April; and the day after, the members of the honest delegation called on the Secretary of War to make arrangements to distribute the amount stipulated by the treaty to be paid to the chiefs, head men, and warriors, of the Creek nation, namely, the sum of $217,000. They presented a catalogue, whereby it was proposed to divide of that sum, among twenty-one Creeks and three Cherokees, one hundred and fifty-nine thousand seven hundred dollars. The Secretary advised them not to make such distribution, but adopted no measure to prevent it.

In the progress through Congress of the bill for carrying the treaty into effect, the fact was communicated to a Senator that twenty-one Creeks and three Cherokees were known to intend to divide among themselves the sum I have just mentioned. In consequence of such information, the Senate amended the bill so as to require the payment of the $217,000 in full council in the nation, upon the certain calculation that the fraud, here made known, would be there prevented.

But, strange as it may appear, I have been informed, and upon evidence entitled to undoubted credit, that this honest delegation, with which the then President negotiated his treaty of 1826, adding two others to their list, did actually divide, between twenty-three Creeks and three Cherokees, the latter receiving an aggregate of $40,000, one hundred and sixty-seven thousand eight hundred dollars of two hundred and seventeen thousand to be distributed between the chiefs, head men, and warriors, of the Creek nation. Is it not wonderful that the sensibility which arrested a supreme law of the land in 1825, on suspicion of fraud, should have permitted a transaction, subject to his own official supervision, to be stamped by such indelible evidence of the same in 1826? If further proof be necessary to establish the readiness of Georgia to abide by the decision of Congress and her co-States, it will be found in the memorial and remonstrance adopted by her Legislature in December, 1826, upon this subject.

This remonstrance was intended to set forth the causes which had disturbed the harmony previously existing between the State of Georgia and the Executive of the Union, from the time the President of the United States, of his own will and accord, nullified the treaty concluded at the Indian Spring, in February, 1825. It was nothing more nor less than an appeal to Congress and the other States against the arbitrary conduct of the Chief Magistrate of the Union. In proof of the spirit from which it sprang, it is only necessary to make a few references to its preamble, in which it will be found that the whole subject in controversy was submitted to Congress and the other States of the confederacy. The memorial distinctly states that, "in the good feeling and sincerity of the States we have the most undoubted confidence; in the integrity of purpose, honesty of motive, and fidelity of service, of the National Legislature, we cannot feel one distrustful emotion. Before that body we believe we can be respectfully heard, and to that body we as firmly believe the crisis has arrived when it becomes necessary to prefer a solemn appeal." Again, after enumerating the causes of complaint against the Executive alone, the memorial uses this forcible language: "It is a matter of anxious and fearful contemplation, what must be the result of this collision, if we fail to enlist the well-known justice and prudence of that part of the General Government to which we have now been compelled reluctantly to appeal." "We cannot but trust that the authority (Congress and the States) to which we have now referred these unhappy differences will duly appreciate the motive as well as the object of this appeal. Our reliance is on the wisdom and justice of the nation." "We want nothing that does not fairly belong to the State sovereignties. To whatever our sister States will submit, in that we must acquiesce. If they would be contented with the treatment Georgia has received, and will come out with a public declaration of the fact, from that moment our complaints are hushed. We threaten no consequences: it would be idle and vain to do so." The memorial concludes with the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That a separate copy of this report, with the documents necessary to support the facts therein detailed, be forwarded by his excellency the Governor to our Senators and Representatives in Congress, to be by them respectfully presented to each branch of Congress, with a request that they use their best exertions to have redressed the grievances of this State, in the various particulars to which this report has reference, and, for the future harmony of the States, to request of that body to make an explicit declaration of the rights that belong to the National Government, and those which belong to the State of Georgia, (and consequently to the other States,) resulting from the immediate difference of opinion specially enumerated in the foregoing report.

"Resolved, That his excellency the Governor be requested to forward also a copy of this report and documents to the Governor of each State in the Union, with an earnest and respectful request that he lay the same before the Legislature of his State; and they are hereby most affectionately and respectfully solicited to express to this State whether they are prepared to admit the foregoing principles, and the powers growing out of them, as belonging to the General Government, and whether Georgia is bound, and must submit to the treatment which she conceives she has most wrongfully sustained at the hands of the executive department of the General Government."

From the references which I have made to the memorial of Georgia in 1826, it is manifest that it breathes any thing but defiance and contumacy towards the Government of the Union, unless a nullifying Chief Magistrate alone constituted that Government. In what stronger terms of confidence and affection could the Legislature of Georgia have appealed to the wisdom and justice of Congress, than by "requesting that body to make an explicit declaration of the rights that belong to the National Government, and those which belong to Georgia, (and consequently the other States?) Or how could she have more strongly expressed her readiness to abide by the decision asked, both from Congress and the States, than by pledging herself that "to whatever her sister States would submit, in that she would acquiesce? and if they would declare that they would be contented with the treatment Georgia had received, from that moment her complaints would be hushed, distinctly stating that she threatened no consequences, for it would be vain and idle to do so. Upon the examination which I have made of the allegations of the honorable gentleman, so far as his charges have reference to the collision between Georgia and himself, as Chief Magistrate of the Union, I know of no other illustration of his accusations so appropriate, within the whole range of fact or fable, as the quarrel fastened by the wolf upon the sheep for polluting the stream, by drinking from it below him. Georgia voted against him in her electoral college in 1824, and in this House in 1825, and held up his arbitrary conduct towards her in the years 1825, 1826, and 1827, to the just indignation of the American people; and it seems that he has not yet forgiven her for the one or the other, or he might have spared himself and this House the gratuitous denunciations he has levelled against her. Believing that I have sufficiently shown that the President of the United States, and not the Government or people of Georgia, nullified the treaty made at the Indian Spring in 1825, I will next proceed to show how stands the accusation of the honorable gentleman respecting the conflict between the State of Georgia and the Supreme Court of the United States. And, first, with respect to the Indians.

At the January term (1831) of the Supreme Court of the United States, the Cherokee nation, by their counsel, moved that court for an injunction against the State of Georgia, to restrain and enjoin her from the enforcement of certain acts of her Legislature, upon various grounds, the most material of which for the present inquiry, it is believed, are embraced within certain portions of the statement of the case as reported in 6 Peters, to which the attention of the House is invited. Among other things, the bill proceeds to state "that, in violation of these treaties, of the constitution of the United States, and of the act of Congress of 1802, the State of Georgia, at a session of her Legislature, held in December, 1828, passed an act, which received the assent of the Governor of that State on the 20th day of that month and year, entitled "An act to add the territory lying within this State, and occupied by the Cherokee Indians, to the counties of Carroll, De Kalb, Gwinnett, Hall, and Habersham, and to extend the laws of this State over the same, and for other purposes." That afterwards, to wit, in the year 1829, the Legislature of the said State of Georgia passed another act, which received the assent of the Governor on the 19th of December, of that year, entitled "An act to add the territory lying within the chartered limits of Georgia, now in the occupancy of the Cherokee Indians, to the counties of Carroll, De Kalb, Gwinnett, Hall, and Habersham, and to extend the laws of this State over the same, and to annul all laws and ordinances made by the Cherokee nation of Indians, and to provide for the compensation of officers serving legal processes in said territory, and to regulate the testimony of Indians, and to repeal the 9th section of the act of 1828 on this subject." The bill also refers to the act of Congress of 1830, and to the acts of the Legislature of Georgia, passed in 1830, "to authorize the survey and disposition of lands within the limits of Georgia, in the occupancy of the Cherokee Indians," &c.; "An act to declare void all contracts hereafter made with the Cherokee Indians," &c.; "An act to provide for the temporary disposal of the improvements and possessions purchased from certain Cherokee Indians and residents;" and sundry other acts passed by the Legislature of Georgia relative to the country occupied by the Cherokee Indians. In short, it passed in review before the court all the acts of jurisdiction which had been exercised by Georgia over them up to that period.

In delivering the opinion of the court, Chief Justice Marshall observes: "The court has bestowed its best attention on this question, and, after mature deliberation, the majority is of opinion that an Indian tribe or nation within the United States, is not a foreign State, in the sense of the constitution, and cannot maintain an action in the courts of the United States." * * * "A serious additional objection exists to the jurisdiction of the court. Is the matter of the bill the proper subject for inquiry and decision? It seeks to restrain a State from the forcible exercise of legislative power over a neighboring people asserting their independence; their right to which the State denies. On the several matters alleged in the bill, (for example, on the laws making it criminal to exercise the usual powers of self-government in their own country by the Cherokee nation,) this court cannot interpose, at least in the form in which these matters are presented." In reference to the jurisdiction of Georgia over the possession of lands by the Cherokees, Chief Justice Marshall says: "The mere question of right might, perhaps, be decided by this court in a proper case with proper parties; but the court is asked to do more than to decide on the title. The bill requires us to control the legislation of Georgia, and to restrain the exercise of its physical force. The propriety of such an interposition by the court may be well questioned. It savors too much of the exercise of political power to be within the proper province of the judicial department." In the closing paragraph of the opinion of the court it is observed: "If it be true that the Cherokee nation have rights, this is not the tribunal in which these rights are to be asserted. If it be true that wrongs have been inflicted, and that still greater are to be apprehended, this is not the tribunal which can redress the past or prevent the future."

"The motion for an injunction is denied."

In addition to the portions of the decision just quoted, in which the court most emphatically disclaims jurisdiction over any and all the matters brought before it by the bill, it should be remembered that it decided, also, that Indian tribes are not foreign nations, within the meaning of the constitution; and, as a consequence, I assert, without the fear of successful denial, that no treaties, in the constitutional sense of that term, could ever have been made by them. Further, the court declares: "The Indian territory is admitted to compose a part of the United States." Here let me ask by what means the United States ever acquired territory as an independent community or Government? Originally there was no territory of the United States, in this sense of the term; nor is there now any such territory, but what has been acquired by the voluntary relinquishment of the States, or purchase from foreign nations. Therefore, the claim on the part of the United States, to exclusive authority over them and the territory of the United States occupied by them, gives to the United States no such jurisdiction over Indians residing on the territory of any State of this Union. Consequently, on these and other grounds, the Government of the United States can set up no such jurisdiction within the limits of Georgia. Further, the court distinctly intimates that the proper tribunal for the redress of wrongs which have been either already inflicted or apprehended for the future, is either the legislative or executive department of the Government, neither of which arraigns the conduct of Georgia, or attempts to control it any way whatever.

Indian Treaties.

Thus it is seen that the Supreme Court, upon solemn argument on all complaints on the part of the Cherokee Indians against the State of Georgia, disclaim all jurisdiction over the subject. But notwithstanding this disclaimer, it may and perhaps will be asserted, that although the court did, in that case, distinctly admit its want of jurisdiction, Georgia had defied its authority in the cases of Tassels in 1830, and Graves in 1834, both Cherokee cases. What were the facts of these cases? They were tried in the superior courts of Georgia, in the same manner in which her own citizens are tried before the same tribunals, upon the charge of murder, and that the murder of men of their own race. Each was convicted and sentenced to death, in conformity to the criminal laws of Georgia. What then? A citation was issued in each case, bearing the sign-manual of a judge of the Supreme Court, requiring the proceedings to be sent up to that court for reversal and correction. The convicted murderers were sentenced to be executed, in each case, at a period anterior to the next succeeding term of the Supreme Court; but, in both instances, at days so distant as to give them the benefit of an application to the clemency of the Legislature of Georgia. That clemency was not exercised, and they were executed in conformity to their respective sentences. For this Georgia has been charged with contumacy towards the Supreme Court of the United States, because her authorities did not suspend the execution of murderers, in obedience to the citation of a judge of the Supreme Court. What, then, is a citation, according to the definition of Chief Justice Marshall himself? We shall see by referring to the opinion delivered by him in the case of Cohens vs. Virginia.

In that opinion it became necessary for the court to inquire into the nature and operation of a citation, of which so much has been heard since the State of Georgia disregarded it in the cases of Tassels and Graves. Chief Justice Marshall asks, "And what is a citation? It is simply notice to the opposite party that the record is transferred to another court, where he may appear or decline to appear, as his judgment or inclination may determine. As the party who has obtained the judgment is out of court, and may, therefore, not know that his cause is removed, common justice requires that notice of the fact should be given to him. But this notice is not a suit, nor has it the effect of process. If the party does not choose to appear, he cannot be brought into court; nor is his failure to appear considered as a default." I have thus brought before the committee the Cherokee chancery case of 1831, and the citations in the cases of Tassels and Graves.

In the first, the Supreme Court of the United States disclaimed jurisdiction over any of the numerous allegations of the bill, allegations embracing every ground of contest between the Cherokees and Georgia. In the latter, according to Chief Justice Marshall himself, the citation is a mere notice, which an individual party may regard or disregard, at his own good pleasure. If, therefore, an individual is not bound to take notice of a "citation," and demean himself accordingly, what possible obligation could exist on the part of Georgia to obey it? It is nonsense to say she was under any such obligation. I have thus travelled over the charge of defiance of the Supreme Court by Georgia, so far as the Indians are concerned, and shown that, in the case in which judgment has been pronounced, it is not adverse to Georgia; and with regard to the "citations," they impose upon her no obligation either of respect or obedience whatever.

And now I am prepared to assert that the State of Georgia is free from all the allegations preferred against her by the honorable gentleman, as it regards the Indians. I have shown that, with respect to the Creek treaty of 1825, the President of the United States was the nullifier, and not the Government or people of Georgia; and, in reference to the Cherokees, that if treaties existed previous to 1802, which bound the United States to protect, and Georgia to forbear the exercise of authority over them, these treaties were abrogated by the Government of the United States, by the compact entered into with Georgia on the 24th of April, 1802, surrendering to her all claim to soil and jurisdiction within the limits reserved to that State; and that the law passed on the 30th of March preceding, regulating intercourse with the Indians, was alike abrogated by that compact. Of the treaties, so called, which have been entered into with the Cherokees since 1802, they could not rightfully embrace any thing at war with the compact of 1802, and in that sense only have they been acquiesced in by Georgia.

If the United States have wronged the Cherokees by their obligation to Georgia under the compact of 1802, it is their duty to do them justice; and in all proper measures to be taken here, for that purpose, the Senators and Representatives of Georgia will be behind no others in awarding to them whatever justice and equity demand, in a manner the most ample and complete. I might have shown that, according to the principles laid down by the Chief Justice in the Cherokee chancery case, an Indian tribe could not make a treaty; but I do not now consider that discussion necessary.

Having disposed, at least for the present, of the allegations of the honorable gentleman against Georgia, as regards her Indian relations, I will now proceed to consider the remaining charge of misconduct towards the missionaries. And here I might contrast the conduct of the original ministers of the gospel with that of the individuals on whose account such grave charges have been preferred against the State of Georgia; but as I have been constrained to occupy so much of the time of the House, and as I doubt not but little to their edification, I will proceed as rapidly as I can to the conclusion of my subject.

As will appear by reference to the decision of the Cherokee chancery case, already referred to, it will be remembered that the Legislature of Georgia commenced its legislation over the territory occupied by the Cherokees in 1828, and repeated it in 1829 and in 1830, all which acts were brought in review before the court, so far as they related to Indians and Indian lands, in the course of that decision; and the prayer of the bill, that the court would enjoin and restrain the jurisdiction of Georgia, was rejected, on the whole ground taken by the complainants. Why, within one year thereafter, the same court should have taken upon itself to increase the political power it so distinctly disclaimed in the Cherokee case in 1831, might be an interesting topic of inquiry, if time would permit. Nor does it seem difficult to refer the motive to the same cause which enlisted every available influence, pecuniary and otherwise, in the then pending presidential election. But I will forbear its discussion.

The last act of the Legislature to which I have referred, the act of the 22d December, 1830, contained the following provisions: "that all white persons residing within the limits of the Cherokee nation, on the 1st day of March next, or at any time thereafter, without a license or permit from his excellency the Governor, or from such agent as his excellency shall authorize to grant such permit or license, and who shall not have taken the oath hereinafter required, shall be guilty of a high misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof, shall be punished by confinement to the penitentiary, at hard labor, for a term not less than four years: Provided, That the provisions of this section shall not be construed to extend to any authorized agent or agents of the Government of the United States or of this State, or to any person or persons who may rent any of those improvements which have been abandoned by Indians who have emigrated west of the Mississippi: Provided, Nothing contained in this section shall be so construed as to extend to white females, and to male children under twenty-one years of age." The oath prescribed is in these words: "I, A B, do solemnly swear (or affirm, as the case may be) that I will support and defend the constitution of the State of Georgia, and uprightly demean myself as a citizen thereof: so help me God." At September term of Gwinnett superior court, (1831,) Samuel A. Worcester, E. Butler, and others, were indicted for living in the country occupied by the Cherokees, in contravention of the laws of Georgia referred to, found guilty, and sentenced to the penitentiary of Georgia, there to remain at hard labor for the term of four years. And in the October following the judgment against Worcester was taken up, by citation, to the Supreme Court of the United States.

I may be once more permitted to express my astonishment that the same tribunal, which in the spring of 1831 should have confessed itself powerless to interfere with or in any manner to restrain the jurisdiction of Georgia over Indians in the country occupied by the Cherokees, should so soon, at its next annual term, find itself fully competent to restrain that jurisdiction over its own white citizens residing within the same territory, so as entirely to oust the State of all right and power whatsoever over them. The country was the same, and the enactments are contained in one of the very laws of Georgia brought in review before the court in 1831. The laws and treaties, so called, upon which the court relied in both cases, were the same, with this remarkable difference in favor of the former, that neither the commercial power claimed by the United States, nor any of the treaties, contain any principle applicable to any other description of persons but Indians, except that description of white persons expressly exempted by the act of 1830 itself from its operation—persons exercising an agency, or otherwise permitted by the United States to reside among the Indians.

The honorable gentleman has asserted that the missionaries were residing among the Cherokees by the permission of the Government. This I most peremptorily deny, upon the well-settled legal principle that what does not appear does not exist.

The law of Georgia under which they were prosecuted excepted from its operation all such white men as were residing among the Cherokees by permission of the Government of the United States. Upon their trial they were entitled to the benefit of testimony going to establish the fact of such permission, and they did not produce it; therefore I deny the existence of such permission. Whatever the honorable gentleman may think of their Christian meekness and piety, it would not have carried them so far as to court conviction and four year hard labor in the penitentiary, if the production of a certificate would have prevented it; and the production of such certificate would have secured that acquittal instantly. Further: if they would have taken the oath to demean themselves in an orderly manner as citizens of Georgia, the prosecution would have been instantly ended. The authorities of Georgia, so far from desiring to prosecute and punish them, were exceedingly anxious to avoid it; and even after their conviction and arrival at the penitentiary, if they would have acknowledged the jurisdiction of Georgia, or consented to leave the country where they resided, they would have been discharged. Nor were they left to make the offer themselves; the most earnest endeavors were made to induce them to accept the one or the other of these alternatives; but they were then refused, when some months thereafter they were liberated upon one or the other of the conditions which I have mentioned.

The honorable gentleman has stated that these missionaries were oppressed by the Government of Georgia for preaching the gospel to the Indians. This allegation has not the shadow of a foundation to rest upon. There is no reference whatever to the object or pursuit of white men living among the Cherokees. All that was required of them was an oath to demean themselves as orderly citizens of Georgia. There were other citizens of Georgia residing in the country, upon whom the laws of the State were operating. It might be curious to inquire why the Supreme Court did not arrogate exclusive jurisdiction over them also. These were citizens who, by virtue of the opinion of the Attorney General of the United States, had rented from the State of Georgia the improvements which had been abandoned by Cherokees, who had been paid for them under the treaty concluded with them by the honorable gentleman in 1828, and had emigrated west of the Mississippi. If these citizens were subject to the laws of Georgia, and even the subtlety, of the Supreme Court could not so twist them as to make its Indian law applicable to them, it may well be asked, why it possessed exclusive jurisdiction over one citizen of Georgia, and a restricted federal jurisdiction over another? The court did indeed resort to what doubtless seemed to it to be an unanswerable argument to sustain its jurisdiction—that Worcester was a citizen of Vermont; and this in the face of the fact, that, by the eleventh amendment to the constitution, it is expressly ousted of jurisdiction in suits at the instance of one State against another State. What constitutes a citizen of a particular State? Being a citizen of the United States, and having a permanent residence in such State. I know no other way in which a citizen of a State can be more properly defined. Worcester was a citizen of the United States, and had a permanent residence in Georgia, and was therefore the citizen of Georgia. Will the court or its advocates, here or elsewhere, say that he was not a citizen of the United States, and a permanent resident within the limits of Georgia?—the limits defined both by her own constitution of 1793, and the compact entered into with her by the United States on the 24th day of April, 1802. I desire an answer without any equivocation or mental reservation whatever, and pronounce the assertion of his citizenship in Georgia as wholly undeniable. He had no residence in Vermont, and could not be her citizen; he had a fixed, permanent residence in Georgia, and was, therefore, undeniably hers; and yet the Supreme Court, to enable it to carry out its usurpation towards Georgia, assume that a man living more than a thousand miles from Vermont, permanently settled in Georgia, was the citizen of the former and not of the latter State. The immediate motive of this assumption is obvious. As the question before the court touched the jurisdiction of Georgia over a portion of country within her own limits, the admission that the individual concerned was her citizen would have deprived it of the pretext of deciding against her. Finally, as relates to the case of the missionaries, let it be remembered that the Legislature of Georgia passed the act under which they were convicted in December, 1830; that but a few months thereafter the Supreme Court admitted her jurisdiction over the country in question, and its Indian inhabitants, by disclaiming any power on its part to repress or restrain it; that in 1832 the same court assumed the power of protecting a citizen of Georgia from the operation of her laws within the same territory in which it had, but one year before, distinctly disclaimed any authority to interfere with that jurisdiction; and I will fearlessly submit it to every impartial judgment, to decide which has been the nullifier, the Supreme Court of the United States or Georgia. Georgia had passed an act of ordinary legislation, and was engaged in its peaceful enforcement, when a decree of the Supreme Court, pronounced more than one year afterwards, upon an unwarrantable statement of facts, and upon a jurisdiction which it had disclaimed after the passage of the law of Georgia referred to, was the nullifier, and not Georgia. It was with the most unfeigned reluctance that I found it to be my duty again to enter into the stale and unprofitable discussion of the conduct of the Government and people of Georgia towards the Indians. That duty I have performed to the best of my judgment and ability, and, as I trust, in no improper or unfriendly spirit towards the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, or any other individual whatsoever. With that topic I have done, and, so far as my own will is concerned, take leave of it forever. Before I resume my seat, I hope I may be permitted to make a few observations upon the most extraordinary speech made by an honorable member from Vermont, [Mr. EVERETT,] upon a kindred subject. I mean the extravagant sympathy expressed by him for an Indian tribe, the Seminoles, now at war with his own countrymen. Can it be possible that, in his ardent sympathy for a miserable tribe of savages, who have conducted the operations of the present war, wantonly provoked by themselves, with all the cruelty peculiar to their race, the member from Vermont could so far have forgotten the manly form and honorable bearing of Wiley Thompson, so long associated with him as a representative from Georgia in the service of this House, as not to have remembered that he had fallen a victim to the scalping-knife? or have failed to remember the ruthless massacre of the ill-fated Dade and companions? I am sure, if a stranger, who had never heard of the lamented fate of those gallant men, had listened to the speech of that gentleman, he would have ascribed the most humane and gentle bearing to the Indians, and unmeasured and unmitigated cruelty to their adversaries. Certain I am, he could not have supposed that a Seminole had handled a rifle or scalping-knife against the white man for the last hundred years. The honorable gentleman may luxuriate as he will in his Indian sympathies, but, for my part, if I believed that the spirits of the departed were ever permitted to revisit this nether world, I should fear, if I entertained sentiments like his, that they would visit upon me more appalling horror than the genius of Shakspeare has thrown around the apparition of Barquo, at the feast of his murderer. Nor do I consider the remarks of that gentleman, relative to our present war with the Seminoles, alone reprehensible. It is well known that much dissatisfaction exists, on the part of a most influential individual of the Cherokee tribe, towards the treaty, for the fulfilment of which we are now asked to provide. While I do not charge upon the honorable member from Vermont any desire to encourage the hostilities of the Indians, I feel very sure that the whole tenor of his remarks, at the time referred to, would not fail to be understood by an Indian as intended to palliate if not to defend them. Nor do I consider the taunting manner in which the venerable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] has spoken of the various acts passed during the present session, appropriating money for the suppression of Indian hostilities, less unfortunate than those of the honorable gentleman from Vermont. Whatever is said in excuse or justification of the Indians, in their barbarous conduct to our fellow-citizens, certainly cannot be calculated to restrain their hostilities; and there were, on the occasion referred to, individuals of that race in this city, and it may have been within hearing of their voices, entertaining no feelings of kindness to the Government or people, and capable, if so inclined, of spreading horror and destruction throughout the borders of more than one of the Southern States. In defence of the plan of Indian emigration, by which the enlightened humanity and wise forecast of the present administration of this Government has been so eminently distinguished, it may not be improper to make a very few brief observations.

Indian Treaties.

When that administration came into power, seven years ago, it found a partial system of Indian colonization west of the Mississippi in operation; partial, not in withholding its benefits from any tribe which might desire to enjoy them, but only inasmuch as it embraced but a portion of the tribes then residing east of the Mississippi. The principal of these were a portion of the Creeks and Cherokees, to which have been since added the Choctaws and Chickasaws, with numerous smaller bands, together with a treaty in 1832 contemplating the removal of the remaining and greater portion of the Creeks; and, lately, the treaty with the Cherokees, to provide for the fulfilment of which the present appropriation is asked at our hands. Within the last six or seven years, the policy of removing and colonizing the Indians in the States east of the Mississippi, to the westward of that river, in a region remote from the habitation of the white man, has been among the topics of universal and bitter discussion from one end of the Union to the other. Nor on any other subject has the course of General Jackson's administration been more violently or unjustly assailed. And here I take leave to say, that so far from Indian hostilities having been provoked, either by the negligence or injustice of that administration, they may, with much greater justice, be ascribed to the political philanthropy, so loudly and pharisaically displayed by its political opponents; and I will further say, that should war arise on the part of the Cherokees, the sin of it lies not at the door of this administration, or its supporters. It may not be amiss to inquire, briefly, into the history of Indian emigration west of the Mississippi. If I am not greatly mistaken, one of the motives which induced Mr. Jefferson to desire the annexation of Louisiana to the United States was the prospective removal of the eastern Indians to its remote and uninhabited regions.

Certain it is, that in January, 1809, when addressed by a Cherokee delegation on that subject, he encouraged their examination of the country high up on Arkansas and White rivers, and promised to aid them in their emigration to it, if they should desire to remove after having explored it. It is believed that a portion of the tribe did emigrate to that country not long afterwards. Within the first year of Mr. Monroe's administration, the year 1819, a treaty was made with the whole tribe, providing for the emigration of such portion as might wish to join their brethren west of the Mississippi; and if the terms of that treaty had not been materially changed by another entered into in the year 1819, there can be but little doubt that a much larger number would have done so. But it may be answered, that, so far, the Government had not entered upon any general system upon this subject; and that, in the partial emigrations which had then taken place, it rather followed, than attempted to lead, the inclination of the Indians. However this may have been, the whole aspect of the question was changed by the especial message communicated to Congress by Mr. Monroe, on the 27th of January, 1825, in which he stated that it had long occupied the attention of the Government, and recommended a general plan of Indian emigration and colonization west of the Mississippi, accompanied by an elaborate report of the Secretary of War on the subject. But a short period of Mr. Monroe's term of service then remained unexpired; but he did not go out of office until he had communicated to the Senate the treaty of the Indian Spring, of February of the same year, which provided, among other things, for an exchange of territory, and the removal of such of the Creek Indians as might desire it, beyond the Mississippi, and the operation of which treaty was arrested by his successor, in the manner I have already stated.

In 1826, an arrangement was made by the then Chief Magistrate for the removal of a portion of the Creeks to the west of the Mississippi; and in 1828, a treaty with the Cherokees of the west, which looked to the same object. Thus it appears, that, although by the act of Congress passed in May, 1830, and the treaties concluded with the Choctaws in 1830, with the Creeks in 1832, the Seminoles in 1834, and more recently with the Cherokees, and within the same period with many smaller bands, the scheme of Indian emigration and colonization west of the States and Territories beyond the Mississippi has been enlarged and systematized, its germe has a much earlier date, and the whole was recommended by Mr. Monroe in 1825, while the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts was a distinguished member of his cabinet. It might, therefore, on the score of time and the authority of high names, be considered worse than useless to explain or defend it. But as this is the last time that I propose ever to discuss this subject, I hope I may be permitted to present a few considerations, derived from experience and the nature of things, why this system is best, both for the whites and the Indians, and especially for the latter. The races are as separate and distinct as color, character, and general condition, could well make them; the one possessing the arts and knowledge of cultivated life—the other the rude, unpolished nature of the savage. The consequence might, therefore, be naturally expected, that it is impossible that they should constitute one community with any thing like practical equality between them. Nor has experience in the slightest degree disappointed the deductions which a sound logic would have derived from these considerations. I have been told, and am in no way disposed to doubt it, that for many years past the remnants of Indian tribes still lingering in most of the old States of this Union have been treated with kindness and humanity. But of what avail have been all the efforts of ages to elevate their character and improve their condition? Alas! that character has continued to descend to the lowest depths of degradation, and that condition to unmitigated misery. Thus has it always been with the Indians, when surrounded by a white population; and thus it must always be, until the laws of nature and society shall undergo such change as can only be produced by the impress of the Deity. Nor can there be difficulty in explaining it. The poor Indian, (and in such condition he is indeed poor,) of inferior and degraded cast, associates with none of the white race, but such as are qualified to sink him into still deeper degradation. What, then, should be done to save the remnant from the moral pestilence which would inevitably await them, if relief and salvation shall be delayed until these causes shall be sought to operate upon them? There is no remedy but to remove them beyond the reach of the contamination which will surely come over them, if permitted to remain until they shall be surrounded by the causes to which I have adverted. By making the appropriation asked for in the bill now under consideration, you will not only save the Cherokees from the fate which has already befallen their kindred in nearly all the old States of the Union, but you will place them where they will not only be safe from the evils I have so imperfectly portrayed, but will insure that improvement and elevation of character as shall cause their posterity to rise up and call you blessed, and at the same time fulfil an obligation to one of the States of this Union, already deferred for more than a third of a century.

One word more, and I have done. We have heard much, here and elsewhere, of the conduct of Georgia towards the Indians. I shall not apologize, for she does not need it, for any act of legislation of hers, either in its principles or regular application.

The Cherokees drove her to the alternative of surrendering forever to a hostile and foreign Government a portion of her own territory, or extending her jurisdiction over it. In this extremity she adopted the course sanctioned by the example of all the original States of the Union. She determined to govern her own territory, and the people upon it, in her own way. Whatever of seeming severity may be found in her legislation on this subject, is the consequence of Cherokee defiance of her lawful authority, sanctioned and encouraged, here and elsewhere, by those whose sympathies are a thousand times stronger towards the Indian and African race, than for the white man of the South, especially if he be a citizen of Georgia—by men who have but one short step to take, to be found brandishing the tomahawk and scalping-knife in the ranks of the Indian.

Mr. MANN, of New York, moved to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, asked for the yeas and nays on this motion; and they were ordered.

The question was taken, and the motion rejected: Yeas 37, nays 99.

The resolution was agreed to; and

The House adjourned.

BOOKS TO MEMBERS OF CONGRESS.

On motion of Mr. INGERSOLL, the House took up the resolution offered by him on a former day, to furnish such books to the new members of the present Congress as had been furnished to the old members. The rules having been suspended, by a vote of 117 to 31,

Mr. INGERSOLL modified the resolution by limiting it to the following books:

Diplomatic Correspondence, Documentary History of the Revolution, the Land Laws, the American State Papers, the Register of Debates, Contested Elections, Commercial Regulations, and Elliot's Debates; and providing that if any book should be out of print, it should not be printed.

Mr. McKENNAN moved the previous question.

Mr. HOWARD requested the gentleman to withdraw the motion, as Mr. H. was instructed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs to move an additional work, which would be accepted by the mover of the resolution as a modification.

JUNE 28, 1836.]

Additional Harbor Bill.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. McKENNAN could not withdraw the motion, as he believed the House was fully prepared to vote upon it.

The motion for the previous question was then seconded, 86 to 39; and the main question being ordered thereon,

Mr. HARDIN asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were: Yeas 107, nays 68.

So the resolution was adopted.

Mr. HOWARD, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported a resolution directing the Clerk of the House to subscribe and pay for three hundred copies of Elliot's Diplomatic Code; one copy to be distributed to each member of Congress, and the residue to the heads of the Departments, Library of Congress, &c.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee, said he felt it his duty to make a few remarks to the House before the adoption of the present resolution. He had heretofore objected to the course of this House in book-making and book-buying for distribution among the members of this House. The resolution which had been just passed, offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. INGENSOLL,] gave to the new members of the present Congress books which would cost the Government but little less than one hundred thousand dollars; and would be bestowing upon each new member books which would cost a little less than one thousand dollars; and, in his opinion, one half the sum in money would enable them to purchase books infinitely more valuable to them and their constituents. He had not yet had an opportunity of ascertaining the cost of the Diplomatic Code now proposed to be purchased by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. HOWARD.] He rose now not with the expectation of arresting the passage of the resolution; he had no right to expect that, after the adoption of the resolution of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, without debate, and the yeas and noes being refused to be called upon the suspension of the rule to take up the resolution. He wished, however, to state to the House some facts which had been communicated to him, and which he believed to be true. He had been informed that many copies of the books which had been ordered by the House to be distributed among the members, for the last few years, had been taken to the booksellers in the city, and sold to them for much less than half the price which had been given by Congress for them, and that the books were retained by the booksellers to supply other and further orders made by Congress. He thought the House should stop such a course, by putting an end to the distribution of books among the members. He believed those facts to be true, and if the House would allow him a select committee, he had no doubt he should be able to prove these things to its satisfaction. He wished farther to state to the House, that the Committee of Ways and Means now had under consideration a resolution directing an inquiry as to the propriety of setting aside the contract for the publication of the Documentary History, which would be twenty volumes in each copy, costing about thirteen dollars a volume. He hoped the committee had ascertained facts enough to justify the House in setting aside the contract. Yet, by the resolution of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, this work is ordered to be distributed, and the Clerk would, of course, purchase a copy for each of the new members. But he would not further occupy the time of the House by details at this late period of the session.

Mr. WHITTLESY, of Ohio, said such a fact as that mentioned by the gentleman from Tennessee should be spread before the nation, and he hoped the House would induce the gentleman with a select committee.

Mr. BRIGGS remarked, that if there were individual members who abused their privilege, or made what was considered an improper use of it, that should not affect the whole body.

Mr. LANE had voted, on a former occasion, for a resolution to furnish the new members, of which he was one, and he had now voted for a similar one; that he had received the books, and had not parted with them, nor should he feel himself at liberty to dispose of them; that he considered them as belonging to his constituents, and that he held them as their trustee; and was there a great library or the district, he should place them in it, as the common property of all.

Mr. BOON said it was clear to his mind that there was business of much more importance to be acted upon than talking about subscribing for books, and therefore he moved the previous question.

Mr. HIESTER thought they had done enough for one day in buying books, and he therefore moved to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. HARDIN called for the yeas and nays; but they were refused, and the motion prevailed: Yeas 84, noes not counted.

So the resolution was laid on the table.

ADDITIONAL HARBOR BILL.

"A bill making additional appropriations for the Delaware breakwater, and for certain harbors, and removing obstructions in and at the mouths of certain rivers, and for other purposes, for the year 1836."

The bill had been reported to the House from the Committee of the Whole, with sundry amendments; the details of which were given at length, when the bill was under consideration in committee.

The first amendment of the committee was concurred in without amendment.

The second amendment of the Committee of the Whole was to strike out the clause "for continuing the improvement of the navigation of the Ohio and Mississippi rivers, from Pittsburg, Pennsylvania, to New Orleans, Louisiana, and from the mouth of the Ohio to the mouth of the Missouri river, one hundred and ten thousand dollars;" and insert "for the improvement of the Ohio and Mississippi, from Louisville to New Orleans, seventy thousand dollars; for the improvement of the Mississippi river, above the mouth of the Ohio and the Missouri river, to Independence, $50,000, in such manner, and for the removal of such obstructions, as the Secretary of War shall direct."

Mr. SMITH moved to strike out "$50,000," and insert "$30,000." Lost.

Mr. HAWES opposed the whole appropriation, on the ground that its effect would be to increase the number of officers of the Government.

Mr. REYNOLDS, of Illinois, said that he was sorry to detain the House at this late period of the session; but the subject was interesting to the people he represented in Illinois, which was his excuse for addressing a single word to the House.

The gentleman from Kentucky said he was opposed to the amendment, as it created more officers to superintend the work on the Western waters than were necessary. It is not possible for any one officer, no matter how efficient and competent he may be, to superintend all the works of improvement that ought to be made on the Ohio, Mississippi, and Missouri rivers. The House well know that these rivers stretch over a vast extent of country; so that if the work is to be done at all during this season, it will require more officers than one to carry it on with that efficiency that the Government ought to observe in the improvement of these rivers.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HAWES] also states that fifty thousand dollars for the improvement of the Mississippi, above the mouth of the Ohio, and the Missouri to Liberty, is too much, and more than the Secretary of War required.

Mr. R. said if the Congress of the United States ap-appropriate any thing at all for these noble and useful rivers, it ought not to be less than that sum. It would be a ridiculous improvement that a less sum would effect on the Mississippi, between the mouth of Ohio and the Falls of St. Anthony, and the Missouri, as high up as Liberty. The sum is not too much. If any thing be given at all, let it be that sum or more.

Mr. HAWES then asked for the yeas and nays on concurring with the Committee of the Whole in this amendment; which were ordered, and were: Yeas 104, nays 81.

So the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. WISE then moved to strike out the enacting clause of the bill. He wished to test the sense of the House on the subject of internal improvements by the General Government, and repeated what he had said in Committee of the Whole, that now the deposit bill was passed, the bill under consideration was nothing more than a scramble for unequal shares of the public money before the day of distribution came.

Mr. W. asked for the yeas and nays on his motion; which were ordered, and were: Yeas 52, nays 133.

So the motion was disagreed to.

Mr. SMITH moved an additional item of $15,000 for building a steamboat to aid in the removal of the Red river raft; which was agreed to.

Mr. HAWES renewed his motion to strike out the appropriation of $200,000 for the improvement of the Hudson river, and spoke at some length in support of his motion.

Mr. SUTHERLAND then moved the previous question; which was seconded: Yeas 84, nays 48.

Mr. HARDIN called for the yeas and nays on ordering the main question to be put; which were ordered, and were: Yeas 106, nays 78.

So the House determined that the main question should be now put.

Mr. LEWIS then moved a call of the House. Lost.

On the call of Mr. PATTON, the yeas and nays were ordered on the main question, being on the engrossment of the bill; and the question being taken, was decided in the affirmative: Yeas 125, nays 63, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, H. Allen, Anthony, Ash, Ashley, Bailey, Barton, Bockee, Bond, Boon, Borden, Bovee, Briggs, Brown, Burns, W. B. Calhoun, Cambreleng, Carr, Casey, Chaney, Chapin, Childs, Corwin, Cramer, Cushing, Cushman, Darlington, Davis, Denny, Dickerson, Doubleday, Evans, Fairfield, Farlin, French, Fry, W. K. Fuller, Galbraith, R. Garland, Gillet, Granger, Haley, J. Hall, Hamer, Hard, Harper, Hazeltine, Henderson, Hiester, Hoar, Howard, Howell, Hubley, Hunt, Huntington, Ingersoll, Ingham, W. Jackson, J. Jackson, James, R. M. Johnson, H. Johnson, B. Jones, Judson, Kennon, Kilgore, Kinnard, Lane, Lansing, Lawrence, Lay, G. Lee, J. Lee, T. Lee, Leonard, Lincoln, Love, A. Mann, J. Mann, W. Mason, M. Mason, S. Mason, May, McKennan, McKeon, McMill, Mercer, Miller, Milligan, Moore, Morgan, Morris, Muhlenberg, Owens, Page, Patterson, D. J. Pearce, Phelps, Phillips, Potts, John Reynolds, Joseph Reynolds, Russell, Seymour, Shinn, Sickles, Slade, Smith, Spangler, Sprague, Storer, Sutherland, Taylor, Thomas, J. Thomson, Toucey, Turritt, Vanderpoel, Vinton, Wagener, Ward, Wardwell, Washington, Elisha Whittlesey, Thomas T. Whittlesey—125.

NAYS—Messrs. C. Allan, Beale, Beaumont, Bouldin, Boyd, Buchanan, Bunch, Bynum, J. Calhoun, Campbell, Carter, J. Chambers, N. H. Claiborne, J. F. H. Claiborne, Cleveland, Coffee, Coles, Connor, Deberry, Dromgoole, Forester, J. Garland, Graves, Grayson, Griffin, Hardin, Hawes, Hawkins, Haynes, Huntsman, Jarvis, Jenifer, C. Johnson, J. W. Jones, Lawler, L. Lea, Lewis, Loyall, Lucas, Lyon, Martin, Maury, Mc-

Comas, McKay, McLene, Montgomery, Parks, Patton, F. Pierce, Pinckney, Rencher, Roane, Robertson, Rogers, Speight, Standefer, Taliaferro, Towns, Underwood, White, L. Williams, S. Williams, Wise—63.

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. HAWES said he did not wish to delay this bill, but he wanted a direct vote of the House upon the appropriation of $200,000 for the Hudson river. He moved to recommit the bill to the Committee of the Whole, with instructions to strike out that clause, and asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. BOON said that he wished to say a very few words before the question was taken. Mr. B. said that he had been honored with a seat in the House of Representatives during a period of nine years, and had uniformly voted for appropriations of money for the "common defence and general welfare of the United States," whether the money was to be expended on the Atlantic seaboard, or in the South, and he would now vote against the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky. But, said Mr. B., I will take this occasion to advise gentlemen that, unless a more liberal policy should hereafter be extended towards the new States of the West, he would, if his life should be spared him, return, at the commencement of the next session of Congress, prepared to organize a Western influence that would be felt against all appropriations of money east of the mountains, until justice should be done to the people of the new States in the West. Sir, said Mr. B., I will not longer consent to have the people of the new States taxed in the purchase of the public lands, for the benefit of other portions of the country.

Mr. B. said that pledges had been given him, for some two or three months past, that a direct vote should be had on the bill to reduce the price of the public lands before the adjournment of the present session of Congress. Yet this promise had not been fulfilled, nor was there any reasonable prospect that it would be. Mr. B. concluded by saying that he had become tired of living upon promises alone, and called upon gentlemen from the Western States to prepare to go with him in future in opposing appropriations for the seaboard until something should be done direct for the people of the West.

The question was then taken, and decided in the negative: Yeas 60, nays 101.

The House then took the usual recess.

EVENING SESSION.

HARBOR BILLS.

The "bill making additional appropriations for the Delaware breakwater, and for certain harbors, and removing obstructions in and at the mouths of certain rivers, and for other purposes, for the year 1836," was read a third time and passed.

The House then took up the "bill making appropriations for the improvement of certain harbors therein mentioned, for the year 1836."

Mr. BELL renewed the motion made by him in Committee of the Whole, to strike out the enacting clause of the bill; and, on that motion, called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and were: Yeas 69, nays 96.

So the motion to strike out was decided in the negative.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, moved the previous question; which was not seconded by the House.

The following amendments of the Committee of the Whole were concurred in:

An amendment appropriating the sum of $300 for an examination of the survey of the passage of Cobscook bay, in the State of Maine.

An amendment to increase the appropriations for the Cochecho branch of the Piscataqua river to $10,000.

JUNE 28, 1836.]

Harbor Bills.

[H. OF R.]

For improving the harbor at Cattaraugus creek, strike out "$40,000" and insert "$20,000."

For deepening the channel of the river Thames, Connecticut, $13,000.

To strike out the following: "For making further improvements in the harbor of Newcastle, $43,000."

For the improvement of the Maumee river, below the rapids, $20,000.

Mr. SUTHERLAND then moved the previous question; which was seconded by the House: Yeas 95, nays not counted.

Mr. MARTIN called for the yeas and nays on ordering the main question; which were ordered, and were: Yeas 104, nays 87.

So the main question was ordered to be put.

Mr. ROBERTSON called for the yeas and nays on the main question, (which was on ordering the bill to be engrossed;) which were ordered, and were: Yeas 108, nays 92, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Heman Allen, Ash, Bailey, Barton, Bean, Boon, Borden, Bovee, Brown, Burns, William B. Calhoun, Carr, Chaney, Chapin, Childs, Cramer, Cushing, Cushman, Denny, Dickerson, Double-day, Efner, Evans, Farlin, William K. Fuller, Galbraith, Rice Garland, Gillet, Granger, Grennell, Haley, Hamer, Hard, Harper, Samuel S. Harrison, Albert G. Harrison, Hazeltine, Hoar, Howard, Howell, Hunt, Huntington, Ingersoll, Ingham, Jabez Jackson, Jenifer, Richard M. Johnson, Henry Johnson, Benjamin Jones, Judson, Kennon, Kilgore, Kinnard, Lane, Lansing, Lawrence, Lay, Gideon Lee, Joshua Lee, Thomas Lee, Leonard, Lincoln, Love, William Mason, Samson Mason, May, McCarty, McKim, McLene, Miller, Milligan, Muhlenberg, Owens, Page, Patterson, Dutee J. Pearce, Pettigrew, Phelps, Phillips, Reed, John Reynolds, Joseph Reynolds, Russell, Schenck, William B. Shepard, Shinn, Sickles, Slade, Sloane, Smith, Sprague, Storer, Sutherland, Taylor, Thomas, John Thomson, Toucey, Turrill, Vanderpoel, Vinton, Ward, Wardwell, Washington, Webster, Weeks, Elisha Whittlesey, Thomas T. Whittlesey—108.

NAYS—Messrs. Chilton Allan, Beaumont, Bell, Bond, Bouldin, Briggs, Buchanan, Bunch, John Calhoun, Cambreleng, Campbell, Carter, Casey, George Chambers, John Chambers, Nathaniel H. Claiborne, John F. H. Claiborne, Cleveland, Coffee, Coles, Connor, Corwin, Craig, Crane, Deberry, Dunlap, Everett, Fairfield, Forster, French, Fry, James Garland, Grantland, Graves, Griffin, Joseph Hall, Hiland Hall, Hardin, Harlan, Hawes, Hawkins, Haynes, Henderson, Hiester, Hopkins, Hubley, Huntsman, William Jackson, Jarvis, Cave Johnson, John W. Jones, Lawler, Luke Lea, Logan, Loyall, Lucas, Lyon, Abijah Mann, Job Mann, Martin, John Y. Mason, Moses Mason, Maury, McComas, McKay, McKennan, Montgomery, Morgan, Morris, Parker, Parks, Franklin Pierce, James A. Pearce, Pinckney, Potts, Rencher, Roane, Robertson, Rogers, Seymour, Shields, Spangler, Speight, Standefer, Taliaferro, Towns, Underwood, Wagener, White, Lewis Williams, Sherrod Williams, Wise—92.

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time to-day.

The bill being on its passage,

Mr. HAWES moved to recommit the bill to the Committee of the Whole, with instructions to reduce the appropriations one half, and to strike out the item of $40,000 for the improvement at the mouth of Cattaraugus creek.

Mr. H. spoke at length in opposition to the general principles of the bill. He considered this but as the beginning of a system which was to take away millions of the public treasure, and only to be a benefit to a set of land speculators. The harbor of Cattaraugus had never been heard of until it was bought up by land speculators; and from that time to this members of Congress had been continually receiving letters, urging them to make an appropriation for this place. He believed there were members in that House who were engaged in these speculations, and he warned them to beware, as there was a committee appointed to investigate this matter. He hoped, too, this committee would be vigilant; and if there were any abuses, (which he believed there were, and believed he could put his finger on some of them,) that they would ferret them out and expose them. The appropriations in this bill were so distributed as to procure votes; whatever State had a large vote in the House got a large appropriation for improvements. Mr. H. spoke at great length, and adverted with some severity to the course of the chairman of the Committee on Commerce in relation to this bill, and pronounced it a bribery and robbery measure throughout, and only calculated to drain the Treasury and prevent the distribution which was contemplated by the bill passed a few days since. After speaking for about three hours, Mr. H. concluded, and

Mr. SUTHERLAND made a few remarks in reply, and showed the importance of Cattaraugus harbor as a port of refuge in cases of storms upon the lake, and moved the previous question.

The previous question was seconded by the House: Ayes 101, noes not counted. And the main question being ordered thereon,

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. WISE moved that the House adjourn. Lost, without a count.

The vote was then taken on the main question, being the passage of the bill, and it was decided in the affirmative: Yeas 99, nays 85, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Heman Allen, Ash, Ashley, Bailey, Barton, Bean, Boon, Borden, Brown, William B. Calhoun, Carr, Chaney, Chapin, Childs, Clark, Cramer, Cushing, Cushman, Darlington, Denny, Dickerson, Efner, Evans, Farlin, William K. So the bill was passed.

Light-house Bill—Cumberland Road, &c.

LIGHT-HOUSE BILL.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, moved that the House adjourn. Lost: Ayes 55, noes 90.

The House next took up "the bill making appropriations for building light-houses, light-boats, beacon lights, buoys, and making surveys, for the year 1836."

The following amendments of the Committee of the Whole were concurred in by the House:

An amendment for the survey of the Kennebec river, Maine, $500;

An amendment to the clause for a survey of Salem harbor, Massachusetts, by adding "Lynn," and increasing the appropriation $500;

An amendment to increase the appropriation for the light-house on Block Island, Rhode Island, to $5,000;

An amendment for a floating light in or near the Middle Ground, on Long Island Sound, $10,000;

An amendment to insert after the word "Delaware" the words, "and Schuylkill," $10,000;

An amendment for a light-house on James river, Virginia, $5,000;

An amendment for a survey of Perdido and Pearl rivers, Louisiana, $450;

"Be it further enacted, That the reports upon all the aforesaid surveys shall contain a statement of all such facts within the knowledge of the engineers respectively making the surveys, as are or may be materially connected with the proposed improvements; and also estimates, in detail, of the sums of money necessary for such improvements, respectively;"

An additional section providing that none of the light-houses should be commenced until the proper examinations be made by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Several other amendments of the Committee of the Whole were concurred in by the House.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time to-day.

The bill being on its passage,

Mr. LANE moved the previous question; which was seconded without a division, and the main question was then ordered to be put.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee, called for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill; which were not ordered.

The bill was then passed.

CUMBERLAND ROAD.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, moved that the House adjourn. Lost: Ayes 55, noes 67.

The House then took up the bill from the Senate to continue the Cumberland road in the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois.

The bill being on its passage,

Mr. MANN, of New York, moved the previous question.

Mr. EVERETT moved to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. McCARTY called for the yeas and nays on this motion.

Mr. HARDIN moved a call of the House.

Mr. HAWES moved that the House adjourn; which motion was agreed to: Ayes 60, noes 53.

And the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 29.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

On motion of Mr. CONNOR, the House went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. CASEY in the chair,) on the bill for the reorganization of the Post Office Department, and the more effectually to provide for the settlement of the accounts thereof.

The question pending was the amendment of the Senate striking out the 43d and 44th sections, which prevent the postmasters from receiving any emolument from pigeon-holes or boxes.

Mr. PHILLIPS had moved to amend the amendment of the Senate by adding a section providing that when the emolument of postmasters shall exceed $2,000 from said boxes, that they shall account to the Post Office Department for the same, and pay over the excess to said Department; and that the postmasters should make returns of the amount received by them for the rent of said boxes.

Mr. INGERSOLL called for the reading of a memorial on the subject from a number of merchants in Philadelphia, setting forth the advantages of the present system, and praying that it might be continued.

Mr. BRIGGS appealed to his colleague to withdraw his amendment, especially after the lengthy discussion which had grown out of the subject when the bill was first under consideration in Committee of the Whole and in the House, as well as from the difficulties of the subject itself. He hoped this point would be suffered to stand over to a future session, when Congress might act upon it with more information than they were now possessed of, and not delay or hazard the passage of so important a bill as this on so unimportant a matter.

Mr. PHILLIPS could not see any objection to the adoption of his amendment, and it was absolutely necessary that the abuse that had grown up under the box system should be removed. He had no wish to cut down the system, but rather to render it permanent upon a proper system. It was well known that by its operation an amount of perquisites had accrued to the postmasters of some of the large cities greater than the salaries of any other officer of the Government under the Chief Magistrate, being, in some cases, from six to nine and ten thousand dollars per annum. His object was to limit the salary within the sum of $4,000, which he thought quite sufficient. It was equal to the compensation paid to the collector of New York, to whose duties those of the postmaster of that city bore no proportion.

Mr. GIDEON LEE agreed that $4,000 was a fair compensation, but it would be better to leave the whole regulation of the subject of these boxes till next session. He believed some reform was necessary, but it was better not to hazard the bill, for he really believed it would be lost if the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts should be adopted. He himself had amendments he should like to see introduced into the bill, but he refrained from pressing them, for the reason he should vote against the pending proposition.

Mr. MASON, of Virginia, remarked that it would not affect more than two or three postmasters in the whole country; and as measures would be taken to collect information on the subject, he also thought it had better be left to the next session.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, hoped the amendment would not be adopted; but if it was, he should move a further amendment to it.

Mr. PHILLIPS said, although he was convinced of the propriety of his amendment, yet, rather than jeopard the passage of the bill, and to meet the wishes of other gentlemen, he withdrew it.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, thought the proposition too reasonable to be passed over, and he therefore renewed it.

After some further remarks from Messrs. BRIGGS, REED, MASON of Virginia, CONNOR, WILLIAMS of North Carolina, GRENNELL, UNDERWOOD, ANTHONY, and LOVE,

Mr. WILLIAMS modified his amendment by inserting the word "net" in that part of it requiring the postmasters to make returns of their emoluments.

The amendment was disagreed to, and the amendment of the Senate was concurred in: Ayes 108, noes not counted.

The second amendment of the Senate, appropriating $3,150,000 for the service of the Post Office Department for the year 1836, commencing on the 1st of July, was also concurred in.

The other amendments of the Senate were also concurred in.

Mr. UNDERWOOD submitted an amendment authorizing the Postmaster General to allow an increase of salary of $1,000 to the postmasters of the large cities, in lieu of the perquisites derived from the boxes.

Mr. WHITTLESEY, of Ohio, suggested that the amendment had better be withdrawn, and leave the whole subject open to investigation at an early day next session. Lost.

POST ROUTE BILL.

The committee then took up the bill "to establish certain post roads, and to alter and discontinue others, and for other purposes," returned from the Senate with various amendments.

On motion of Mr. CONNOR, they were all severally concurred in.

The committee then rose and reported the amendments to the House.

The Speaker having resumed the chair,

The first bill was taken up, all the amendments of the Senate having been concurred in, except that providing for the regulation of the number and salaries of clerks in the Department.

Mr. LANE rose, and moved the previous question; which was seconded—ayes 85, noes 39—and the main question ordered to be put.

Mr. UNDERWOOD called for a division of the question, so as to take the question separately on the amendments regulating the salaries.

Mr. HIESTER moved to except the amendment striking out the forty-third and forty-fourth sections of the bill.

Mr. EVERETT moved to except the amendments relating to the contracts.

Mr. ADAMS moved to except the amendment appropriating $3,500,000 to the service of the Post Office Department.

The other amendment was then concurred in without a division.

Mr. EVERETT called for the yeas and nays on the amendment reserved by him, but the House refused to order them, and the amendment was concurred in by ayes 94, noes not counted.

Mr. HIESTER asked for the yeas and nays on the amendment regulating the salaries; which were ordered.

Mr. WISE begged to inquire of the Chair if the effect of the amendment was to increase or decrease the salaries of the clerks.

The CHAIR was informed by the Clerk that it was to increase their salaries.

The question was then taken on the amendment, when it was concurred in by a vote of: Ayes 107, noes 75.

The question being on the Senate's amendment to strike out the 43d and 44th sections, relating to the "boxes" in the post offices.

Mr. UNDERWOOD asked for the yeas and nays, but they were refused, and the amendment was concurred in: Ayes 89, noes 41.

The question being on the amendment reserved by Mr. ADAMS, it was concurred in without a division.

The "post route" bill was then taken up, and the amendments all concurred in without a division.

TIME OF MEETING OF CONGRESS.

Mr. BRIGGS moved a suspension of the rules for the purpose of offering a resolution instructing the Committee on Enrolled Bills to report a bill fixing the time of the annual meeting of Congress on the first Monday in November; which was agreed to—120 to 29.

Mr. VINTON moved an amendment, instructing the same committee to report a joint resolution fixing also the day of adjournment.

Mr. WARDWELL moved the previous question; which was seconded; and the main question being ordered and carried, the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. BRIGGS, on leave, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, then reported a "bill to alter the time of the annual meeting of Congress," (to the first Monday in November;) which was read twice; and the question being on its engrossment,

Mr. PIERCE, of New Hampshire, called for the yeas and nays; but they were not ordered.

Mr. HANNEGAN moved an additional section, to reduce the pay of members of Congress to six dollars per day during their attendance in Congress.

Mr. MAY demanded the previous question.

Mr. MANN, of New York, moved to lay the bill and amendment on the table. Lost.

The previous question was then seconded, and the main question being ordered,

Mr. HANNEGAN called for the yeas and nays thereon; which were ordered, and were: Yeas 99, nays 93.

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-day.

Mr. ADAMS moved to recommit the bill to the Committee on Enrolled Bills, with instructions so to amend it as to limit its operation to the next session only.

Mr. MILLER said, if the gentleman would modify his instructions, by limiting its operation to future sessions after the next, he would vote for them. He said he thought, after remaining in session till July, it was extraordinary that they should pass a bill to come back in November. He therefore moved to postpone its further consideration till to-morrow.

Mr. PEARCE, of Rhode Island, demanded the previous question.

Mr. SPEIGHT moved a reconsideration of the vote by which the bill had been ordered to be engrossed. He said he had voted in the majority expressly that he might make this motion, in the hope that, upon more mature reflection, a majority would reject the bill.

The CHAIR ruled the motion to be out of order after the previous question had been demanded.

The previous question was then seconded by a vote of 98 to 53.

Mr. SPEIGHT called for the yeas and nays on ordering the main question to be put; but they were refused, and the main question was ordered without a count.

Mr. SPEIGHT then asked for the yeas and nays on the final passage of the bill; which were ordered, and were: Yeas 101, nays 95.

So the bill was passed.

CUMBERLAND ROAD.

The House took up the bill from the Senate "to continue the Cumberland road in the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois."

Mr. MANN, of New York, had moved the previous question.

Mr. EVERETT had moved to lay the bill on the table.

The second was the pending question, the House having adjourned last night before it was taken; and it was now taken, and decided in the negative without a division.

The question then recurred upon seconding the demand for the previous question, and it prevailed—70 to 50.

Mr. WEBSTER said he had voted against the motion of the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. EVERETT] to lay the bill on the table, with the belief that the previous question would not be sustained, and that the bill would be yet modified to meet his views. But as the previous question had now been ordered, so as to cut off all the proposed amendments, that further time might be had to deliberate, and for the friends of the bill to compromise their different views, he renewed the motion.

Mr. LANE called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were: Yeas 67, nays 103.

So the House refused to lay the bill on the table.

The main question was then ordered to be put; and being put and carried, the bill was ordered to a third reading.

The House then, according to order, took recess till four o'clock.

EVENING SESSION.

CUMBERLAND ROAD.

The House then proceeded to the consideration of the "bill to continue the Cumberland road in the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois." The question being on its passage.

Mr. McCARTY entered at some length into a review of the provisions of the bill, and urged his objections against it in its present shape. He then moved to recommit it, with the following instructions:

"Strike out from the provisional clause in the first section to the end of the section; and strike out the second section, and insert the following:

"SECTION 2. And be it further enacted, That the money hereby appropriated for the continuation of said road in Indiana and Ohio shall be applied to the graduation and bridging; the same to be let out in contracts and sections, upon public notice, to the lowest bidders, by such superintendent or superintendents, engineer or engineers, as may have charge of said road, under the direction of the Secretary of War: Provided the said Secretary may direct so much of the appropriation for the continuation of the road in Ohio as may be necessary for the completion thereof east of Springfield, to be applied to that purpose: And provided, That not more than twenty thousand dollars of the amount thus appropriated for the continuation of the road in Indiana shall be applied in the collection of materials for the bridge over the Wabash."

After a few words from Messrs. A. MANN, T. WEBSTER, and BOON,

Mr. VANDERPOEL moved the previous question; but the House refused to second it: Ayes 64, naves 69.

Mr. WEBSTER said no member could be more sensible than he was that the House was fatigued with debate; and while those members most favored of the House could only rise under the repeated cry of "question, question, question," he could not hope to be heard with attention. Members were already preparing for their departure—they were now approaching the close of a long, and, as he had learnt from the older members, a session of unparalleled labors; and of that long calendar which yet encumbered their desks, members were anxious to dispose of that which was most essential to the public interests. He would not trespass long. He believed the bill in its present shape would not so well advance the permanent interests of the West as an amendment, which he contemplated, would. He hoped the motion to recommit the bill, for amendment, would prevail; and he would throw himself upon the indulgence of the House while he briefly stated his views. It was very far from his desire to defeat the bill; but he felt it to be his duty to make an effort to perfect it: should that fail, though with much reluctance, he would vote for its passage. He now did, and trusted he always would, yield with proper deference to the deliberate will of the House.

He had long been of the opinion that the system under which that road had been constructed was extremely faulty, and that the progress of the work, and the interests of the public Treasury, required that it should be corrected. The corps of cadets, and their agents, which were quartered on this road fund, required a large amount for their own pay, and rendered the agency extremely expensive. This was one of the reasons why that work had appeared to cost so much. But this was not the greatest objection. The money had been applied, and the work directed, without that regard to economy which had characterized the progress of the public works which had been prosecuted so successfully under the management of the State of Ohio and her corporate companies. He did not attempt to attach blame to any one, or censure anywhere. He believed the fault was more in the system than in the individuals.

Ohio had, with great success and commendable economy, prosecuted her great system of internal improvements. These great works had been directed by her own civil engineers. They were men of great scientific attainments in their profession. They were, however, her own citizens, and knew that they were acting for the people of Ohio; they had reputations to advance, felt a common interest in the welfare and prosperity of their State, and devoted themselves to the service in which they were employed; they were practical as well as scientific men, and knew the value of labor and money. And it is a subject of cherished pride and boast, that so much has been accomplished for the honor of the State, and for the public good, and for the advancement of the common interests of all her citizens, with so little burden to her treasury. A very different state of feeling existed in regard to the national road. The people of Ohio had discussed the subject, and understood it. The Legislature of Ohio had expressed an opinion on the subject, broad and clear, and had sent here a very able and earnest, but respectful memorial on this subject, requesting that the future appropriations for this road may be expended under the direction of her board of public works.

It was in accordance with this instruction from the Legislature of Ohio, that he had felt it to be his duty to propose the amendment which he did, in Committee of the Whole, to place this work under the direction of that board. He believed it would be a great saving to the road fund, and would greatly accelerate the progress and completion of the work. And this proposed amendment having been cut off by the call for the previous question, was one of the reasons which induced him to desire that the bill should be laid, for the present, on the table.

He regretted to say that other proposed amendments, matured and reported by the able and experienced Committee on Roads and Canals, had been cut off. In his opinion, these amendments were essential to the profitable expenditure of the appropriation. It would be recollected by gentlemen, that the plan of the construction of this road had been once entirely changed; and that the covering of the old road east of Wheeling, which had been put on at great expense, had failed to answer the purpose, and had been replaced by a new and different one, at very great expense to the Government, and much inconvenience to the travelling community.

The Macadamized road might answer through the mountainous country east of the Ohio river; but he believed that it would not long be tolerated through the level and fertile and populous valley of the West. That country was too well adapted to a much more easy, cheap, and rapid mode of communication. The enterprise of the West would not be content with the tedious and fatiguing stage of six or eight miles per hour, when they can with more safety, much more ease, and at less expense, and the important saving of time, travel 20 or 25 miles on a railroad. And if a Macadamized road should be completed, he did not doubt that it would be, in a few years, abandoned by the traveller for the facilities of a railroad, which may be constructed on the same line, or near it. And he believed that when the Baltimore and Ohio railroad, which is now in progress, reaches the Ohio river, the Macadamized road east of Wheeling will be abandoned by the general traveller. It must be so, for there will be few travellers so attached to the old mode of travelling as to be jolted and bruised for days in the stage, when they can make the trip in a single day, and comparatively without fatigue. The old road will doubtless continue to be used as a neighborhood road, to travel from village to village; but should a road for such a purpose be constructed at such expense? He understood the national road to be constructed for national purposes—for general travel.

The same thing must take place west of the Ohio river, whenever a railroad should be constructed. No man who has ever travelled on a railroad can doubt it. The prosperity of the West demands the speedy construction of such a work; and its enterprise would speedily accomplish it. The construction, then, of a Macadamized road would be unnecessary. The day was rapidly approaching when the distance between the termination of the Baltimore and Ohio railroad and the Mississippi would be travelled in two days. It was no idle fancy. Ten years ago it was less believed that the distance between Washington city and New York would at this time be travelled in three fourths of a day. This may now be done. And what may be accomplished through this region, may be accomplished through the great valley of the West much sooner, and therefore much cheaper. A line of railroad cannot be laid in any part of the world, of the same extent, through a country so well adapted to its rapid and cheap construction, and to the most rapid travelling, as between the Ohio and Mississippi rivers, on and near the line of the national road; nor could it be constructed through any country capable of containing a greater population, of building more flourishing towns and cities, or of making its citizens more independent and wealthy. Unlike most roads, which must wind their grades circuitously through an uneven country, the greater part of that road may be constructed on straight lines and even grades. On a crooked track the speed of the cars cannot exceed a certain limit with safety; but on a straight line almost any required speed may be attained; and all this line between Zanesville and the Mississippi river could be travelled at the rate of twenty miles per hour as safely as the line between this city and Baltimore, or that winding through the mountains between Baltimore and the Ohio river, could at twelve or fifteen miles per hour.

He did not permit himself to doubt the construction of a railroad through that region of country, between the Ohio and Mississippi. It was called for by the spirit of the age and the growth of the West. It would be to the travelling community of the West what her great rivers were to her commerce. It formed the very important and connecting link between the various canals and railroads which connect the Northern lakes with the Ohio and Mississippi rivers. It will render each of these much more useful, by connecting and continuing their communication, furnishing and receiving their supplies. It will be to them what the father of waters is to his many tributary streams, and render each improvement now of less value, because not directly connected with the others—as much more important and useful as are the great rivers of the West more valuable than they would be were they separate and disconnected streams, and the navigation confined on each to their own channels.

Your magnificent lakes and beautiful rivers must forever continue your commercial avenues. Your canals, which bisect the country between, will communicate with the commercial interior; but the ease and speed of railroads give them unquestionable preference for all travelling purposes; and all experience has shown that for commercial purposes they are incomparably superior to the best Macadamized roads. Animal power for draught, much less for speed, can never compete with steam, which is unlimited in its ability, and never tires. Not many years ago, the keel-boat was made to stem the rapid current of the Ohio and Mississippi rivers by manual power; then a trip to New Orleans was a voyage of three months. The first introduction of steamboats greatly lessened the time and labor; the time, under the advancing improvements, is reduced much farther; but every traveller who has been upon a railroad knows that the time may be yet reduced one half.

He viewed the determination of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company to persevere in their prosecution of that work to the Ohio river, as a most propitious event to the West. He should feel that he had been recreant to the interests of the West were he not to embrace this occasion to express these sentiments. And he believed the West would be unpardonably negligent to her interests if the earliest opportunity be not embraced to secure the termination of that road at such a point as will be suitable for the termination of the great railroad avenue of the West, that the two may complete the rapid and cheap communications between the East and the West. Each of these great works, East and West, will add incalculably to the value of the other; they are inseparable parts of a great and essential whole; and surely the different sections so deeply interested will not let the available period pass without securing their junction, and the completion of both. He entertained an earnest hope that they would not.

Let this railroad be completed from the Ohio to the Mississippi, and to the farthest West, and it will greatly advance all the interior towns and villages between your canals and rivers, will form a much more valuable channel of communication for commercial purposes than any other road, to forward the productions of the interior to their destined markets, and receive in return whatever the necessities of the country require. It will bring them substantially as much nearer to the canals and rivers, and to each other, as the time and expense of travel and transportation are reduced. It will cross the great projected way between Lake Erie, by way of Cincinnati, to Charleston; and will cross the projected railways of Indiana and Illinois, and will render them all more valuable to those who construct them and to the country, by gathering the current of travel as it comes from the East, and distributing it again through these diverging channels to the interior and to the remotest regions of the West; and it would invite an immense travel eastward through these roads, which must otherwise pass to the east by way of the Ohio river or the lakes; and it would present a most successful competition to the steamboats on the Ohio, between Cincinnati, by way of the projected Lake Erie railway, to its intersection, and the termination of the Baltimore and Ohio railway—for the distance may be travelled in less than half the time; and between St. Louis and that point the time of travel would be reduced at least three fourths; and between the mouth of the Ohio and Wheeling, by way of the Illinois central railway, to intercept the great Western railway at Vandalia, it would compete most triumphantly with the steamboat travel; for it could be travelled in about one third of the time, and probably safer and cheaper, and at all seasons of the year when the stage of water is unfavorable in the river, particularly during the low water in the summer and the ice in the winter, which so often render extremely difficult, and frequently entirely interrupt, the navigation in the upper Ohio. If the time was the same, this would be an invaluable substitute; but when it is known that the time is reduced several days in the trip, compared with the most favorable stages of the river, it would be preferred by all business men, to whom time is more valuable than money. It would be seen by all, and he could not doubt that the people of Illinois would see it so, that this road, in this view, receiving and transmitting the immense travel of Missouri, Tennessee, Mississippi, Alabama, and the whole Southwestern country, that travel to and from the East, through the southern section of the Illinois central railway, would add incalculably to the value and interest of that road, and would divert a large portion of that immense travel, that is now confined to the Ohio river, through the States of Illinois, Indiana, and Ohio.

To those who have not kept pace with the improvements of these most eventful times, and to those who have not enjoyed the ease and witnessed the facilities of railways, this picture may appear too high-wrought. But all who have travelled upon any of the railways of this country will readily admit its practicability. He knew he had not stated all that may be, and in his sober judgment would be, accomplished before many years in the rapid progress of Western enterprise. He had himself travelled at a greater speed than twenty miles per hour; he had travelled twenty continuous miles in less than an hour over a track not so well adapted to great speed as that now projected. To him these objects were too desirable in his view, and of too much value to his country, to let any proper occasion pass without presenting them for public consideration, and pressing their early accomplishment.

Every person the least observant of the progress of events in this country has seen with pleasure that the whole system of travelling throughout this country has undergone a great and important revolution within the last four years. This has been effected by the application of steam to boats, the construction of railroads and steam locomotives, and the general introduction of stages and extension of stage lines, to connect all the important points of the country. It is within the recollection of those present, when the citizens of the Atlantic cities travelled from one city to the other in their own private carriages, and when the tedious journey from the West could only be performed with great fatigue on horseback. No one thinks now of making a journey in this style. He who would attempt it would be laughed at as unfashionable and eccentric; as one who neither consulted his ease, his economy, nor his leisure. A private carriage, or a traveller on horseback, is seldom met on any of our great travelling thoroughfares. This results from the great facilities of travelling to any desired point faster and cheaper by other means. And as the number of contiguous lines of stages, steamboats, and railways, is increased, each adds to the importance and increases the business of the other. This was the boasted age of inventions; the hand of improvement was seen and its influence felt every where, advancing the interests and promoting the happiness of society. Labor-saving machines were applied to increase the power and reduce the labor of men in each operation and every department of life; and in no attempt have these efforts been more successful than in their application to the means of travelling. The general adoption of railways will accomplish all that is desirable; and, viewed in this light, the connexion of the great Eastern and Western sections of the Union by a railway is of the utmost importance. The improved mode and increased facilities of intercommunication are among the prominent events which characterize this age. To that immense multitude who travel between the East and West, time is money; and the time that would be saved, without estimating the fatigue between a railway and a Macadamized road, would be several days to each passenger. This economy of time would in a short period equal the construction of the road. The ease of the travelling public would be promoted, and the ability of the business community increased.

He had made an effort to collect a series of statistical items relative to that country, to elucidate this subject; but in a country so new, so vast, and so extraordinary in all that relates to it, nothing satisfactory, or even approaching the truth, could be gathered. What was correct of it to-day, fell far behind the truth to-morrow. Such was the rapidity of its growth in improvement, population, wealth, and business resources. Like the current of its mighty rivers, its course was rapid, irresistible, onward.

A few years ago, a journey over the best roads in the country, of three hundred miles, was one of many days and of great trial. Now it may be performed in a single day, and comparatively without fatigue. A journey across the Alleghanies and through the valley of the West required formal preparation and the toil of weeks or months. The traveller took solemn leave of his family and relatives. The unforeseen incidents and unavoidable perils of the journey were the constant theme of his anxious friends. Complete these roads, and a trip from New York to the Ohio river may be performed in two days, and to the Mississippi in four. And in point of time, and for all practical purposes, St. Louis will be brought as near to New York as Baltimore was twenty years ago; and every other point in the West, in time and labor, is brought as much nearer. Is not the accomplishment of all this most desirable to the West? And will not the East, who will share so largely in its advantages, aid in its accomplishment? Every individual interested in the canals and railroads, or in the prosperity of the commerce or towns of the West—every merchant or trader who travels to the East—every farmer whose agricultural products are sent to the East—every individual who travels—has a common interest in the accomplishment of this work. They have only to reflect upon its immense advantages to every interest, to perceive them and advocate them. Let the attention of the people of the West be directed to it, and they will not fail to approve of it, and to instruct their representatives to secure their interests; nor will they hold him faultless who withholds his co-operation.

He believed the social and political influence which would result from the increasing facilities of intercommunication would be happily felt on the character and destiny of the American people. As the time, labor, and expense of travelling were lessened, greater inducements were held out to the man of ease, and the man of industry, to travel, as well as to the man of business and the man of leisure. As the time and expense were reduced, more frequent journeys of friendship, and trips of pleasure, would be made—social feeling promoted, society improved, and a more genial feeling exist, and intimate connexion be formed, between the citizens of the different sections of the Union. To the true patriot, to the ardent lover of his country, and to the true friend of the Union, the rapidly extending lines of mail stages, the construction of canals and railways through every part of the country, the improvement of steamboat navigation upon all your lakes and rivers, furnish the strongest and most conclusive evidence that this Union will be perpetual. They bring within a few days' travel the most distant parts of this wide-spread republic—improve their social feelings—soften and subdue their prejudices—unite their commercial interests—and form the sinews and ligaments which must forever and inseparably bind and cement them into one common and united people. And as military defences, the facilities with which any required amount of men, military stores, and arms, may be concentrated through them, at any given point, give to the assailable points of the country the most confident security against any successful invasion.

And since it has become the settled policy of the Government to remove and congregate all the Indian tribes on the Southwestern frontier, it is a subject worthy of grave and deliberate consideration, whether a railway on the line under consideration, and extended beyond the Mississippi to the Indian territory, would not furnish the most available and certain means of that kind of frequent communication and rapid supply of force to control and keep in proper check that wild and lawless people.

He did not understand it to be the desire of the friends of the proposed amendment to proceed with the present appropriation to lay down any part of a railway. They only desired that the bill should be so modified as to expend the appropriation in completing the grading of the road, and that the grade should be so cut that a railway, or a Macadamized coat, could either be put on, as might hereafter be determined. He did not permit himself to doubt the superiority of the railway; but if the Macadamized was finally adopted, nothing could be lost by now completing the grade; whereas, if the railway should be hereafter adopted, the whole expenditure on the stone covering would be of little value. He wanted to give time for the people to investigate the subject, and for the Legislatures of the States, into whose hands it was to be surrendered, and who were to keep it in repair, to express their opinions. He would feel himself instructed on this subject by the decision of the Legislature of Ohio.

Gentlemen seemed not to apprehend the operation of the change. When either plan of road should be completed, it would be surrendered to the States. They committed the Macadamized road to their agents, and levied toll upon those who travelled upon it, to keep it in repair. If a railway was constructed, it would be surrendered to the States, and the States would put their cars under the direction of their agents on it, and would only charge so much for transportation and passengers as would keep the road in repair, and meet the expenses of running the cars. It would, therefore, be the cheapest fare of any road ever constructed, as the tolls now on the Macadamized road are the lowest. Either road would be equally under the control of the States and the people. And it is shown, from the highest authority, that the railroad may be kept in repair at much the lowest expense.

Several objections had been urged against the change of plan to a railroad, untenable as they were novel. The objection that it could not be used by emigrants, might be refuted by stating that families going westward may, in two days from the time they reach this road, be set down in the Grand Prairie of Illinois for less money than their provisions would cost them in the long and toilsome two or three weeks which their journey would occupy on the Macadamized road. It would be a common advantage to the farmer and to the merchant; the one would procure his produce sent to the nearest point on the canals or rivers as much cheaper than he could on a wagon, as the other could his merchandise brought to him in return, cheaper. It would tend to make the towns and villages on its line the places where the farmer could sell his produce as much higher than he otherwise could, as it could be taken to market cheaper. It would be of the same advantage to every one in travelling; all could travel cheaper and faster than in the stage. It would be emphatically the poor man's means of travelling. The rich could pay their way in the stage at any price; but the reductions of fare on this railroad would bring the expense within the means of the poorest, and no person would desire to travel on horseback when they could perform the journey in one fourth the time, and for less money than the amount of their tavern bills. Last of all, the most astonishing objection was brought forward, that the speed was too great; the traveller passed so rapidly through, that he had no time to stop and spend any money. If this objection were admissible, it would be injurious to improve the roads in any way. Let them remain as impassable as possible, so that passengers must stop every five miles and stay all night for the benefit of the tavern-keepers and prosperity of the country. This objection, he apprehended, would not be very popular with the travelling public, and he understood that road to be made for the benefit of those who travelled it.

He had been no little surprised to hear honorable gentlemen advance these objections, and advocate a Macadamized road, when they well knew that no private company nor their States would adopt any other than a railroad, in several of which they were already engaged. He knew them to be gentlemen of intelligence and enlarged views of public policy, and knowing this, he was only the more surprised that they should descend to the argument of the demagogue and cant of the pot-house politician, when, by taking an elevated stand on this subject, so much that is so desirable might be attained for the advancement of the West. His constituents and the people of Ohio were in advance of such objections. Unless something of the kind were effected, the West would be behind all their neighbors in the means of travelling and of receiving intelligence.

To those who did not believe that the Federal Government had any power to construct such works, he had no arguments to address. But to those who were willing to complete the national road, he hoped the superior advantages of a railroad would be seen and adopted. It was shown by the estimates that it could be made nearly or quite as cheap, and that it could be kept in repair for half the amount. This last item was one which should control the decision of the States who are obligated to keep it in repair.

He could not refrain from again expressing that it would be with much regret that he would assent to the expenditure of the appropriations for Ohio and Indiana in the manner provided in the bill; for so soon as a railroad should be constructed, the expenditure would be rendered of comparatively little value. The Macadamized road, like the turnpike between this city and Baltimore, and Baltimore and Frederick, would be abandoned; but the State would be under obligation to keep it in repair. Why would it be abandoned? Because the fare will be cheaper, and the speed much greater. No wagons, or comparatively none, will run upon it, for this very conclusive reason: that every thing can and will be transported cheaper on the railroad. The expenditure should therefore be for grading. The plan should be changed. It was important that the decision should be early made; the interests of the whole country require it. Let its benefits extend to those who may come after us. Let it be not for our use alone; but for our country and posterity.

His constituents felt a deep interest in the location of this road. That question he had hoped would have been settled before this bill. In this he had been disappointed. Such had been the course of the application for that change, that he had not been able to present his views upon it. It was the belief that the interests of a large majority of his constituents required that the bill proposing a change of route should be first passed, that had induced him to move to lay this on the table. He regretted that he could not comply with the wishes of all his constituents in reference to it; but as they were themselves divided, he could only endeavor to advance the greater interest. He would now only say, that he hoped, when that bill came up, he should be able successfully to meet every objection, and refute every argument against its passage, and prevail upon the House to do justice to one of the most populous, fertile, and interesting sections, through which a road could be made in the West.

Mr. HANNEGAN moved an additional instruction to strike from the bill every thing in relation to a bridge across the Wabash river.

Mr. LANE said it was not his object to detain the House by a speech, and more especially not to make a speech against the bill, or to submit a motion, which, if adopted, would of necessity result in its defeat; on the contrary, to insure its passage by asking the previous question; which was seconded by the House: Ayes 75, noes 46.

Mr. McCARTY called for the yeas and nays on ordering the main question; which were ordered, and were: Yeas 101, nays 74, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ash, Ashley, Barton, Beale, Bean, Boon, Brown, Buchanan, Burns, Cambreleng, Carr, Casey, Chaney, Chapin, Clark, Connor, Corwin, Craig, Cramer, Cushman, Darlington, Davis, Deberry, Dickerson, Doubleday, Fairfield, Farlin, William K. Pearce, Phillips, Pinckney, Potts, Rencher, Robertson, Rogers, A. H. Shepperd, Slade, Sloane, Spangler, Standefer, Storer, Taliaferro, Underwood, Vinton, Webster, L. Williams, S. Williams, Wise—74.

So the House determined that the main question be now put.

Mr. McCARTY called for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill; which were ordered, and were: Yeas 104, nays 82, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Ash, Ashley, Barton, Bockee, Boon, Borden, Briggs, Brown, Buchanan, Cambreleng, Carr, Casey, Chaney, Chapin, Clark, Corwin, Cramer, Darlington, Davis, Denny, Dickerson, Doubleday, Efner, Fowler, Fry, W. Shepperd, Shields, Smith, Speight, Standefer, Taliaferro, Towns, Underwood, Wagener, White, Lewis Williams, Sherrod Williams, Wise—82.

So the bill was passed.

MILITARY ROADS, &c.

The House next took up the bill making appropriations for certain military and other roads, and for examinations and surveys, for the year 1836.

The amendments of the Committee of the Whole, which have been heretofore noticed, were all concurred in.

Mr. SMITH moved to strike out the item of $30,000 for surveys, and called for the yeas and nays on his motion; which were ordered.

Mr. CAMBRELENG did not rise to debate the question, but to appeal to gentlemen to take the question without debate, as they had now but a very short time to act on some very important appropriation bills; which were yet before the House.

After a few words by Mr. DENNY, the question was taken and decided in the affirmative: Yeas 87, nays 84.

So the motion to strike out was agreed to.

Mr. PEYTON moved an additional section to the bill, to establish a port of entry at the mouth of Laurel, to be called Laurel.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, offered an amendment to the section, to appropriate $50,000 for the improvement of the Cumberland river, between the mouth of Laurel and Nashville, Tennessee.

Mr. PEYTON accepted the amendment, and read the report of one of the engineers to show the necessity of making this place a port of entry, and of making the appropriation proposed by the amendment.

Mr. P. called for the yeas and nays on his amendment; which were ordered.

Mr. VINTON said that, with a view of testing whether it was the sense of the House that these improvements should go on, he would move to lay the bill on the table, and on that motion called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were: Yeas 85, nays 77.

So the bill was laid on the table.

CUMBERLAND ROAD.

The House then took up the "bill for continuing the Cumberland road east of the river Ohio."

After some remarks from Mr. HARDIN, he moved to lay the bill on the table; which motion was agreed to without a division.

The House then took up the bill to continue the national road from Vandalia to the Mississippi river, in the State of Illinois.

The amendment of the Committee of the Whole was concurred in.

JUNE 29, 1836.]

Cherokee Treaty.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. REYNOLDS, of Illinois, called for the yeas and nays on the engrossment of the bill; which were ordered, and were: Yeas 92, nays, 80.

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

The House then took up the remaining bill, to continue the national road from the Mississippi river to Jefferson city, in the State of Missouri."

The amendment of the Committee of the Whole, to strike out that part of the bill providing for the grading of the road in such a manner as will permit the laying of rails thereon, was concurred in, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

CHEROKEE TREATY.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. LINCOLN in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill making further appropriations for carrying into effect certain Indian treaties.

The question pending was the motion of Mr. ADAMS to strike out the first section of the bill, as follows:

"For the amount stipulated to be paid for the lands ceded in the first article of the treaty with the Cherokees of the 29th of December, 1835, deducting the cost of the land to be provided for them west of the Mississippi, under the second article of said treaty, $4,500,000."

Mr. ADAMS called for the reading of certain documents, and addressed the committee at length in support of his motion. Mr. A. reviewed the whole subject of our Indian policy, contending that the treaty with the Cherokees was not binding upon the House. Among the documents, which occupied upwards of three hours in the reading, was a letter of Major Davis, of Kentucky; which having been read,

Mr. ADAMS called on the delegation from Kentucky to give their evidence as to the character of Mr. Davis.

Messrs. C. ALLAN, UNDERWOOD, HAWES, and HARDIN, all bore testimony to the high character of the gentleman alluded to.

Messrs. BOON and VANDERPOEL bore testimony to the character of Mr. Schermerhorn.

Mr. MCKAY having called for the reading of certain letters contained in the correspondence communicated to the House,

Mr. WISE said if the gentleman went on in this way, calling for certain extracts to be read, he should feel it his duty to call for the reading of the whole document.

Mr. GRANTLAND hoped the gentleman from Virginia would not call for the reading of a document so lengthy, at this period of the session, for the purpose of defeating the bill.

Mr. CALHOON, of Kentucky, said that Schermerhorn had stated in his letter that Major Davishad been removed from the situation he held in the Cherokee nation. Now, he was prepared to show that Mr. Davis never was removed, but that he had remained in office until he finished the business assigned to him. Schermerhorn had also stated that Davis was removed in consequence of representations to Major Bateman. So far from that, Major Bateman had written a complimentary letter to Mr. Davis about the time his office expired. All this he was prepared to show to the satisfaction of the committee.

Mr. HAYNES said he had understood that Mr. Davis was now exceedingly dissatisfied at this letter being made public.

Mr. WISE inquired if he had retracted any thing he had said in that letter.

Mr. HAYNES said he had not.

Mr. WISE said that, however anxious Georgia gentlemen might be for the passage of the bill, he would not be hurried one step beyond the snail's pace of justice.

Mr. GRANTLAND replied that Georgia was not more anxious than some other States to have this bill passed. She would have her lands whether the bill passed or not.

After a few remarks by Messrs. WISE, LAWLER, EVERETT, and HAYNES, the Clerk proceeded to read a variety of other letters contained in the document above alluded to.

Mr. BOULDIN said: I wish to make a few remarks upon the subject before the committee. It is one on which I have felt much, and have thought for some time.

What is the policy, the design, of the United States, in regard to the Indians? What has been their policy and their practice? Whence did they derive the title to all the wide domain of which they are the proud owner? Did they not derive it, or rather wrest it, from the possession of the natives—the Indians? and has it not been the uniform and persevering policy of the United States, hitherto, to drive them off, or exterminate them? What means this change of policy? Have they relented, or repented, and do they mean to change their policy? Let them, then, give up all the lands they have, by the tomahawk and scalping-knife, or the rifle, taken from that gallant but unfortunate race, and I will believe in their pity and their repentance. If they do not mean this, what do they mean? Do they mean, after having driven these unfortunate beings from the North and East to the South and Southwest, by treaties and cruelties far worse than have been lately practised, to use the whole power of the confederacy, thus acquired, to compel the people of Georgia and their neighbors to submit to the scalping-knife and the tomahawk? Do they mean that an independent savage nation shall remain forever in the heart of a civilized sovereign State? Do they believe this practicable—possible to be executed! Do they mean that these savages shall remain there, scalping and tomahawking, under the protection of the Federal Court or the Federal Government, until they have taken their vengeance on these helpless, defenceless women and children, and obtained as much money for their land as they may think proper to demand? Sir, what is to be the policy of this Government in regard to them? Will they abandon the idea of removing them? Will they cease to exterminate them? Do they think that by denying them all the privileges under our Government and protection under our laws, all participation in our privileges, and mixing of blood, we can make them friendly and civilize them? I again inquire, what is to be the policy hereafter in regard to them?

It is said they have been grossly cheated; that they will be compelled to give up this land by force, if they ever do surrender it. Sir, would they ever have surrendered their land, their home, and their country, had they not been compelled to do it? That we have taken this country from the savages, in whose possession it was when we found it, is certain; all the world knows it; and we could not disguise it if we desired to do so. What signifies this talk of relenting and repenting? If a man wrongs another, let him make restitution; let those that mean to alter their course in regard to the savages deliver up their country to them. When this is done, I will have some faith in this relenting and repenting. Let a man, or a country, or a State, or a section, relent and repent for himself or itself, and if they have robbed any, let them make restitution; restore the same back. I will not go to the Mosaic law, and require three or four-fold. Let them return the lands, and invite these Indians to them, and this will make entire peace with the Indians. But it is said these Indians have been dreadfully cheated, and to prove it several papers have been read, telling long tales both ways; the credibility of both witnesses is fully established. What shall we do with them? Believe both or neither? I believe they are both respectable men; I cannot question it; I do not wish to question it; they appear to be rivals for the favor of the Government, and do not look though the same glass.

This treaty has been made by our President and his officers, and ratified by the Senate, and shall I not believe them sooner than tales of this sort? Look, sir, too, at the sum: five millions six hundred thousand dollars! When was such a sum ever paid for Indian lands before? I am not particularly informed; but did all the lands for many miles on the Atlantic, from Maine to Georgia, cost that much money? If not, why should we infer that these Indians were cheated, when they have conveyed away a spot of land, (in general not very fertile,) in comparison with what has been acquired from them for less money, not larger than the palm of my hand, for this vast sum?

Mr. Chairman, I hope that neither you nor any other person, in or out of the House, will misunderstand me in regard to these people. I think they are a noble, gallant, injured, race. I think they have suffered nothing but wrong and injury from us, since the Anglo-Saxon race (borrowing an expression of Mr. Randolph, my predecessor, which seems to have become popular) first landed in this country. But as things are now, this nation of men cannot remain in the heart of civilization, unless they will submit to the laws of the States in which they reside. It is impossible to be executed, and in my opinion cruel to attempt it. The end of it will be, that a few of the whites will be barbarously killed, and the Indians exterminated. Sir, a melancholy overcasts my mind, whenever I think of this too probable issue in regard to the red man—his gradual but entire extinction. I believe, and ever have believed, that if the States where they reside would but treat them with humanity, and acknowledge their equality as men, and mix with them, and give them all the advantages of civilized men, and compel them to submit to the laws of civilization, they would find them worthy of their friendship and confidence. I must think this; for many of our first families and most distinguished patriots are descended from the Indian race. My heart compels me to feel for them; for some of my nearest relations (not that I have myself any of their blood) are descended from the Indian race. I always wish to see pursued the same policy that was suggested and practised by the gallant and wise Captain Smith, who made the first permanent settlement here. He treated them sternly, kindly, affectionately, and made them obey the laws of England, so far as the Indians fell within his jurisdiction. He encouraged marriages between them and the whites, and wrote a beautiful letter to Queen Anne concerning Pocahontas, setting forth the advantages of such a policy. After Pocahontas's marriage with Rolfe, during her life all was harmony between the whites and the Indians. This policy was advised by Patrick Henry, and many others of our wisest men and greatest patriots.

Other councils, however, have prevailed; those, in former days, who talked most of oppression towards Indians, and refused most positively to treat them as men, and as brethren and equals—who expected to civilize and make them friendly by talking of friendship and equal rights, and while they at the same time placed them in a situation necessarily hostile with the whites—contending toe to toe for the same acre of ground with the whites—who expected, after taking from the Indians their lands, and murdering their wives and children, to make them friendly by talking soft talk to them, about the cruelty and dishonesty of others who do the like—who thought it cruelly not to let them have fire-arms, and were surprised when they shot white men with them; I say, unhappily, the council of such men has hitherto prevailed; and by thus bringing the Anglo-Saxon race in direct conflict with the Indian, the Indian has been hitherto continually tending to extermination; and if this policy prevail, extermination must necessarily be his end. I never think of this thing but with pain. I think the North American Indian gallant, noble, generous; possessing every quality of mind, body, and spirit, to enable him to take a stand on the same level with the noblest race. There is no tribe among them that has shown more marks of these qualities, and not one perhaps as much civilization, this side of Mexico, from the first, as this tribe with which this treaty is made. If they would stay there, and obey the laws of the States where they reside, and the States would treat them as equals, according to their education and other circumstances, I should be highly gratified. But I fear, indeed I am too well persuaded, that this will not be the case; but that they will either go away under this treaty, or some other, not as favorable to them, or stay where they are until they share the fate of all the remnants of all the tribes of this unfortunate race, who have attempted to remain among the Anglo-Saxon race; a fate that is too painful to me to delineate particularly, and too well known to the world to make the performance of that painful duty necessary.

Alas! Mr. Chairman, this sickly sensibility, if it be real sensibility at all, has already well nigh exterminated a gallant race. The same thing, be it what it may, is now seeking to bring another race, far inferior, in every sense, into direct collision with the Anglo-Saxon breed, instead of being under the protection of the laws of civilized men. Suppose the negro brought toe to toe and point to point with this Anglo-Saxon race, what will be the issue? Mr. Chairman, look at the fact as history records it, and as we every day see it with our eyes.

The Indian, brought into direct collision with the Anglo-Saxon, is nearly exterminated. The negro, far inferior in every sense, under the protection of the laws of civilized men, (the Anglo-Saxons,) has multiplied beyond all others among us. Place this negro at points with our race, and what will be the issue? Does any man or woman doubt what will be the issue?

Should this exceeding great tenderness and honesty prevail, which has elbowed the negroes and Indians from the North and East, to the far West and South—yes, sir, elbowed them, or scalped them, or cheated them, or caused them to pine away and die with despair, after all the talk about humanity, and equality of men, emancipation, abolition, and all that—I say, should this still prevail, the consequence will be, that the Indian race will be exterminated from the face of the earth, and the negro from the face of North America.

But, sir, as I promised to say but little, I will draw to a close. As it appears that the President and Senate have ratified this treaty; as it appears that this is much the highest price that any nation of Indians has ever got for an equal quantity of land; as respectable white men disagree in statements about the manner of the execution of the treaty, (and I am well satisfied in my own mind that these Indians have been dealt as fairly by as any of whom we have got land, and as I ever expect them to be,) I shall vote for the appropriation. Sir, but a short time since, France had concluded a treaty with us, and the Chambers boggled a good deal (as we thought) about the appropriation of the money, to comply with it. What did we all say and think of that? I am not aware that treaties are made and ratified there with more or equal solemnity with a treaty made here by the President, and ratified by the Senate. Whatever individuals may say, or think, or pretend to think, the world in general does respect the solemn act of the President and Senate of the United States, and I shall certainly credit them, and confide in them, sooner than I will rely upon the contradictory statements of Indians and others, (strangers to me,) and who may have prejudices and biases which it is impossible for me to know. More money is given to them than ever was given to Indians for the same quantity of land of equal quality; and these high powers have confirmed the bargain and the treaty; and why should I withhold my vote for the appropriation? I see no good reason, and shall not withhold it. I am perfectly satisfied that both parties are benefited, under the circumstances, and I see no reason why the appropriation should be withheld. It is true, the idea of men leaving their home and their country, and marching in solemn procession to a strange land, is painful indeed; but the thought of being trampled under foot in their native land, is painful in the extreme. To remain, and see their race melting away like wax before the sun, must create sorrow beyond all measure, and drive men to utter despair. Present the other view of it, and compel me to choose between the blood of the Indian and that of my own kindred and country, and I must prefer my own. I am not one of those who, after having acquired, directly or indirectly, every foot of land that they own from the Indians, by means of titles far less excusable than this, are seized with a sudden tenderness of conscience just as the scalping-knife is uplifted over the heads of others, will hold their own and use the power that it and the strength of the Union gave them, (repenting suddenly, so far as others are concerned only,) holding these my kindred and countrymen, until they will come to the terms of the savage or submit, along with their wives and unoffending children, to the tomahawk and scalping-knife. The only thing worthy of doubt, or that could create difficulty, is the amount of the purchase-money. It is certainly very large; but considering that we are bound to extinguish the Indian title, and looking to the fact that we have sums so large in the Treasury, that many of the wisest and best are uneasy for the safety of our institutions, and the purity of our public functionaries, I feel no difficulty about it, and shall vote for the appropriation, without the least doubt of the propriety of the vote.

Mr. GRANTLAND said: I do not rise, Mr. Chairman, to discuss the merits of this Cherokee treaty, nor the manner in which it was made. I shall not, sir, inquire whether the whole Cherokee tribe, (for nation I will not call them,) or whether a majority, or less than a majority, of that tribe gave their assent to it; nor shall I, sir, consider it necessary to show that this treaty has been made with more than usual fairness, or that the agents of the Government, to effect an object not less beneficial to the Indians themselves than it is to several of the States, may not have used some of that address and management which is commonly practised by diplomatists, and especially in the making of Indian treaties. But, sir, I cannot forbear to remark that, of the almost numberless compacts made by this Government with Indians for the cession of their lands, all negotiated by commissioners appointed by the President, it very rarely happens that objection to any of them is made either in the confirmation by the Senate, or in the appropriation of money to carry them into effect by this House, unless it be with a tribe within the limits of Georgia; and then, sir, there is always doubt and difficulty and vexatious delay, if not a charge of fraud. How, sir, does this happen? Can it be that gentlemen are willing to shut their eyes and close their ears, and almost connive at frauds upon Indians, when the land is acquired for the benefit of all the States, and the especial convenience of their own constituents, but are ever wide awake, industrious, and vigilant, to hunt out and detect frauds, though none exist, when Indian lands are contracted for, which, under the compact of 1802, are for the benefit of Georgia alone? It might be considered indecorous, Mr. Chairman, were I to assert that this is the case; but every man must admit the thing has a suspicious appearance. Yes, sir, its aspect is more than suspicious—it has an awful squinting! and need I say at what?

My purpose, Mr. Chairman, in addressing the committee is, as I before stated, not to discuss this treaty; that, sir, has been done by one of my colleagues, and more ably by far than I could do it, and with a clearness and soundness of reasoning that will convince every member of this body whose mind is open to conviction; and I hope there are but few, though some there may be, who will not do us and themselves the justice of giving to this question a fair and dispassionate consideration.

It is sufficient, sir, for me, that this contract with the Cherokees was made by that department of the Government to which alone has been confided by the constitution the treaty-making power; it was concluded by commissioners of the United States, duly authorized to treat with the Indians, and has been approved by the Executive, and confirmed by the Senate. This, sir, is enough to satisfy me; let those who doubt seek for new lights, but I admonish them not to be led astray by some ignis fatuus: by plausible sophistry, or misplaced philanthropy. The treaty, sir, will speak for itself. It gives the Cherokees (besides an equal quantity of better land west of the Mississippi) about six millions of dollars for a country containing eight or nine millions of acres, nine tenths of which are mountains. But I again say, sir, that I did not rise to take part in the discussion of this treaty, but to repel the aspersions cast by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Wise] on the "faith and humanity of Georgia." That honorable gentleman has thought proper, sir, to charge the State which has sent me here, with bad faith in the observance of treaties, and with inhumanity to the Indians. These are grave charges, but I deny, sir, in the most emphatic manner, that the honorable gentleman can sustain his assertions, and I defy him to prove that which he has so rashly and unwarrantably said before this committee.

Now, sir, I shall proceed to show that it is not Georgia, but the General Government, that has acted with bad faith in the observance of compacts. It is known to you, Mr. Chairman, and to every member of this committee, that in 1802 Georgia made a compact with the United States, by which the former ceded to the latter all her lands extending from the Chattahoochee to the Mississippi, and from the 31st to the 35th degree of north latitude, a territory of vast extent and almost unrivalled fertility, out of which have since been formed the flourishing States of Alabama and Mississippi. What, sir, were the conditions of that cession? One condition was the payment to her by the United States of the sum of $1,250,000, (out of the sale of her own lands,) which is less than a fourth part of the amount to be paid the Cherokees for their territory, which is not a tithe in quantity, and is generally mountainous and sterile. But the main inducement with Georgia was to get possession of the Indian lands within her chartered limits. Has this been done? Could it have been done by the United States, as agreed upon in her contract with Georgia? I ask, sir, that the Clerk may read the preamble and the first and second articles of a treaty concluded by the United States with the Cherokees in the year 1817, and also part of a convention made with that tribe in 1819, which annuls or modifies the bargain of 1817, and makes one of a very different kind, without the consent of Georgia, deeply as she was concerned.

[The Clerk here read from vol. 6, pages 702-4, part of the treaty of 1817 alluded to, made with the Cherokees, by Andrew Jackson, Joseph McMinn, and David Meriwether; and the preamble and boundaries of a treaty made with the chiefs of the same tribe in 1819, by John C. Calhoun, Secretary of War.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have shown by the preamble

H. of R.]

Cherokee Treaty.

to the treaty of 1817, which has just been read, that, so early as the year 1808, deputations from the upper and lower Cherokee towns, duly authorized by their nation, went on to the city of Washington, the first named to declare to the President of the United States their anxious desire to engage in the pursuits of agriculture and civilized life, in the country they then occupied, and to make known to the President the impracticability of inducing the nation at large to do this, and to request the establishment of a division line between the upper and lower towns, so as to include the waters of the Hiwassee river to the upper town; that, by thus contracting their society within the narrow limits, they proposed to begin the establishing of fixed laws, and a regular Government; the deputies from the lower towns to make known their desire to continue the hunter's life, and also the scarcity of game where they then lived, and, under these circumstances, their wish to remove across the Mississippi river, on some vacant lands of the United States.

Mr. Chairman, I ask your particular attention and that of the committee to the fact that the Cherokees of the upper towns, who desired to become agriculturists, were almost exclusively in Tennessee, North Carolina, and Alabama; that those of the lower towns, who wished to continue the hunter's life, and to emigrate, were in Georgia. The treaty of 1817 goes on to state that the Cherokees wishing to emigrate did explore the country on the Arkansas and White rivers, which they were pleased with, and had notified the President of their "anxious desire for the full and complete ratification of his promise" to give them lands there in exchange for those they held in Georgia; and, for that purpose, the treaty of 1817 was made. Fortunate would it have been, sir, for Georgia, and for the United States, if that treaty had not been set aside by the subsequent one of 1819. If the first contract had been adhered to, Georgia would not now be unjustly charged, as she has been, with bad faith and inhumanity; nor would any complaint have been made by her against the General Government for the non-performance of the compact of 1802.

The preamble to the treaty of 1819 states that the greater part of the Cherokee nation had expressed an earnest desire to remain on this side of the Mississippi. The United States, notwithstanding her engagements to Georgia, and without consulting her, chose to gratify them. And hence all the difficulties with the Cherokees.

Now, sir, I say boldly, and without fear of contradiction, that bad faith is not in this case imputable to Georgia, but to the United States, for failing to carry into effect the compact of 1802.

I shall now, Mr. Chairman, proceed to notice the gentleman's charge of inhumanity towards the Indians; and here, sir, I shall not find it necessary to refer to documents to prove what I say, though your library furnishes, as I am told, abundant evidence on this point. History, and the information of every gentleman of this body, will establish the fact that whatever may have been the legislation of Georgia in regard to these people, (and I candidly admit I have not always approved of it,) that she has no cause to apprehend any thing from a comparison between her and her sister States in the treatment of Indians. The best evidence in our favor is, that while the Indians in Georgia have increased in number, in most of the States they have diminished, and in some are extinct. Does it, sir, become the gentleman from Virginia to talk about humanity to Indians? to rail against what he may consider their oppression by other States? I ask that gentleman, what has become of the Indians who were once the sole occupants of all the lands in his own State? Where are the Pamunkies, the Nansemonds, and the Appamattoxes, the Rappahannocks, the Chickahomies, and the gigantic Susquehannocks? Where are they, sir? I put the question, Mr. Chairman, not to you, but to the honorable gentleman from Virginia. Are they not extinct, annihilated, or driven to the wilds of the far West? I can assure the gentleman from Virginia that I have no unfriendly feeling to his State; it is my native land, and I feel for it much affection—perhaps nearly as much as he does; but, much as I love Virginia, I love Georgia still more.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Virginia made one remark in regard to my State which I was particularly sorry to hear from him. He said that Georgia, for persisting to execute her laws in regard to the Indians, and for refusing to obey the mandates of the Supreme Court, ought to have been "whipped into obedience" by the General Government. Whipped into obedience! Is that, sir, the honorable gentleman's State rights doctrine? I am sure it is not held to be orthodox doctrine by his State. Sir, I hope to God that I may not live to see the day, and that my children's children may not live to see it, when it shall be deemed necessary to "whip into obedience" any State for the assertion of her rights. But, sir, as some of the generals sent to the South have been thought rather slow in their movements, it is my wish (should it be deemed expedient to send one there on such an errand as this) that the gentleman from Virginia be selected to perform this operation of "whipping into obedience." I promise him, sir, that he will find a warm reception, and be happy if permitted to retrace his steps.

As so much has been said, Mr. Chairman, against Georgia, it may not be deemed obtrusive or irrelevant if I should say something in her favor; and, sir, with your permission, and that of the committee, I will briefly recapitulate a part of what she has done for herself and for this Union. She fought, sir, by the side of her sisters, and as valiantly as any of them, to achieve the liberty of this country. Her Clarks, and her Jacksons, her McIntoshes, and her Twiggses, are known in the history of the revolutionary war; as are the Cummings, the Applings, the Floyds, and the Newmans, in that of the late war. While menaced by the Indians on her extensive frontier, and the Britons on her seacoast, Georgia sent a considerable army to defend the then infant Territory of Alabama, (bone of our bone and flesh of our flesh,) which had been invaded by the enemy. When the Indian war broke out recently in Florida, our volunteers rushed to the standard of their country, as they have in the war with the Creeks. The bravery of Captain Garmany, and of his officers and men, and of Captain Horne, and his small detachment, when assailed by numbers greatly superior, is worthy of all praise.

But, sir, I can name circumstances to show that, in devotion to this Union, in public spirit and genuine patriotism, Georgia is not behind any of her sister States.

At a most critical period of the late war with Great Britain, when several of the Southern States had been invaded; after this Capitol had been laid in ashes, when your Treasury was empty, your credit tottering, and national bankruptcy was staring us in the face; when your Treasury notes, sir, which bore interest, were spurned as trash, and a preference over them given to notes of banks in this District, these last being at a discount of twenty per cent.; at this gloomy time, sir, when your Government could not furnish a dollar to the contractor or quartermaster of your army—at this crisis in your affairs, sir, what did not Georgia do? Sir, she poured out her treasury for the defence of the country; she furnished money to feed your soldiers, and to procure forage and transportation. She did more, sir; her patriotic Governor, Peter Early, (whose memory should be held dear by all Americans, and is revered by every Georgian,) pledged the faith of the State, and his own private fortune, to get loans from the banks for the use of the United States. This, sir, came within my own knowledge; and I doubt whether the interest paid by Georgia on loans thus obtained for the United States has yet been repaid to her. I know, sir, that it was, while General Mitchell was Governor of Georgia, and Mr. Rush Secretary of the Treasury, applied for and refused, on the ground that the Government never paid interest!

Mr. Chairman, I thank the committee for their patience and attention. I did not intend to have spoken on this occasion, and should not, but for the attack made upon my State by the gentleman from Virginia. Her character I will defend here and elsewhere.

Mr. CHAPMAN followed, in reply to Mr. ADAMS, and in defence of the validity of the treaty, which was made in good faith, and had been approved of by a majority of the Cherokee nation. He went on to show that such was the fact, that the treaty had undergone all the forms necessary, and that it had become a law binding upon both parties. The only objection was a technical one, arising out of some mere informality in the preliminaries; and in proof of this he cited the letters from John Ross and others to the Secretary of War; which chief, Mr. C. maintained, had himself acted with bad faith. This was the first instance of a treaty with these Indians where the inquiry had ever been made whether it was approved of by a majority of the nation or not, though there was no evidence to show that a majority of them, or rather of their chiefs, were not consenting to it. The protest was not a paper of that character deserving the consideration of the House; for, though he would not pronounce it a forgery, it was impossible, from the circumstances, to be authentic. The treaty was made at New Echota in December last, and it was impossible, out of a population of sixteen thousand individuals, scattered over a country of hundreds of miles in extent, that fifteen thousand of them could have examined its provisions so as to be enabled to pass their opinion upon it in so short a time. He then went on to show that the stipulations of the treaty were highly advantageous to the Indians, and gave them far more than an ad valorem equivalent for their lands.

Mr. HOAR moved that the committee rise, ($\frac{1}{2}$ to 11, P. M.) Lost: Ayes 20, noes 100.

Mr. CAMBRELENG suggested that the bill be brought into the House and there discussed to-morrow.

Mr. BRIGGS preferred going into committee to-morrow morning at 9 o'clock, and proceeding with the bill, instead of having midnight sessions. Where was the necessity of passing the bill through committee to-night?

Mr. CAMBRELENG replied, that if not brought out of committee to-night, it would require two thirds afterwards to pass the bill. If, said Mr. C., you have had midnight sessions it is not our fault.

Mr. BRIGGS. Whose fault has it been?

Mr. CAMBRELENG. Those who have made long speeches.

Mr. WISE said he had made long speeches on that floor, and intentionally, and he now said it, and gentlemen ought to know it, for he was always candid, and had no sinister motive, no secret motive or secret design about this matter; he warned gentlemen that he did intend to oppose this bill, not in an unfair way, unless he was forced to do it at the risk of his health, and he would die in the attempt to defeat it.

Mr. HOAR then proceeded to argue upon the invalidity of the Cherokee treaty; and that it was not a fair compact, and was deficient of the requisites which should make it binding. He contended that no evidence had been adduced to show that the treaty was a treaty, a compact between parties competent to enter into it. On these points, the honorable member dwelt at some length. Mr. H. concluded, and

Mr. LOVE then took the floor, and was proceeding to contend that the treaty was no treaty, when he gave way to

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, who moved that the committee rise.

Mr. GRANTLAND said the friends of the bill had no disposition to harass the House, and he hoped they would consent to take up the bill to-morrow morning, at 10 o'clock. In that he wished the friends of the bill to acquiesce; and if there was any opposition to it, he hoped it would be made manifest.

Mr. GILLET said he rose to make a suggestion or two to the committee, and particularly to the friends of the bill. We have now but four days remaining of the present session. It is the general impression that Monday, the last day of the session, which is one of the four, will not be occupied, to any considerable extent, in the transaction of business. Many supposed we were to meet in the morning, read and correct the journal, and then adjourn. This would leave us but three days for transaction of business. By our rules, we cannot send an original bill from this House to the Senate on either of the three last days of the session. It results from this, that we have but one day after this to send our bills to the Senate. This bill is made the special order for to-morrow at twelve o'clock; and we should have only from that time until the adjournment of the Senate to-morrow, which, if it adjourns at the usual hour, will be five or six o'clock, in which to dispose of this bill. He would ask if it was expected this bill, with all the opposition it had to encounter, could be got out of the committee, be engrossed, read a third time, and passed, in that brief period? We may be told that if it is not passed during to-morrow, the joint rules may be suspended, and allow it to go to the Senate. This can be done; but it requires two thirds of the votes of those present to suspend the rules; and he would ask the friends of the bill if they were willing to weaken their hold, and place the measure at the mercy of one third? He, for one, as a friend of the bill, could not consent to it. Let us act now.

But we are told that we may commence two hours earlier to-morrow morning, and have that much more time to devote to this bill. Mr. G. said he could not yield his assent to that. We have only from ten to twelve to-morrow morning, in which to pass and send to the other House several important bills. He said this on the presumption that this bill would consume the residue of the day. Are we entirely to abandon all the other important bills? He would refer to a few only, to show what were remaining, which ought to be attended to before we finally adjourn. There was the bill on the subject of gold coins, the bill to fix the compensation of custom-house officers, the bill concerning ports of entry and drawback of duties, and to reorganize the Treasury Department, which were reported by himself; and there were others for the erection of custom-houses and marine hospitals, reported from the committee of which he was a member. The substantial interests of the country required these bills to be acted upon at this session. There were other bills, from other committees, equally important, he presumed, which ought to be considered. There were necessary appropriation bills still behind. He would ask, are we to jeopard all these, by placing them in the power of one third in each House? He thought not. It seemed to him that our duty to the country required that we should finish this bill before we adjourn this evening. If any of the bills which he had in charge should fail to be acted upon, he should consider himself blameless. It was known to all that not one of the bills he had mentioned had been in orders once they were reported.

A special order was made on the 26th of January last, and it had continued until within a few days past. At the moment of its expiration another was made, under which we are now acting: So it will be seen that from the 26th of January last to this time, no public bills have been in order in this House except those included in these special orders. From that day to this one third of the House has controlled all other public business. Thus far he had found it impossible to get up any of the public bills he had reported. He felt it to be his duty to make this explanation concerning the state of our business, which he considered a sufficient justification for desiring to finish this bill before we adjourn for to-day.

H. or R.]

District Banks—Indian Treaty Appropriations.

After some further remarks from Messrs. WISE, ADAMS, and LEWIS, who suggested that they meet to-morrow at nine o'clock, allow a reasonable length of time, and, meeting the bill on its merits, conclude its consideration. He asked if that was the general understanding of the committee.

Mr. CHAMBERS, of Kentucky, would answer for himself, that he would obstinately resist this bill to his utmost power of physical strength, and would sit there for hours, till after daylight, to defeat it.

After a few words from Messrs. LEWIS, HUNTS-MAN, and R. M. JOHNSON, the committee rose and reported.

The Speaker having resumed the chair,

Mr. LEWIS said, with a view of giving the members of the House, as well the enemies as the friends of the bill, a full opportunity of discussing it, he moved that it be taken up at 11 o'clock to-morrow. Agreed to.

On motion of Mr. REED,

The House then adjourned.

THURSDAY, JUNE 30.

DISTRICT BANKS.

On motion of Mr. THOMAS, in conformity with a special order, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill from the Senate "to extend the charters of the banks of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes."

On motion of Mr. W. B. SHEPARD, the bill was amended by striking out the words "and funds equivalent to specie," wherever they occurred in the bill.

Mr. THOMAS asked the yeas and nays on ordering the bill to be read a third time, and they were ordered.

After some remarks from Mr. GILLET,

Mr. GARLAND, of Virginia, moved to strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert a substitute, renewing the charters of the several banks, as they now exist, till the 4th of July, 1838.

Mr. THOMAS moved to amend the amendment by striking out the Farmers and Mechanics' Bank of Georgetown. Lost.

After some remarks by Mr. THOMAS,

Mr. W. B. SHEPARD said he understood, when this bill was taken up, it was with the distinct understanding among those gentlemen who had the matter particularly in charge, that the House should express its opinion without debate. If, however, the debate was persisted in, he would reply to some assertions which had been made, otherwise he was disposed to comply rigidly with what seemed to be the wishes of the House. As regards the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. GARLAND,] at the request of several gentlemen, he would observe, for the information of the House, that he had no objection whatever to its adoption, but would rather prefer the amendment to the bill as it came from the Senate. It would allow the public mind time to recover from its present excited state upon the subject of banking, and for the House to act more understandingly upon this subject.

Mr. FAIRFIELD moved to strike out "4th of July, 1838," and insert "4th of March, 1837." Lost.

The motion of Mr. GARLAND was agreed to: Yeas 128, nays 50.

Mr. LANE demanded the previous question on ordering the bill to a third reading, and it was seconded.

The main question being taken, the amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill read a third time to-day: Yeas 126, nays 55.

The bill was read a third time; and the question being on its passage,

Mr. LANE asked the previous question; which the House refused to second.

Mr. MANN, of New York, moved to lay the bill on the table. Lost.

The bill was then passed, without a division.

INDIAN TREATY APPROPRIATIONS.

The House, in pursuance of the special order, went into Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of the bill making appropriations to carry into effect certain Indian treaties. The question being on the motion of Mr. ADAMS to strike out the appropriations for the Cherokee treaty,

Mr. LOVE resumed his remarks. He was opposed to the treaty. He examined the history of the negotiation, and said the evidence was, that one of the parties did not contract; and asserted that it was affirmatively proved that the reverse was the fact, and that the Cherokee nation was almost universally opposed to this treaty. He read the following paragraph:

"And whereas the said commissioners did appoint and notify a general council of the nation, to convene at New Echota on the 21st day of December, 1835, and informed them that the commissioners would be prepared to make a treaty with the Cherokee people who should assemble there, and those who did not come they should conclude gave their assent and sanction to whatever should be transacted at this council; and the people having met in council according to said notice"—

And argued that, if the commissioners had gone into the woods any where, and put up such a notice on a stick, and then had collected five Indians, the treaty would have been as binding as it was with two, or five hundred, which were said to have assembled. He said the truth of the whole matter had been disclosed by Major Davis, who had referred to many gentlemen now in this city for testimony as to his character, particularly to a gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. R. M. JOHNSON,] upon whom he would call to state what he knew.

Mr. R. M. JOHNSON, in reply to a question addressed to him by Mr. LOVE, in the course of the remarks of that gentleman, rose and said: That being called upon to state what he knew of the standing of Major William M. Davis, he would, with very great pleasure, state that he had known him for many years, and very intimately; and that no man stood higher in the estimation of all who knew him, for honor, integrity, patriotism, and firmness. But to prevent any wrong impressions as to the feeling and opinions of Major Davis on this subject, he would add that he felt justified, from all his correspondence and various conversations with him, taking all the facts together up to this time, in saying that Major Davis, placed in his (Mr. JOHNSON'S) situation, under all the circumstances of the case, would vote as he (Mr. J.) intended to vote, to carry into effect this treaty with the Cherokees.

Mr. LOVE went on to argue that the testimony of Major Davis, thus enforced by testimony to his high character, was ample to show that the treaty was obtained by fraud; and that to enforce its execution would be unjust. He also referred to a history of similar transactions, given by a Mr. Page, which was fully confirmed by the evidence of Major Davis. Mr. Page was there at the time, a guest of John Ross, in company with Schermerhorn, and knew the transactions relative to the treaty; and he knew that, at the council, the treaty was rejected by a large majority; and that, about the same time, John Ross and this Mr. Page were both taken by the Georgia guard, and carried into Georgia, where they were kept about two weeks. He said, if these two witnesses were to be believed, this Schermerhorn had acted in a way to disgrace a tyrant; and the whole history of this transaction, as shown in the documents, exhibited conduct wholly repugnant to the doctrines of the religion he professed, to do unto others as he would that others should do unto him. That a minister of religion, claiming to be commissioned from on high, should turn a cheat upon principle, only confirmed an opinion he had long held, that clergymen, turned politicians and office-hunters, are among the worst of bad men.

He deprecated the idea that such a man's doings, with all the evidence to show their baseness, should be made the ground of action of this Government to enforce a treaty thus made and protested against by the party so deeply interested. Mr. L. also examined the treaty, with a view to show that the contracting parties on the part of the Indians were not duly authorized, and that the nation had never ratified the treaty. When it could be shown that the treaty had been duly ratified by both parties to the contract, he would vote for any sum necessary to carry it into effect; and the amount of money required would be no obstacle in the way, for he approved of a high-minded, liberal course of dealing towards these red men. It was no answer to say that this treaty had been ratified and confirmed by the Senate; that was only by one party; and he asked if it had been ratified by the Cherokee nation? If it had not been so ratified by that nation, it was not binding upon them, and he would not vote for an appropriation. If they were to be treated with at all, it should be fairly and properly, as with other nations, and he would not have the Government go with a treaty in one hand and a sword in the other, to say, sign this paper, or we will drive you to it by force. The answer, that this was the best thing the Indians could do, and those who had any regard for them would vote to carry it into effect, changed entirely the character of the bill. It purported to be to carry a treaty into effect; but if the argument used was sound, and if it was determined to keep no faith with them, but to carry them away by force, at the point of the bayonet, he should like to have it so expressed in the bill, that it might tell the truth. As it now stood, he would never vote a dollar to carry into effect a pretended treaty, in all its circumstances blacker than hell. He had never heard of a treaty so obtained and so attempted to be enforced; and he would wash his hands of the blood that might, and probably would, be shed if it was attempted to be enforced.

Mr. LANE said he did not rise to go into the merits of the bill, nor to defend the administration; they needed no defence; but he rose to answer an inquiry of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. LOVE,] "who is this Schermerhorn?" He went on to say that he had long known Mr. Schermerhorn to be an honorable man, venerable in appearance and character, whose life and conversation were in accordance with his professions; and he thought there were many members of the House who knew him to be worthy of confidence as a man of truth and integrity.

Mr. HARDIN went at length into an examination of the treaty-making power, which, he said, by the constitution, was vested in the President and the Senate; and when, without violating the constitution and principles of government of the country, those powers had concluded and ratified a treaty, he thought it not competent for the House to inquire into the authority or conduct of the agent empowered to make the treaty. The duty of this House was only to appropriate all reasonable sums of money called for in the fulfilment of treaties so made.

The inquiry proper to be made by this House now was, whether this treaty had been concluded and ratified in a proper manner. He believed it had; and the remarks that the agents of the other party were not duly authorized, he thought not proper for the consideration of the House; that question might have affected the ratification. Neither did he think it a proper subject of inquiry by the House, whether the treaty would or would not operate injustice and oppression. It was a treaty which the President was competent to make, which the Senate had ratified; and if it violated no part of the constitution, if it proposed no dismemberment of the Union, if it deprived the people of this country of no right, then he thought the House was bound to make the appropriation necessary to carry it into effect.

Mr. ROBERTSON went at length into an examination of the details and principles of the treaty, and examined the evidence contended for by the friends of the bill, to show that the treaty was made by the Cherokee nation; and it having been said that John Ross and others were willing to submit to the decision of the Senate, and ought not now to protest against its execution, he read the following letter:

"WAR DEPARTMENT, Feb. 28, 1835.

"SIR: Having submitted a proposition for a final adjustment of our difficulties with the Government of the United States, and understanding that the President deems it to be too extravagant, we must beg that the subject be referred to the Senate for its sense on the question: the President having often told us that he would go as far as the Senate would allow him in regard to money matters.

"We therefore trust that he will adopt this course. Being extremely desirous that this unhappy controversy might be speedily adjusted, and deeply sensible of our dependent condition, and confiding in the liberal justice of the United States Government, we are prepared, so far as we are concerned, to abide the award of the sense of the American Senate upon our proposition, and to recommend the same for the final determination of our nation.

"We have the honor to be, sir, very respectfully, your obedient humble servants,

"JNO. ROSS.

"R. TAYLOR.

"DANL. MCCOY.

"SAML. GUNTER.

"WM. ROGERS.

To the Hon. LEWIS CASS,
Secretary of War."

To this he replied that they were willing to submit the terms of a treaty to be made and their negotiation here, and it did not follow that they were willing to submit a treaty to be made at New Echota afterwards; nor did it follow that they must assent to such a treaty. Mr. R. then examined the evidence to show that the agents were not duly authorized, and that the treaty was not properly and fairly concluded; which was wholly contradicted, and was conclusive to show that the treaty ought not to be enforced. He contended at length that the treaty, to be binding upon the Cherokees, must be the act of a majority of the Cherokee people. It was an act of cession of their lands, and nothing less than the assent of a majority, fairly obtained, could be a sufficient ratification. Here the treaty had been made by a few persons, collected by Schermerhorn, and the whole tribe now protest solemnly that those persons acted without authority. The commissioners were instructed to convene the whole people, and not to treat with any other authority; and in this respect the commissioners had violated their instructions. Mr. R. then went into an argument at length, upon the various points of evidence and the principles involved; and suggested that this treaty ought to be set aside, and another treaty made with the whole Cherokee nation. If this course was not pursued, if the treaty was to be enforced, he anticipated that it would be necessary to send an armed force to execute it; and he hoped the magnanimity of the House would not pursue a course so unjust and so illiberal.

When Mr. ROBERTSON had concluded his remarks, the House took the usual recess.

EVENING SESSION.

DEATH OF EX-PRESIDENT MADISON.

On the Speaker's resuming the chair, at 4 o'clock, he announced the following message from the President of the United States:

WASHINGTON, June 30, 1836.

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

It becomes my painful duty to announce to you the melancholy intelligence of the death of James Madison, ex-President of the United States. He departed this life at half past six o'clock on the morning of the 28th instant, full of years and of honor.

I hasten this communication, in order that Congress may adopt such measures as may be proper to testify their sense of the respect which is due to the memory of one whose life has contributed so essentially to the happiness and glory of his country, and to the good of mankind.

ANDREW JACKSON.

The message having been read,

Mr. PATTON, of Virginia, said that the particular relation in which he stood, as his immediate representative and personal friend, towards the great public benefactor whose decease, "full of years and full of honors," had just been announced by the message of the President of the United States, had induced the Virginia delegation to devolve upon him the mournful duty of proposing for the adoption of the House the resolution he was about to offer, for the purpose of determining upon the course to be pursued for giving expression to the national sensibility to the great bereavement we had suffered.

I do not, however, Mr. Speaker, feel it to be a suitable occasion in which to employ or indulge in any studied phrase of panegyric upon the public or private virtues of the venerable man whose loss we deplore.

It is true, sir, that, early imbued with the sincerest veneration for the character of Mr. Madison, with the profoundest admiration of his talents, and the warmest gratitude for his eminent and varied public services, there is no language that I could employ which would exaggerate the deep emotion with which I have been impressed by the melancholy intelligence of his death. And I am sure that it would be equally impossible for me to speak of him in any terms that would depict an individual pre-eminent in all the virtues of social and private life, or one that combined the merits of a patriot, statesman, and sage, that would not find a ready and full response in the minds and hearts of all who hear me. But it is not a feeble effort of this kind, such as I could make, nor even by the highest effort of human eloquence, the lofty inspiration of poetry, "the storied urn or animated bust," that can rear an appropriate monument to the memory of Mr. Madison, or erect a suitable monument to his fame.

His appropriate and enduring eulogium is to be found inscribed in those pages of his country's history which are identified with her honor and glory. It is engraved upon every pillar of that splendid fabric of constitutional liberty under which we live. It is identified with the existence of that glorious union of confederated States which he contributed so essentially to form, and the maintenance and preservation of which, with all its numerous blessings, were the constant objects of his care during his long, laborious, and useful public life, and of his most earnest and anxious solicitude in the shades of retirement.

And, Mr. Speaker, another and not less decisive and more affecting evidence of his merit and title to public gratitude will be found in the deep grief with which his loss will be deplored by every man in the nation as a great national calamity. I offer the resolution which I now send to the chair.

Resolved, That a committee be appointed on the part of this House, to join such committee as may be appointed on the part of the Senate, to consider and report by what token of respect and affection it may be proper for the Congress of the United States to express the deep sensibility of the nation to the event of the decease of Mr. Madison, just announced by the President of the United States to this House.

The resolution having been read,

Mr. ADAMS rose, and addressed the Speaker. By the general sense of the House, (said he,) it is with perfect propriety that the delegation from the Commonwealth of Virginia have taken the lead in the melancholy duty of proposing the measures suitable to be adopted as testimonials of the veneration due from the Legislature of the Union to the memory of the departed patriot and sage, the native of their soil, and the citizen of their country.

It is not without some hesitation, and some diffidence, that I have risen to offer in my own behalf, and in that of my colleagues upon this floor, and of our common constituents, to join our voice, at once of mourning and of exultation, at the event announced to both Houses of Congress by the message from the President of the United States—of mourning at the bereavement which has befallen our common country by the decease of one of her most illustrious sons; of exultation at the spectacle afforded to the observation of the civilized world, and for the emulation of aftertimes, by the close of a life of usefulness and of glory, after forty years of service in trusts of the highest dignity and splendor that a confiding country could bestow, succeeded by twenty years of retirement and private life, not inferior, in the estimation of the virtuous and the wise, to the honors of the highest station that ambition can ever attain.

Of the public life of James Madison what could I say that is not deeply impressed upon the memory and upon the heart of every one within the sound of my voice? Of his private life, what but must meet an echoing shout of applause from every voice within this hall? Is it not in a pre-eminent degree by emanations from his mind that we are assembled here as the Representatives of the people and States of this Union? Is it not transcendently by his exertions that we all address each other here by the endearing appellation of countrymen and fellow-citizens? Of that band of benefactors of the human race, the founders of the constitution of the United States, James Madison is the last who has gone to his reward. Their glorious work has survived them all. They have transmitted the precious bond of union to us, now entirely a succeeding generation to them. May it never cease to be a voice of admonition to us of our duty to transmit the inheritance unimpaired to our children of the rising age.

Of the personal relations with this great man, which gave rise to the long career of public service in which twenty years of my own life have been engaged, it becomes me not to speak. The fulness of the heart must be silent, even to the suppression of the overflowings of gratitude and affection.

Cherokee Treaty.

[H. OF R.]

A message was received from the Senate, announcing the adoption of the following resolution by that body:

"IN SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
June 30, 1836.

"Resolved, That a committee be appointed on the part of the Senate, to join such a committee as may be appointed on the part of the House, to consider and report by what token of respect and affection it may be proper for the Congress of the United States to express the deep sensibility of the nation to the event of the decease of Mr. Madison, just announced by the President of the United States.

"Ordered, That Mr. RIVES, Mr. CLAY, Mr. CALHOUN, Mr. GRUNDY, Mr. BUCHANAN, Mr. LEIGH, and Mr. TALLMAGE, be the committee.

"Attest: WALTER LOWRIE, Sec'y."

The House concurred in the resolution, and, according to a previous order of the House, the committee was ordered to consist of one from each State in the Union; and the following gentlemen were appointed:

Mr. PATTON, of Virginia; Mr. MASON, of Maine; Mr. CUSHMAN, of New Hampshire; Mr. ADAMS, of Massachusetts; Mr. TOUCHEY, of Connecticut; Mr. PEARCE, of Rhode Island; Mr. ALLEN, of Vermont; Mr. WARD, of New York; Mr. PARKER, of New Jersey; Mr. ANTHONY, of Pennsylvania; Mr. MILLIGAN, of Delaware; Mr. WASHINGTON, of Maryland; Mr. DEBERRY, of North Carolina; Mr. GRIFFIN, of South Carolina; Mr. COFFEE, of Georgia; Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky; Mr. DUNLAP, of Tennessee; Mr. MCLENE, of Ohio; Mr. RIPLEY, of Louisiana; Mr. CARR, of Indiana; Mr. CLAIBORNE, of Mississippi; Mr. REYNOLDS, of Illinois; Mr. LYON, of Alabama; Mr. HARRISON, of Missouri.

CHEROKEE TREATY.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole (Mr. LINCOLN in the chair) on the "bill making further appropriations for carrying into effect certain Indian treaties, and for other purposes."

The question pending was the motion of Mr. ADAMS to strike out the following clause:

"For the amount stipulated to be paid for the lands ceded in the first article of the treaty with the Cherokees of the 29th of December, 1835, deducting the cost of the land to be provided for them west of the Mississippi, under the second article of the treaty, $4,500,000."

Mr. CALHOON, of Kentucky, addressed the committee at some length in opposition to making the appropriation. He did not regard this as a treaty at all, and would not vote this appropriation under any consideration. Should it be said that the Government, because it had the power, should force this fraud upon the Cherokee nation? for no man could say that it was a treaty. He would take occasion to ask the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means to state the items on which the thirty-five thousand dollars for bearing the expenses of making this treaty were based.

Mr. CAMBRELENG stated that twenty-nine thousand dollars were for bearing the expenses of the delegation from the western to the eastern Cherokees, and from that to Washington; and six thousand dollars for the expenses of the commissioners in the negotiation of the treaty.

Mr. CALHOON resumed, and said he was satisfied with the explanation; but he would like to see the vouchers from which this appropriation was made out, or to know whether there were any. He then went on to show, by a reference to letters, that the statements of Mr. Schermerhorn, in relation to Major Davis, were unfounded in fact.

The question was taken on the motion to strike out; which was decided in the negative, without a division.

Mr. WISE then offered an amendment to strike out the clause above alluded to, and insert an appropriation of $4,500,000, for the purchase of a tract of country west of the Mississippi, for the use of the Cherokee nation, omitting all reference to the treaty. Mr. W. denied that there was a treaty, and called upon gentlemen to say whether there was one.

Mr. DUNLAP replied that there had been a treaty made under the authority of the President, and confirmed by the Senate; and this treaty was made under the constitution of our country.

Mr. WISE resumed, and denied that there was any bonafide treaty; because the Cherokee nation had never agreed to this treaty, and now almost unanimously protested against it. He contended that the whole proceeding in relation to the negotiation was a fraud upon the Indians. This Mr. Schermerhorn was a complete "rawhead and bloody-bones" to these ignorant Indians, while their chiefs were at Washington, and he had made with them what he called a treaty with a very small portion of the Cherokees. Mr. W. quoted from various documents, and addressed the committee for about three hours.

Mr. PEYTON followed, in reply to Mr. WISE, and in support of the appropriation. He denounced Messrs. Schermerhorn and Currie as the two worst agents that could have been selected in all God's creation, and entered into an examination of the character of all Indian treaties, which could not be weighed by the rigid rules of Puffendorf, Grotius, and Vattel. So far from their having been made, or avowedly made, between equal contracting parties, they had always been made by force. Mr. P. then moved that the committee rise and report the bill to the House.

Mr. WISE remarked that his amendment was pending, and he trusted it met his friend from Tennessee's view. Let us (said Mr. W.) vote the money, but strike out all about a treaty, which was a thing not in esse.

Mr. BOON said he had heard the letters of Messrs. Davis and Schermerhorn read, but neither of them weighed any thing with him, coming, as they did, from persons who were interested. It was enough for him to know that the treaty had been approved by the Executive, and ratified by two thirds of the Senate; and he would vote for it, in that case, if its stipulations took every dollar of the surplus revenue out of the Treasury. Let the contracting parties—the President of the United States, and the commissioners making the treaty, and the Senate of the United States confirming it—be responsible for the act; he would vote for the appropriation.

The amendment of Mr. WISE was then disagreed to without a division.

Mr. BELL proposed an additional item of $30,000 to defray the expenses of removing the Choctaw Indians residing within the State of Mississippi to their location west of the Mississippi river; which was agreed to.

Mr. B. moved an amendment fixing the time of the payment of the pension to Colonel Gideon Morgan, from 22d of March, 1814, agreeably to the 14th article of the Cherokee treaty. [Colonel M. was wounded at the battle of the Horse-Shoe.] Agreed to.

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved to increase the item of $35,000 for the negotiatory and other expenses attending the Cherokee treaty to $37,212; which was agreed to.

Mr. C. also moved an additional clause appropriating $7,000 for surveying the lands set apart for the Cherokees under the stipulations of the treaty. Agreed to.

Mr. C. moved an additional section, providing that no part of the appropriation heretofore made under the treaty with the eastern Creeks should be paid to any Indians engaged in hostilities against the United States, except in such a change of circumstances as to induce the President of the United States to direct otherwise. Agreed to.

Mr. C. also moved a further section, extending the provisions of a bill relating to the Winnebago Indians; which was agreed to.

Mr. WISE called for a statement, item by item, of the appropriation of $35,000 for expenses attending the negotiation of the said treaty, and of the delegation.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said the gentleman from Kentucky had put the same question, which Mr. C. had then answered. Mr. C. then stated the items composing the aggregate, part of which were provided for under the fifth article of the treaty.

Mr. WISE was not satisfied with the explanation, and he moved to strike out the clause as follows:

"For expenses attending the negotiation of the said treaty, and of the delegation, according to the fifth article of said supplemental treaty, thirty-five thousand dollars." Lost without a count.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the committee rose (at a quarter to 9 P. M.) and reported the bill and amendments to the House.

The Speaker having resumed the chair, the amendments of the Committee of the Whole were severally concurred in without a division; and the question being on the engrossment of the bill,

Mr. ADAMS asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were: Yeas 125, nays 43, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Ash, Barton, Bean, Bell, Bockee, Boon, Bouldin, Bunch, Burns, Cambreleng, Campbell, Carter, Casey, Chaney, Chapman, Chapin, J. F. H. Claiborne, Cleveland, Coles, Connor, Craig, Cramer, Cushman, Dickerson, Doubleday, Dromgoole, Dunlap, Fairfield, Farlin, Forester, Fowler, French, Fry, William K. Fuller, J. Garland, R. Whittlesey, L. Williams, Wise—43.

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and having been engrossed, was read a third time.

Mr. VINTON asked for the yeas and nays on the final passage; which were ordered, and were: Yeas 127, nays 54, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Ash, Barton, Bean, Bell, Bockee, Bouldin, Boyd, Bunch, Burns, Cambreleng, Campbell, Casey, Chaney, Chapman, Chapin, J. F. H. Mason, McCarty, McKennan, Mercer, Milligan, Morris, Phillips, Potts, Reed, Robertson, Russell, Slade, Taliaferro, Vinton, E. Whittlesey, L. Williams, Wise—54.

So the bill was passed.

INDIAN HOSTILITIES.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the committee took up the "bill making appropriations for the suppression of Indian hostilities, and for other purposes."

[The bill made applicable a balance of a former appropriation of $1,000,000, and further appropriated the sum of $2,400,000 for the objects stated in the title.]

Mr. STORER said he had voted this evening upwards of $5,000,000 to remove these Indians peaceably, and he did so on proper grounds; but the document from the War Department did not, in his opinion, justify this additional call of two millions and a half. Moreover, he had heard it stated that the Creek war was at an end. He could conceive, then, of no other object for this large appropriation than this: that the magnificent scheme of fortifications having been voted down by the House and the Senate, the object now was to exhaust as much as possible of the surplus to be distributed in January next. He was not disposed to stint these appropriations; and, if satisfied they were necessary, he would go to the verge of liberality. Mr. S. moved to reduce the second section to $1,000,000.

Mr. WHITE, of Florida, entered into an explanation of the necessity of the appropriation. There were now between six and seven thousand men employed in the Creek campaign. A portion of the appropriation was already expended, and drafts were coming in every day. No one knew for certain that the Creek war was ended; but it would be better to appropriate as much as might be necessary in case of exigency, since no more would be expended than was required.

Mr. STORER was satisfied with the explanation, and withdrew the amendment.

Mr. PEYTON moved an additional section, providing that the horses of the mounted volunteers received into the service under the act passed at the present session of Congress should be sold as the property of the Government, when the said volunteers were discharged from the service, and each volunteer should receive the sum at which each horse was valued at the time he entered the service. Lost.

The bill was then laid aside.

WEST POINT ACADEMY.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the committee

then took up the "bill making appropriations for the Military Academy of the United States, for the year 1836."

An amendment, inserting some small additional item, was moved by Mr. INGERSOLL, and agreed to.

Mr. PIERCE, of New Hampshire, rose and addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Chairman: An attempt was made during the last Congress to bring the subject of the reorganization of the Military Academy before the country, through a report of a committee. The same thing has been done during the present session, again and again, but all efforts have proved alike unsuccessful! Still, you do not cease to call for appropriations; you require the people's money for the support of the institution, while you refuse them the light necessary to enable them to judge of the propriety of your annual requisitions.

Whether the amount proposed to be appropriated by the bill upon your table is too great or too small, or precisely sufficient to cover the current expenses of the institution, is a matter into which I will not at present inquire; but I shall feel bound to oppose the bill in every stage of its progress. I cannot vote a single dollar until the resolution of inquiry, presented by my friend from Kentucky, [Mr. HAWES,] at an early day in the session, shall be first taken up and disposed of. I am aware, sir, that it will be said, because I have heard the same declaration on a former occasion, that this is not the proper time to discuss the merits of the institution; that the bill is to make provision for expenses already incurred in part; and whatever opinions may be entertained upon the necessity of a reorganization, the appropriation must be made. I say to gentlemen who are opposed to the principles of the institution, and to those who believe that abuses exist, which ought to be exposed and corrected, that now is their only time, and this the only opportunity during the present session, to attain their object, and I trust they will steadily resist the bill until its friends shall find it necessary to take up the resolution of inquiry and give it its proper reference.

Sir, why has this investigation been resisted? Is it not an institution which has already cost this country more than three millions of dollars, for which you propose, in this very bill, an appropriation of more than one hundred and thirty thousand dollars, and which at the same time, in the estimation of a large portion of the citizens of this Union, has failed, eminently failed, to fulfil the objects for which it was established, of sufficient interest and importance to claim the consideration of a committee of this House, and of the House itself?

I should have expected the resolution of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. HAWES,] merely proposing an inquiry, to pass without opposition, had I not witnessed the strong sensation, nay, excitement, that was produced here, at the last session, by the presentation of his yet unpublished report. Sir, if you would have an exhibition of highly excited feeling, it requires little observation to learn that you may produce it at any moment by attacking such laws as confer exclusive and gratuitous privileges. The adoption of the resolution of inquiry, at the last session of Congress, and the appointment of a select committee under it, were made occasion of newspaper paragraphs, which, in tone of lamentation and direful prediction, rivalled the most highly wrought specimens of the panic era. One of those articles I preserved, and have before me. It commences thus: "The architects of ruin.—This name has been appropriately given to those who are leading on the base, the ignorant, and the unprincipled, in a remorseless war upon all the guards and defences of society."

I introduce it here merely to show what are, in certain quarters, considered the guards and defences of society. After various compliments, similar to that just cited, the article proceeds: "All this is dangerous as novel, and the ultimate results cannot be contemplated without anxiety. If this spirit extends, who can check it? 'Down with the Bank;' 'down with the Military Academy;' 'down with the Judiciary;' 'down with the Senate;' will be followed by watchwords of a worse character." Here, Mr. Chairman, you have the United States Bank first, and then the Military Academy, as the guards and defences of your country. If it be so, you are indeed feebly protected. One of these guards and defences is already tottering. And who are "the architects of ruin" that have resolved its downfall? Are they the base, the ignorant, and the unprincipled? No, sir. The most pure and patriotic portion of your community; the staid, industrious, intelligent, farmers and mechanics, through a public servant, who has met responsibilities, and seconded their wishes, with equal intrepidity and success, in the camp and in the cabinet, have accomplished this great work. Mr. Chairman, there is no real danger to be apprehended from this much-dreaded levelling principle.

From the middling interest you have derived your most able and efficient support in the most gloomy and trying periods of your history. And what have they asked in return? Nothing but the common advantages and blessings of a free Government, administered under equal and impartial laws. They are responsible for no portion of your legislation, which, through its partial and unjust operation, has shaken this Union to its centre. That has had its origin in a different quarter, sustained by wealth, the wealth of monopolies, and the power and influence which wealth, thus accumulated and disposed, never fails to control. Indeed, sir, while far from demanding at your hands special favors for themselves, they have not, in my judgment, been sufficiently jealous of all legislation conferring exclusive and gratuitous privileges.

That the law creating the institution of which I am now speaking, and the practice under it, is strongly marked by both these characteristics, is apparent at a single glance. It is gratuitous, because those who are so fortunate as to obtain admission there receive their education without any obligation, except such as a sense of honor may impose, to return, either by service or otherwise, the slightest equivalent. It is exclusive, inasmuch as only one youth out of a population of more than 47,000 can participate in its advantages at the same time; and those who are successful are admitted at an age, when their characters cannot have become developed, and with very little knowledge of their adaptation, mental or physical, for military life. The system disregards one of those great principles which, carried into practice, contributed, perhaps, more than any other to render the arms of Napoleon invincible for so many years. Who does not perceive that it destroys the very life and spring of military ardor and enthusiasm, by utterly foreclosing all hope of promotion to the soldier and non-commissioned officer? However meritorious may be his services, however pre-eminent may become his qualifications for command, all is unavailing. The portcullis is dropped between him and preferment; the wisdom of your laws having provided another criterion than that of admitted courage and conduct, by which to determine who are worthy of command. They have made an Academy, where a certain number of young gentlemen are educated annually at the public expense, and to which there is, of consequence, a general rush, not so much from sentiments of patriotism and a taste for military life, as from motives less worthy—the avenue, and the only avenue, to rank in your army. These are truths, Mr. Chairman, which no man will pretend to deny; and I leave it for this House and the nation to determine whether they do not exhibit a spirit of exclusiveness, alike at variance with the genius of your Government and the efficiency and chivalrous character of your military force.

H. OF R.]

West Point Academy.

Sir, no man can feel more deeply interested in the army, or entertain a higher regard for it, than myself. My earliest recollections connect themselves fondly and gratefully with the names of the brave men who, relinquishing the quiet and security of civil life, were staking their all upon the defence of their country's rights and honor. One of the most distinguished among that noble band now occupies and honors a seat upon this floor.

It is not fit that I should indulge in expressions of personal respect and admiration, which I am sure would find a hearty response in the bosom of every member of this committee. I allude to him merely to express the hope that, on some occasion, we may have, upon this subject, the benefit of his experience and observation. And if his opinions shall differ from my own, I promise carefully to review every step by which I have been led to my present conclusions. You cannot mistake me, sir; I refer to the hero of Erie. I have declared myself the friend of the army. Satisfy me, then, what measures are best calculated to render it effective, and what all desire it to be, and I go for the proposition with my whole heart.

But I cannot believe that the Military Academy, as at present organized, is calculated to accomplish this desirable end. It may, and undoubtedly does, send forth into the country much military knowledge; but the advantage which your army, or that which will constitute your army in time of need, derives from it, is by no means commensurate with the expense you incur. Here, Mr. Chairman, permit me to say that I deny, utterly, the expediency, and the right to educate, at the public expense, any number of young men who, on the completion of their education, are not to form a portion of your military force, but to return to the walks of private life. Such was never the operation of the Military Academy until after the law of 1812; and the doctrine, so far as I have been able to ascertain, was first formally announced by a distinguished individual, at this time sufficiently jealous of the exercise of executive patronage, and greatly alarmed by what he conceived to be the tendencies of this Government to centralism and consolidation. It may be found in the report of the Secretary of War, communicated to Congress in 1819.

If it shall, upon due consideration, receive the sanction of Congress and the country, I can see no limit to the exercise of power and Government patronage. Follow out the principle, and where will it lead you? You confer upon the National Government the absolute guardianship of literature and science, military and civil; you need not stop at military science; any one, in the wide range of sciences, becomes at once a legitimate and constitutional object of your patronage; you are confined by no limit but your discretion; you have no check but your own good pleasure. If you may afford instruction, at the public expense, in the languages, in philosophy, in chemistry, and in the exact sciences, to young gentlemen who are under no obligation to enter the service of their country, but are, in fact, destined for civil life, why may you not, by parity of reasoning, provide the means of a legal, or theological, or medical education, on the ground that the recipients of your bounty will carry forth a fund of useful knowledge, that may, at some time, under some circumstances, produce a beneficial influence, and promote "the general welfare?" Sir, I fear that even some of us may live to see the day when this "general welfare" of your constitution will leave us little ground to boast of a Government of limited powers. But I did not propose at this time to discuss the abstract question of constitutional right. I will regard the expediency alone; and whether the power exist or not, its exercise, in an institution like this, is subversive of the only principle upon which a school, conducted at the public expense, can be made profitable to the public service—that of making an admission into your school, and an education there, secondary to an appointment in the army. Sir, this distinctive feature characterized all your legislation, and all executive recommendations, down to 1810.

I may as well notice here, as at any time, an answer which has always been ready when objections have been raised to this institution—an answer which, if it has not proved quite satisfactory to minds that yield their assent more readily to strong reasons than to the authority of great names, has yet, unquestionably, exercised a powerful influence upon the public mind. It has not gone forth upon the authority of an individual merely, but has been published to the world with the approbation of a committee of a former Congress. It is this: that the institution has received at different times the sanction of such names as Washington, Adams, and Jefferson; and this has been claimed with such boldness, and in a form so imposing, as almost to forbid any question of its accuracy. If this were correct, in point of fact, it would be entitled to the most profound respect and consideration, and no change should be urged against the weight of such authority, without mature deliberation, and thorough conviction of expediency. Unfortunately for the advocates of the institution, and fortunately for the interests of the country, this claim cannot be sustained by reference to executive documents, from the first report of General Knox, in 1790, to the close of Mr. Jefferson's administration.

The error has undoubtedly innocently occurred, by confounding the Military Academy at West Point as it was, with the Military Academy at West Point as it is. The report of Secretary Knox, just referred to, is characterized by this distinctive feature—that the corps proposed to be organized were "to serve as an actual defence to the community," and to constitute a part of the active military force of the country, "to serve in the field, or on the frontier, or in the fortifications of the seacoast, as the commander-in-chief may direct." At a later period, the report of the Secretary of War (Mr. McHenry,) communicated to Congress in 1800, although it proposed a plan for military schools, differing in many essential particulars from those which had preceded it, still retained the distinctive feature just named as characterizing the report of General Knox.

With regard to educating young men gratuitously, which, whatever may have been the design, I am prepared to show is the practical operation of the Academy, as at present organized, I cannot, perhaps, exhibit more clearly the sentiments of the Executive at that early day, urgent as was the occasion, and strong as must have been the desire, to give strength and efficiency to the military force, than by reading one or two paragraphs from a supplementary report of Secretary McHenry, addressed to the chairman of the Committee of Defence, on the 31st January, 1800.

The Secretary says:

"Agreeably to the plan of the Military Academy, the directors thereof are to be officers taken from the army; consequently, no expense will be incurred by such appointments. The plan also contemplates that officers of the army, cadets, and non-commissioned officers, shall receive instruction in the Academy. As the rations and fuel which they are entitled to in the army will suffice for them in the Academy, no additional expense will be required for objects of maintenance while there.

"The expenses of servants and certain incidental expenses relative to the police and administration, may be defrayed by those who shall be admitted, out of their pay and emoluments."

You will observe, Mr. Chairman, from the phraseology of the report, that all were to constitute a part of your actual military force; and that whatever additional charges

JUNE 30, 1836.]

West Point Academy.

should be incurred, were to be defrayed by those who might receive the advantages of instruction. These were provisions, just as they are important. Let me call your attention for a moment to a report of Colonel Williams, which was made the subject of a special message, communicated to Congress by Mr. Jefferson, on the 18th of March, 1808.

The extract I propose to read, as sustaining fully the views of Mr. McHenry upon this point, is in the following words:

"It might be well to make the plan upon such a scale as not only to take in the minor officers of the navy, but also any youths from any of the States who might wish for such an education, whether designed for the army or navy, or neither, and let them be assessed to the value of their education, which might form a fund for extra or contingent expenses."

Sir, these are the true doctrines upon this subject: doctrines worthy of the administration under which they were promulgated, and in accordance with the views of statesmen in the earlier and purer days of the republic.

Give to the officers of your army the highest advantages for perfection in all the branches of military science, and let those advantages be open to all, in rotation, and under such terms and regulations as shall be at once impartial toward the officers, and advantageous to the service; but let all young gentlemen who have a taste for military life, and desire to adopt arms as a profession, prepare themselves for subordinate situations at their own expense, or at the expense of their parents or guardians, in the same manner that the youth of the country are qualified for the professions of civil life. Sir, while upon this subject of gratuitous education, I will read an extract from "Dupin's Military Force of Great Britain," to show what favor it finds in another country, from the practice and experience of which we may derive some advantages, however far from approving of its institutions generally. The extract is from the 2d vol., 71st page, and relates to the terms on which young gentlemen are admitted to the junior departments of the Royal Military College at Sandhurst.

"First. The sons of officers of all ranks, whether of the land or sea forces, who have died in the service, leaving their families in pecuniary distress; this class are instructed, boarded, and habited, gratuitously by the State; being required only to provide their equipments on admission, and to maintain themselves in linen.

"Secondly. The sons of all officers of the army above the rank of subalterns actually in the service, and who pay a sum proportioned to their ranks, according to a scale per annum regulated by the supreme board. The sons of living naval officers of rank not below that of master and commander, are also admitted on payment of annual stipends, similar to those of corresponding ranks in the army. The orphan sons of officers, who have not left their families in pecuniary difficulties, are admitted into this class on paying the stipends required of officers of the rank held by their parents at the time of their decease.

"Thirdly. The sons of noblemen and private gentlemen who pay a yearly sum equivalent to the expenses of their education, board, and clothing, according to a rate regulated from time to time by the commissioners."

Sir, let it be remembered that these are the regulations of a Government which, with all its wealth and power, is, from its structure and practice, groaning under the accumulated weight of pensions, sinecures, and gratuities, and yet you observe that only one class, "the sons of officers of all ranks, whether of the land or sea forces, who have died in the service, leaving their families in pecuniary distress," are educated gratuitously.

I do not approve even of this, but I hold it up in contrast with your own principles and practice.

If the patience of the committee would warrant me, Mr. Chairman, I could show, by reference to executive communications, and the concurrent legislation of Congress in 1794, 1796, 1802, and 1808, that, prior to the last-mentioned date, such an institution as we now have was neither recommended nor contemplated. Upon this point I will not detain you longer; but when hereafter confronted by the authority of great names, I trust we shall be told where the expressions of approbation are to be found. We may then judge of their applicability to the Military Academy as at present organized.

I am far from desiring to see this country destitute of a Military Academy; but I would have it a school of practice, and instruction, for officers actually in the service of the United States: not an institution for educating, gratuitously, young gentlemen, who, on the completion of their term, or after a few months' leave of absence, resign their commissions and return to the pursuits of civil life.

If any one doubts that this is the practical operation of your present system, I refer him to the annual list of resignations, to be found in the adjutant general's office.

Firmly as I am convinced of the necessity of a reorganization, I would take no step to create an unjust prejudice against the institution. All that I ask, and, so far as I know, all that any of the opponents of the institution ask, is, that after a full and impartial investigation, it shall stand or fall upon its merits. I know there are graduates of the institution who are ornaments to the army, and an honor to their country; but they, and not the seminary, are entitled to the credit. Here I would remark, once for all, that I do not reflect upon the officers or pupils of the Academy; it is to the principles of the institution itself, as at present organized, that I object. It is often said that the graduates leave the institution with sentiments that but ill accord with the feelings and opinions of the great mass of the people of that Government from which they derive the means of education, and that many who take commissions possess few qualifications for the command of men, either in war or in peace. Most of the members of this House have had more or less intercourse with these young gentlemen, and I leave it for each individual to form his own opinion of the correctness of the charges. Thus much I will say for myself, that I believe that these, and greater evils, are the natural, if not inevitable, result of the principles in which this institution is founded; and any system of education, established upon similar principles, on Government patronage alone, will produce like results, now and forever. Sir, what are some of these results? By the report of the Secretary of War, dated January, 1831, we are informed that, "by an estimate of the last five years, (preceding that date,) it appears that the supply of the army from the corps of graduated cadets has averaged about twenty-two annually, while those who graduated are about forty, making in each year an excess of eighteen. The number received annually into the Academy averages one hundred, of which only the number stated, to wit: forty, pass through the prescribed course of education at schools, and become supernumerary lieutenants in the army." By the report of the Secretary of War, December, 1830, we are informed that "the number of promotions to the army from this corps, for the last five years, has averaged about twenty-two annually, while the number of graduates has been at an average of forty. This excess, which is annually increasing, has placed eighty-seven in waiting until vacancies shall take place; and show that, in the next year, probably, and in the succeeding one, certainly, there will be an excess beyond what the existing law authorizes to be commissioned. There will then be one hundred and six supernumerary brevet second lieutenants appurtenant to the army, at an average annual expense of $80,000."

H. of R.]

West Point Academy.

Sir, that results here disclosed were not anticipated by Mr. Madison, is apparent from a recurrence to his messages of 1810 and 1811.

In passing the law of 1812, both Congress and the President acted for the occasion, and they expected those who should succeed them to act in a similar manner. Their feelings of patriotism and resentment were aroused, by beholding the privileges of freemen wantonly invaded, our glorious stars and stripes disregarded, and national and individual rights trampled in the dust. The war was pending. The necessity for increasing the military force of the country was obvious and pressing, and the urgent occasion for increased facilities for military instruction equally apparent.

Sir, it was under circumstances like these, when we had not only enemies abroad, but, I blush to say, enemies at home, that the institution, as at present organized, had its origin. It will hardly be pretended that it was the original design of the law to augment the number of persons instructed beyond the wants of the public service.

Well, the report of the Secretary shows that, for five years prior to 1831, the Academy had furnished eighteen supernumeraries annually. A practical operation of this character has no sanction in the recommendation of Mr. Madison. The report demonstrates, further, the fruitfulness and utility of this institution, by showing the fact, that but two fifths of those who enter the Academy graduate, and that but a fraction more than one fifth enter the public service.

This is not the fault of the administration of the Academy; it is not the fault of young gentlemen who are sent there; on your present peace establishment there can be but little to stimulate them, particularly in the acquisition of military science. There can hardly be but one object in the mind of the student, and that would be to obtain an education for the purposes of civil life. The difficulty is, that the institution has outlived both the occasion that called it into existence and its original design.

I have before remarked that the Academy was manifestly enlarged to correspond with the army and militia actually to be called into service. Look, then, for a moment, at facts, and observe with how much wisdom, justice, and sound policy, you retain the provisions of the law of 1812. The total authorized force of 1813, after the declaration of war, was 58,254; and in October, 1814, the military establishment amounted to 62,428. By the act of March, 1815, the peace establishment was limited to 10,000, and now hardly exceeds that number. Thus you make a reduction of more than 50,000 in your actual military force, to accommodate the expenses of the Government to its wants. And why do you refuse to do the same with your grand system of public education? Why does that remain unchanged? Why not reduce it at once, at least to the actual wants of the service, and dispense with your corps of supernumerary lieutenants? Sir, there is, there can be, but one answer to the question, and that may be found in the War report of 1819, to which I have before had occasion to allude. The Secretary says, "the cadets who cannot be provided for in the army will return to private life; but in the event of a war their knowledge will not be lost to the country."

Indeed, sir, these young gentlemen, if they could be induced to take the field, would, after a lapse of ten or fifteen years, come up from the bar, or it may be the pulpit, fresh in military science, and admirably qualified for command in the face of an enemy!

The magazine of facts, to prove at the same glance the extravagance and unfruitfulness of this institution, is not easily exhausted; but I am admonished by the lateness of the hour to omit many considerations which I regard as both interesting and important. I will only detain the committee to make a single statement, placing side by side some aggregate results. There has already been expended upon the institution more than three millions three hundred thousand dollars. Between 1815 and 1821, thirteen hundred and eighteen students were admitted into the Academy; and of all the cadets who were ever there, only two hundred and sixty-five remained in the service at the end of 1830. Here are the expenses you have incurred, and the products you have realized.

I leave them to be balanced by the people. But, for myself, believing as I do that the Academy stands forth as an anomaly among the institutions of this country; that it is at variance with the spirit, if not the letter, of the constitution under which we live; so long as this House shall deny investigation into its principles and practical operation, I, as an individual member, will refuse to appropriate the first dollar for its support.

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved that the committee rise, and report the "bill for the suppression of Indian hostilities," and lay the one under consideration aside.

Mr. BRIGGS objected to the motion.

Mr. BELL said gentlemen were mistaken in thinking that no bills could be sent to the Senate to-morrow. There was nothing in the rules to prevent it.

Mr. WARD suggested that the present bill be also reported to the House, and if there was any intention to oppose it, let that opposition be made in the House; and he pledged himself to exert whatever influence he might have, to prevent the application of the previous question. We have, said Mr. W., now been here upwards of six months, without any appropriation having been made for the Military Academy, and now we have not to exceed one hour left upon which a bill can be sent to the Senate for concurrence: and unless this bill is now disposed of favorably, it will be lost. There is no reason that can be urged against the appropriation, for the institution has not been abolished by law; and until that is done, which I trust will not happen soon, the appropriation must be made. He hoped gentlemen would not, at this period of the session, interpose any further objections against this bill. Such was the situation of the finances of this institution, that many of the young gentlemen had been obliged to call upon their friends for money to reach their homes, and the gentlemen who had been appointed visitors of the institution had not received the usual compensation for their services. Mr. W. said, in conclusion, that he would not consent that the committee should rise on the one bill without, at the same time, reporting the other. Moreover, there were several other bills that ought to be acted upon at the present time.

The motion was disagreed to without a division, and Mr. PIERCE concluded his remarks.

Mr. CAMBRELENG again expressed a wish that the bill would be brought into the House at once. He stated that he had, in every instance, voted to take up the resolution of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HAWES] to print the report of the select committee on this institution, and he was confident the friends of the institution had nothing to fear from investigation, or the publication of that report.

Mr. BRIGGS made some remarks in defence of the institution.

Mr. WHITE, of Florida, then renewed the motion that the committee rise.

Mr. VANDERPOEL moved a modification, that the two bills be reported to the House.

Mr. BOON then addressed the committee in opposition to the principles of the institution, which he described to be of an aristocratic and exclusive character.

Mr. HAWES then proceeded to address the committee, and, after proceeding for some time, gave way to

JULY 1, 1836.]

Ex-President Madison—Indian Frauds and Hostilities.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. LEWIS, who moved that the committee rise.

Mr. VANDERPOEL moved to amend the motion by adding, "and report the bills to the House."

Mr. PINCKNEY called for a division of the question; and on taking it on the bill making appropriations for the West Point Academy, the tellers reporting ayes 74, noes 30, (not a quorum,) the committee rose and reported that fact to the House.

Mr. INGERSOLL moved a suspension of the rules for the purpose of offering the following resolution:

Resolved, That a select committee, consisting of nine, be appointed to inquire what, if any, alterations are expedient to be made in the constitution and government of the Military Academy at West Point; and what, if additional, legislation is expedient upon the subject of such Academy; with power to visit said Academy prior to the next session of the present Congress, to send for persons and papers, and to report their proceedings and views upon the whole matter thus submitted to them as early as may be done after the commencement of the next session of Congress.

The motion to suspend was lost without a division.

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved that 10,000 copies of the report of the select committee on the West Point Academy be printed, remarking that it ought to have been printed twelve months ago.

Mr. BRIGGS said it ought not to be printed at all.

Mr. EVANS contended that, as the committee had risen for want of a quorum, no business could be transacted until it was ascertained whether a quorum were present.

The SPEAKER caused the House to be counted, and a quorum being found present, the House again went into committee on the West Point Academy bill.

Mr. HAWES moved to strike out the enacting clause, and after speaking for some time, the question was taken, and the motion disagreed to.

The committee then rose and reported both the above bills to the House, when the amendments to both were severally concurred in, and they were ordered to a third reading, and read a third time and passed.

EX-PRESIDENT MADISON.

Mr. PATTON, from the select committee, made the following report:

"The President of the United States having communicated to the two Houses of Congress the melancholy intelligence of the death of their illustrious and beloved fellow-citizen, JAMES MADISON, of Virginia, late President of the United States, and the two Houses sharing in the general grief which this distressing event must produce:

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the chairs of the President of the Senate, and of the Speaker of the House of Representatives, be shrouded in black during the present session; and that the President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and the members and officers of both Houses, wear the usual badge of mourning for thirty days.

"Resolved, That it be recommended to the people of the United States to wear crape on the left arm, as mourning, for thirty days.

"Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to transmit a copy of these resolutions to Mrs. Madison, and to assure her of the profound respect of the two Houses of Congress for her person and character, and of their sincere condolence on the late afflicting dispensation of Providence."

The report and resolutions were concurred in unanimously.

On motion of Mr. BRIGGS,
The House then adjourned.

VOL. XII.—287

FRIDAY, JULY 1.

Mr. BELL, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs have power to sit in the recess of Congress, for the purpose of completing the investigation directed by the resolution of this House of the 15th of January last; and that any two or more of them, under the direction of the committee, be authorized to take testimony in relation to the same.

Mr. B. said the resolution was the unanimous recommendation of the committee.

Mr. MANN, of New York, hoped the resolution would not be adopted. Experience had shown the inutility of these investigations by committees during the recess of Congress; besides, they subjected the country to considerable expense. He was utterly opposed to the adoption of the resolution, and therefore called for the yeas and nays on its adoption; which were ordered.

Mr. McCARTY said a few words in support of the resolution, and of the expediency and propriety of the proposed investigation.

Mr. HESTER moved to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. WHITTLESEY, of Ohio, asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and the House refused to lay the resolution on the table: Yeas 69, nays 84.

Mr. BELL remarked that the object of the resolution was to authorize two or three members of the committee to take testimony during the recess, and not that the whole committee should regularly hold their sittings.

Mr. MANN, of New York, moved a modification to that effect.

Mr. EVERETT preferred the resolution as originally introduced.

Mr. HAWES demanded the previous question; which was seconded, 65 to 55; and the main question being ordered, was put, and the vote was: Yeas 87, nays 87.

The CHAIR voting in the negative, made 87 to 88; so the resolution was not agreed to.

INDIAN FRAUDS AND HOSTILITIES.

Mr. LEWIS rose and said he held in his hand a paper of a most extraordinary and important character, which he had just received from the theatre of the present Creek war. He considered its importance so great, that he should, even at this late period of the session, ask to lay it before the House.

Mr. L. then sent the petition to the Clerk, by whom it was read.

[The memorial which was read is from the citizens of Georgia and Eastern Alabama, and represents that the Indian hostilities in which the people of that country are involved were caused by individuals jointly associated under the name of land companies, whose proceedings and contracts were of the most nefarious character. The memorialists ask Congress to institute an investigation into the circumstances, which, as they represent, will not fail to exhibit a state of facts of the most revolting character. They intimate that the press of that country is entirely under the control of these heartless agitators, and that, through bribery and corruption, all channels of information to the public and to the Government on this subject are closed.]

Sir, said Mr. L., it is neither my intention nor my duty to prejudice the investigation which the petitioners ask of this Government, or to express any opinion whatever as to the guilt or innocence of the party implicated in this transaction. It is sufficient for me that, in my representative character, I have been charged, by a respectable portion not only of my constituents, but of the citizens of an adjoining State, with the presentation of a petition containing the grave charges above alluded to, and praying a most thorough and satisfactory investigation into the truth of them. I have bestowed on this subject all the reflection which the late period at which the petition was received has allowed me, and with a decided conviction that the investigation is alike due to the public sentiment of the country from which this proceeding has emanated, and to the calamities which have grown out of the wide-spread scene of Indian rapine and massacre, which this war has brought on a portion of my constituents. I have been careful to give this investigation that course which I believed would best subserve the purposes of public justice. If individuals have been so lost to all the sentiments of humanity, and the aspirations of patriotism, as to have wilfully excited this war, they have incurred the crime of "treason," and should be made to answer that offence by a trial of life and death, before the judicial tribunals of their country. With this view, I have proposed that the investigation should be instituted by the President, in order that he might call to his aid the district attorney, and other judicial officers; and that, if the fact should justify it, that prosecution might be promptly instituted. Whatever other investigation might be thought necessary, all will admit that one of this character, at least, is required.

Sir, I have not proposed an investigation by a committee of this House, for the reason that, by a vote just given, the House have refused to authorize a similar committee to investigate the frauds in the purchase of Indian reservations under the Choctaw treaty. There is evidently an indisposition, from some cause, to institute committees of inquiry during the recess of Congress; and as any resolution I may offer will require a suspension of the rules of the House, by a vote of two thirds of the members present, before it can be received, I am admonished, at this late period of the session, if I wish to effect any thing towards an investigation, that it must be presented in the least objectionable form. Besides, sir, I know of no act of prospective legislation, growing out of the action of a committee of this House, which could repair the injuries already done, punish the offenders, or provide more efficiently than by existing laws, for the punishment of future offences of a similar character.

If, however, a majority of the House be of a different opinion; if it is thought that an investigation by a select committee of this body will be either more accurate, or more satisfactory, or that any legislative action will grow out of such inquiry, I will give it my warmest support. On one thing, however, I must insist, that an investigation of some sort be had, and I will sustain that which is broadest and fullest in its scope.

With these views, Mr. L. moved that the rule be suspended, to allow him to introduce the resolution he held in his hand. He hoped the House would not refuse him this indulgence. He trusted that after the most thorough investigation, to the honor of those he represented, and to the citizens of an adjoining State, the public mind would be relieved from the suspicion that any individual white citizen, or citizens, of either of the States, had been base enough in design, or sufficiently fiend-like in action, to have excited this war. The charge has been before made in the public prints, not only against different individuals, but different classes of individuals, whose interests were supposed to have been promoted by this cruel scourge of the rest of the community.

Coming in the responsible form in which this subject is now, for the first time, presented to the country, Mr. L. said he considered it as a source of congratulation that the whole transaction would be thoroughly sifted, with a view of acquitting the innocent and punishing the guilty. He believed that the honest men of all classes and of every party desired the most rigid investigation, and he trusted if there were any who were justly obnoxious to the charge of connivance with the late Indian hostilities, be they who they may, whether high or low in public estimation, that the bolt of popular indignation and of legal justice would fall heavily upon them.

Mr. L. then introduced the following resolution, expressing the belief that it would not occupy the attention of the House over five minutes:

Resolved, That the memorial of certain citizens of Alabama and Georgia, respecting alleged frauds in the purchase of the reservations of the Creek Indians, and the causes of their present hostilities, be referred to the President of the United States, and that he be requested to cause such measures to be taken for investigating these transactions, and for the prosecution of the persons engaged in them, who may have been guilty of any breaches of the laws, as may appear to be proper and within the power of the Executive.

Mr. GRANTLAND was of opinion that there ought to be a most thorough and efficient investigation into this subject. He believed there had been frauds, and that those frauds had been the cause of the Creek war.

Mr. WISE said he had been endeavoring all the session to elicit the facts in regard to the causes of the Indian hostilities. He had information enough on the subject to lead him to the conclusion that the allegations of the memorial were true. We had documentary evidence on our files that the Seminole war originated in the manner indicated in the memorial; and he believed that some of the executive officers of the Government were concerned in the transactions. It had been very difficult to obtain any information on the subject. The little that was obtained from the Departments was like drawing their eye-teeth out of them. He greatly preferred that the investigation should be intrusted to a select committee of this House.

Mr. BELL said it was the duty of the House to investigate the transactions. The Committee on Indian Affairs had had the subject under examination, and had asked leave to continue it during the recess, which had this morning been refused by the House. This was the proper constitutional body to conduct the investigation, and the House was bound to do it in behalf of their own character and the honor of this Government.

Mr. LEWIS said, that if it was the pleasure of the House to institute an investigation through one of its committees, he certainly would not oppose it. On the contrary, he was in favor of an investigation, in any and every shape it might be proposed. He (Mr. L.) had asked for an inquiry by the President in one form, in order that it might lead to a judicial investigation. He presumed that, under the resolution submitted, the President would feel it his duty to require of the district attorneys of Alabama and Georgia, a critical, and, if necessary, a personal examination into the causes of the Creek war; and, if the facts warranted it, that they would be required to institute the necessary prosecutions. If other gentlemen proposed a legislative inquiry, with a view to legislative action, he saw no reason why the proposition should be opposed.

Mr. L. said he had consulted his colleagues, and he spoke the unanimous opinion of the delegation of Alabama in saying that no member from that State would vote against any form of inquiry that the House might be willing to adopt.

Sir, one of my colleagues [Mr. LYON] is of the Committee on Indian Affairs, who, from his practical knowledge and business habits, is, in my estimation, peculiarly fitted to undertake this investigation; yet, from a sense of propriety, which I highly appreciate, he wishes it distinctly known to the House that he is unwilling to serve as one of the committee of inquiry. Such, sir, are my own feelings. I believe that no member from Alabama or Georgia, nor any other person either directly or remotely connected with the party politics of that section of country, ought to be on that committee. If a committee be instituted, it ought to be entirely free from personal, sectional, or local political bias. I have no doubt a sub-committee of such a character could be formed out of the Committee on Indian Affairs; and of all other committees, that one, from its nature, and its recent investigations into our Indian relations, is best able to undertake the inquiry.

Mr. JARVIS moved to postpone the subject till tomorrow.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, called for the yeas and nays on this motion; which were ordered, and

Mr. JARVIS withdrew his motion.

Mr. HAWES said there were frauds enough in relation to the Indians and the public lands to sink any Government on the face of the earth; and he wished to see who it was that committed them, and who were engaged in covering them up. If the House would permit the investigation to proceed, it would save millions of dollars to the Government. Even the Indians would discontinue their hostilities when they found Congress disposed to look into the state of their affairs, and the frauds committed upon them.

Mr. CUSHMAN moved the previous question. Lost. 73 to 88.

Mr. WISE urged an investigation by a select committee.

Mr. LEWIS said that the objection which had been urged to the resolution which he had the honor to present to the House was as to the character of the agents which the President would appoint to undertake the proposed investigation. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] has said that the agents of the Government who have heretofore been employed in the Creek country may have participated in these alleged frauds; and to send them out again, to investigate their own frauds, would be the highest absurdity. Sir, the gentleman appears to misapprehend the purport both of the petition and resolution. Neither the petition nor the resolution asks that the frauds which have been committed upon the Indians be again investigated, with a view to set them aside. That investigation has already been ordered by the President, and is now going on. The investigation proposed goes a step farther, and asks that an inquiry be instituted into the fact, whether those who have committed frauds upon the Indians have not also excited the Indians to their present state of hostility, with a view to smother and prevent the investigation of such frauds. It is a more grave inquiry than one of mere frauds, and involves an offence of the most criminal character, which can only be punished by a court of justice. If agents of the Government have been engaged, from any cause or motive, in exciting this war, the investigation would reach them as well as others.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] knows me too well to think that I am disposed to screen Government agents, or any other class of men, from the strictest scrutiny. On the contrary, I have uniformly avowed my desire to give the broadest range to the inquiry. I have not often been suspected of yielding too implicit confidence in executive discretion; but I can hardly believe that the President would appoint agents to investigate this matter, who have been in any manner connected with certifying Indian contracts, or setting aside those contracts. On the contrary, I should suppose that he would feel it his duty to appoint persons totally unconnected in feeling or interest with these transactions; individuals who have in no manner been connected with the eliminations and recriminations which have been dealt out between the Government agents and the land purchasers. To insure the appointment of the most disinterested and competent agents, and to meet the views of gentlemen, I am willing to modify my resolution so as to authorize the President to institute a commission of three persons, to be appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to investigate thoroughly the whole matter.

After having said thus much in favor of his resolution, Mr. L. said he was willing to vote for the proposition of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] to establish a legislative inquiry. The two inquiries can go on together, as they are not in their nature incompatible.

Mr. McKAY said the gentleman's modification would render it necessary to send the resolution to the Senate.

Mr. LEWIS withdrew it for that reason, as he feared, at this late period of the session, the proposition might be lost by sending it to the Senate.

Mr. PEYTON contended that a double investigation going on at the same time would be entirely incompatible, and would embarrass the question at every step of the investigation. He was in favor of the appointment of a committee, and not leave it to the uncertain mode of executive inquiry. If left to the President, he would leave the selection to his friends, and some of the very individuals implicated might be selected for the purpose.

Mr. HOAR contended that the proposed resolution gave no power to the President; for he could now direct precisely the same investigation without it. The resolution was nothing more than a request to the President to do his duty, but conferred upon him no additional power, nor imposed any additional duty, more than he was now in possession of. To Mr. H., therefore, it appeared that the resolution was nugatory and improper.

Mr. ROBERTSON added his request that the gentleman from Alabama would modify his resolution so as to direct an inquiry by a committee of the House. This House was the grand inquest of the nation, and by it the inquiry ought to be made. It was a matter of astonishment to the nation, that every attempt on this floor to investigate public abuses was resisted and defeated. The information could not be obtained from the Executive, however well disposed he might be to afford it. The abuses had long been going on under his eyes, but they would be concealed, as they had heretofore been concealed, from his view. Moreover, this House was clothed with judicial power, and could command the attendance of witnesses, &c., which the President could not.

Mr. LEWIS modified his resolution so as to add a number of the members of the Committee on Indian Affairs to the commission proposed.

Mr. VANDERPOEL called for the orders of the day.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, said that this was as important a matter as any of the orders of the day, and he therefore asked for the yeas and nays on the motion.

Mr. LYON said this subject was of great importance to the people in his part of the country, if it was not to New York.

Mr. VANDERPOEL remarked that the discussion would occupy the whole day. Gentlemen had better take an opportunity to consult and agree among themselves as to the proper mode of proceeding in the matter.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and were: Yeas 71, nays 109.

So the House refused to proceed to the orders of the day.

Mr. WISE then moved to strike out the reference to the President, and to refer the subject to a committee of the House, with power to send for persons and papers, to sit during the recess, to proceed to the scene of the alleged frauds, and, generally, to carry on the investigation to the fullest extent.

Mr. W. said those who had been engaged in the investigation knew best where to look for information; and he therefore proposed to include some of the members of the Committee on Indian Affairs on the committee. The course proposed by the gentleman from Alabama would, he believed, be worse than useless. It would have the effect to cover up these frauds, instead of exposing them.

Mr. LEWIS said he had consulted his colleagues, and would state they were all in favor of the widest possible investigation. He accepted the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia as a modification of his resolution.

Mr. BOULDIN wished to address a question to the mover of the resolution. Was there a war going on with the Creeks at this time?

Mr. LEWIS replied in the affirmative.

Mr. BOULDIN said in that case he should not vote for the resolution.

Mr. BELL stated the fact that agents had been appointed by the Government, and paid for the investigation of these very frauds. The adoption of the resolution, as first proposed, would, therefore, add nothing to the extent of the inquiry already in progress. It was a part of the business of the Government to investigate these frauds, and appropriations were regularly asked and made for the purpose.

Mr. RPLEY stated that frauds did exist, to a great extent, as he had before had occasion to state on this floor. But agents had been appointed to investigate them and hunt them down; for this reason he thought a select committee unnecessary. He would authorize the President to send agents to the spot to investigate the acts, and then to institute a suit against those found to be guilty, in order to bring them to condign punishment. Ex parte examinations by committees were not worth a straw. They would lead to no results. The system of fraud was more extensive than any one here imagined, and it was to be ferreted out and stopped in no other way than by examinations on the spot, and the immediate prosecution of the individuals implicated.

Mr. R. moved a substitute for the resolution.

Mr. LYON was of the opinion that there ought to be an investigation both by the President and by a select committee of this House. A committee would not have the power to arrest and punish persons found guilty of participation in the frauds.

Mr. GARLAND, of Louisiana, was satisfied, (he said,) by the remarks which had been made, that it was improper to commit this investigation to the Executive. It was said that the Executive had long been engaged in these inquiries, but as they had not succeeded in arresting these frauds, he wished to try some other course. He therefore proposed, as a substitute, a resolution for the appointment of a select committee, with instructions to inquire into the causes of the war now going on with the Seminole and Creek Indians, the frauds that have been practised on any of said Indians, or those of any other tribe, by any person or persons whatever, and into the management of our Indian affairs generally, with the powers contained in the resolution of Mr. WISS.

Mr. E. WHITTLESEY admitted (he said) that this was an important question; but he implored gentlemen, in consideration of the number of bills, public and private, demanding the attention of the House, to desist from further discussion, and take the question.

Mr. LYON moved the previous question; but it was not seconded.

After some remarks from Mr. GRANTLAND,

Mr. MANN, of New York, said he should vote against the resolution, because he was convinced, from former experience and observation, that investigations by committees of this House were utterly impotent. They were among the humbugs of the day. It was said that we could confer no new power upon the President by a resolution charging him with the investigation. This was true; but it would have the effect to direct his attention specially to the subject.

Mr. PEYTON replied to the remarks of the gentleman from New York. It was a new doctrine that this House was powerless for the purpose of inquiring into public frauds and abuses. This was not the doctrine of the House when the United States Bank incurred the displeasure of the Executive. A reference of the memorial to the President was an evasion of the inquiry asked for; and it was a part of the system in pursuance of which this House had steadily refused, during the present session, to authorize any inquiry into public abuses.

Mr. BYNUM was opposed to the resolution, as reflecting upon the President and the party which supported him. It proceeded upon the supposition that the President would not discharge his duty in this matter. He thought it idle, also, in the heat of battle, to stop to inquire into the causes of the war; but he would prefer the course proposed by the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. RIPLEY,] to any other that had been suggested.

Mr. ADAMS made some remarks in support of the right of the House to make the inquiry solicited by the memorialists, and the expediency of the exercise of that right. To refer the memorial to the President would be no answer to the memorialists, and would be an abandonment of the constitutional power of this House. It was well known, too, that the President was in possession of all the power over this subject which this House could impart to him. He had the power to carry into execution the laws of the United States; and he was said to be now engaged in the investigation of the subject. We could give him no additional power. All we could do, by the course which some gentlemen advocated, was to lay the lives, the fortunes, and the feelings of our constituents, at his feet. He would consider such a course as a denial of the right of the memorialists to petition this House for the redress of the grievance of which they complained. Mr. A. said he felt it his duty, on this occasion, to make some remarks in reply to the extraordinary doctrine maintained by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. MANN.] He understood that gentleman to maintain that the exercise of any power by this House to investigate the circumstances attending public frauds, abuses, violence, or wars, was a mere humbug.

Mr. MANN, of New York, explained. In all cases, heretofore, investigations by the House and its committees had proved to be a humbug. That was what he said.

Mr. ADAMS said it was a sentiment impeaching the constitution of the United States. But he would take issue with the gentleman as to the fact. Was the investigation into the abuses of the Post Office a humbug? and was there ever an inquiry which was more steadily resisted, step by step, than that was? It was very far, however, from proving to be a humbug in the eyes of the majority of this House, or of this nation. Was it not then contended that, in the management of that Department, there was nothing that was corrupt, or irregular, or even improvident? The gentleman himself would hardly rise and maintain that position now, however much he might have been disposed to do it during the progress of that humbug.

Mr. MANN said that investigation was no exception to his remark. It resulted in two reports of contradictory character.

Mr. ADAMS pursued this topic at some length; and, when he concluded,

The House took a recess.

EVENING SESSION.

FORTIFICATIONS.

The bill making appropriations for certain fortification, returned from the Senate with amendments, was taken up.

The amendments were to strike from the bill the clause authorizing the purchase of sites, the construction of arsenals and depots for arms, in Arkansas, Missouri, and Tennessee, provided the same should not cost over $14,000 each, and to add a section providing that the appropriations should be drawn from the Treasury only as they were wanted for actual disbursement.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said he hoped both amendments would be concurred in. The first was made in the Senate because the same items were embraced in another bill which had passed the Senate; and the second was one proposed in the House, but cut off by the previous question.

Mr. HALL, of Vermont, said he hoped the House would not concur in the first amendment, which proposed to strike out the appropriation of $42,000 for depots of arms in Arkansas, Missouri, and at Memphis, Tennessee. He wished that appropriation retained in this bill for the very reason which had been assigned by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means for striking it out, viz: that it was contained in another bill which had passed the Senate and been sent to this House. That other bill contained appropriations of between four and five hundred thousand dollars, and for objects which, when once begun, would require additional appropriations of a million or more to complete them. He believed all the appropriations contained in that bill were unnecessary and useless, except those for these depots of arms. He was for retaining the appropriation in the present bill, because he supposed it was one which ought to be made, and because he did not wish the other bill to have the benefit of the strength which this appropriation, if the amendment of the Senate was concurred in, might give it. He wished that bill to stand alone, unaided by this proper appropriation; and he hoped the House would non-concur in the amendment of the Senate, and reject the other bill whenever it came up for consideration.

After some remarks from Messrs. DUNLAP, ASHLEY, and R. M. JOHNSON, the question was taken upon concurring in the first amendment, and decided in the negative.

The second amendment was then concurred in.

CREEK INDIANS.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolution in relation to the frauds in Creek lands.

Mr. RILEY had moved to strike out the modification submitted by Mr. WISE, and accepted by the mover of the resolution, so as to leave the resolution as it was originally submitted.

Mr. R. GARLAND, of Louisiana, had moved a substitute, proposing to raise a select committee of ——— members, to have three members of the Committee on Military Affairs on said committee, subsequently modified by striking out the part relative to there being three members of the Military Committee.

Mr. MANN, of New York, briefly replied to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS.]

Mr. BELL believed that millions had been expended by these abuses in relation to frauds, and he believed that the Creek war had grown out of these abuses. He did not impute any improper motives in officers of the Government, yet such was the fact. He believed the investigations heretofore instituted had proved abortive, although he doubted not they were instituted with the purest motives. He did not believe we should ever know the truth in relation to those frauds, until a committee was sent to investigate the matter, with more power than the agents had which had heretofore been sent there. He thought much might be done by instituting an inquiry, and he thought the country called for it. He was of opinion that the Committee on Indian Affairs was the most proper committee to refer this subject to, although he did not think that he himself would be able to attend to the duties which would be required of that committee.

Mr. VANDERPOEL said he would, with great pleasure, have voted for the resolution originally introduced by the honorable gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. LEWIS,] but he could not, and would not, vote for it now, after the gentleman had accepted of the modification proposed by the honorable gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE.] The gentleman from Alabama, who was most particularly interested in the subject-matter to which the resolution referred, in having the alleged frauds ferreted out, had, no doubt, introduced his resolution after most mature deliberation. He was not in the habit of taking any step here without looking well to its effects and its consequences, both immediate and ulterior; and it gave him great pleasure here to be able to add, in relation to that honorable gentleman, that the efficient, able, and, so far as regarded the administration, he might add, the candid manner in which he treated the interests of that portion of our Southern country which is threatened or scourged with an Indian war, constituted an ample guarantee that every thing that he proposed or moved in relation to that interesting subject was the result of all becoming care and reflection. Though an opposition member, he had proved himself above making the Indian wars that had so suddenly visited some of the fairest portions of the South, pretexts for attacking and imputing blame to the administration; on the contrary, he had evinced a disposition, which he (Mr. V.) could wish that many gentlemen would reciprocate and emulate, to do the administration full justice; and, after the candid and magnanimous course which the gentleman from Alabama had pursued, touching our Indian troubles, it was not surprising that there had been a strong predisposition here, with even the friends of the administration, to gratify that gentleman in relation to appropriations for the relief of those whose position exposed them to the losses and dangers of those desolating wars; and to think rather favorably of propositions that he might originate or offer in relation to that interesting subject. The gentleman's original proposition of this morning would most assuredly have commanded a most triumphant majority, if not an almost unanimous vote; and he (Mr. V.) very much regretted that he had yielded to the importunities of the honorable gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] and had accepted of his resolution as a modification of his own. He now very much feared that he had, by this act of acceptance, jeopardized the success of the measure in any form; nay, that he had secured the entire frustration of the object he had in view when he offered the memorial and introduced his resolution this morning.

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PETTON] was responsible for introducing "party" into the consideration of this subject. He had, as usual, treated us with the old hackneyed catchwords of "the party." Were there any of the friends of the administration here, any who could not be intimidated or driven from their principles by satirical sneers and sarcastic appellations? If there were any such, he would earnestly and respectfully beg them to look well to the import of the resolution of the gentleman from Alabama, as it now was, after the incorporation of the modification of the gentleman from Virginia, before they voted for it. He would ask the friends of the administration; he hoped he might still say he would ask a majority of this House, whether they could vote for the resolution in its present form, when it involved such a direct imputation of gross delinquency on the part of the executive branch of this Government? What did the resolution now propose? Why, it proposed to appoint a select committee, not only to inquire into the alleged frauds upon the Indians, but also to inquire into the causes of the Indian wars; and this, too, after the repeated invectives of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] against the executive branch of the Government, for not reporting or disclosing to us the true causes of the Seminole war. Have the friends of the administration lost their recollection? If not, will they not bear me witness that the gentleman from Virginia has again and again charged the Executive with a most culpable omission to communicate to us the true causes of the Seminole hostilities? has again and again denounced what he seemed to suppose was contumacy in the Executive, for not answering calls, and not favoring us with the necessary light on this subject? And are those who claim to belong, who are, like myself, proud to belong to "the party," are they ready to vote for a resolution which involves an admission that these oft-repeated complaints are well founded? which does even more than this: which involves an appeal from this alleged delinquency and contumacy of the Executive to an itinerant and most powerless committee of this House? Let gentlemen show, by their votes on this occasion, how credulous and confiding an ear they lend here to accusations against that good old man, who has given such noble, such repeated, such ample pledges of devotion to the best interests of his beloved country. Are they willing to say, by their votes, without evidence, that he has been grossly remiss, that he has been guilty of a sin of omission that should expose him to the severest reprehension of all honest men? Let them answer by their votes.

H. of R.]

Creek Indians.

He (Mr. V.) could not but admire the tactics of the honorable gentleman from Virginia; and he hoped that upon this occasion he would not by success exemplify a remark which he made a few days ago in a speech on the deposit bill, after its passage. He then pronounced a high eulogium upon a distinguished member of the other branch of the Legislature, and told us that the skill and tact with which that gentleman had secured the success of his favorite measure were enough to gain him immortal fame; that he knew when and where to strike; that upon that occasion he had made a dash at the covey, and the birds had scattered and divided. It would seem that the honorable gentleman now means to imitate the example of that distinguished man. He has thrown in among the flock, and he hopes to scatter and divide them; but they have not yet mounted on the wing, and all time for reflection has not yet passed. The gentleman well knew that a bald and naked proposition of his own, to raise a committee to inquire into the cause of the Seminole war, on the alleged ground that the President had refused to communicate it, would not for a moment be sustained by this House.

The gentleman from Alabama introduces a resolution that the President cause inquiry to be made into frauds upon the Indians; and then the gentleman from Virginia very opportunely, as he no doubt supposed, offers his amendment, by which he not only proposes to transfer the subject of the resolution to one of the travelling committees of this House, but incorporates another matter which involves a direct imputation of delinquency upon the Executive; which proposes an inquiry into matters which the gentleman has so often told us that the Executive has so culpably neglected to disclose to us. He doubtless supposes that the overweening, the very laudable anxiety of the friends of the administration to eviscerate the numerous frauds upon the Indians, would tempt and control enough of them to secure success to his amendment—to swallow it, though it was made both bitter and acid by the implication of gross neglect on the part of their venerated President. It remains to be seen, sir, whether his tactics will frighten and scatter enough of our friends here to secure the triumph of the honorable gentleman's favorite measure. He (Mr. V.) trusted not, when they now saw what it was. The pill was not sufficiently gilded to deceive and delude enough for the purposes of success.

Mr. V. said he was far, very far, from being desirous that any of the frauds in question should be concealed; on the contrary, he was for adopting the most efficient measures to bring them to the light and to the execration of the world. He was in favor of instituting a commission by law to inquire into them. He was for three commissioners, nominated by the President, and concurred in by the Senate, who should be invested with the most plenary powers to ferret out the dark doings that we had heard so much talked about. How much more efficient would be such a commission, than a committee appointed by this House. The one would be the creature of the entire legislative power of this Government, with powers adequate to the full execution of its duties; the other would be the miserable, rickety, and impotent creature of one branch of the Legislature, with powers uncertain, undefined, and, for all efficient purposes, very doubtful. He of course meant nothing personally disrespectful to any of the committees of this House; he used this language only to express their impotency, and entire insufficiency for the occasion. He was astonished, very much astonished, now, to see these interregnum travelling committees such peculiar and strong favorites of the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS.] He heard a very different language from that gentleman on a former occasion. Only two short years ago we appointed a select committee, with all the powers that it was competent for this House to confer, to inquire into the transactions of the Bank of the United States. It was an able committee, and one composed of as able men as graced this floor. Well, they repaired to Philadelphia, with their power of attorney to send for persons and papers; summoned Nicholas Biddle, Esq., to appear before them, to make certain discoveries which they sought. Mr. Biddle appeared, but very politely refused to gratify the curiosity of the gentlemen of the committee, and they returned to us, just as wise, in relation to the doings of Mr. Biddle and his bank, as when they left us. They reported to us the contumacy of Mr. Biddle, his virtual defiance of their powers and the powers of this House; and where was the member here, who, amid the doubt and uncertainty as to the powers of the committee, which all felt, deemed it prudent to propose or originate any order against the president or cashier of the bank? Who has forgotten a speech which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] delivered on that occasion, to demonstrate the impotency of a committee of this House, and to give us an idea of the force that would be played off here in any effort that might be made to enforce its imaginary powers. Never was any body more triumphantly satirized than was on that occasion one of these fishing "person and paper" committees of this House. The ridicule which he then lavished upon such a committee and its fancied powers was indeed overwhelming. He gave us, as many gentlemen here will recollect, a most graphic fancy sketch of the forms through which we would go to vindicate our own dignity and the powers of this House. He imagined that we would send our Sergeant-at-arms to take Mr. Biddle and all his directors, and the valiant and puissant Sergeant returning with his troop of prisoners, and being asked how he took and secured them all, (answering in the triumphant tone and language of a certain other single valiant sergeant,) would respond, "why, sir, I surrounded all of them!" This memorable and able speech many here would recollect, for it had made an indelible impression upon his (Mr. V's) mind; and now we had just heard the same gentleman make just as able a speech on the other side of the question! The opinions of men, Mr. Speaker! what sudden, what miraculous changes they oftentimes undergo!

Creek Indians.

[H. OF R.]

The argument of the gentleman from Massachusetts struck him in many respects as a very strange one. He had told us that his (Mr. V's) colleague, in opposing the appointment of such a committee in cases of this kind, had surrendered nearly the whole of the impeaching power of this House. If he had not the utmost respect for the character and the opinions of the venerable and distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, he would say, that to talk of such a committee as auxiliary to the impeaching power, was absurd in the extreme. Was there a proposition here to impeach any officer of this Government for official mal-conduct; and were the powers of such a committee invoked to inquire preliminarily into facts, in order to ascertain whether there was sufficient ground for impeachment? He had heard nothing of the kind. How, then, could the gentleman tell us that this committee was required as auxiliary to the impeaching power, when no officer was charged with any offence requiring or justifying impeachment, and when all that was proposed to be done by the committee was to go on an inquisitorial expedition against a horde of speculators upon the rights and property of the Indians? If any gentleman would rise here in his place and tell us, on the responsibility of his high station, that he had reason to believe that a public officer had committed an impeachable offence, he could well, in that event, imagine the propriety of appointing a committee to inquire into the grounds of accusation. This would be a committee auxiliary to the impeaching power; but the one which you now proposed to create had none of the characteristics, and would go in pursuit of none of the objects, of such a committee.

There was another reason why he would vote against the appointment of the committee contemplated by the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia. The President had already appointed competent agents to inquire into these frauds, and he was credibly informed that those agents had executed their duties most vigorously and efficiently. The President could clothe them with all the powers with which we could invest a committee of this House. Why, while one tribunal was investigating these matters, should we supersede its authority by appointing another vastly more expensive, and not one particle more efficient? Why adopt a proceeding that was based upon a distrust of the Executive, since every one who knows the President, knows full well that if fraud has an implacable and uncompromising enemy on earth, it is Andrew Jackson; and more especially since he has so promptly caused inquiry to be made into these frauds? Let the friends of the President answer by their votes.

Mr. BOON called the attention of the House, and of the people of the whole country, to the many important subjects yet unacted on, in consequence of this untimely proposition and the discussion thereon. The bill to reorganize the General Land Office was one of the most abiding and deepest interest to the whole people of the West; and if a discussion of this kind was to go on, that bill would remain unacted on. He therefore moved to lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were: Yeas 80, nays 99.

So the House refused to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. LEWIS said, after the repeated attempts which have been made to strangle the investigation which he proposed, by motions to lay it on the table, and motions to proceed to the orders of the day, and after the signal failure which had just attended the last attempt of that kind, he trusted that the House would, in that form which it thought best, pass the resolution of inquiry. He (Mr. L.) had introduced his resolution in the early part of the day, through the special indulgence of the House, and he believed then it would not occupy more than five minutes of the precious time of the session. In the course of his whole legislative experience, which had not been inconsiderable, he was never more disappointed.

While all, with a single exception, were in favor of the investigation, no two gentlemen seemed to be of the same opinion as to the authority under which, and the agents by whom, it ought to be conducted. No sooner was his resolution offered, than it was objected that it required the President to do no more than it was his duty to do without the resolution; and that, if the investigation was to be conducted under the auspices of the agents which had already been engaged in the Creek country, it would in fact amount to stifling the inquiry. Now, after a discussion of more than seven hours, the gentleman from New York [Mr. VANDERPOEL] informs us that the resolution in its original form would have commanded an almost unanimous vote, and that in its present form it would not receive the sanction of a majority of the House.

Sir, I introduced the resolution in that shape in which I thought, at this late period of the session, it was most likely to meet the assent of this House. I proposed such an inquiry as all must admit, whatever other form they may desire this investigation to assume, to be necessary to bring legal punishment upon the offences charged in the petition. Having opened the door of inquiry, was I to shut it in the faces of those who desired it to be more thorough? Was it my duty to limit an investigation which I myself had proposed? Could gentlemen have expected me to say that I was willing to yield an inquiry to the Executive, and not to the legislative department of this Government? When charges are brought against a portion of my constituents, would I not, as their Representative, dishonor them, by evading or skulking from any inquiry, however rigid?

No, sir, I repeat what I have before more than once had occasion to say, that I go for the fullest, broadest, deepest, and most thorough investigation which may be proposed. Every principle of self-respect, every feeling of sensibility to the honor of those I represent, requires me to pursue this line of conduct, and those who expect me to depart from it have mistaken my character.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. VANDERPOEL] has been pleased to allude, in a most complimentary manner, to the course which I have heretofore taken in relation to questions growing out of the Creek war; while at the same time he alleges that, by yielding to the importunities of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] I have given to this question a party aspect, and endangered the passage of my resolution in any form. While the gentleman has done me more than justice in relation to my past course, he has done me much injustice on the present occasion.

Sir, I have pursued on this subject the same course which I have pursued on all subjects connected with our relations with the Creek Indians. Although, in general, I prosecute my party purposes with as much zeal and steadiness as any gentleman on this floor, I have looked upon the calamities of the Indian war with which my constituents have been scourged as too serious in its consequences, too disastrous in its results, to be made a topic of party discussion. When it was charged upon this floor that the administration had been indifferent to the rights of the Indians, and, by not taking the necessary measures to set aside the frauds in the sales of their reservations, had brought on the war, I stated what I now take pleasure in repeating, that the Secretary of War had, to my own knowledge, used every possible exertion to investigate and annul such fraudulent contracts; that three agents were appointed, and were in fact investigating these alleged frauds up to the very moment when hostilities commenced; and that, in the opinion of many respectable citizens in that section of the country, the course of the administration, so far from being harsh and cruel to the Indians, was more mild and liberal than treaty stipulations required. That instead of continuing the investigations of frauds, measures of a more decisive character towards their removal should have been earlier used, and that in fact the safety of the white settler had been too much sacrificed in the attempt to do the most ample justice to the rights of the Indian. And yet, in the face of these declarations, I am charged with pursuing a course which, by subverting the purposes of party, would do injustice to the administration.

Creek Indians.

Sir, if other considerations did not restrain me, I owe too much to the repeated kindness of this House, to the indulgent liberality with which even my political opponents have sustained every legislative effort I have made for the defence of my constituents against a savage enemy, to allow me to mingle one sentiment of party with the consideration of this question.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. VANDERPOEL] has told us that an investigation of the frauds in the sale of Indian reservations has been and is now going on, under the authority and by the agents of the President; and that the object of the resolution in its amended form is to withdraw the subject out of the hands of the President, and to place it before a committee of this House. I must tell the gentleman from New York, as I have before had to tell my friend from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] that he mistakes the object of the proposed inquiry. It is not proposed, I must again repeat, to investigate or to set aside the frauds in the purchase of Indian reservations, but to inquire whether those who have committed these frauds, or any others, have been guilty of exciting the Indians to hostilities, and, by such means, of producing the present war. The President has the investigation of the frauds in his own hands under the treaty, and it is not proposed to interfere with that subject. The present question is, whether an inquiry into the causes and authors of the Creek war shall be instituted by agents appointed by the President, or by a committee of this House. Sir, I have not charged, or intended to charge, either by word or by implication, that the President would not prosecute this inquiry with the utmost vigor. On the contrary, I have no doubt that the charges contained in the petition having been brought to his notice, he will feel it his duty, whether this resolution passes or not, to proceed forthwith to a full, fair, and satisfactory examination of the whole subject. Should the House refuse to order an investigation, it is the intention of the delegation from Alabama to submit the matter to his consideration, that he may order such inquiry as he may think the occasion requires.

Mr. Speaker, it has been to me a matter of surprise, to witness with what zeal an investigation by a committee of this House has been opposed, and with what pertinacity it has been insisted that the appointment of such a committee would imply mistrust and disrespect towards the President. Sir, I have not viewed the subject in that light, nor have I advocated it from such feelings. What, has it come to this, that this House cannot, for legislative purposes, procure information by a legislative committee? Are we to be dependent on executive agents, and executive inquiries, for that information which is to guide us in the discharge of our legislative duties?

For the first time in the history of our Government has it been argued that a committee of this House have not the power to procure any information which the House may want; and that the Executive, through his agents, alone possesses such power. What prerogatives appertain to executive agents, that do not belong to a committee of this House? Cannot our committee be intrusted with the authority to send for persons and papers, and can such authority emanate from the President? Sir, as much as gentlemen may deprecate the powers of a committee, they can be, and often are, clothed with all the powers that belong to this House; and to abandon the use of committees in procuring compulsory information, for legislative purposes, is to yield up one of the most important powers which belong to the legislative department of this Government. Sir, a word to the gentleman from New York, and I have done. That gentleman, while he has so highly commended my course in avoiding all appeals to party feelings, in discussing questions of this character, will pardon me when I tell him he has not followed the example he so much approves. Sir, a more decided party rally I have not heard during this session than that which the gentleman has thought proper to make in opposition to an inquiry by a committee of this House. He charges that proposition with being an attack on the Executive, as evincing a want of confidence in the President, and calls on the friends of the President to "answer by their votes." I must say to the gentleman that, in my opinion, this appeal is not only ill-timed, but unjust, so far as it was intended to be made applicable to me, or the course I have thought proper to pursue. I say again to the friends of the President, that, in supporting the proposition for an additional inquiry by a committee of this House, it is the farthest from my intention to throw any imputation on the fairness or efficiency with which I believe he will prosecute his branch of the inquiry. My only object is to give the greatest possible latitude to the investigation, and to avoid the imputation of skulking from an inquiry into charges affecting the honor of a portion of my constituents.

Mr. GRANTLAND said that the Georgia delegation concurred fully in all that had been said by the gentleman from Alabama, as to the disposition evinced by the President and Secretary of War to have a strict investigation of the frauds alleged to have been committed in certifying contracts for Creek Indian lands. At the suggestion and on the recommendation of the Georgia delegation, two additional commissioners, gentlemen of high character, were appointed several months ago, to aid Colonel Hogan in bringing that investigation to a speedy close. While that investigation was in progress, it was arrested by the commencement of Indian hostility.

Mr. SUTHERLAND moved the previous question; but the House refused to second it: Yeas 70, nays 73.

After some remarks by Messrs. SUTHERLAND and LEWIS,

The amendment of Mr. GARLAND was disagreed to.

The question recurred on the motion of Mr. RIFLEY to strike out that part of the resolution which was moved as an amendment by Mr. WISE, and accepted by the mover as a modification, which left it as originally offered.

On this question Mr. GARLAND, of Louisiana, called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were: Yeas 93, nays 89.

So the motion to strike out was decided in the affirmative.

The question recurring on the adoption of the resolution,

Mr. WISE addressed the House at some length on the subject, and renewed his amendment as an addition.

Mr. PEYTON addressed the House to the following effect:

Mr. Speaker, it is with equal mortification and astonishment that I have witnessed the introduction of party into this discussion. Sir, has it come to this in the American Congress, that, upon questions of fraud, the watchword of "party" is to be raised? Why, sir, is there a party here which avows itself the advocate of fraud, and another party which declares open, undisguised war against fraud? If so, then I am proud to proclaim myself as belonging to the anti-fraud party. Is there a party here willing to encourage and conceal the acts of men who have been guilty of perpetrating the most glaring outrages upon their own country, and who, to conceal their crimes, have, after oppressing and plundering the savage tribes, goaded, encouraged, and roused them to a cruel and sanguinary war? If there is such a party here, sir, I wish at once to say that I do not belong to it.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. VANDERPOEL] has chosen, on this occasion, as is usual with the party to which he belongs, to go into an elaborate defence of General Jackson, as if he had been assailed, when it is admitted by all that the President and Secretary of War have exhausted all the means in their power without being able to accomplish the very object of this resolution. Hence the necessity and propriety of this House taking the matter into its own hands. This is the reason why the memorialists—from the scene of action—the seat of fraud and war—have appealed to Congress for redress. But, sir, when the memorial is submitted, and a committee asked for, the gentlemen reply to us with psalm-singing eulogiums upon General Jackson.

Mr. Speaker, since the gentleman from New York [Mr. VANDERPOEL] has indulged so widely in allusions to "party," I hope I may be permitted, in my reply to him, to call his attention, and that of the House, to some other questions growing out of those allusions; questions, sir, which address themselves to patriots everywhere, coming from whatever quarter, or belonging to whatever political sect they may.

We have been told by the Globe, that the party in this House to which I am proud to belong has studiously labored to retard the public business, and to defeat the action of the House upon important measures, deeply and vitally interesting to the country. Sir, while this stale calumny was confined to its polluted source, it was unworthy of notice; but it is now endorsed by gentlemen on this floor. Sir, let me ask what party it was that defeated the "land bill" sent to this House from the Senate? What party laid that bill on the table? What party prevented the distribution under that bill of thirty millions of the people's money, to which every body admits they are entitled, when it is not needed for the wants of the Government? Not the party to which I belong, but that gentleman and his friends.

Let me ask, sir, who delayed and defeated the executive patronage bill—a measure which was the great lever that elevated General Jackson to power? The gentleman and his friends. Let me ask, also, who perpetrated the sin—yes, sir, the unpardonable sin, if we are to believe half we see and hear upon the subject—of defeating the action of the House upon the President's recommendation to amend the constitution so as to secure to the people the election of President and Vice President of the United States? It is the same democratic Van Buren party. Yes, sir, and this is the second offence of the same kind; they defeated that measure at the last Congress, when I and my friends were urgent to take it up. What party in this House is it that differs with the President on the propriety of members of Congress holding appointments under the President to whose elevation they have contributed? The same party. What party defeated every effort to regulate the public deposits by law? Let me ask, sir, what party it is that, on all occasions, as a settled rule of action here, goes for every device calculated to elude inquiry and suppress the truth? Not the party to which I belong. Let me call the attention of the gentleman (and I allude to the subject for his especial consideration) to the memorable resolution of my friend from Virginia, [Mr. WISE], to investigate the conduct, the frauds, of your pet, Reuben M. Whitney—a dishonored, disgraced, perjured traitor as he is! Why, sir, is he shielded under the mantle of the same party? And now, when we propose to investigate other frauds, at the instance of a large portion of the people of two States of this confederacy, the same gentlemen rise up and cry out "party." The gentleman from New York tells me, if we want party, we shall have the benefit of it. What does this mean, sir? We say, examine, investigate the truth, and expose the conduct of men who have disgraced the nation, and caused the spilling of innocent blood; and the gentleman replies, it is a party question; go on, and we will give you the benefit of "party." Where is the man who would not consider himself dishonored, degraded below an American patriot, an American representative, to attach himself to such a question as this on party grounds?

[Mr. VANDERPOEL explained, and stated that what he said was, that the gentleman himself had first blown the horn of party, had first used the every-day catchword of party, and so treated it. If any one was responsible for dragging in party, he contended it was the honorable gentleman from Tennessee himself.]

Mr. PEXTON continued. What I said in allusion to party was by way of reply to the colleague of the honorable gentleman, [Mr. MANN, of New York], who denounced the proposed investigation as a humbug; I then appealed to that honorable gentleman to know if I rightly understood him; if I was to understand that his party would shield those men whom neither honor, justice, humanity, nor the innocent blood which was shed upon the frontier before their eyes, could restrain. I wished to be informed by him whether the mantle of party was to be thrown around them. I understood him, sir, and have had the avowal more marked and emphatic in the declarations of the gentleman on my right, [Mr. VANDERPOEL]. We say, sir, that there are rogues in the woods. The gentleman replies, well, they are all friends, and it is a party question. Hands off; don't touch them.

Mr. Speaker, when this proposition was first presented this morning, it was scented in the breeze by the old, the experienced, and cunning, who shied off. It may be meal, but then, possibly, a cat might be concealed in it. My colleague [Mr. BELL] proposed this investigation, for enough had come to light, independently of these memorials, to justify it, though in that proposition he did not, to be sure, sound the alarm in such a manner as to arouse the fears of the party, but they rallied all the strength which could be collected in so short a time; it was a tie. The vote stood 88 and 88; the Speaker gave the casting vote in the negative, and so the investigation was strangled. Yes, sir, the presiding officer of this House [Mr. POLK] had it in his power to say whether this scene of iniquity should remain, unexamined, unpunished, a blot upon the honor of the nation: the casting vote of the Speaker was fatal to the inquiry.

Well, then, secrecy is still the order of the day, and the watchword of your party. Gentlemen, I detest your tactics, and have no confidence in your chief, (Mr. Van Buren,) for the reason that secrecy and concealment are your principles of action. You are endeavoring to make the Government itself a secret inquisition, the more odious and detestable because it is to be wielded as an instrument of torture and death to one man, and of rewards and honors to another; not as a reward to virtue and a punishment to vice, but the very reverse. Men are proscribed for obstinacy in virtue, patriotism, and love of liberty, and rewarded for their degrading servility and infamous truckling. Yes, sir, secrecy is the very existence, the soul of your party, if it has any soul. I have seen many exhibitions of its existence of late. The first time I saw it formally introduced into this House, it had the honor of being ushered in here by two gentlemen, then and now filling distinguished places amongst us—I mean the chairmen of the Committees of Ways and

Creek Indians.

[JULY 1, 1836.]

Means and Foreign Affairs at the last session of Congress, [Messrs. POLK and CAMBRELENG.] Sir, it was about the expiration of the last session of Congress that these four leading and distinguished members of "the party"—(I say distinguished for their promptness and efficiency in great party emergencies, such as the present)—took their degree in their order. Then it was that this badge of secrecy regularly became ingrafted and legitimately installed as one of the main elements of power in "the party" who are now exercising it for the suppression of all inquiry.

Mr. Speaker, an examination into its origin, progress, and present condition, could not be otherwise than serviceable to the House, and more especially to the country. Then, sir, to the secret history, or the history of the secrecy of the party.

The first time that I have heard or known of such a thing as a secret correspondence between the heads of committees in this House and the heads of Departments, was commenced here by the heads of the Committees on Foreign Affairs and Ways and Means [Messrs. POLK and CAMBRELENG] with the Secretary of State, at the last session of Congress. Yes, sir, a secret correspondence which has never yet seen the light. Where is that correspondence with the Secretary of State? Why suppress it? The public have a right to it, as touching a most important question, deeply affecting, at that time, the honor and safety of the nation. These chairmen, sir, without the direction of the House, without the knowledge of their committees, sent a secret, yes, sir, a secret, written communication to the Secretary of State, calling upon him to be informed how much money was necessary to be appropriated for the defence of the country. To this communication the Secretary replied, in writing, recommending one million for fortifications, and two millions for the navy. Now, sir, I ask again, why has not this correspondence been suffered to see the light? Why never published? Why never laid before this House? Why, sir, it has never been spoken of by one of those gentlemen, [Mr. POLK,] even in "a whisper, under the injunction of secrecy," so far as we know. From the other [Mr. CAMBRELENG] it seemed to escape as if by chance, in the hurry and press of a heavy fire from my friend on my right, [Mr. WISE.] This was only the "premonitory symptom" of more important matters. The Secretary's recommendation was not only obtained, but the sanction and approbation of the President, also, were to be obtained; not in the usual form, by a message to the House, in an open, frank, undisguised, manly, and honest way; no, sir, his recommendation was sought, obtained, and concealed. Yes, sir, studiously, carefully, and fraudulently suppressed from the House—circulated only in cautious whispers, under the injunction of secrecy—and this on a question of national defence, national honor and safety. Yes, sir, and intended, at the time, to be made a party question by those who were engaged in the dark plot. We are told by the President, in his message sent to Congress nine months afterwards, that this was a great leading object with him at that time; that the safety and the honor of the country required it. Yes, sir, a correspondence is opened; the Secretary furnishes the estimates, and recommends the appropriation of three millions of dollars; the President sanctions it; and all, all is kept in the dark, suppressed, concealed by a few jugglers; and they then present their propositions, to be hurried through this House. I said, sir, that secrecy was the new order of things. Am I not right, sir? The President's wishes were ascertained upon a most important and exciting subject, before that subject was acted on in this House; and those wishes are held in the power of a few men, to be either disclosed afterwards, or concealed, at their pleasure, for party purposes.

Now, sir, it seems to me that party could never have chilled my soul and deadened all sense of justice so much as this. If I had seen a venerable, distinguished colleague of mine, whom I had always known to be frank, disinterested, bold, and fearless, in his support of the President; if I had heard him standing up and saying, "Where is my file leader? where is the President? he understands the condition of our foreign affairs; it is his constitutional duty to speak, and, if he advises me it is necessary, I will vote the money;" if I, sir, had known the President's views, and intentionally concealed them from that venerable Senator, when I saw the baits spread for his feet by an insidious enemy, I should have been ashamed to go back to my own country. I could never have held up my head amongst honest men anywhere. What an awful test; we are required to walk blindfolded amongst burning ploughshares. Yes, sir; we hear nothing of a quarter from which the measure comes, notwithstanding it originates in the cabinet, receives the executive sanction, and is then ushered silently in here; and we are told, after we go wrong, that it is one of General Jackson's choice leading measures, and you are dead against the administration. Now, sir, I put it to you whether this House was not entitled to that information. Was not the Senate entitled to it? Was not every American citizen entitled to it? Yet, sir, the President's views were cut off in transitu by these non-conductors of the truth. But, as soon as the vote was taken, why, then, we hear the hue and cry raised, wind and horn, in the mouth of every demagogue, and blazoned forth by all their presses, that the President required the appropriation to defend the country, and here is Judge White, from his own State, going against it. That, Mr. Speaker, was the first step towards the establishment of this secret inquisitorial power, more to be dreaded than any thing which has threatened the destinies of this country. Mr. Speaker, that correspondence was not suppressed by accident. No, sir; that is impossible; but what followed shows most clearly that it was done by design. After the committee of conference was appointed; after they had agreed upon a report, and directed a report to be made to the House; after the chairman [Mr. CAMBRELENG] had pledged himself in the committee to make the report, and when he renewed that pledge to gentlemen around him; after he took his seat on this floor—

[The SPEAKER here interrupted, and called the gentleman from Tennessee to order for irrelevancy.]

Mr. Speaker, (said Mr. PEXTON,) I had hoped, sir, that it would be in order to speak the truth. The truth and facts of that night are not yet half told, and I had hoped to be permitted, in reply to those gentlemen who are so free to allude to party, and assail others for their course upon this floor, to state a few additional facts as going to establish my original proposition, that there is established, and now about to be fixed upon the country, a secret, dangerous, corrupt, arbitrary, tyrannical, and hitherto unknown power. This is my position. The facts to which I have alluded, and am about to allude, are important links in the chain of evidence, and, if not arrested in my argument, I will establish my position, and make you ashamed of your leader, who is most guilty of all.

Sir, it is extremely difficult to say what is relevant or what is irrelevant. The great Marshall, in any of his learned opinions, would lay his premises so far out of sight, sir, that you would call him to order for irrelevancy, and yet, sir, he would force you along, with the strength of a giant, to his conclusions. It is a most delicate as well as a most dangerous and arbitrary exercise of power by the Speaker of a deliberative body, to call a member to order, and silence him for irrelevancy, and should be resorted to with a sparing hand.

The SPEAKER. Order! The Chair is not aware that

JULY 1, 1836.]

Creek Indians.

[H. OF R.]

he has been tyrannical or arbitrary. He only reminded the gentleman from Tennessee of the irrelevancy of his remarks.

Mr. PEXTON. The Chair does not understand me, I hope, as alluding to him personally. I was suggesting that it was a most delicate and arbitrary exercise of power, by any Speaker, to silence a member for what he conceived to be irrelevancy, and one seldom to be used.

The SPEAKER said he had called the gentleman from Tennessee to order because the subject of appropriations at the last session of Congress for fortifications was not before the House.

Mr. PEXTON. Mr. Speaker, I am very unwilling to give the Chair any uneasiness, or be at all troublesome to the House; but, sir, I cannot think I have transcended the usual and legitimate latitude of parliamentary discussion. Sir, the power of the President, the influence of the President, the character of the President, the efficiency of the President, in such an inquiry as this, the honesty and fidelity of the party, their mode of transacting business now, heretofore, and hereafter, have all been, and must still be, alluded to in this discussion; and I appeal to the House if I shall not be permitted to submit what few remarks I have to offer. [Cries of "Go on! go on!" and a few "No! no!"]

The CHAIR said he was at all times unwilling to arrest any gentleman, nor would he have done so on the present occasion, if the gentleman's remarks had been pertinent to the subject before the House. With this admonition, the gentleman will proceed.

Mr. PEXTON. Sir, it will be impossible for me to proceed, unless I can be permitted to take my own view of this subject.

Mr. Speaker, how can I tell but that some very busy and obliging gentleman has already run off to the President for his opinions, and that they may now be in the pocket of my nearest neighbor, ready to be turned loose against all who cannot find out and obey them by instinct. Sir, we have about this hall and in it, a great many of these tell-tale, penny-post carriers of news to the President. No, I will not say a great many, but we have seen, and do continue to see, some gentlemen going to him for his sanction of measures before they are presented or acted on in this House, and, after obtaining his opinions, they keep them in profound secrecy; and if any one should chance to tread a little out of the traces, why, then, sir, they halloo out, he is against General Jackson; all the time sitting by his side with the President's views in their pockets, and fraudulently suppressing them.

Mr. Speaker, you know, sir, that such things have been done; and how can I tell but it may be the case in this instance? I am arguing from what has been done, to show what may be expected; and, sir, I say, that a party which cannot, which dare not have investigated any fraud, any corruption, any public robber brought to the bar of justice, without raising the cry of "General Jackson! General Jackson!" are not fit to be trusted with the destinies of this nation. Here is one of the plainest and most audacious outrages which has ever been perpetrated in the annals of the world: your petty tyrants, the Indian agents referred to in these memorials, forming combinations to defraud the Government of its public domain, plundering, yes, sir, literally stripping the savages and then aiding and encouraging them to make war upon your helpless frontier, that they may escape the punishment due to their crimes. Why, sir, the oppressions and corruptions of Warren Hastings, in his government of Hindostan, would dwindle into nothing, and he would appear a saint in comparison with these speculators; and yet, sir, we are denied a committee—the people who have suffered, and are suffering, are denied a committee—of this House to investigate their frauds, and the part which they have acted in the Indian wars. Why?

Because something has been said which is offensive to the sensitive nerves of gentlemen here, and it is forthwith made a party question. A party question! If so, sir, then let those Indian agents be at once made members of the cabinet, and Reuben M. Whitney be proclaimed President, and then the people will understand you, and know what to be at. You should no longer attempt to deceive them by the perpetration of such deeds in the name of a man whom they have so many reasons to love, and trust a man who has no secrets, but is open and frank as day in all he does, notwithstanding these petty spies obtain his opinions and wishes, and then come here, to this hall, and conceal them. Why, sir, if he knew of the petty tricks and low deceptions which they practise, he would spurn them from his presence, and blush to own them as his partisans.

Why, sir, I am informed that your candidate for the presidency himself took a direct, deep personal interest in one of these very transactions, under the dark cover of midnight, behind one of these pillars. Nay, sir, more, I can prove it upon him, with such circumstances as would be sufficient to send any common man, tried before a jury of honest men, to the penitentiary.

Now, Mr. Speaker, another instance, almost as flagrant as this. It is said we made it a party question by saying there are rogues in the woods, and the gentleman says they are our friends. Sir, a few days past we had another striking exhibition of this same power of secrecy. A great measure is pending. The same gentlemen are trembling in the wind, or do not know how to go—turn their eye upon the chief, and want to know his opinion. They obtain it, but keep it secret to themselves, though he never enjoined secrecy, and pass the bill; and then, what takes place? Why, we see the ambassador whom the party has employed, as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Adams] said, to lie for them by the job and by the year, (undoubtedly as to time and amount;) we see him coming out and saying—what? The President putting his name to the bill, to be sure; but we are told that he looks upon it as the worst of measures, calculated to destroy the State Governments, and subvert the true principles of our institutions; that there was not time for consultation, but that he would hereafter give his reasons against it. Sir, this is strange. Ascertain the President's views of a measure before it is passed; and then, after he sanctions it, to write speeches in his name to break down all those who supported it! And yet these gentlemen profess to have some regard to the President's fame, his character, and his principles. Why, sir, the President came into power upon the very idea that he was a bold, frank, fearless, honest, man; and the plain, bright, daylight honesty of his administration was the reason, the very ground, upon which the soldiers of the country rallied around him; and now in his name are perpetrated such deeds of shame as will make one almost weep to look upon, against every thing which the President has proposed, and which the President has done, so far as he could do any thing. But the great misfortune is, that the President is surrounded by an army—yes, sir, an army of mercenaries—who are hostile both to the principles of his administration and the welfare of the country; and though they flatter him, far and near, there is none that love him; no, not one. They are base flatterers and parasites.

Mr. Speaker, we are informed, officially informed, by the organ of the Vice President, (for a paper which could prostrate the fame of General Jackson as that print has done can no longer be considered as the friend of General Jackson,) we are informed by it that the President says:

"We are equally warranted in saying that the President has approved the amended bill, not because he thinks it judicious to make the States the depositories of the moneys of the United States, but because the plan is not obnoxious to constitutional objections; because it has been presented by a majority of the people's representatives, to whom the question of expediency on this subject peculiarly belongs, &c.

"He thinks it impolitic and unsafe to mix up the affairs of the United States with those of the several States, and that the chances of perpetuity for our admirable system of government are increased in proportion to the clearness with which the lines which separate their several powers, duties, and interests, are defined and maintained. It is probable he will take some fitting occasion to make known to his countrymen, in detail, the views he entertains on this vital subject. It is only necessary now that they should know that, in approving the deposite bill, he does not intend to countenance, in the least degree, the idea of raising money by the General Government for distribution among the States, thus lessening the responsibility of the State Governments in taxing the people, and at the same time encouraging extravagant expenditures, making the States, instead of independent sovereignties, the mere stipendiaries of the General Government, perverting the power of taxation given in the constitution to purposes never thought of by its framers; corrupting the sources of legislation; tending to consolidation; and ultimately destroying all that is pure and valuable in the structure and administration of our political system," &c.

* * * "Such, we are warranted in saying, are the views of the President in relation to this interesting subject."

Mr. PEXTON was proceeding to contrast these views with the sentiments of the President himself, as contained in his message of 1830, when he was arrested by the Speaker.

In his message of December, 1830, to Congress, the President holds this language:

"Thus viewing the subject, I have heretofore [in his message of 1829] felt it my duty to recommend the adoption of some plan for the distribution of the surplus funds which may at any time remain in the Treasury after the national debt shall have been paid, among the States, in proportion to the number of their Representatives, to be applied by them to objects of internal improvement."

"Although this plan has met with favor in some portions of the Union, it has also elicited objections which merit deliberate consideration. A brief notice of these objections here will not, therefore, I trust, be regarded as out of place. They rest, as far as they have come to my knowledge, on the following grounds: 1st. An objection to the ratio of distribution. 2d. An apprehension that the existence of such a regulation would produce improvident and oppressive taxation to raise the funds for distribution. 3d. That the mode proposed would lead to the construction of works of a local nature to the exclusion of such as are general, and as would consequently be of a more useful character; and, lastly, that it would create a discreditable and injurious dependence on the part of the State Governments upon the federal power," &c. The President goes on at length, and with great ability, to answer the several objections to this plan of distribution. He insists upon the correctness of his first position, as to the ratio of distribution, (that is, according to the representation of each State in Congress,) and says, "the ratio of representation presented itself to my mind, and it still does, as one of obvious equity, because of its being the ratio of contribution, whether the funds to be distributed be derived from the customs or from direct taxation." The vote in the Senate upon this proposition in the late bill, now a law, stood equal, and the Vice President could not be found, though called for, to give the casting vote in favor of this old favorite ratio of General Jackson, and it was lost.

The President proceeds to state:

"In my first message I stated it to be my opinion that it is not probable that any adjustment of the tariff, upon principles satisfactory to the people of the Union, will, until a remote period, if ever, leave the Government without a considerable surplus in the Treasury beyond what may be required for its current service." "I have had no cause to change that opinion, but much to confirm it. Should these expectations be realized, a suitable fund would thus be produced for the plan under consideration to operate upon; [the plan of distribution for the purposes of internal improvement by the States.] I do not doubt that those who come after us will be as much alive as we are to the obligation upon all the trustees of political power to exempt those for whom they act from all unnecessary burdens; and as sensible of the great truth, that the resources of the nation, beyond those required for the immediate and necessary purposes of Government, can nowhere be so well deposited as in the pockets of the people," &c.

"The strength as well as the true glory of the confederacy is mainly founded on the propriety and power of the several independent sovereignties of which it is composed, and the certainty with which they can be brought into successful, active, co-operation, through the agency of the Federal Government."

He does not seem to think it impolitic and unsafe to mix up the affairs of the United with those of the several States. The President proceeds:

"That the plan under consideration would derive important advantages from its certainty, and that the moneys set apart for these purposes would be more judiciously applied, and economically expended under the direction of the State Legislatures, in which every part of each State is immediately represented, cannot, I think, be doubted," &c.

In respect to the last objection, its probable effect upon the dignity and independence of the State Governments, it appears to me only necessary to state the case as it is, and as it would be if the measure proposed were adopted, to show that the operation is most likely to be the very reverse of that which the objection supposes.

In the one case the State would receive its quota of the national revenue for domestic use, upon a fixed principle, as a matter of right, and from a fund to the creation of which it had itself contributed its fair proportion. Surely there could be nothing derogatory in that. (What say you to that, gentlemen? Can you make, in the President's name, a better argument against this measure, which is emphatically his own, than he has made himself in favor of it?)

The President proceeds:

"As matters now stand, the States themselves, in their sovereign character, are not unfrequently petitioners at the bar of the Federal Legislature for such allowances out of the national Treasury as it may comport with their pleasure or sense of duty to bestow upon them. It cannot require argument to prove which of the two courses is most compatible with the efficiency or respectability of the State Governments."

The SPEAKER here interposed, and said he must again remind the gentleman that the deposite bill was not then the subject under consideration, but was wholly unconnected with it.

Mr. PEXTON. Mr. Speaker: All I can say, then, sir, is, that the same party in this House who have prevented an amendment of the constitution to secure to the people the election of President and Vice President—the same party who have trampled under foot the executive patronage bill—a measure which was a means of elevating the present Chief Magistrate to power—the same party who have prevented any investigation into the control over the public money—the same party who have prevented the distribution of thirty millions of dollars of the revenue to which the people are entitled, as every body admits, under the constitution—the same party who have concealed the frauds of Reuben M. Whitney—yes, sir, that same party are now arrayed to suppress inquiry into these Indian frauds, and to protect a band (to call them robbers would be a compliment in comparison to what they merit) of men whom avarice and grasping meanness have impelled to the perpetration of every crime, and upon whom the blood of the innocent child, spilt before its mother's face, cries aloud for vengeance. Of this we have already evidence enough. And, sir, it is the same party, headed by the same leaders, whom I have stood by here and seen in days gone by, who defeated the three-million appropriation on the Ides of March; yes, sir, and headed by the same chief that I saw enter that door in the dark hour of midnight, gliding and stealing in as if he had fled from the inglorious field of Bladensburg, he was present, aiding and consenting to the death. Then there was his Secretary, (Mr. FOSTER,) at his side, to give the order, to pronounce sentence. He sanctioned it, and his deputy sheriff (Mr. CAMMELLENG) executed it, while his committee men and chairman were going through this House dissuading members from voting. Mr. Speaker, I can prove it. I can prove, sir, that the then chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means (the present Speaker, Mr. POLK,) told one of his colleagues that if he had any doubt, he ought not to vote. His colleague told him, in reply, that he had doubts as to the propriety of sitting after twelve o'clock, and should like to have them removed; but that he would continue to vote until that was done. And, sir, if a committee had been appointed with full power to send for persons and papers, which was refused, through the instrumentality of the party, too; and rejected by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] * it could have been proved. Nor is this all. Sir, I am informed by a gentleman, that he himself heard Mr. Van Buren say that the report must not or ought not to be made; and, said he, I told Mr. Lewis, of Alabama, and Mr. Whittlesey, of Ohio, the same thing, and one or two other gentlemen besides; and, since that, without knowing my object, I have asked them about it, and they have substantiated what this gentleman has informed me. Sir, it is the same secret, sly, indirect, crafty influence, which is now operating to defeat the present inquiry; for they well knew that if you once set a precedent to examine into these frauds, it would not be very easy to stop it. Oh! but, say they, it is not worth while to say any thing about it. Every one knows the President is honest, and we will get out of it that way. But once establish the precedent, and give us a committee on these frauds, and then you must give us a committee upon land speculators everywhere else, ay, even in New York. Then you must give us a committee upon any men or set of men concerned in, or charged with, frauds, not even excepting the notorious Reuben; and therefore it is better to establish the precedent in time, that secrecy is and shall be the order of the day, and the watchword of the party; for in that consists its power and safety. Sir, what freeman will bend his neck to that secret power, more detestable and more odious than the inquisition of Spain?

Sir, it is not necessary that the chief and leader should always be personally present. First, on the night of the

* When Mr. Adams introduced his celebrated resolution of inquiry into the loss of the fortification bill of the last session, Mr. Williams, of North Carolina, suggested a modification, of the character indicated above, which Mr. A. refused to accept. last session, you might see the cogniac ghost, as my friend from Virginia called him, [Mr. WARREN, of New York,] gliding in, to shed the light of his countenance upon the subject. When that failed, you might see the chief himself stalking in, smiling, through the green and white door, and even if he did not speak, the Secretary spoke for him. A wink, a nod, or a look from him was enough.

"Though smooth his voice and calm his general mien, Still seems there something he would not have seen."

What brought him here at such a time?

"Few are his words, but quick his eye and hand,
With these he mingles but to command:
Steer to that shore! They sail. Do this! 'Tis done.
Now form and follow me, the spoils are won.
What is that spell, that thus his lawless train
Confess, and envy, yet oppose in vain?"

What might it be, but the power of gold—the magic of the Treasury? Yes, sir, you might on that night see his creatures flying, advancing, retreating, and returning, according to orders. Mr. Speaker, have you not witnessed the same thing? I saw it, sir, and am sure it could not have escaped your observation.

Mr. Speaker, I know I am speaking under the uplifted arm of the previous question. It is personified in this hall.* I can see it now, sir, as I saw it operate upon its owner one day, when he rose to speak, very much like a chicken that has the gapes. It sticks in his throat so naturally that he can get nothing else out for some time. He goes about with it half out of his mouth, like a snake with a chicken half swallowed. Sir, I not only know it, but I know that no opportunity will be offered for me or any other man to express his sentiments upon any question, unless directly up to the point of relevancy, and that is my apology for detaining the House even as long as I have done. I have been induced to make the remarks which I have made, not, sir, because they were directly pertinent to the question before the House, but in reply to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. VANDERPOEL,] who was suffered to proceed unrestricted, and who, while he himself seems to have put this question solely on party grounds, has, at the same time, attributed to me, and to those with whom I act, the very same motives for desiring to go into the investigation of these frauds.

When Mr. PEXTON had concluded,

Mr. EVERETT said he rose to ask the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] to withdraw his motion, and permit the question to be taken. He said the House had already decided the question. The Committee on Indian Affairs had been charged with an important examination in relation to the abuses in the Indian department. They had progressed so far as to become unanimously satisfied that there was sufficient ground to continue the examination, without committing themselves upon any particular case. This, for one, he should not do until the examination was completed. The committee, as the organ of the House, had reported this as their judgment, in the resolution they had presented to the House. This resolution proposed to continue the examination as to all abuses. The Creek frauds were not the most important; their effect was temporary, though it had been most fatal. The other abuses were of a more permanent character; they had been interwoven in the administration of this department, and might involve individuals of high standing. As to the Creek frauds, the committee were of opinion that an important collateral benefit would result from the mere fact of the appointment of a committee. It was a fact known to every one, that, from some cause, (just or unjust, he would not say,) the Indians had no confidence in agents sent by the Executive among them. The appointment of a committee of the House would inspire them with confidence in the justice of the country: though it might have no effect on those who were in actual hostility, yet it might prevent the increase of their number. It would decide the wavering, and, for one, he believed it would, more than any other measure, tend to pacify them. The House had been put in possession of the views of the committee; they had deliberately decided that there should be no further examination; they had negatived the resolutions offered by the committee; they had taken the responsibility of refusing the inquiry—a responsibility which would rest on every member who voted against the resolution. They had also negatived the very proposition now offered by the gentleman from Virginia, when offered by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. GARLAND] as an amendment to the amendment of his colleague, [Mr. RIPLEY.] They had voted against any examination of the Creek frauds by a committee. Having thus, in two votes, refused all further examination, he would, therefore, ask the gentleman from Virginia what purpose would be answered by a third vote, and hoped he would withdraw his motion.

* It should be stated that, several times in the course of Mr. P.'s remarks, gentlemen had risen to address the Chair, who were much in the habit of what is technically called "applying the screws."—Note by Mr. P.

Mr. WISE stated the yeas and nays were not called on Mr. GARLAND's amendment; his object in persisting in his amendment was to obtain the yeas and nays.

Mr. BOON said that the charges made against this administration, of supposed frauds and corruption, had been so often repeated, that they had lost all their influence with the people of the country, and passed by the public ear like the sound of the idle winds. Sir, said Mr. B., I recollect that two years ago, the hue and cry of fraud and corruption was sung against the Post Office Department, and its then talented and distinguished head. And, Mr. Speaker, one would have supposed, from the clamor of the opposition, that the Post Office Department was the very fountain of all kinds of fraud and corruption. Committees of both Houses of Congress were appointed to examine into the alleged frauds, in the recess of Congress, and what was the result? Why, sir, reports were made and printed for circulation among the people, containing several hundred pages of testimony and comment by the committees; but, after all their labors, they were not able to produce proof of a solitary case of fraud or corruption in any one of the officers of the Government. The consequence was, that the public mind became satisfied that all the charges of fraud and corruption were wholly unfounded in point of fact; and now we hear no more about the frauds that were charged upon the Post Office Department. The venue is now changed, and it is now supposed and verily believed that enormous frauds have been committed by some of the officers of the Government upon the "poor Indians," and we are now called upon to appoint a committee to travel over the country during the recess of Congress, with power to send for persons and papers, with a view to ascertain whether or not those vague charges that have been trumpeted forth to the country are well founded.

Those who are opposed to sending out this mission, are charged with a disposition to cover up those supposed or alleged frauds complained of, and party tactics have been charged upon those who are opposed to the appointment of a committee of this House to inquire into this matter during the recess of Congress.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I will not charge the honorable mover of this project, or any of its advocates, with party purposes in this matter; but, sir, as many surmises have been made in reference to the alleged frauds upon the poor Indians, would it not be fair to suppose a supposable case? and to suppose that great electioneering facilities would be afforded to the political missionaries thus sent into the different sections of the country? Might it not be surmised or supposed by some, that this mission, if sent out through the country, would have an opportunity of operating upon the next presidential election? How is this committee to be raised, Mr. Speaker? Why, sir, it is proposed that the Committee on Indian Affairs shall depute three or more of their own members, and we are told that a majority of the members of that committee are friends of this administration. Admit this to be true, does that argue that the friends of the administration on the Committee on Indian Affairs will be appointed a sub-committee for the purposes that are had in view in this matter? I think not. The Committee on Indian Affairs is composed of nine members, and I predict that if the proposition as first proposed shall be adopted by the House, the sub-committee will not be made up of the friends of the administration. On the contrary, its most bitter enemies would be sent out, and an opportunity to electioneer for President would be afforded to some, and the newspapers would be filled with political squibs, stating that no doubt existed as to the alleged frauds, and that all that was wanting to support the charges, was a lack of one or more credible and disinterested witnesses to testify, and the truth declare on oath. Thus would matters progress until after the presidential election in November next; and, to wind up the affair, at the next meeting of Congress, this House, and the country, would be favored with another report similar to the one made on the subject of frauds which were charged upon the Post Office Department.

Mr. B. said that he had entire confidence in the President, and that he had no doubt but what every exertion would be made by the President to have this matter probed to the bottom; and if fraud shall be found to exist, have the guilty punished. Sir, said Mr. B., I am one of those who never feared responsibility on my part; and as one of the representatives of the people, I am willing to bear my share of responsibility in voting against the appointment of a committee on the part of this House, to travel through the country to electioneer from now until the next annual meeting of Congress, at eight dollars per day, and eight dollars for every twenty miles' travel. Mr. Speaker, I will not detain the House at this late period of the session, but I felt myself called upon to say thus much by way of offset to some of the many charges that have been made against this administration and its friends.

Mr. BYNUM demanded the previous question; but withdrew it at the suggestion of

Mr. HAWES, who said a few words in reply to the gentleman from Indiana, and then renewed (as promised) the demand for the previous question.

Mr. CALHOUN, of Massachusetts, moved to lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. WISE called for the yeas and nays; which were not ordered, and the motion to lay on the table was lost without a count.

The previous question was then seconded by the House, 69 to 56.

Mr. WISE asked for the yeas and nays on ordering the main question; which were ordered, and were: Yeas 90, nays 66. So the House determined that the main question should be now put.

The question on the adoption of the resolution, as modified on suggestion of Mr. Wise, was then taken, and decided in the affirmative: Ayes 91, noes not counted. So the resolution was agreed to in the following form:

Resolved, That the memorial of certain citizens of Alabama and Georgia, respecting alleged frauds in the purchase of the reservations of the Creek Indians, and the causes of their present hostilities, be referred to the President of the United States, and that he be requested to cause such measures to be taken for investigating these transactions, and for the prosecution of the persons engaged in them who may have been guilty of any breaches of the laws, as may appear to be proper, and within the power of the Executive.

Mr. WHITTLESEY, at half-past nine P. M., called for the orders of the day; and, after some conversation, on the priority of business, the House went into Committee of the Whole, for the consideration of certain private bills from the Senate.

SATURDAY, JULY 2.

BANK LOANS TO MEMBERS OF CONGRESS.

Mr. HUNT, from the select committee appointed to inquire whether any and what members of Congress, heads of Departments, and other officers of the Government, had obtained accommodations and facilities from any bank or banks in obtaining the use of public money for the purposes of speculation in the public lands, submitted a report, concluding with the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the select committee appointed by this House on the 20th June, 1836, be increased to nine, and that the said committee have power to sit during the recess of this House.

Resolved, That the said committee embrace, in their inquiries, any connexion between deposit banks or others and the land offices, for the purposes of speculation.

Resolved, That said committee inquire how far, and to whom, for speculation in public lands, the deposit banks have issued certificates of deposit without an actual deposit in cash, and to what extent they have been received in payment for purchases of public lands at the several land offices.

Resolved, That said committee inquire how far, and to what extent, combinations in the purchase of the public lands have been formed, or are forming, sufficiently strong, from interested motives, to control, to any extent the legislative action of Congress.

Mr. HUNT addressed the House at some length, in explanation of the course taken and recommended by the committee; and stated that the report and resolutions had the unanimous assent of the committee.

Mr. LANE moved that the report and resolutions be laid on the table and printed; remarking, at the same time, in justice to himself, that he had no interest in making the motion, having had no connexion with any banks, having received no accommodation or facilities from them, and having had nothing to do with land speculations.

Mr. PEARCE, of Rhode Island, (a member of the committee,) begged leave to ask the gentleman whether he could say the same of his son; and whether his son had not made forty or fifty thousand dollars through bank facilities?

Mr. P. was called to order.

Mr. ADAMS called for a division of the question, so as to be first taken on laying on the table.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, asked the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and, being taken, were as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Ash, Barton, Beale, Bean, Bockee, Boon, Boyd, Buchanan, Burns, Cambreleng, Casey, G. Chambers, Chapin, Cleveland, Coles, Connor, Craig, Cramer, Cushman, Davis, Dickerson, Double-day, Dunlap, Efner, Fairfield, Farlin, Fowler, Fry, W. K. Fuller, Gillet, Grantland, Albert G. Harrison, Hawkins, Haynes, Henderson, Hiester, Hubley, Huntington, J. Jackson, Jarvis, R. M. Johnson, Cave Johnson, John W. Jones, Judson, Kennon, Lane, Lansing, G.

Whittlesey, Lewis Williams, Sherrod Williams, Wise—71.

So the report and resolutions were ordered to lie on table; and they were then ordered to be printed.

LAND OFFICE.

On motion of Mr. KENNON, the committee took up (nem. con.) the "bill to reorganize the General Land Office."

The bill having been read, the committee took up the amendments proposed by the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. KENNON hoped the committee would not concur in any of the amendments, but agree to the bill as it came from the Senate.

On this considerable discussion arose, in which Messrs. LINCOLN, WILLIAMS of North Carolina, VINTON, JOHNSON of Tennessee, CHAPMAN, JOHNSON of Louisiana, LYON, GRENELL, JARVIS, WHITTLESEY of Ohio, PARKER, BOON, and KENNON, took part, when all the amendments of the committee were concurred in.

Mr. KENNON offered an amendment to the bill adding twenty additional clerks, at a salary of $1,200 each. Mr. K. explained that this amendment was contained in the Senate's bill, but was left out in the engrossment by mistake.

The amendment was then agreed to.

Mr. LINCOLN moved to strike out the proviso in the fourth section. Agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee, offered an amendment as a substitute for section nine, a section providing that the Commissioner should have a stated number of clerks, to be appointed only for two years. He stated his object to be to have all the work of the office now lying behind brought up; and then leave it for Congress to fix the number necessary to be employed hereafter.

After some remarks by Messrs WHITTLESEY of Ohio, BOON, JARVIS, VINTON, WILLIAMS of North Carolina, and PARKER,

The amendment of Mr. JOHNSON was rejected.

Mr. GARLAND, of Louisiana, offered as an additional section that the offices should be kept open ten hours a day in the summer season, and eight hours in the winter. Agreed to.

Mr. UNDERWOOD offered an amendment placing restrictions upon registers of land offices. Agreed to.

Mr. HAWES submitted an amendment prohibiting officers of the General Land Office from purchasing public lands. Agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee, moved an amendment providing that the thirty-five clerks provided for by the bill at a salary of $1,000 should not be appointed for a longer term than two years. Lost.

Mr. J. then offered an amendment, for the purpose of increasing the pay of the clerks in the War Department.

After a few remarks by Messrs. VINTON, CAMBRELENG, and JOHNSON, the amendment was rejected.

The bill was then laid aside, to be reported to the House.

The committee then took up the bill in addition to the "act making appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1836."

Some of the amendments submitted by Mr. CAMBRELENG, from the Committee of Ways and Means, were concurred in; when

The House took the usual recess, from half past two to four o'clock.

EVENING SESSION.

The House took up the bill making appropriations for certain harbors.

The several amendments of the Senate proposing reductions were concurred in.

The question then recurred on the amendment proposing to insert the clause struck out by the House making an appropriation of $30,000 for surveys.

Mr. SMITH called for the yeas and nays on concurring in the amendment; which were ordered, and were: Yeas 71, nays 64.

So the amendment of the Senate was concurred in.

INDIAN AFFAIRS.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. MASON, of Virginia, in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the "bill in addition to an act making appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1836."

Various amendments submitted by Mr. CAMBRELENG were agreed to.

Mr. PARKS moved an additional clause, extending the Capitol square westward to First street, including the botanic garden, (so called,) which motion was briefly advocated by Mr. P.

Mr. WARD said he concurred in opinion with the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. PARKS,] as to the propriety of extending the public grounds on the west of the Capitol as far as First street, and he hoped the proposed amendment would prevail. The public square will be much improved in appearance, and will be more in keeping with the splendid Capitol; for the public grounds on the west are too limited for a building covering nearly two acres of ground. In point of economy, he said, it was desirable, because it is now proposed to erect an iron fence around the botanic garden, which will cost at least 30 or $40,000; and next year there will doubtless be an application for making an iron fence on the triangular lots which lie to the north of Pennsylvania avenue, and south of Maryland avenue. If the grounds are extended to First street, as proposed, they will be handsomely laid out in walks and planted with trees and shrubbery, and will moreover allow sufficient space for the fountain, or a jet d'eau, to be erected, $5,000 being appropriated in this bill for that object.

The amendment was then agreed to.

Mr. MANN offered an amendment authorizing the President of the United States to contract for the construction of a building for the Treasury Department of the United States.

Mr. TALIAFERRO offered an amendment to the amendment to provide for the erection of a fire-proof building for the Patent Office.

After some remarks by Messrs. VINTON, A. H.

SHEPPERD, TALIAFERRO, and JARVIS, the amendment was agreed to; and the amendment as amended was also agreed to.

Mr. GRAVES offered an amendment to provide for the purchase of the stock of the Louisville and Portland canal. Lost: Yeas 50, nays 72.

Mr. DUNLAP offered an amendment appropriating $5,000 for the erection of a marine hospital at Memphis, Tennessee.

Mr. D. said that the amendment he offered was one of necessity; that every State west of the mountains was more interested than the State he had the honor in part to represent; but his immediate constituents in the town where the hospital was intended to be erected were directly interested as individuals. They had to pay annually more than two thousand dollars in private contributions for the support of such persons as were put on shore at this town sick and unable to pay anything for their support and protection. This burden I ask the House to relieve my constituents from. They have less interest in the hospital than any other portion of the community, except the town of Memphis. When the citizens of my district get so near home as Memphis, their friends will come and take care of them.

Mr. Chairman, (said Mr. D.) I now hold in my hand the list of the steamboats engaged in the navigation of the Mississippi river. The number of the boats will give the House some idea of the number of persons engaged in the navigation of said river. But, sir, there is another meritorious class of our citizens engaged in the navigation of the Mississippi river; they are persons who take their surplus produce to the Southern market in flat-boats, and return home on the steamboats. Sir, the persons who are engaged in the navigation of the Mississippi river are compelled to go to market in the season of the year that they are subject to all the diseases incident to the Southern climate.

Mr. Chairman, (said Mr. D.,) Memphis is situated between three and four days' travel above New Orleans, and those who contract the disease of cholera, yellow fever, or small pox, by the time they arrive at Memphis, the disease makes its appearance, and the captains of the boats leave the persons thus diseased, lying on the banks of the river, without any place to go to; no public house will take them in, and the private families do not wish to take persons among their families with contagious diseases, and the persons are left to lie on the wharf and die, or are placed at the charity of the citizens. Sir, if there is one man on this floor who will rise in his place and say an hospital is not necessary at Memphis, I will not press my amendment. I cannot believe that any representative of the American people will refuse to appropriate money sufficient to build a house for the reception of the sick and disabled American citizens who are engaged in the navigation of the Western rivers.

Mr. STORER offered a substitute for the amendment appropriating $5,000 for the purpose of making examinations and purchase of suitable sites for hospitals on the Western waters.

Mr. PEARCE, of Rhode Island, opposed the adoption of the amendment, on the ground that the House was not in possession of the information necessary to justify the appropriation at this time.

Mr. REYNOLDS, of Illinois, said that he knew it was unpopular to rise and speak at this late hour of the session. His excuse for it was the situation of the working class of men on the Western waters. It was for them, and not for himself, that he exposed himself, on this occasion, to the censure of the committee. The gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. PEARCE] said we must wait. Mr. R. said he would have no objection to wait, if sickness and death to the sailors on the Western waters would also wait. He said he had brought the subject before the House and Committee on Commerce the session before the last, but nothing was done. The gentleman from Rhode Island does not know the situation of the working men on our rivers, or he would not urge a continuance of this subject. They are not, like the gentleman, living at their ease, with physicians and all the comforts and luxuries attending them. They walked not on carpets in navigating their vessels. They needed legislation, and he hoped they would receive it.

Mr. R. concluded by observing, that nothing was demanded but a preparatory step to purchase sites and report to the next Congress.

The substitute and amendment were both rejected.

Mr. HAWES offered an amendment appropriating $300 for the printing of the report in relation to the West Point Academy. Lost.

Mr. LOVE offered an amendment for the erection of an hospital on some point on Lake Erie. Lost.

Various other amendments were offered to the bill and acted on by the committee.

The bill was then laid aside to be reported to the House.

PATENT OFFICE.

The committee then took up the bill to promote the progress of the useful arts, and to repeal all acts or parts of acts heretofore made for that purpose.

Mr. HAWES offered an amendment reducing the salary of the commissioner of the Patent Office to $2,000.

After a few remarks by Messrs. WILLIAMS of North Carolina, VINTON, REED, JOHNSON of Tennessee, PARKS, and HARPER, the question was taken, and the vote was: Yeas 25, nays 55—no quorum.

The committee then rose and reported that fact to the House.

The Speaker having resumed the chair.

Mr. DROMGOOLE moved a call of the House; which was ordered, and proceeded in for some time, when its further proceedings were dispensed with, and the House again went into committee.

The question being taken on the amendment, no quorum again voted, the tellers reporting first 23 to 76, and then 32 to 77.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said he hoped the committee would rise, and that there be a call of the House, so that it might be seen who were absent on so important an occasion as the present.

The committee then rose again for want of a quorum.

Mr. MCKAY moved a call of the House.

Mr. GARLAND, of Louisiana, asked for the yeas and nays, by the taking of which, he said, it could be ascertained if a quorum were present or not.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and were, 119 to 35. So a call of the House was ordered.

The House then went again into committee, and

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved that the committee rise, and report some of the bills to the House; which was agreed to, and the committee rose and reported.

Mr. ADAMS raised the point of order, that the chairman of the committee ought not to have reported any of these bills, notwithstanding the vote of the committee, on the ground that any one bill was open to amendment until they were all gone through. He addressed the House at some length on the point. Mr. A. then moved to recommit the bills. Lost.

GENERAL LAND OFFICE.

The House took up the bill to reorganize the General Land Office.

The amendments of the Committee of the Whole were all severally concurred in; and the bill having been engrossed, was read a third time and passed.

SUPPLEMENTARY CIVIL LIST BILL.

The House then took up the bill in addition to the act making appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1836.

The amendments of the Committee of the Whole were severally concurred in.

Mr. DUNLAP then renewed his amendment to appropriate $5,000 for the erection of a marine hospital at Memphis, Tennessee.

After a few remarks by Mr. DUNLAP,

Mr. HOWARD moved the previous question; which was seconded by the House, and the main question was ordered.

The bill having been ordered to be engrossed, was read a third time, and the question being on its passage,

Mr. PATTON moved to recommit it to the Committee of the Whole, with instructions to strike out the clause appropriating the compensation to the Senators and Representative from Michigan.

Mr. MANN, of New York, moved the previous question; which was seconded by the House: Yeas 77, nays 52.

Mr. CALHOUN, of Massachusetts, called for the yeas and nays on ordering the main question; which were ordered, and were: Yeas 94, nays 73.

The bill was then passed.

PATENT OFFICE.

The House again went into Committee of the Whole on the bill to promote the progress of useful arts, &c.

The amendment pending was the motion of Mr. HAWES to reduce the salary of the Commissioner of the Patent Office to $2,000.

The question being taken, it was decided in the negative: Yeas 28, nays 93.

Mr. HAWES moved to reduce the salary of the chief clerk to $1,500. Lost.

Various other amendments were submitted by Messrs. HAWES, ADAMS, GRAVES, and HOWARD, all of which were rejected.

The bill was then laid aside, to be reported to the House.

Mr. R. M. JOHNSON moved that the committee take up the bill providing for the appointment of three additional paymasters in the army. Agreed to: Yeas 88, noes not counted.

The committee then took up said bill.

Various amendments were submitted by Messrs. MCKAY and KINNARD; which were acted on.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, moved to strike out the enacting clause of the bill. Lost.

The bill was then laid aside, to be reported to the House.

JUDICIARY SYSTEM.

On motion of Mr. THOMAS, the committee then took up the bill entitled "An act supplementary to the act entitled an act to amend the judicial system of the United States."

There were several amendments proposed to this bill by the Committee on the Judiciary.

After a few remarks by Mr. THOMAS,

Mr. EVERETT moved to lay the bill aside.

After some further remarks by Messrs. R. GARLAND, J. GARLAND, UNDERWOOD, MARTIN, BELL, ROBERTSON, JOHNSON of Louisiana, SUTHERLAND, R. M. JOHNSON, EVERETT, and RIPLEY, the motion to lay the bill aside prevailed.

DUTY ON WINES.

The committee then took up the Senate bill entitled "an act to suspend the discriminating duties upon goods imported in vessels of Portugal, and to reduce the duties on wines."

Mr. HOWARD, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, submitted sundry amendments; which were agreed to.

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved a proviso, that the benefits of this act should not extend to any wines entitled to debenture. Agreed to.

The bill was then laid aside, to be reported to the House.

PATENT OFFICE.

The Speaker having resumed the chair, the House took up the bill entitled "an act to promote the progress of the useful arts;" and to repeal all acts and parts of acts heretofore made for that purpose.

Mr. GARLAND, of Louisiana, moved to lay the bill on the table. Lost.

Mr. TALIAFERRO moved to reconsider the vote by which this bill was ordered to a third reading. Lost.

The bill was then read a third time and passed.

HARBOR BILL.

The House took up the amendments of the Senate to the bill making appropriations for certain harbors for the year 1836.

Mr. PATTON moved to lay the bill and amendments on the table.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were: Yeas 54, nays 91, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Beale, Beaumont, Bell, Bond, Bouldin, John Calhoun, Cambreleng, Casey, Chapman, John F. H. Claiborne, Cleveland, Coles, Craig, Crane, Forester, Fry, James Garland, Graves, Joseph Hall, Hiland Hall, Hawes, Hawkins, Haynes, Henderson, Hopkins, Hubley, Jarvis, John W. Jones, Luke Lea, Lewis, Logan, Loyall, Lucas, Abijah Mann, Job Mann, Martin, John Y. Mason, McKay, McLene, Montgomery, Morris, Patton, Pinckney, Rencher, Robertson, Rogers, A. H. Shepperd, Standefer, Underwood, Wagener, Webster, White, Sherrod Williams, Wise—54.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Heman Allen, Ash, Ashley Bailey, Barton, Bockee, Borden, Boyd, Briggs, Burns, W. B. Calhoun, John Chambers, Chapin, Corwin, Cramer, Cushing, Cushman, Darlington, Denny, Dickerson, Doubleday, Evans, Farlin, William K. Fuller, Galbraith, R. Garland, Gillet, Granger, Grennell, Haley, Hamer, Hard, Harper, A. G. Harrison, Hazeltine, Hiester, Hoar, Howard, Huntington, Ingersoll, Ingham, Jabez Jackson, James, Richard M. Johnson, Henry Johnson, Judson, Kilgore, Kinnard, Lane, Lansing, Lawrence, Lay, T. Lee, Lincoln, Love, W. Mason, S. Mason, McCarty, McKennan, McKeon, McKim, Miller, Milligan, Moore, Muhlenberg, Patterson, Dutee J. Pearce, James A. Pearce, Pettigrew, Phillips, Reed, Ripley, Russell, Schenck, Shinn, Sickles, Smith, Spangler, Sprague, Storer, Sutherland, Thomas, John Thomson, Toucey, Turrill, Vinton, Wardwell, Washington, E. Whittlesey, T. T. Whittlesey—91.

So the motion to lay on the table was negatived.

Mr. SUTHERLAND moved the previous question; which was seconded by the House; Ayes 88, noes 38.

The main question was ordered, and the amendments were concurred in.

DEPOSITE BILL.

The House then took up the supplemental deposit bill from the Senate.

Mr. RENCHER submitted an amendment providing for the disposition of the United States Bank stock owned by the United States, in case it should be received before the distribution bill came into operation, (viz: that its proceeds should be added to the amount to be distributed,) and asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. McKIM moved the previous question; but the House refused to second the motion, only 54 voting in the affirmative.

Mr. WISE then addressed the House on the principles of the original bill; and, after a few words in explanation from Mr. PATTON,

Mr. MANN moved to lay the bill on the table. Lost.

The question was then taken on the amendment; which was decided in the negative: Yeas 60, nays 76.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The bill having been ordered to a third reading, was read a third time and passed.

CHICKASAW SCHOOL LANDS AND FIVE PER CENT. FUND.

Mr. CLAIBORNE, of Mississippi, said that it was now near day-light, and he had been patiently waiting from ten o'clock on the previous morning for an opportunity of moving to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the bill from the Senate "to carry into effect the compact with the States of Alabama and Mississippi, in regard to the sixteenth sections and the five per cent. fund." He was wearied with these repeated prolonged sittings, these midnight vigils, but could not neglect a bill which, though local in its character, was of absorbing interest to his constituents. He was aware of the competition for the floor; of the deep anxiety of almost every gentleman to call up some favorite measure: he knew that there were bills upon the calendar of more national importance; but still he would throw himself upon the indulgence of his friends around him, on all sides and in all parties of the House, and ask for the immediate commitment and consideration of this bill. He would move to give it precedence over all others. He had not heretofore been troublesome, importunate, or officious; he had proposed no partisan measures, made no superfluous requests. The youngest member in the House of Representatives, he felt, from the day on which he took his seat, that he had much to learn from the wisdom of the distinguished men around him, much to ask and expect from their liberality and kindness. He had experienced frequent instances of this from the committee, which had already voted him, without opposition, handsome appropriations for the benefit of his State. And he now asked, as a personal favor to himself, and to his respected colleague, [Mr. DICKSON,] absent from indisposition; he asked it as due to the people of Mississippi, and more particularly to his enterprising and intelligent constituents residing in the Chickasaw cession; he asked it in behalf of the great cause of letters and internal improvement, which will be essentially advanced, that the House do agree, in these expiring moments of its protracted session, to go into committee on this bill.

On motion of Mr. C., the House went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and took up the bill indicated by Mr. C., the title of which was as follows.

"An act to carry into effect, in the States of Alabama and Mississippi, the existing compacts within those States in regard to the five per cent. fund and the school reservations."

[This bill is peculiarly interesting to the people of Mississippi. It makes an appropriation out of the Treasury of an amount equal to five per cent. on the nett proceeds of the sales of the Chickasaw lands, probably $30,000, and authorizes the State to locate other lands in half or quarter sections, or eighths, in lieu of the 16th sections neglected to be secured by the provisions of the treaty; and the land thus located is for the use of schools in the twelve counties recently organized in the Chickasaw cession. Alabama is alike interested, but in a smaller degree.]

The bill was read, considered, and ordered to be reported without amendment.

JULY 2, 1836.]

Judicial System.

[H. OF R.]

JUDICIAL SYSTEM.

Mr. RIPLEY moved that the committee take up the bill entitled "an act supplementary to the act entitled an act to amend the judicial system of the United States."

On taking the question twice, the tellers first reported, yeas 71, nays 44; second, yeas 72, nays 36; no quorum.

Mr. EVERETT moved that the committee rise and report that fact to the House.

The CHAIR then rose, and was proceeding to count the House, when

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, rose and called the Chair to order.

The CHAIR desired the gentleman from Kentucky to take his seat.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I shall not take my seat—you take yours.

[Loud cries of order! order! from every part of the hall.]

The CHAIR. The gentleman from Kentucky is called to order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I call you to order.

The CHAIR, again. The gentleman from Kentucky will be pleased to take his seat.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I shall not take my seat! You take yours—I call you to order!

The SPEAKER here appeared and resumed the chair; when

Mr. SUTHERLAND reported that while in Committee of the Whole House, Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, a member of the Committee of the Whole House, addressed the Chairman whilst he was counting the members for the purpose of ascertaining whether a quorum was present, and was called to order by the Chairman and requested to take his seat; this he positively and repeatedly refused to do, and called the Chairman to order, and demanded of him to take his seat; and Mr. WILLIAMS persisting in his refusal to submit to the authority of the Chair, the Chairman left the chair, and now reports the facts which had induced the committee to rise to the Speaker, and through him to the House.

The Speaker decided the gentleman from Kentucky to be out of order.

Mr. ADAMS moved that the House adjourn. Lost, without a count.

Mr. VINTON then, by consent, moved that when the House adjourns, it adjourn to meet on Monday morning, at 8 o'clock; which was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMS then rose and said that, like all other men, he was somewhat impulsive when he found his rights trampled upon; but he wished the House distinctly to understand that what he had done was not out of contempt or disrespect to the House. The fact was that, but a few moments before, he had called for a division of the question, and the individual occupying the chair had refused to listen to his motion. He himself had passed it over then, though one of his colleagues had come to him and endeavored to dissuade him from doing so. On what he considered a repetition of the insult, he called the Chair to order. He would now state distinctly that he intended no disrespect to the House, but he did intend to offer an indignity to the man who occupied the chair.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Then I will not take the chair again.

The SPEAKER. The Chairman will resume the chair.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. After what has fallen from the member, I will not take the chair.

Mr. EVERETT moved that the House adjourn. Lost, without a division.

The SPEAKER said the Chair had hoped that, on the temporary rising of the committee, this question would have been settled without any difficulty, and he still hoped so. It was a novel case, and it was for the House, under the circumstances, to take its own course. He again requested the chairman to resume the chair.

Mr. SUTHERLAND said he must decline.

Mr. LEWIS remarked that a great deal was due to temperance on this occasion. The fact was that the House had had, for several days past, most protracted sessions, and the great interest felt by particular members for particular measures might have prompted the Chairman to have done more for the despatch of business than was perhaps strictly regular, though without intending it. He himself had no doubt that the gentleman from Kentucky labored under the impression that an indignity was offered to him, though he was quite confident that none was intended. It was, perhaps, an innocent misunderstanding on both sides, and as the gentleman from Kentucky had made an apology to the House, and one that Mr. L. considered ample and satisfactory, he hoped the Chairman would resume the chair.

Mr. JARVIS said it appeared to him that the case was a very simple one. It was, whether the House would suffer itself to be insulted through its Chairman when in Committee of the Whole. If they would not sustain their Chairman, if they would not resent an indignity offered to him in the chair, there was an end to all order.

Mr. LEWIS replied, that if the chairman was willing to push forward the business of the House in a manner violative of the rules of order, he could not but expect that the House would insist upon the observance of its rules. He did not impute any blame to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, then occupying the chair. On the contrary, Mr. L. believed he was acting in accordance with what he believed to be the wishes of the House. He trusted, however, they would not be disturbed by a formal discussion on the subject. As to the indignity to the House, he considered an ample atonement had been offered, for something was owing to the circumstances and to the course pursued by the Chairman.

Mr. PATTON thought the first suggestion of the gentleman from Alabama entitled to very great consideration, and they should strive to pass over this thing. It was not Mr. P.'s intention to express any opinion on the subject, or to recommend any step for the purpose of asserting the dignity of the House, or of inquiring who was wrong, or who most wrong, in this matter, for he did not deem such a course to be necessary. There is the gentleman who occupied the chair refusing to resume it, and they must consequently either stand where they were, or get on in some way. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania still refused to resume the chair, Mr. P. hoped the Speaker would request some one else to take it. [Cries of no! no! from all parts of the hall.]

Mr. CAMBRELENG hoped no one else would take the chair, till the insult offered to the Chairman had been satisfactorily disposed of.

[By unanimous consent the Speaker signed a number of enrolled bills at this stage.]

Mr. CRAIG moved an adjournment. Lost.

Mr. PATTON wished to add to what he said before. It was perfectly manifest that the presiding officer of the House could not do any thing more than he had done, and it was for the House to take what measures it thought best. No proposition of that sort having been made, he now submitted to the Speaker whether it was not the rule that he should vacate the chair, and, if the former Chairman refused to take the chair, appoint some one else in his place.

Mr. PARKS had particularly remarked the course of the Chairman that night, which, in his opinion, was strictly parliamentary; and, after what had taken place, he should deem it highly improper in the Speaker to call any other person to the chair, until some apology had been made to that gentleman for the insult offered him by the member from Kentucky. For one, he should object to any other Chairman being appointed until that be done.

Judicial System.

[JULY 2, 1836.]

Mr. INGERSOLL objected to this course, as it might render the session interminable. He would take the liberty of adding that it was not at all necessary that the House should instantly vindicate its own dignity, if it had been insulted. Any time during the session would do, either by the appointment of a committee, or by some other mode. He hoped, therefore, that some other gentleman would be called to the chair, and leave the question open for future decision.

The SPEAKER would respectfully state that as the case was altogether of a novel character, he would be entirely under the control and government of the House in this matter.

Mr. INGERSOLL then moved that the Speaker request some other gentleman to take the chair. [Cries of no! no! from all parts of the hall.]

Mr. CALHOON, of Kentucky, said, if the House would accede to this proposition, he was well assured that his colleague would on Monday make such an apology as would be right and proper. If he did not, then Mr. C. himself would move such resolutions and such proceedings as should vindicate the order and dignity of the House. To this he pledged himself, and he hoped the House would assent to it.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, knew his colleague to be actuated by the best feelings, both towards him and towards the House. During the present session Mr. W. had done all in his power to keep order, nor had he done any thing to obstruct the business of legislation; but, on the contrary, every thing to expedite it. What apology might be necessary was unknown to him, but he could only repeat what he had said before. That under the excitement of the moment, believing, as could be testified to by a host of members, that an indignity had been offered to him by the Chairman, he had acted as he had done, and as he believed he had a perfect right to do. He called for a division of the question: the Chairman said "never mind—go on, go on;" and then one of Mr. W.'s colleagues came to him and told him that he had received more than any man ought to receive, and that he ought to insist upon his rights. Still he thought the Chairman intended nothing till after two successive counts. By passing through the tellers, it was evident that a quorum was not present; and it was the duty of the Chairman immediately to have vacated the chair and made known the fact to the House. Still the Chairman was not satisfied, and he himself commenced counting, when the member from Vermont [Mr. EVERETT] moved that the committee rise and report that there was no quorum. Well, what did the Chairman then do? Instead of putting the question, (said Mr. W.,) as he should have done, he ordered the members to take their seats, commenced counting, and I got up to a point of order. The Chairman directed me to take my seat, and I refused, when there were cries of order! order! from every part of the hall, intimating that I was out of order. I then said that I called the Chairman to order, and that he had failed to discharge the duty imposed upon him. I was again called to order from every quarter, and every man knows how to appreciate a thing of this kind. I have said that I was the last man upon this floor who would offer an indignity to the House, but that all I did do was intended to reach the Chairman, and I will not recall what I have said. Towards none do I entertain any unkind feelings except one, but I will never submit to be dictated to by any man. I do not know (added Mr. W.) whether you can separate the personal and official character of the Chairman, but I intended to insult him without intending to insult the House, for I knew he had no right to govern the House.

Mr. UNDERWOOD made a few suggestions. He was satisfied, he said, that his colleague made the remarks he did, under the supposition that he was insulted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. But Mr. U. was perfectly satisfied that that gentleman designed no insult to his colleague from Kentucky. His colleague, perhaps, was not much acquainted with the gentleman's rapidity of manner, and therefore ascribed it to insult towards himself. Mr. U. was satisfied the Chairman was acting his best to progress in the business of the House, whether in order or out of order, in counting the House after the report of the tellers that no quorum had voted. Mr. U. did not know whether the Chairman had the right to do this or not. If he had, his colleague [Mr. WILLIAMS] was wrong in calling him to order. It seemed to him, however, that the difficulty could be settled in this way; that his colleague might acknowledge, without compromising his honor in the least, that what he did proceeded from a belief that he was personally insulted; and Mr. U. felt satisfied, as his friend and colleague, that no insult was intended. [Mr. U. paused for some time.]

Mr. FRY said he had listened to the explanation of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. WILLIAMS,] and it certainly was unsatisfactory, and he suggested a resolution to that effect.

Mr. UNDERWOOD begged leave to add a word or two. He was sure he could not be mistaken in supposing the Chairman intended no insult to his colleague, and he thought the correct course would be for his colleague to state to the House that what he had done proceeded from a belief that he was insulted, and his rights trampled upon; that in that belief only, and laboring under that impression, if it should be the sense of the House that he was not insulted, or intended to be insulted, he retracts every thing he has said. This Mr. U. thought the best way, without compromising the honor of any body.

A considerable pause took place, apparently to give Mr. WILLIAMS a further opportunity of explaining; but that gentleman not rising,

The SPEAKER said the course of the Chairman in counting the House, when a quorum had not voted, was strictly parliamentary.

Mr. WHITTLESEY, of Ohio, said he had no doubt all the difficulty had grown out of the fact of the gentleman from Kentucky not knowing the rules. It had been the invariable rule for the Speaker and the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole, whenever the question was raised, whether a quorum was present or not, to proceed himself to count the members, or to ascertain in any other way he thought best to accomplish that object. Now, it was well known that a division of the House did not always ascertain that fact, for it was frequently the case that all the members did not vote. In the present instance, he knew that many members did not vote, and he held it to be the duty of the Chair to ascertain whether a quorum was present or not, by his own personal examination, if he could. He thought at the time that the gentleman from Kentucky supposed the Chairman had no such right or power, but Mr. W. maintained it to be his duty. Now, if the gentleman from Kentucky was laboring under that impression, it seemed to him [Mr. WHITTLESEY] that, without compromising his honor, it was due to him to make such a statement to the House. An explanation like this would settle the difficulty, and the House might then proceed in its business.

Mr. PATTON had thought the plan he recommended would have been satisfactory to the House, but gentlemen said no! no! no! and yet no one had offered any proposition. He now moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to take into consideration whether any, and, if any, what measures ought to be taken in vindication of the authority of the House alleged to be contemned by the violation of order

Judicial System.

[H. OF R.]

reported by the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. P. thought this would be the best mode to be adopted, and then the business of the House might proceed. [Cries of no! no!]

Mr. R. M. JOHNSON adverted to the fact that this was perhaps the first instance of its kind that had occurred since the organization of the Government. The fact was, that if the ground was maintained that the Chairman could be officially or personally insulted in the chair, no one would ever consent to occupy it. He would say to the House, however, that such was his knowledge of his colleague's character as an honorable and feeling man, that he was sure he intended no insult to the House, and that he was excited towards the Chairman only under the belief that that gentleman had exhibited a want of attention towards him. Now, Mr. J. was well convinced that every member of the House would acquit the gentleman from Pennsylvania of any intention of a personal insult; but his (Mr. J's) colleague being under that impression, as is very evident from what he has said, has made an attack upon the Chairman of the House which is totally unjustifiable. He had no doubt that his friend would take the advice of his colleagues, either then or when under less excitement. If he did not, he had a different character from what Mr. J. had always thought him to be possessed of.

Mr. HARPER, in a few remarks, also urged the gentleman from Kentucky to make the explanation suggested by his colleagues.

Mr. EVERETT said he had made the motion that the committee rise and report there was no quorum, holding that to be the proper course, though he knew that many gentlemen contended it to be the duty of the Chairman to ascertain himself whether there was a quorum or not. It was possible that his motion had produced the difficulty, and he now regretted extremely that he had made it.

Mr. WILLIAMS again repeated his former statement, saying that his "indignation and contempt had been aroused" by the insult offered to him by the Chair. Mr. W. did not, and would not, retract any thing he had said.

Mr. PEARCE, of Maryland, then rose and said, that however painful it might be, he felt himself under the necessity of moving such a resolution as should vindicate the dignity and order of the House. That House had nothing whatever to do with any personal quarrel between the gentleman occupying the chair and the member from Kentucky; but he was very much mistaken if it had not a great deal to do with the violation of its orders, and the total sacrifice of all the public business at a moment like the present. While he deeply regretted the painful necessity which urged him to do it, he most respectfully submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the member from Kentucky, Mr. WILLIAMS, having refused to take his seat when ordered so to do by the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House; having ordered the Chairman to take his seat, and having defied the power of the Chair and the House, has committed a contempt of this House, and is justly liable to its censure.

Mr. LEWIS contended that the House should be governed by the quo animo towards itself. He held that the gentleman from Kentucky was right in retorting what he considered to be an insult towards himself by the Chairman; for supposing the Chairman threw an inkstand at his head, would he not be justified in sending the missile back? Mr. L. also maintained that the distinction should be drawn between the personal and official character of the Chairman. He had no doubt the gentleman from Kentucky would say that he had no intention to insult the member from Pennsylvania as Chairman of the House, but as an individual, and he would put that question to the gentleman.

Mr. PHILLIPS sincerely hoped that no such question would be propounded to the member from Kentucky, nor that any course would be taken that would have the effect of converting this into a personal altercation. He differed with the gentleman from Alabama, whatever might have been the personal feelings of the member from Kentucky towards the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole, or whatever ground he might have supposed he had. Mr. P. thought he had none. He should not be justified in his course, whatever his personal feelings may have been. While in the House they were all bound to conform to its rules, and the proper time and place for an expression of personal feelings was elsewhere, and at a different time, than on that floor. This act can only be regarded here as an act of the member from Kentucky, in violation of the order of the House of which he was a member. Mr. P. held that no personal feelings could justify such conduct. The language, too, used since by the gentleman from Kentucky, in his explanation, must be considered by all the members of the House as an act of disrespect to that body and to its presiding officer; and Mr. P. could conceive of no proper result until that language was withdrawn, or, if that was not done, of the adoption of a proposition similar to that indicated by the gentleman from Maryland; in which Mr. P. felt it his duty to say he entirely concurred.

Mr. THOMAS would suggest whether the House could not, without compromising its own dignity, postpone the consideration of his colleague's resolution till Monday. [General cries of no! no!]

Mr. EVANS did not see what could be gained by postponing this matter till Monday, when it would probably consume the whole day. If any more business was intended to be done, this matter must first be settled; and he regretted, extremely regretted, that the member from Kentucky did not seem inclined to accede to the request, advice, and solicitation, of his friends and colleagues, and what seemed also to be a very generous sentiment on the part of the House, and thereby put an end to this exceedingly unpleasant matter. Mr. E. regretted that the gentleman did not take the view of it his colleagues did. The gentleman himself had left the matter beyond all doubt; for since the Speaker resumed the chair, he declared his object explicitly was to offer an indignity to the Chairman.

The reason given by the gentleman from Kentucky offered no justification, even if the Chairman had heard his call. Perhaps the gentleman did not know that those calls for "question," "divide," "tellers," from members in their seats, were entirely out of order; and neither the Speaker nor the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole were bound to regard them, unless a member rose and addressed the call to the Chair in the same manner as if he was about to address the House. That the Chairman had been treated with great indignity there was no doubt; and he hoped that gentleman would not resume the chair, nor that any other would be put in his place, until this matter was settled; for the House was under a deep obligation to protect its presiding officers.

Mr. CALHOON, of Kentucky, did not intend to offer any justification for his colleague; but he was convinced that, when he had time to reflect, he would make such an explanation as would be satisfactory. Mr. C. asked that this matter be postponed till Monday. He asked it not so much as a favor to his colleague as to the other members from Kentucky. He again assured the House of his conviction that on Monday his colleague would come forward with a full and frank disavowal.

Mr. PATTON then modified his resolution as follows:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to take into consideration what measures ought to be taken in vindication of the authority of the House, contemned by the violation of order, reported by the chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. PEARCE, of Maryland, then moved his as a substitute.

Mr. ROBERTSON remarked that there was no difference of opinion in the House as to the violation of order on the part of the member from Kentucky; but Mr. R. appealed to the House whether it ought to be visited by its censure and punishment at this late period. He asked what member would have escaped censure, if censure had fallen upon every breach of order during the present session? It was too late in the session to commence this vindictive course towards the member from Kentucky.

Mr. PARKER moved to amend the resolution, by inserting the subsequent declaration of Mr. WILLIAMS, that his intention was to insult the Chairman; but the House evincing an indisposition, Mr. P. withdrew it.

The substitute of Mr. PEARCE was then agreed to as an amendment, with only one dissentient voice; and the resolution, so amended, was concurred in, [only two voices cried no at first, and after a short time a third was heard,] with only three dissentient voices. It was then half past four, A. M.

The House then went again into committee, (Mr. SUTHERLAND resuming the chair,) and, on motion of Mr. PATTON, immediately rose, and reported the various bills acted on to the House.

The House continued to sit till nearly 5 o'clock acting upon various bills, when it adjourned to meet again on Monday morning, at 8 o'clock.

MONDAY, JULY 4.

SUSPENSION OF THE RULES.

Mr. MASON, of Virginia, asked the consent of the House to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the 16th and 17th joint rules of the two Houses, which provide that no bill that shall have passed one House shall be sent for concurrence to the other on either of the three last days of the session, and which also prohibit any bill or resolution that shall have passed the House of Representatives and the Senate shall be presented to the President of the United States for his approbation on the last day of the session, are hereby suspended until half past 2 o'clock of this day, so far as respects bills of the Senate now in the House of Representatives, and bills of the House of Representatives now in the Senate.

Objection being made, Mr. M. moved a suspension of the rules, and briefly explained his object to be to embrace some bills that had passed the two Houses, but had not received the signatures of the presiding officers.

Mr. RIPLEY asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

The question being taken, the House refused to suspend—84 to 77—not two thirds.

Mr. MASON then moved a suspension of the rules for the purpose of offering the following:

Resolved, That the 17th joint rule of the two Houses, which declares that "no bill or resolution that shall have passed the House of Representatives and the Senate, shall be presented to the President of the United States for his approbation on the last day of the session," be suspended until the hour of 12 o'clock this day, so far as to embrace those bills which have passed the two Houses.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, asked for the yeas and nays, for he said he did not wish to be detained there all night; which were ordered.

After various suggestions by Messrs. VINTON, PATTON, WHITTLESEY of Ohio, and THOMAS, as to certain bills being embraced within the resolution, and the mode of doing so,

Mr. WHITTLESEY, of Ohio, moved to except the bill to transfer certain appropriations from the Potomac bridge to other uses.

Mr. MASON, of Virginia, accepted the above as a modification.

Mr. THOMAS moved to include in the resolution a joint resolution annulling certain laws of the Legislative Council of Florida, and called for the yeas and nays on his motion; but they were not ordered.

The amendment of Mr. T. was then agreed to.

Mr. T. moved further to amend the resolution by embracing the bill to amend the judicial system of the United States.

Mr. LYON called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were: Yeas 94, nays 61.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved to include the bill to alter and amend the act imposing duties and imports. Lost.

Mr. CAMBRELENG then moved to include the bill supplementary to the act for the relief of the sufferers by the late fire in New York.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. MASON, of Ohio, demanded the previous question.

Mr. VINTON moved to lay the whole subject on the table, and called for the yeas and nays; which were not ordered.

The motion to lay on the table was then decided in the negative: Ayes 43, noes not counted.

The previous question was then seconded: Ayes 95, noes not counted; and the main question was ordered to be put.

Mr. ADAMS called for a division of the question.

The CHAIR decided that the motion to suspend was not divisible, inasmuch as the object for which a suspension of the rules is asked must necessarily form a part of the motion.

Mr. ADAMS appealed from the decision of the Chair, and called for the yeas and nays on the appeal; which were not ordered.

The decision of the Chair was then affirmed without a division.

The question was then taken on the motion to suspend the rules; which was decided in the affirmative: Yeas 111, nays 53.

Mr. JARVIS moved to amend the resolution by including the bill for the enlistment of boys in the navy, and the bill in relation to the marine corps. Lost.

Mr. RICE GARLAND moved to include the bill allowing the Appalachicola Railroad Company to locate on the public lands.

Mr. PINCKNEY moved to amend the amendment by including the bill for the relief of Thomas Cooper. Lost.

Mr. DUNLAP moved to amend the amendment by including the bill to extend the time of issuing certain scrip certificates.

Mr. GARLAND accepted this as a modification.

Mr. FRENCH moved to amend the amendment by including the bill for the purchase of the Portland and Louisville canal stock. Lost.

Mr. HARDIN moved to lay the whole subject on the table. Lost, without a division.

Mr. SPANGLER moved the previous question; which was seconded: Ayes 87, noes not counted.

Mr. BOND called for the yeas and nays on ordering the main question; which were not ordered, and the House ordered the main question to be put.

Mr. ADAMS called for a division upon the original resolution and upon the amendment.

JULY 4, 1836.]

Texas.

[H. OF R.]

The CHAIR decided that the resolution was not susceptible of division.

Mr. ADAMS appealed from the decision of the Chair.

After a few words by Messrs. ADAMS, PARKER, and HARRISON of Missouri,

Mr. GARLAND, of Louisiana, moved the previous question on the appeal.

Mr. ROBERTSON moved to lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. HARLAN called for the yeas and nays, but the House refused to order them.

The motion to lay on the table was decided in the negative, without a division.

Mr. ADAMS then withdrew the appeal.

Mr. RENCHER called for the yeas and nays on agreeing to the resolution; which were ordered.

Mr. EVANS renewed the appeal taken by Mr. ADAMS.

Mr. ADAMS called for the yeas and nays on the appeal; which were not ordered, and the decision of the Chair was affirmed without a division.

The question was then taken on agreeing to the resolution, and decided in the affirmative: Yeas 111, nays 50.

TEXAS.

Mr. MASON, of Virginia, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, made a report in relation to the affairs of Texas, accompanied by the following resolutions:

"1. Resolved, That the independence of Texas ought to be acknowledged by the United States, whenever satisfactory information has been received that it has in successful operation a civil Government, capable of performing the duties and fulfilling the obligations of an independent Power.

"2. Resolved, That the House of Representatives perceive with satisfaction that the President of the United States has adopted measures to ascertain the political, military, and civil condition of Texas."

Mr. ADAMS moved to lay the report and resolutions on the table.

Mr. PINCKNEY called for the yeas and nays on this motion; which were ordered, and were: Yeas 40, nays 108.

So the motion to lay on the table was decided in the negative.

Mr. PEYTON said this was a subject upon which he had a great desire to give his views, but they all knew that it would be impossible to discuss it at this late period of the session. For the first, and probably for the last time in his life, if it was not out of order for him to do such a thing, and if it would not be considered as interfering with the prerogative of any other gentleman, he demanded the previous question upon the adoption of the resolutions.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, thought it not necessary, and he therefore begged the gentleman from Tennessee to withdraw it.

Mr. PEYTON refused, on the ground that there was no time to discuss the subject.

The previous question was seconded: Ayes 80, noes not counted.

Mr. REED called for the yeas and nays on ordering the main question; which were not ordered, and the main question was ordered to be put.

Mr. HARDIN called for the yeas and nays on the main question; which were ordered.

Mr. ADAMS called for a division of the question.

The question was taken on the first resolution, and was: Yeas 128, nays 20, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ash, Bell, Bockee, Bond, Bouldin, Boyd, Bunch, Bynum, J. Calhoun, W. B. Calhoun, Cambreleng, Carr, Carter, Casey, G. Chambers, Chaney, Chapman, Chapin, N. H. Claiborne, Cleveland, Coffee, Coles, Connor, Cushing, Darlington, Denny, Dickerson, Doubleday, Dunlap, Forester, French, W. K. Fuller, Galbraith, J. Garland, R. Garland, Gillet, Granger, Griffin, Haley, J. Hall, Hamer, Hardin, Harlan, A. G. Harrison, Haynes, Henderson, Hiester, Hopkins, Howard, Hubley, Hunt, Huntington, Huntsman, Ingersoll, Ingham, J. Jackson, R. M. Johnson, C. Johnson, H. Johnson, J. W. Jones, Kinnard, Lane, Lawler, Lay, G. Lee, T. Lee, L. Lea, Lewis, Loyall, Lucas, Lyon, J. Mann, Martin, J. Y. Mason, W. Mason, Maury, May, McCarty, McKay, McKennan, McKim, McLene, Mercer, Miller, Milligan, Montgomery, Morgan, Morris, Muhlenberg, Owens, Page, Parker, Patterson, Patton, F. Pierce, Pettigrew, Peyton, Phelps, Pinckney, Rencher, John Reynolds, Ripley, Robertson, Rogers, Seymour, A. H. Shepperd, Shields, Shinn, Suckles, Sloane, Smith, Spangler, Standefer, Storer, Sutherland, Taliaferro, Thomas, J. Thomson, Toucey, Towns, Underwood, Ward, Washington, E. Whittlesey, T. T. Whittlesey, L. Williams, S. Williams—128.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, H. Allen, Bailey, Beale, Clark, Ciane, Grennell, H. Hall, Hazeltine, Jarvis, Lawrence, Lincoln, Love, D. J. Pearce, Phillips, Potts, Reed, Russell, Slade, Vinton—20.

So the first resolution was adopted.

The question was then taken on the second resolution, and was: Yeas 113, nays 22, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ash, Beale, Bockee, Bond, Boyd, Bunch, Bynum, J. Calhoun, W. B. Calhoun, Cambreleng, Carr, Carter, Casey, G. Chambers, Chaney, Chapman, Chapin, N. H. Claiborne, J. F. H. Claiborne, Coffee, Connor, Cushing, Cushman, Denny, Dickerson, Dunlap, Farlan, Forester, French, W. K. Fuller, Galbraith, J. Garland, R. Garland, Gillet, Grayson, Haley, Hamer, Hardin, Harlan, A. G. Harrison, Haynes, Henderson, Hopkins, Howard, Hubley, Huntington, Huntsman, Ingersoll, J. Jackson, Jarvis, R. M. Johnson, C. Johnson, H. Johnson, J. W. Jones, Kinnard, Lane, Lawler, Lay, G. Lee, T. Lee, L. Lea, Lewis, Lucas, Lyon, J. Mann, Martin, W. Mason, Maury, May, McCarty, McKay, McKennan, McKim, McLene, Mercer, Miller, Montgomery, Morgan, Morris, Muhlenberg, Owens, Page, Patterson, F. Pierce, Pettigrew, Peyton, Phelps, John Reynolds, Ripley, Robertson, Rogers, Seymour, A. H. Shepperd, Shields, Shinn, Suckles, Sloane, Smith, Spangler, Standefer, Storer, Taliaferro, Thomas, J. Thomson, Toucey, Towns, Underwood, Ward, Washington, E. Whittlesey, T. T. Whittlesey, L. Williams, S. Williams—113.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, H. Allen, Bailey, Beaumont, Bouldin, Clark, Coles, Darlington, Grennell, H. Hall, Hazeltine, Hiester, Lawrence, Lincoln, Love, Milligan, D. J. Pearce, Phillips, Potts, Reed, Russell, Slade—22.

So the second resolution was adopted.

The joint resolution adopted this morning having been returned from the Senate with the following amendment: "Strike out all after the word 'suspended,' and insert 'so far as relates to such acts as have already passed both Houses, and have been signed by the presiding officers thereof.'"

Mr. THOMAS moved that the House concur.

Mr. JARVIS moved to except from the operation of this resolution the bill passed on Saturday night last, confirming the titles to certain land claims in the State of Missouri.

Mr. GARLAND, of Louisiana, demanded the previous question; which was seconded by the House: Yeas 87, nays 39.

Mr. JARVIS called for the yeas upon ordering the main question, but they were refused; and the main question was ordered.

Mr. BOND asked for the yeas and nays on the main question; but they were refused, and the amendment of the Senate was concurred in without a count.

Compensation to Messengers—Pay for Books, &c.

[JULY 4, 1836.]

COMPENSATION TO MESSENGERS.

Mr. HARDIN moved to take up the resolution to pay $250 extra to each of the little boys attending in the House, (in addition to their pay of $1 50 a day;) which was agreed to.

Mr. TALIAFERRO offered an amendment, to give the Post Office messengers $750 per annum.

Mr. HARDIN moved the previous question; which was seconded: Ayes 79, noes 59; and the main question was ordered, put, and agreed to.

PAY FOR BOOKS, &c.

Mr. EVANS asked the consent of the House to offer a resolution directing the Clerk of the House to pay out of the contingent fund the amount of the expenses in providing books for the new members. [The Senate had stricken out the item from the supplementary appropriation bill on Saturday last.]

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON objected.

Mr. EVANS moved a suspension of the rule. Agreed to—91 to 35.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON hoped the House would consent to the yeas and nays, so that the country might see who it was that voted in the affirmative. He wished, also, an opportunity of recording his vote in the negative. The yeas and nays were accordingly ordered.

After some remarks by Messrs. PATTON and EVANS,

Mr. CAMBRELENG said the resolution was a blank, for there was not a dollar remaining of the contingent fund, out of which the Clerk could pay this money. He said it was extraordinary that the resolution should be introduced and advocated now, when, on Saturday night, there was not a single dissentient voice heard to concurring in the amendment of the Senate striking out this very appropriation from the bill.

The question was then taken, and decided in the negative: Yeas 56, nays 79.

So the resolution was not agreed to.

On motion of Mr. R. M. JOHNSON, the House took up the joint resolution from the Senate proposing the appointment of a joint committee to wait on the President of the United States with the usual message, and the committee on the part of the House was ordered to consist of two.

Mr. LEWIS moved a suspension of the rules for the purpose of offering a resolution to pay to the sergeant-at-arms, doorkeeper, assistant doorkeeper, and postmaster, $300 each for extra services during the present session. Lost, only 65 voting in the affirmative.

Mr. VINTON asked the consent of the House to submit a proposition to repeal the rule requiring a vote of two thirds to suspend rules in relation to the order of business. Lost.

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved a suspension of the rule, for the purpose of offering a resolution to pay extra to the lamplighters, &c.

Mr. LEWIS moved to amend the resolution, by adding the one he had just offered.

Mr. HARDIN briefly opposed the amendment, and it was negatived.

The House agreed to suspend the rules for the original proposition of Mr. CAMBRELENG—83 to 37.

On motion of Mr. HARDIN, all the committees of the House were discharged from the further consideration of such subjects as had been referred to them and had not been acted on.

Mr. R. M. JOHNSON, from the select joint committee appointed to wait on the President of the United States, made the usual report.

Mr. CALHOON, of Kentucky, made some explanations to the House, in behalf of his colleague [Mr. S.

WILLIAMS] on the subject of the vote of censure passed upon that gentleman at the last sitting, and stated that he was authorized by his colleague to say that he intended by his course on that occasion to offer no disrespect to the House or the Chair. Mr. C. accordingly moved that the vote adopting the resolution of censure be reconsidered.

Mr. SUTHERLAND expressed his entire satisfaction at the explanation, and his wish that the occurrence should be erased from the record and the memory of the House. He professed a high regard for the gentleman from Kentucky personally, and stated that, in his own course, upon the occasion alluded to, he was governed solely by what he considered the strict rules of parliamentary propriety, without regard to the individual to which they might apply. He also stated, in justice to himself, as the chairman of the committee, that he did not hear the motion which the gentleman from Kentucky was said to have made, or he should certainly have attended to it.

Mr. S. WILLIAMS rose and informed the House that he concurred in the explanation which his colleague [Mr. CALHOON] had made in his behalf, and he wished further to state to the House what were the circumstances under which he was placed as to incur their censure. He had made a motion in the Committee of the Whole, which he had a right to make, and which the Chair did not notice; and he then rose to a point of order in reference to that neglect of the Chair. One of his colleagues, at the time, came to him, and asked him why he did not insist upon his motion.

In taking the course which he did, he was governed by no consideration except a wish to maintain his rights, as a member of that committee. He had not the slightest intention of embarrassing the business of the committee, or of offering any personal disrespect to the Chair. He was now extremely happy to learn from the honorable chairman, that he did not hear that motion, the neglect of which prompted his (Mr. W's) course; this being the case, he most cheerfully disclaimed any intention to offer the slightest disrespect to the Chair or to the House.

Mr. JARVIS remarked that the explanation by the gentleman who first spoke [Mr. CALHOON] was entirely satisfactory; but that the explanation of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIAMS] was too much qualified in regard to the Chair.

The question was then taken on the motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution of censure was adopted, and there appeared: Yeas 90, nays 20—not a quorum.

Mr. WILLIAMS said he had been misunderstood by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. JARVIS,] and added some explanatory remarks.

Mr. PARKS warmly expressed his dissatisfaction at the character of the explanation offered by the gentleman from Kentucky. It was made to depend upon the previous explanation of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and was placed solely on that ground. He was for maintaining the rules, even against a brother or his dear friend.

Mr. PEYTON said it was quite sufficient that the gentleman from Kentucky had concurred in the explanation offered by his colleague. The House would have no reason to demand or expect a humiliating apology.

Messrs. MERCER and HUNT took a similar view; but Messrs. PARKER and LUCAS were of a different opinion.

The question being again put, the motion to reconsider was agreed to without a count.

The resolution was then negatived.

On motion of Mr. PARKER, at 2 o'clock,

The House adjourned, sine die.

Surplus Revenue.

[SENATE.]

SUPPLEMENTAL SPEECHES.

IN SENATE, THURSDAY, JANUARY 12, 1836.

SURPLUS REVENUE.

The resolution offered yesterday by Mr. BENTON, being taken up for consideration, as follows:

Resolved, That the surplus revenue of the United States, and the dividends of stock receivable from the Bank of the United States, ought to be set apart and applied to the general defence and permanent security of the country. That the President be requested to cause the Senate to be informed of—

1st. The probable amount that would be necessary for fortifying the lake, maritime, and gulf frontiers of the United States, and such points of the land frontier as may require permanent fortifications.

2d. The probable amount that would be necessary to construct an adequate number of armories and arsenals in the United States, and to supply the States with field artillery (especially brass field pieces) for their militia, and with side arms and pistols for their cavalry.

3d. The probable amount that would be necessary to supply the United States with the ordnance, arms, and munitions of war, which a proper regard to self-defence would require to be always on hand.

4th. The probable amount that would be necessary to place the naval defences of the United States (including the increase of the navy, navy yards, dock yards, and steam floating batteries) upon the footing of strength and respectability which is due to the security and to the welfare of the Union.

After Mr. BENTON had addressed the Senate,

Mr. WEBSTER said, I do not propose, sir, to discuss the subject of our affairs with France, which have been alluded to by the Senator from Missouri. It is my duty, however, to take care that neither in this House, nor out of this House, should an impression exist derogatory to the character, unfavorable to the diligence, or reproachful to the patriotism of this body. I remember the progress of the bill to which the Senator has referred, and I shall at a future day detail the incidents of its history, and the true reason of its loss; and will satisfy every one that the loss of it was not attributable to this body. The means of so doing are not, at present, all in my possession; nor can they be, according to the established rules of the Senate, until after we shall have been again engaged in executive business. I shall then discharge this duty. I shall then show that neither the Senate, nor any one of its committees or officers, can be charged with the slightest dereliction of duty in regard to that bill.

Mr. LEIGH said he was not now going to enter upon the more interesting topics presented by the remarks of the gentleman from Missouri—those that related to prospective measures for national defence; but there were some facts belonging to the history of the propositions of measures of that kind made at the last session which were matters of publicity, and which he thought it proper to take the first opportunity of stating.

In the first place, he said, he had a distinct recollection of the report made by the Committee on Military Affairs, mentioned by the gentleman from Missouri, which, it appeared by the journal, was made on the 18th of February, 1835; but he had no recollection that that report, and the resolution therein recommended, were ever called up for consideration, and he was at a loss to understand how or when that proposition was rejected by the Senate, as he understood the gentleman to say it was, unless it was incorporated in the general bill for appropriations for fortifications, which was lost in consequence of the difference between the two Houses, in respect to that bill, on the last night of the last session.

[Mr. BENTON was understood to say he believed he had himself withdrawn the proposition.]

Mr. LEIGH said that his attention was early attracted to the whole subject, and most anxiously directed to it, because the aspect of our affairs with France had struck him, from the first, as very serious, and because he had expected some recommendation, not from any individual or from any committee of the Senate or of the other House, but from the President himself, to strengthen the arm of national defence, as a precautionary measure against possible, and, as he supposed, probable contingencies. Such were his sentiments on the subject, that when the appropriation bills for the army, for the navy, and for fortifications, were first sent to the Senate from the other House, he went to the Secretary's table to examine the bills, in order to see whether any provisions were made or proposed, founded on or plainly referrible to an apprehension of serious collision with France suited to such a contingency, and calculated to put the nation in a state of security and defence. He found nothing of the kind in any of those bills; and he took upon himself to say that there was nothing that had respect to any possible interruption of our pacific relations with France or any other nation. He said that he himself had thought, and had said, as those with whom he was in the habit of familiar intercourse might perhaps remember, that some extraordinary appropriations were proper; and he was ready to vote for such appropriations, though in respect to the amount he had formed no opinion, having, in truth, no data on which he could form an opinion.

The general appropriation bills sent from the House of Representatives to the Senate, were, of course, immediately referred to our Committee on Finance. Such appropriation bills, he had remarked, generally came from the House in an imperfect form; that is, it generally occurred that some alterations, most usually additions, were required and proposed, in consequence of suggestions made by the several Departments to the committee of the Senate, or by the members of the Senate themselves. The particular bill of appropriations for fortifications being referred to the Committee on Finance of the Senate, they reported it, with several amendments; they did not, according to his memory, propose to abate a single dollar from any appropriation provided in the bill from the House for any one object; they did not propose to dispense with appropriations for any one object. The amendments they proposed consisted (chiefly, if not entirely,) in proposing increased appropriations for objects provided for in the bill of the House, and in appropriations for new objects. He supposed, at the time, and he still believed, that these increased and additional appropriations were, for the most part, settled by the committee, upon consultation and conference with the executive department; but on that head he knew nothing. He referred to the chairman of the committee,

SENATE.]

Surplus Revenue.

[Mr. WEBSTER,] who was able to correct him if he had fallen into any misapprehension in this respect. At present, he had only to state, positively, upon the authority of the journal of the Senate, that this bill of appropriations for fortifications was reported to the Senate by the Committee on Finance, and passed, with the amendments proposed and agreed to, as early as the 24th February. From that day, the bill remained in the House of Representatives until the 3d of March, without any action on it there; without any notice of it, at least in any way communicated or known to the Senate; and without the least apprehension (he believed) on the part of any member of the Senate, that any thing at all new or important was intended to be proposed.

The Senate commenced its evening session on the 3d of March (as it appeared by the journal) at five o'clock. The other House had had this important bill in its possession from the 24th of February; and it was not until after five o'clock of the last day of the session that it was returned to the Senate, with the following memorable amendment, (among others,) proposed as an amendment to one of our amendments:

"And be it further enacted, That the sum of $3,000,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended, in whole or in part, under the direction of the President of the United States, for the military and naval service, including fortifications and ordnance, and increase of the navy; provided such expenditures shall be rendered necessary for the defence of the country prior to the next meeting of the Senate."

The bill, with the amendments proposed by the other House, was promptly, Mr. L. believed instantaneously, taken up. Upon this particular amendment a short but very animated debate ensued. The opposition to it was founded, principally, on constitutional grounds. It was objected that it was, in fact, a general vote of money to the Executive for the defence of the nation, to be used at his absolute, unlimited discretion; that the proposed appropriation was not sufficiently specific; that the amendment would place this large sum of money in the President's hands, with power to apply every dollar of it to whatever arm of the national defence he thought proper, and to judge when defence would be proper; in other words, to determine the question of war or peace. The objection was not so much to the amount, though no estimates had been laid before us, and we had no data on which we could judge of the reasonableness of the appropriation. Nor was the objection rested on any distrust of the Executive in the exercise of such a discretion: the objections chiefly relied on would equally have applied to such a vote of money to any Chief Magistrate whatever.

On the strength of these objections, the Senate disagreed to the amendment. The bill was returned to the other House, which insisted on the amendment, and very quickly sent the bill back to us. We then adhered to our disagreement. And upon this the House asked a conference, which was agreed to.

By this time (Mr. LEIGH said) it had been intimated to him that an idea was entertained that the session would necessarily terminate at twelve o'clock; and thus his attention was called to the time at which the committee of conference on the part of the Senate left the chamber; it was, by his watch, not the clock, about fifteen minutes before eleven; and the committee returned to the Senate between fifteen and twenty minutes after eleven. There was, therefore, ample time (if his watch had not deceived him) to have acted on the report of the committee of conference, even supposing the session necessarily terminated at midnight.

The committees agreed in the conference that there should be additional appropriations, in specific terms, of $500,000 for the naval service, and $300,000 for fortifications. The Senate was informed of this agreement between the committees: but as the bill was in possession of the other House, we could not act on the report of our committee; and, though the House had asked this conference, we heard nothing further from them on the subject. We waited for a long time, some hours, with patience; and then sent a message to the House, reminding them of the conference; no answer came. It became at last apparent that the House intended to do no other business; at least, none in co-operation with us; and, therefore, the Senate adjourned.

Mr. LEIGH said he had thought it proper to give this history of the facts, according to his recollection of them; he believed it was correct and accurate. It was not his purpose, at present, to make any commentary on them, or to deduce any inferences from them. Why or how it happened that the result of the conference was not reported to the House of Representatives—why or how that House was induced to suffer a bill of that importance to be lost by its own inaction, Mr. LEIGH said he did not pretend to know; he had heard something, and he had his suspicions or conjectures: but it was not proper or decent, it would be disorderly, to say what he suspected.

Mr. PRESTON. The gentleman from Virginia, who has just addressed the Senate, has given us a clear, and, I believe, a correct statement of the proceedings of the last session in reference to the appropriation bills; but, sir, I do not feel myself called upon to explain the vote which I then gave. It wants no apology—it was given because the appropriation of three millions, proposed to be placed within the control of the Executive, was unauthorized, unconstitutional, and dangerous. Sir, if, instead of the vague and indefinite rumors of war which have been alluded to, the war had actually come, and our seaboard had been ravaged, I should not repent of my vote. The responsibility would have been, where it now is, upon the Executive, who shrunk from his duty in calling upon Congress for appropriations which were necessary, and specifying their application. What was that most extraordinary transaction? At the end of the last session, when the table was loaded with unfinished business; when every thing was crowded upon us; at midnight of the last night, that appropriation sprung upon us, no one knew whence or by whom. Sir, at no time, much less at such a time, are we called upon for legislation of this kind, without receiving from the heads of Departments all the information which it may be in their power to afford. They are bound to assume the responsibility of such measures—a responsibility which I was not then, and am not now, disposed to release them from.

The Senator from Missouri, sir, has submitted a resolution authorizing the application of the public money to purposes of general security and defence. He asks for the appropriation of the twenty-five or thirty millions of money, to be applied to objects which are not specifically indicated; and he requires it, too, at the very time when two important measures, that of the Senator from Kentucky, and that of my colleague, are already before us. Without, as the gentleman says, any immediate or pressing occasion, he has brought forward a resolution making the largest appropriation ever asked for at any one time, either in peace or war, and then, by a strangely inverted order, a resolution asking how much is required. He demands that the thirty millions be given, and then institutes an inquiry whether it be wanted. If the Executive says five millions are sufficient, what becomes of the residue? In order of time, the resolution of inquiry should be acted on first. If we make the appropriation, the inquiry is useless; if we make the inquiry, the appropriation is out of time.

The gentleman proposes a heavy appropriation for the purpose of putting the United States in a situation of security and defence suitable to her wealth, population, and magnitude. He thinks it desirable that the nakedness of the land should be clothed; and, sir, I heartily concur with him. I am willing to make any necessary appropriation. But, while the Senator from Missouri says that this resolution is general and permanent in its character; that it is unconnected with any object of a mere temporary nature, he has, at the same time, in a very pointed and emphatic manner, directed his remarks to the peculiar situation in which we stand with the French nation. He asks for what purpose this fleet of observation has visited our seaboard? What fleet, sir? Has France fitted out a hostile armament, and are the winds speeding them hither? How does the Senator know what we do not know? Why is this Senate permitted to slumber in ignorance? Why are we annoyed with gloomy, indistinct rumors of menace or danger? Why, if there is danger, are not we informed? Why does not the Executive give us the facts? It is his official duty to know, and, knowing, why do we receive from the gentleman from Missouri what should be told us by the President himself? Sir, I imagine our ancient ally, who has stood with us in many a battle-field, shoulder to shoulder, does not doubt our courage. I am inclined to think that her Monarch himself, who has been among us, entertains no unkind feelings towards this country, and would not readily fall into the error of supposing that the appearance of a French fleet on our coast can overawe the deliberations of this Senate; but that, on the contrary, both he and his ministry would be aware that any hostile or threatening movement would serve but to rouse the indignation of the country, and to increase those difficulties in the way of an adjustment which they throughout have manifested the utmost anxiety to overcome. I do not know that such a fleet is coming; but, if it is, I can conceive a reason why it should come, and that, too, consistent with dispositions the most entirely pacific.

It will be remembered, sir, that our diplomatic agent at the French court was ordered to demand the money or his passports. His passports were demanded, and contemporaneously with that the fleet alluded to by the Senator sailed, it is said, in the direction of the French West Indies. Now, sir, during our quarrel with Great Britain, when our statute book for many years was bristled all over with warlike enactments, and a state of quasi war actually existed, no step so decisive as the withdrawal of diplomatic agents was resorted to until all hope of accommodation was lost. It is most decisive, sir. It cuts off all intercourse with the French Government. The Executive of the United States had recommended in his message of the last session reprisals upon French commerce, provided France did not pay the first instalment. France refused; our diplomatic agent was recalled; the French Government was thrown back upon her former position; and, sir, without intending to threaten or insult, a French fleet might have been deemed necessary here, for the protection of French commerce. If such a threat had been made by the French King, to be executed upon a similar contingency, and, upon the happening of it, our Executive had failed to take measures for the protection of our commerce on the coast of Europe, he would have failed in the most obvious point of duty and policy; and if the French King had said that he would submit to the Chambers a proposition of reprisals upon our commerce, with what face could they complain that we were taking care of that commerce, while such a measure was under discussion?

What the effect of the appearance of that fleet here may be, is another question. We undoubtedly should be prepared for any contingency; and whatever the President sees fit to ask for this purpose, will certainly receive the most deliberate consideration of this body; but, sir, he has not suggested the expediency of any appropriation whatever; he, the commander-in-chief of the army and navy, has asked in reference to this fleet, or to our French relations, neither men nor money. He, whose duty it is to inform us of the state of the Union, and recommend such measures as he may judge necessary and expedient, has made no recommendation, nor sent us any information. It does not belong to the gentleman from Missouri, nor any other member, to supersede him in these high functions.

At the opening of this session we had, in the annual message from the Executive, a detailed account of our relations with France, and were put, as we supposed, into possession of all the facts; has any thing extraordinary in its character happened since? Is there any farther intelligence? If so, sir, why does not the President transmit it here? Why leave us in darkness and uncertainty, to be worked upon by passion, to be excited by rumor, to legislate by guess, or, if we refuse to do so, to be denounced for our hesitation? That it may be said hereafter that the Senate has not done its duty, when, in truth, the Executive has failed to perform his. Let him take the responsibility; it is the first he ever shrunk from.

Passing over the several bills of indictment which the Senator from Missouri has found against this Senate, I must be permitted to congratulate this body upon one remark that has fallen from the honorable gentleman. He says that the clouds which are lowering in the horizon will soon be dissipated; that our fears will soon be silenced; that there will be no French war! Sir, I never supposed that there would be. I never supposed that these two great countries would expend their blood and treasure about a point of honor which it might well become two duellists to stand upon. In my opinion, the last message of the President ought to be satisfactory to France, and I believe it will be so considered by the French ministry, if no new cause of irritation intervenes. I think so, because, throughout this controversy, the French King and ministry have manifested a pervading and earnest desire to adjust the difficulties between the two nations; and this, too, while the negotiations, on our part, have occasionally approached, at Paris, a tone of angry urgency, and here of personal petulance, which in my judgment does not properly belong to the conduct of such affairs. Be this as it may, the controversy is now narrowed down to so minute a point, that I do believe it is impossible for two nations, in a civilized age, to go to war about it. Certain it is that France will not commence hostile aggression. Her position in the controversy is purely defensive. She does not propose to compel any thing from this Government, unless by a negative proceeding—by withholding the money. We are the plaintiffs, and can select the time and manner of enforcing our rights. We are in no danger until we make it. If the interest or honor of this country require us to seek that danger, let the President inform us of the facts which involve our interest and honor.

It is not proper in itself, it does not comport with our dignity, to fashion our proceedings upon the idle gossip of the newspapers, or a refusamiento of them served up here. Our minister in France thought it not unbecoming his station to take his cue from the Globe newspaper. I hope the Senate will not follow the example, that it will not take either that print or the "Constitutionnel," instead of a message from the President of the United States, or the King of the French. It is forgetting the whole character of the discussions; it is idle, it is worse than idle, to intimate that France, in the present position of things, can possibly commit an act of aggression. She will not, she cannot. No gentleman on this floor will venture to say plainly that he thinks so. It was but fair and candid in the gentleman from Missouri to say that there will be no war. No, sir, there will be no French war; none, unless perchance it may be intended to raise a war spirit with France, for the purpose of a war against this Senate—unless it may be intended to get up a war spirit, for the purpose of covering the surplus, or throwing its expenditure into the hands of the Executive. If such a game as this is to be played on the verge of a war, we may fall in. If we do, sir, the responsibility is a fearful one upon those who made such a stake upon the issue of such a game; but I hope for better things; I hope that the honor of the nation will be left untarnished, that its peace will be uninterrupted, and that the Senate will maintain its high and salutary control.

Mr. BENTON bore testimony to the zeal displayed by the Military Committee, who not only agreed at once to bring forward the proposition, but to sanction any other proposition which he might deem it necessary to report. [He here read the last paragraph of the report of the committee.]

With respect to his resolution, it contained no appropriation. The terms were general, and only declared the sense of the Senate on a subject which was admitted into the action of the Government forty years ago, when Congress applied all the surplus revenue to the extinction of the public debt. The commencement of his resolution was similar in principle, and there was not an appropriation of a dollar. He had got up merely that he might bear testimony to the industry of the Military Committee, and to say that there was no appropriation. He wished to make an issue between those who would appropriate the surplus revenue for the defence of the country, and those who would make an indiscriminate distribution of it among the States. If gentlemen wished to know his authority for what he had said, it was the Constitutionnel, a semi-official newspaper in Paris. He had nothing to say on the subject of that committee on conference, as he was not one of that committee. He took his stand on a position which was obvious to the whole American people, when he referred to what Senators said on this floor, and afterwards sent out to the world in their printed speeches, on the subject of their opposition to these appropriations. He took his stand on the broad ground of these speeches.

Mr. CLAYTON said that the Senate and the country would perceive from the remarks of those who had already participated in the debate, and particularly from those of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. LEXER,] how far the member from Missouri had succeeded in his accusations against those who, at the last hour of the last day of the 23d Congress, refused to vote for an appropriation of three millions of dollars, without specification of objects. He held it entirely unnecessary, for the full and perfect vindication of himself and those who acted with him on that occasion, to enter into any further detail of the acts and doings of that memorable night, although he believed that a full development of all that occurred out of this chamber at that time would still further expose the utter want of foundation for the charge that the fortification bill fell by the fault of the Senate, or that there was among its members a neglect of duty in endeavoring to provide for the defence of the country. But his object in now rising was to reply to that remark of the member from Missouri, pronounced with so much emphasis, that the people were yet to be made acquainted with other proofs of our disposition at that session to refuse to provide for the defence of the country. These proofs he proceeded to state. They consisted of the report of the Committee on Military Affairs, made at an early day during the last session, recommending a very great addition to the sums proposed to be appropriated for national defence, in the fortification bill, which came here from the other House, and, among others, a specific appropriation of half a million of dollars, to be applied to arming and completing the fortifications of the United States; and then the gentleman informed us that, after he had moved to insert this large appropriation in the fortification bill, which the committee had proposed as being in connexion with other amendments, also increasing the appropriations proposed by the other House, adequate to the purposes of defence at the time, his motion failed. We are thus shown, sir, by this statement, to have refused to vote for a specific appropriation of five hundred thousand dollars for defence. Now, sir, in my defence, and to put down, now and forever, all imputations or insinuations that I have ever refused to grant specific appropriations for the defence of the country, I beg leave to submit a brief statement of the facts connected with this subject, which will be confirmed by every member of the Committee on Military Affairs, and by all who have any recollection of the events to which I refer.

Sir, after all that has been said here, you will be surprised to learn now that I was the very member of the Committee on Military Affairs who moved the instruction to the honorable member from Missouri, as chairman of that committee, directing him to make the motion upon which he has plumed himself, and for the failure of which he has this day arraigned us all before the American people; that I voted for and supported the motion here, as well as in the committee, and that the motion fell, not because the Senate was opposed to the object of it, but because the Committee on Finance informed us at the moment that they had the subject under consideration, and intended to propose a substitute for it, which we know they afterwards did propose. Yes, sir, the members of the Committee on Military Affairs will bear me witness that I was the first man who proposed, in either House of Congress, at the last session, to increase the means of our defence, in consequence of the indications of a possible rupture with another country; and that I went in advance of every department of the Government in making this identical proposition: the purport of which was, that, after granting ample appropriations for every fortification which was named in the bill, five hundred thousand dollars should be placed at the disposal of the Executive, to be applied to constructing, arming, and completing any other fortifications which, in his judgment, might require it. Recollect, sir, that, at the time I moved this instruction, no department of this Government had moved in the matter to anticipate or give direction to my action; and, let me add, that I moved it without preconcert with any man, or set of men, either in or out of Congress. I acted solely on my own responsibility, independent of all party considerations. I thought I saw that a crisis was approaching in the affairs of our country which required me to move without prompting, and I waited for no man's lead to induce me to use my humble efforts to arm and protect that country, without caring from what quarter or from what cause the necessity for that protection had arisen or might arise. Sir, I moved that part of the instructions also under which the chairman proposed to double the amount of the appropriation proposed by the other House, for the purpose of rebuilding Fort Delaware. This amendment was adopted after a protracted debate, in which I took a part, supporting the amendment according to the best of my humble ability, here on the floor of the Senate. The honorable gentleman from Alabama, who was in the chair at the time, will tell you, sir, that such was the fact; and he will remember, as will others here, that, after the adoption of the motion to grant $150,000, instead of $75,000, for rebuilding Fort Delaware, the Senate did, at a very late hour of the day, and when many members were out of their places, proceed to consider the chairman's motion, then made in obedience to his instructions, to grant $500,000 for arming and completing the fortifications of the nation in general. The reason for its failure at the time I have already mentioned, was not a party reason, nor was there any party vote upon the proposition. It had my vote, and the votes of some others with whom I usually act here; but the measure was not pressed by the chairman, who contented himself with simply making the motion, not apprehending that his duty required of him any labored argument to support the proposition.

Then, sir, with this matter in evidence, how stand I on the Senator's arraignment before the country? So far from lagging in the discharge of my duty, I have led him in the path of it, and directed his course. I have gone in advance of the Department of War, and of every branch of the Executive. Yes, sir, and of every other man in both Houses of Congress. I have submitted during the past year in silence to those reproaches which have charged me, and those who voted with me on this fortification bill, with a want of patriotism, because, forsooth, we would not agree to vote a general appropriation of three millions of dollars, without any limitation, restriction, or specification as to the objects to which it should be applied, and in direct opposition to the whole practice of the Government for nearly forty years, as well as the plainest principles of the constitution. But, sir, if I have heretofore submitted to such reproaches in silence, knowing how unmerited they were, I have nevertheless felt their injustice, and felt it deeply, too, and I now avail myself of this the very first opportunity which has been offered me on this floor to repel the charge, and denounce and expose it to the American people as being utterly destitute of foundation.

Suffer me to say, sir, briefly, in conclusion, that I stand prepared now, as I have been heretofore, and shall be hereafter, to go as far as he who shall dare go farthest, in providing, on all occasions, for the necessary defence of the country. And whether my conduct shall be rewarded by calumny or approbation, nothing shall prevent me, while I hold a seat here, from discharging with the fidelity which becomes an American Senator, my duty to guard and protect the country from the danger of foreign aggression, no matter by what party it shall be provoked, or from what cause it may originate. On all such questions, I have known, and will know, no party, and I will have no reference in my action upon any of them but to the honor, the safety, and the welfare of the nation.

Mr. BENTON rose, and read a passage from the journal, showing that he moved the proposition appropriating half a million of dollars as an amendment to the fortification bill at the last session, which was negatived.

Mr. CLAYTON said he had already stated these facts, now confirmed by the journal, precisely as they existed. I admit that the chairman did his duty in obeying the instructions of the Committee on Military Affairs, by making the motion he had read. But, sir, I was the man who moved the instructions under which he acted, and who first suggested the measure.

To this Mr. BENTON assented.

When Mr. CLAYTON concluded, the Senate adjourned, without concluding the discussion.

IN SENATE, FEBRUARY 26.

CUMBERLAND ROAD.

The bill making an appropriation for the completion of the Cumberland road in the States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri, being under consideration—

After Mr. HENDRICKS had taken his seat,

Mr. BUCHANAN said, he had often travelled upon the Cumberland road before. It had been a standing subject before Congress ever since he had been first a member of the other House. He was, therefore, always ready to act upon it. He would vote for the appropriation proposed by this bill. He did not think the friends of the bill should consent to lay it upon the table at the request of the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CRITTENDEN,] in the hope that further reflection might induce him to change his opinion. His remarks had induced Mr. B. to believe that the prospect of such a change was but faint.

In one respect, said Mr. B., I am happy to concur in opinion with that gentleman. I admit that we are not bound by the compacts with the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, to appropriate this money. It cannot be demanded from us as a matter of contract. The two per cent. fund, arising out of the sales of the public lands, in these States, has long since been expended. It is now millions in the arrear, more than it will ever pay. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] estimates that this fund will eventually yield upwards of seven millions of dollars. This may possibly be so, though I very much doubt it. At all events, it is a prospective contingent calculation; and the money to make the road is required immediately. I am disposed to grant it; but not because the compact imposes any such obligation upon me. I wish to be distinctly understood upon this point.

Why, then, shall I vote for this appropriation? Simply because it has long been the established policy of Congress to construct this road as far west as the Mississippi. We have acted upon this principle steadily for many years. Shall we now arrest the progress of this road, and abandon the policy which we have so often sanctioned? Is there a single Senator within the sound of my voice who believes seriously that this will be done? No, sir. The road must be completed. It will be completed; and the only question which can arise is, as to the amount which we ought to appropriate for the present year. On this branch of the subject I shall say a few words. We have been informed by the chairman of the Committee on Roads and Canals [Mr. HENDRICKS] that the sums appropriated by the bill have been asked for by our engineers in their estimates, and that they believe this amount of money can be judiciously expended upon the road during the present year.

[Here Mr. HENDRICKS observed that the sums in the bill were the minimum of what the engineers required.]

Then, (said Mr. B.), what can be the objection to this appropriation? If the road must be made—will be made—why not pass this bill? Is not the Treasury overflowing? Is there any necessity for limiting the expenditure, during the present year, below the sum which can be judiciously applied? Besides, if you grant the engineers what they required, and hold them to a strict responsibility for its expenditure, they can never excuse themselves hereafter by alleging that the expense has been increased by your refusal to give them the sum necessary to prosecute the work in the best and most economical manner. You do not interfere with their plan of operations. For my own part, I do not profess to be a judge of the sum which can be properly expended; and as there is no want of money in the Treasury, I am disposed to complete the work as rapidly as it can be done consistently with the permanent and proper construction of the road.

The Senators from Kentucky complain that whilst the new Northwestern States have received large sums from the public Treasury for the construction of their roads, their State has been entirely neglected. Does it stand alone in this particular? Might I not, with equal justice, complain of the same neglect towards Pennsylvania? I feel proud to say that she has almost completed her vast system of internal improvements without having received one dollar from the national Treasury. It is true she is in debt more than twenty millions; but the income which she will derive from those very improvements will, ere long, prevent this debt from being a burden upon her people. I would advise Kentucky to do likewise. We can now afford her important aid in such a great undertaking, if she will accept it. She can have the benefit of all our experience. The agents who have been employed upon our public works—men faithful, competent, and experienced—have been or will be swept away with the besom of reform. Not one will be left. Of this, however, I do not complain. I should be glad if Kentucky would be benefited by it. We can afford her men who will conduct the public improvements which she is about to undertake, with integrity, economy, and skill.

In reference to the veto upon the Maysville road, which has been introduced into this debate, I shall make a few remarks. I voted for that bill, and whatever I may have thought, at the time, of the veto on that particular road, I am convinced that the principles which were asserted in it have been of great service to the country.

If we had pursued the system of appropriating money for the construction of roads and canals all over the Union, the attention of Congress would thus have been diverted from the great objects intrusted to our care by the constitution. Our time would have been almost exclusively occupied in this business. Besides, although each member might have prescribed it as a rule for himself to grant no appropriations except to national objects, yet when a road or canal was proposed, affecting nearly the interest of his own constituents, he would have been ingenious in satisfying himself that it was of general importance. Such is the nature of man. Each member would have had to decide this question for himself, and each decision would have been a precedent, upon the strength of which we might go a little farther. The natural tendency of the system was to proceed to such an extent that, instead of legislating for the great interests of the Union, the chief objects of our pursuit would have been to obtain money from the Treasury to be expended on roads and canals for the benefit of our constituents.

Notwithstanding all the knowledge and all the ability which are centered in Congress, in my humble opinion, we would constitute a very inefficient and injudicious board of internal improvements. I am glad this system has been checked. I think it the very worst mode which we could adopt of expending the surplus in the Treasury. I should greatly prefer any other which has been proposed.

Mr. B. said he had been in Kentucky when he was very young; and he yet retained and ever should retain a lively and grateful impression of that visit. He had then formed a most favorable opinion of the State and of its population. But he must also say that he never should forget their roads. He was glad to learn that the road between Lexington and Maysville had been turnpiked. It needed it much. He would venture to say, that, before this turnpike was made, all the horses which could have been attached to any vehicle of sufficient dimensions to accommodate Orozimbo, would not have drawn him, in the spring season of the year, from Maysville to Ashland.

Mr. NILES said he had made several unsuccessful attempts to get the floor, but did not intend to detain the Senate, as it was not his purpose to enter into a general discussion of this bill, or of the particular motion before the Senate. This was a Western interest, and, in his opinion, especially a local one; yet it was called a great national work, and, perhaps, in one view of the subject, it might be so considered. Coming from a different quarter, it could not be supposed that he felt any special interest in the bill; yet having never before had the honor of a seat in Congress, this was the first time he had been called on to act in relation to the Cumberland road; and, considering that it had been an old and constant claimant, having been for more than thirty years before Congress, he was perhaps called on to pay his respects to it. This road appears to have been a particular favorite of this Government, and, like other favorites, to have been a large sharer in the public bounty. His object was to notice some of the suggestions of the honorable Senators from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY and Mr. CRITTENDEN,] rather than either to oppose or advocate the bill, in the fate of which he felt no particular solicitude. He could not subscribe to the correctness of the positions which the Senator from Kentucky, who first spoke, [Mr. CLAY,] had assumed, and in which he seemed disposed to place others.

He did not understand the position which the gentlemen from Kentucky have assumed in relation to this bill. In saying this, he had no intention of charging them with a want of clearness or force in their remarks—far from it; but there appeared to be something in reserve; some object which lay beyond this bill, and which they seemed disposed to advance indirectly, by their course in relation to this subject. Are the gentlemen opposed to the bill, or in favor of it? In either case, he thought he should understand them.

He understood perfectly well the position of the two honorable Senators from Indiana, [Mr. HENDRICKS and Mr. TROTTON,] their object is to get through this road; to have it made at the expense of the Government, and as soon as possible; and, consequently, they wish to obtain as large appropriations as they can. He did not complain of this; it was a course perfectly natural, and consistent with the relation in which they stood to the subject. But the Senators from Kentucky appear to occupy a more uncertain and equivocal relation to this bill. At one time, it would seem as if the only question was, whether this road was to be constructed on one side or the other side of the Ohio river. If this is the main question, it is one in which the members of this body generally will probably feel but little interest.

The Senator from Kentucky, who first spoke, [Mr. CLAY,] informed us of his early friendship for this great work; of the constant support he has afforded it. He might have said powerful support; but he seems now to intimate a reluctance to sustain it, because the system of internal improvement, of which he says this road was a part, is suspended. Mark that word, sir; the gentleman says this is suspended; but I will take the liberty to use a more definite term, and inform the gentleman that I think this favorite system of his is ended; that it is overthrown, not only by the act of the Executive, but by public opinion, and that it is ended now, henceforth, and forever. He says the veto of the bill for the Maysville and Louisville road had destroyed the system, and that those who sustained the administration who had put down the system, could hardly expect the support of those who are friendly to it. But whilst he still professes to be friendly to the object of this bill, he insists on placing it on a ground which, he must know, would be fatal to it, not only in another quarter, but in Congress. He says the Cumberland road cannot be distinguished from any other work of internal improvement, and that it can rest on no other foundation than the existence of a power in this Government to construct roads. Sir, if this bill can stand on no other foundation than this, it cannot stand at all—it cannot be sustained—it must fall to the ground.

I had supposed that the compacts with the new States, by which five per cent. on the amount of lands sold in such States was reserved, two per cent. for roads leading to those States, and three per cent. for making roads in such States, amounted to something—that it was entitled to some consideration as distinguishing this from other roads, notwithstanding this fund and much more has already been expended. But this road owes its origin to those compacts—it was undertaken in pursuance of them; and, having been begun, has been continued, and a sum expended greatly exceeding the five per cent. on the sales of the public lands. I do not say that these compacts were wise, but I regard them as unwise and unfortunate, by involving this Government in a business which did not belong to it, and in regard to which its constitutional power is very doubtful. I regard these compacts as still in force, because the five per cent. on all the lands to be sold within those States is to go into our Treasury. I regret that these compacts were entered into; but having been made, and the Government having undertaken this work—having persevered in it for more than thirty years—it having received the sanction of every administration, from that of Mr. Jefferson to the present, and of every department of the Government—it becomes a grave question, whether we can stop short and now abandon it; whether, after all that has been done, after the long course of action on this subject for more than thirty years, the nation is not in some sense committed—is not in some way pledged to complete this road? If it is; if this Government has yet to build this road to the Mississippi, as the gentleman from Kentucky seems to admit, it is not perhaps very material whether the appropriations are made in one year or in many years, if we have the money to spare. This becomes only a question as to time and convenience, and a wise economy in the expenditure of the money. If we have yet to make this road, having now a large surplus, (which is so alarming to some gentlemen,) we may perhaps as well appropriate what can be profitably and advantageously expended. The sooner we are done with this road the better; it is time this Government was clear of it.

But the honorable Senator from Kentucky appears to have another object in view; to revive his favorite system in another form, by the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands. Sir, it is not surprising that that gentleman should feel sensibly and deeply the loss of that system—a system of which, and I presume correctly, he has been called the father. No doubt it was a fond child of his; one which he cherished with parental solicitude during its brief and troubled existence; one on which he relied, and from which he expected much. And since it has been taken from him, it doubtless appears more interesting. It is a principle of our nature, that when objects dear to us are lost, they appear more lovely than when we possessed them, and our affections are revived with more vividness and force. I have myself had the melancholy experience of the truth of this principle.

The regrets of the honorable Senator over his fallen system are perfectly natural; I am not surprised at them; but I think they will be unavailing; I trust that system is something more than suspended; it is, I hope, ended, and never more to be revived, either in its original shape or in a new form or disguise. I hope never to see the day when there will be such an enlargement and extension of the powers and patronage of this Government, as that system is calculated to bring with it. Sir, the accumulation of power here, in this central, this engrossing, ingulfing Government, is sufficiently rapid and alarming, without giving any new impetus to its natural tendencies.

The honorable Senator has informed us that he wishes to see the blessings of this Government reach the whole Union, and spread over the whole and every part with an even hand. But what does he regard as the blessings of this Government? Is it the extension of its agency in the construction of roads and canals within the States? Is it the distribution among them of large sums of money for these objects? Sir, I hope never to see the day when the States of this Union shall be encouraged and induced to look up to this central power for money, whether to make their roads and canals, or any other object. I hope the day will never arrive, when the sovereign States shall be reduced to a dependence on this Government; when they shall become its pensioners, as are now the surviving remnants of the glorious army of the Revolution. If these are the blessings the gentleman alludes to, I hope we may be long saved from them. Sooner than vote for such a system, I would see this arm fall from its socket. Would the gentleman have this Government like that of France, where forty millions are expended annually by the Executive on the public roads, and an immense patronage attending it? If the States are taught to look to this Government for means to construct roads, and to carry on their works of internal improvement, they will soon look here for means for other objects—for the erection of their public buildings, for education, and even for their ordinary current expenses. Should such a system be established—a system of degradation and dependence on the part of the States; of a vast accumulation of power, patronage, and influence, on the part of this Government; it would work a revolution in the system. I should despair of long preserving our liberties; they would at once lose their freshness; a blight would come over them, and decay, rapid decay, would follow. Sir, the disbursement of the public treasure is the essential element of Government patronage, and the extent of the one depends on the amount of the other; neither is it very material how this money is paid out, whether to public officers, to agents, or contractors, or distributed among the States.

The swelling flood which is now flowing into your Treasury, according to the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. PRESTON,] and which he so eloquently described the other day, would all be wanted to keep up a system like this, and would all go to extend the patronage of this Government.

Sir, the real blessings of this Government are diffused over the whole Union; they are diffused equally in every State, and among the whole people. All participate in them, and all share alike. These blessings are the moral power and influence of this Government; the protection and security which it affords to all; the consciousness of this security, and the peace and happiness which flow from it. This is the great and primary end of all civil institutions. It is the great moral agency of this Government, and its influence on public sentiment at home and abroad, which preserves peace among the States, and security against foreign Powers. We have recently experienced the importance of this security, whilst the danger of a rupture with a great nation impended over us. Had it not been for this system, what would have been the situation of the States? Would they have been able to have afforded protection, and would the people have felt that security and composure which they did? These blessings are not the less to be prized because the power from whence they flow is in a great measure unseen and unfelt. If the action of this Government was confined to its proper limits, it would be scarcely seen or felt by the people. Your tax-gatherers do not go among them; they seldom see your marshals or executive officers. This Government acts on the great body of the people only by its moral power and influence, and the blessings which it confers may almost be compared to those dispensed by Divine Providence: we enjoy, we realize them; we feel their influence, but hardly know the source of the power whence they flow; it is far removed, invisible, and felt only in the blessings it diffuses over the Union.

Mr. BENTON said the Government had been about thirty years—the life of a generation—engaged in this road, and still it had not reached the Mississippi. Some of the superintendents, by the smallness of the sums which they had applied for, had seemed to consider their occupation as a life estate, which it would be a pity to abridge. He had often, and years ago, spoken to the chairman of the Committee on Roads and Canals [Mr. HENDRICKS] to have these appropriations increased, and the work carried forward more rapidly, as the same superintendent could overlook large portions of the work; and now that large appropriations were actually asked for, a motion was made to reduce them; a motion which Mr. B. hoped would not prevail. He wished all the public works, which were overlooked by superintendents at salaries, to go forward more rapidly; the public interest would be benefited by it, though the private interests of some of the superintendents might not. Long and slow jobs might suit them, as a long and moderate war is supposed to have been the toast, and to have suited the interests of a certain army chaplain during the Revolution: a long war, that he might have his salary continued; and moderate, that too many men should not be killed for his remaining in office. But quick work does best for the country; and now that a good appropriation was asked for, he trusted it would be granted.

Mr. B. said, this road rested on compact, and had received the sanction of every President, from Mr. Jefferson to General Jackson; it had also been supported by every majority that had ever prevailed in either House of Congress; and, therefore, should not be opposed now. It needed bridges, especially over the Wabash, and he hoped they would not be denied. The same road, on this side of the Ohio, had many noble bridges erected on it, of which he would mention the one on the Yohogany, in the State of Pennsylvania; and he should be in favor of treating both ends of the road alike.

It had been objected that the country between the Great Wabash and the Mississippi was destitute of stone, and would not furnish material for covering the road. On this point, he had some information, as well as some personal knowledge. The general character of the country was that of scarcity of stone quarries; but he had been informed by Colonel McRee, one of the commissioners for reconnoitering the country for its location, that gravel pits abounded, which would furnish a flint gravel, well adapted to the cover of the road; and he had seen these pits near Vincennes, in the famous swamp called Purgatory, through which General Clark's men marched to surprise the British post at Vincennes, and the character of which was indicated by its name. The ground for many miles was a trembling morass, in which men and horses often sunk, and required help to get them out. Now a good road is there; boughs from the trees being cut and laid on the morass, to form a bed for the gravel which was got from pits in the same prairie which contained the swamp.

It was also objected to the continuation of the road, that the point of striking the Mississippi was not fixed, and that Missouri and Illinois were contending about it. That question, Mr. B. said, could not become material until the road passed Vandalia, and the present appropriations were to carry it to Vandalia. The Senators from those States, now on this floor, were not disposed to balk the bill by a premature difficulty, and he hoped nobody else would raise difficulties for them, while they were in harmony, and disposed to proceed amicably. Sufficient for the day is the evil thereof. At present, they would work together to get the road to Vandalia, and after that would settle the difficulty as commodiously as possible. All they asked at present were good appropriations for the road and the bridge, and a speedy passage to the bill, that the season for doing the work might not be passing by before the work could begin.

Mr. DAVIS said that as the motion was put, he would vote for it. But he did not intend by that vote to express any hostile purpose towards the bill. No estimate was before them of the cost of this road. But he had been informed an estimate was made in a former year.

A great deal had been said in this discussion that reflected much light on the subject. But he would like to see the estimate.

IN SENATE, MAY 19.

FORTIFICATION BILL.

After Mr. WRIGHT had concluded his speech,

Mr. EWING, of Ohio, said he had some time since endeavored to show, and he thought successfully, from the reports of the chief engineer, that it would not be in the power of the Executive to expend, advantageously to the public service, the amount of money which it is proposed to appropriate by this bill. That we could not do it for the want of engineers, and especially for the want of mechanics and laborers. We have already (said Mr. E.) appropriated seven millions for the navy, and two millions are proposed for finishing the fortifications already commenced, an amount larger than we have ever yet been able to expend on the seacoast in any one year; and now it is proposed to add to all this the amount named in this bill. Now, sir, that money cannot be expended, and is not needed for the present year.

To my suggestion, that this sum could not be expended for the want of the physical force, mechanics and laborers, to carry on the works, two answers have been given, entirely inconsistent with each other, neither of them entitled to much weight. The Senator from Missouri says, that, by extending the line of operations, commencing new works at points where none are already in progress, we can draw from the adjacent country labor which we could not procure upon more distant works. This would be very correct in many situations, though it is not so here. These fortifications are all upon the same line of seacoast. Materials may be procured, and prepared any where within one or two hundred miles of the works, and transported with very little expense; and so can the hands which are to construct them. Then, if an individual can spare a month, or a week, from his common avocations, he can be procured to make shingles, or prepare timber, or stone, for any of these fortifications, just as well as if they were to be built at his own door; and laborers can be transported, without loss of time or expense, one or two hundred miles to work on the fortifications. So that the founding of works, at new points on the coast, will not much increase the amount of labor that can be procured upon them.

But the Senator from New York [Mr. WRIGHT] goes on the other extreme, the very antipodes of the Senator from Missouri. He charges those of us who voted for the land bill, and who say that the States can expend this money usefully for internal improvements, with inconsistency; because, says he, if the States can expend this money, the United States can also. If the labor is in the country to be procured, the United States can procure it. Now, sir, I might leave those two arguments to dispose of each other, for they do it effectually; and, it is the strongest proof of our correctness, that those who object to our proposed policy find their objections on all sides of it; for truth is always surrounded with errors, and pursuing the straight line between them. But how is it with the objection of the Senator from New York? We propose, for example, that the State of Ohio shall receive of the present surplus two millions, to be expended by her, if she pleases so to expend it, in internal improvements. The Senator argues, that if Ohio can procure laborers to expend that, the same laborers can be procured by the United States to expend the same sum. Now, sir, materials cannot be got out in Ohio for the construction of a fort, and transported to Throg's neck; laborers cannot be hired in Ohio to go to the seacoast, and work upon these fortifications. But let us set on foot our works at home, and there is no want of materials or of men.

Land Bill.

[SENATE.]

The farmer's sons in the West, who are the best hands in the world, will help in with the spring crop, and then have a month which they will employ in working on the road or canal in the neighborhood. But they would not go to New York to work that month. After harvest, and before corn gathering, they will work two or three months more, and again in the open weather in the winter; and an industrious lad will, in a year or two, lay up money enough to buy himself 80 acres of land, besides helping his father in every emergency on the farm at home. Now, the effect of these enormous expenditures on the seacoast, under the pretext of national defence, must cut off or greatly check those improvements in the West, and thus deprive our country of the advantages to which it is entitled, and its young men of the benefits which it would enable them to derive from their industry and enterprise. The public money, it seems, must be all taken to the East, and expended on the seacoast, or kept in the banks, and our public lands become the property of those who have our public money in keeping. As this bill is part of a system of monopoly—of sectional monopoly—and as it is not, at this time, necessary for the purpose of national defence, and as the system of which it forms a part will distract and derange unnecessarily the business of the Western country, I shall vote against it.

IN SENATE, APRIL 25.

LAND BILL.

The bill to distribute the proceeds of the public lands among the different States being under consideration,

Mr. WHITE rose and addressed the Senate to the following effect:

Mr. President, the subject under consideration is not new, but the circumstances connected with it are both novel and important. Formerly we were in debt, and had no money in the Treasury, which we could not conveniently use. Now we owe nothing, and have an overflowing Treasury. The common wants for an economical administration of the Government will require but a small portion of our vast and accumulating treasure, and the question is, what disposition shall we make of the surplus. Several projects have been presented. An increase of the army, of the navy, additional fortifications, and munitions of war, is one plan. Another is to put the funds in the power of the commissioners of the sinking fund, and let them vest them in stocks, which will add to our wealth. A third is, to form contracts with incorporated railroad companies, for transporting the mail, your warlike stores, and your armies. And the fourth is that presented by this bill, which is to distribute the proceeds of the public lands among the several States.

In forming an opinion upon this subject I find myself compelled to form some opinion on each of the others also, that I may be able to decide which ought to be preferred.

But the first question to be settled is one of power. If we have no power to dispose of this money as this bill proposes, it is only a waste of time to pursue the subject any farther. Some of our enlightened public men, years past, foresaw difficulties which would in time originate from surpluses accumulating in the Treasury, and suggested this very plan for disposing of them. Some doubted the power under the constitution, and suggested an amendment to remove the doubt; others felt no doubts, therefore did not deem any amendment necessary. All, however, seem to have concurred in the fairness and justice of this disposition of such funds as might not be needed for the uses of the Federal Government. If I mistake not, Mr. Jefferson, while President, made a suggestion to Congress on this subject.

VOL. XII.—291

Ten years ago an honorable Senator from New Jersey, now Secretary of the Navy, and I do him the justice to add, then, as well as now, a zealous friend of the present Chief Magistrate, moved in this body on this subject, had a committee created, made an able detailed report, accompanied by a bill, which was not finally acted on during the session. To do that gentleman justice I must recur to this report, and read such parts of it as are material, that we may have the benefit of his opinion as enforced by himself. It is found in the fourth volume of the Senate documents at the session 1825 and 1826, Doc. 95, p. 1, and is in these words:

"The committee, from as careful an examination of the subject as a due attention to their other duties would permit them to make, have come to the conclusion that great advantages would result to the United States from an annual distribution among them, by some equitable ratio, of a portion of our national revenue, for the purposes of education and internal improvement, or for such other purposes as the State Governments may respectively deem most to their advantage. Whether the United States shall divide the whole of their revenues beyond what are required for the usual expenditures of the Government, domestic and foreign, civil, military, and naval, to the reduction of our public debt, until the whole of it shall be extinguished; or whether they shall apply a portion of those revenues, as proposed, for the most important purposes, and thereby cause a more gradual reduction of the public debt, resolves itself into a question of expediency.

"It remains for Congress to determine which of these courses will most effectually promote the present, as well as the future, prosperity of the country. There can be no doubt that money distributed among the States, as proposed, would be invested in a way to give much greater profit than the interest on such money would yield at three, four and a half, or even five per cent., which are the rates of interest now paid on the greater part of our public debt.

"As a large portion of this debt is payable to persons in Europe, to discharge it as fast as our means would permit would be to send from the country, sooner than necessary, funds that are wanted at home; the inconvenience of which would be sensibly felt in the present embarrassed state of our moneyed market, and most probably for several years to come.

"Money distributed as proposed, would give new activity to industry and enterprise in all the States; and that equally and simultaneously.

"It would create a vigilance on the part of the State Governments, over the expenditures of the General Government, and thereby prevent the waste of money, and the adoption of extravagant measures, that might diminish the amount of the annual dividends.

"It would secure impartial justice to all the States in the distribution of the expenditures of our revenue, a failure of which at present is a subject of loud and just complaint.

"It would relieve the General Government of the serious inconvenience of an overflowing Treasury, which, if not provided for in the manner proposed, or by a reduction of our revenue, will impair the most important principles of our constitution.

"It would relieve the two Houses of Congress of a large portion of legislation, now devoted to the disposal of our surplus funds—legislation of the worst kind, calculated to produce combinations, sectional feelings, injustice, and waste of the public treasure.

"It would transfer to the States the regulation of expenditures for internal improvements by roads and canals, which, if retained and exercised by the General Government, contrary, as is believed by many, to the letter and spirit of our constitution, will, in time, so far decrease the powers of the State Governments, and increase those of the United States Government, as to destroy the federative principle of our Union, and convert our system of confederated republics into a consolidated Government.

Land Bill.

"It would remove the cause of the great and increasing difficulties arising from an objection, on constitutional grounds, to the exercise of the right claimed on the part of the United States, of making roads and canals through the different States of the Union. It would enable the General Government to keep in operation an efficient system of finance and revenue, with advantage to the States. And should the exigencies of the country require the application of all our means to some object connected with our national peace and prosperity, those means could soon be brought into operation, by suspending, for a time, the dividends to the States. By this our Treasury would be filled without a sudden resort to new taxes, which might be oppressive to agriculture, and which might create much inconvenience by interrupting the pursuits and industry of our citizens.

"Money collected from the sources which now give us our revenues, and distributed among the States as proposed, would produce a rapid and profitable circulation of our funds, from the centre to the extremities of the Union, and thus add to the force of the moneyed capital of the country."

It will here be remarked, that no doubt was felt or expressed as to power to distribute every portion of the revenue which could be spared, and a plan was recommended for adoption immediately, although we then owed a large debt, bearing various rates of interest, from three up to six per centum.

Next in the order of time, is the message of the present Chief Magistrate at the commencement of the session of Congress in 1829, found in the Senate journal, pages 13 and 14. That part of it which is material is in these words:

"After the extinction of the public debt, it is not probable that any adjustment of the tariff, upon principles satisfactory to the people of the Union, will, until a remote period, if ever, leave the Government without a considerable surplus in the Treasury, beyond what may be necessary for its current service. As then the period approaches when the application of the revenue to the payment of debt will cease, the disposition of the surplus will present a subject for the serious deliberation of Congress, and it may be fortunate for the country that it is yet to be decided, considered in connexion with the difficulties which have heretofore attended appropriations for purposes of internal improvement, and with those which this experience tells us will certainly arise, whenever power over such subjects may be exercised by the General Government; it is hoped that it may lead to the adoption of some plan, which will reconcile the diversified interests of the States, and strengthen the bonds which unite them. Every member of the Union, in peace and in war, will be benefited by the improvement of inland navigation, and the construction of highways in the several States. Let us, then, endeavor to attain this benefit in a mode which will be satisfactory to all. That hitherto adopted has, by many of our fellow-citizens, been deprecated as an infraction of the constitution; while, by others, it has been avowed as inexpedient. All feel that it has been employed at the expense of harmony in the legislative councils.

"To avoid these evils, it appears to me that the most safe, just, and federal disposition, which could be made of the surplus revenue, would be its apportionment among the several States according to their ratio of representation—and should this measure not be found warranted by the constitution, that it would be expedient to propose to the States an amendment authorizing it. I regard an appeal to the source of power, in cases of real doubt, and when its exercise is deemed indispensable to the general welfare, as among the most sacred of all our obligations. Upon this country, more than any other, has, in the providence of God, been cast the special guardianship of the great principle of adherence to written constitutions. If it fail here, all hope in regard to it will be extinguished. That this was intended to be a Government of limited and specific, and not general, powers, must be admitted by all; and it is our duty to preserve for it the character intended by its framers. If experience points out the necessity for an enlargement of these powers, let us apply for it to those for whose benefit it is to be exercised; and not undermine the whole system by a resort to overstrained constructions," &c.

It will be perceived that in these two short paragraphs the justice and utility of distributing these surplus funds are presented to the mind, in language as clear, distinct, and forcible, as can well be employed.

It was not necessary to his purpose, and therefore he did not examine the question whether the powers of Congress over the moneys arising from the public lands were as limited as those possessed over moneys derived from taxes, and he contents himself with the expression of a general doubt on the question of power, and recommends an amendment of the constitution to remove it.

At the session of 1831 and 1832, this subject is introduced into the report of Mr. McLane, then Secretary of the Treasury, and afterwards Secretary of State. What he says will be found in the Senate documents, vol. 1, doc. 3, page 12, and is in these words:

"The sources from which the revenue has hitherto been derived, are the imports, public lands, and bank dividends. With the sales of the bank stock the latter will cease, and as the imports, according to any scale of duties which it will be expedient and practicable to adopt, will be amply sufficient to meet all the expenditures, that portion of the revenue heretofore drawn from the sale of the public lands may be dispensed with, should Congress see fit to do so.

"On this point, the undersigned deems it proper to observe, that the creation of numerous States throughout the Western country, now forming a most important part of the Union, and the relative powers claimed and exercised by Congress and the respective States over the public lands, have been gradually accumulating causes of inquietude and difficulty, if not of complaint. It may well deserve consideration, therefore, whether, at a period demanding an amicable and permanent adjustment of the various subjects which now agitate the public mind, these may not be advantageously disposed of, in common with the others, and upon principles just and satisfactory to all parts of the Union.

"It must be admitted that the public lands were ceded by the States, or subsequently acquired by the United States, for the common benefit, and that each State has an interest in their proceeds, of which it cannot justly be deprived. Over this part of the public property, the powers of the General Government have been uniformly supposed to have a peculiarly extensive scope, and have been construed to authorize their application to purposes of education and improvement, to which other branches of revenue were not deemed applicable. It is not practicable to keep the public lands out of the market, and the present mode of disposing of them is not the most profitable, either to the General Government or to the States, and must be expected, when the proceeds shall be no longer required for the public debt, to give rise to new and more serious objections.

"Under these circumstances, it is submitted to the wisdom of Congress, to decide upon the propriety of ceding all the public lands, in the aggregate, to those States within whose territorial limits they lie, at a fair price, to be settled in such manner as might be satisfactory to all. The aggregate price of the whole may then be apportioned among the several States of the Union, according to such equitable ratio as may be consistent with the objects of the original cession, and the proportion of each paid," &c.

APRIL 25, 1836.]

Land Bill.

The vigorous and discriminating mind of this highly gifted and useful man at once recognises as sound a distinction in the powers of Congress over moneys derived from a disposition of the public lands, and those powers that body may be supposed to possess over moneys derived from other sources, and he strongly urges the necessity and propriety of a distribution among the States.

It is fortunate that we are not yet placed in circumstances which make it essential to decide whether we have a power to divide all surplus revenue, no matter from what source derived. I profess to be what is called a strict constructionist of the constitution, and that our power to appropriate money is necessarily confined to appropriations, to effect some object upon which Congress is expressly empowered to legislate, or some necessary and appropriate means to effect such enumerated objects. Still I never have been satisfied we do not possess the power to distribute surplus revenue, if it is believed wise to do so. No just Government will take, either by direct or indirect taxes, more money than is necessary to defray all the reasonable expenses of the Government. When taxes are imposed, either directly or by an assessment of duties, it cannot be foretold precisely how much will be wanted, or how much will be received, in the Treasury. We must necessarily act upon estimates. To some extent, we will be mistaken. Foreseeing this, and for the sake of collecting what will be certainly sufficient, we will almost invariably collect more than is necessary. In a series of years, these accumulating balances will amount to a sum too large to remain locked up, and entirely useless. What, then, is to be done? We surely are not at liberty to devise some wasteful and mischievous project, merely to use the money. It came into the Treasury by mistake. Mistakes which, in the nature of things, could not be avoided. Have we no power to correct them when discovered? Is not the power to refund the money a necessary result from the power to assess and collect it? Is not this a power which Congress has always exercised, and must exercise, as to individuals?

By mistake, our officers collect and place in the Treasury money which ought not to have been collected; the mistake is discovered, and the individual calls on Congress for redress. We pass a law to refund the money. Where do we get power to do this? There is no express grant of any such power; but it results from the very nature of the relation which exists between the payer and receiver. The latter must always have power to act justly, to act honestly, and whenever he finds he has money through mistake, he would seem to have power to return it. But I do not intend to express any opinion on this point, or to prolong a discussion, by introducing important topics, not necessary to our action on this bill. All I intended was to state, for myself, that should it ever become necessary to discuss the general subject of our power to distribute the whole surplus, no matter from what source derived, for one, I think it well worth a careful and deliberate consideration, before it is either affirmed or denied; and I most heartily concur in the sound doctrine of the President, that we ought not to act, when there is a reasonable doubt of our power.

The question which we must now decide is, whether we have power to do that which all admit it is perfectly just we should do, if we have the power—distribute the proceeds of the sales of the public lands. The following considerations have satisfied my own mind, and they are respectfully submitted for the reflection of others. Our public lands were acquired by the United States, by deeds of cessions from several individual States, and by the purchase of Louisiana and Florida, which were paid for by moneys derived from the lands which had been ceded by individual States.

The most important cession was made by the State of Virginia, in the year 1784, and that part of the cession material to our present purpose is in the following words:

"That all the lands within the territory so ceded to the United States, and not reserved for, or appropriated to, any of the before-mentioned purposes, or disposed of in bounties to the officers and soldiers of the American army, shall be considered as a common fund for the use and benefit of such of the United States as have become, or shall become, members of the confederation, or federal alliance of the said States, Virginia inclusive, according to their usual and respective proportions in the general charge and expenditure, and shall be faithfully and bona fide disposed of for that purpose, and for no other use or purpose whatsoever."—1 vol. Laws U. S. p. 474.

This language creates an express trust between the United States and each individual State. By it the United States stand pledged to hold these lands in trust, that they shall be faithfully managed, and their avails applied for the joint benefit of all. So far as it has been applied to the payment of debts due by all, the trust has been complied with; but now the debts are paid, and there is a surplus, have we the power to give this surplus to those for whose use the trust was created? I might ask who can doubt it? Suppose the States still bound together only by the articles of confederation, out of money raised in its own way, and out of its own means, each State had paid, when called on, its quota for the expenses of the Federal Government, and for the payment of the national debt, and there was a surplus of twenty or thirty millions of dollars, for which the Federal Government had no use, would we not be bound to distribute it? I say we would not only have the power to do so, but if we did not exert it, a court of chancery would compel us, if we could be sued. The very terms of the cession look to distribution. If this were not so, why say in the deed that, when used for the benefit of all, "Virginia" shall be included? Why fix the "ratio" in which payments shall be made to each? If we only have power to pay debts and bear common expenses of Government with these moneys, and can do nothing else with them, both these regulations would have been useless. I take it, therefore, as too clear for a doubt, that, if now connected by the articles of confederation only, we would have the power to distribute.

The next question is, did the adoption of the present constitution alter the rights of the parties, or take from Congress the power to comply with their engagement? I answer, unhesitatingly, no.

In the 6th article of the constitution, the first paragraph runs thus:

"All debts contracted, and engagements entered into, before the adoption of this constitution, shall be as valid against the United States under this constitution as under the confederation."

In the 3d section of the 4th article of the same instrument, this language is found:

"The Congress shall have power to dispose of, and make all needful rules and regulations respecting, the territory or other property of the United States, and nothing in this constitution shall be construed to prejudice any claims of the United States, or of any particular State."

Thus we find all debts contracted, and engagements entered into, before, were to remain unchanged, and the respective rights of the United States, and of each individual State, were to remain precisely as if the form of Government had not been altered, and express power is conferred to dispose of the public lands, and to make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property of the United States.

With these different provisions before him, who can doubt the power of the United States to do that which, by accepting this trust, they expressly agreed to do? Cessions from the other States are made substantially on the same conditions, and liable to the same dispositions by Congress. Louisiana and Florida were purchased with the avails of these ceded lands; the trustee is the same, and that trustee holds these lands loaded with exactly the same burden, and is bound, if those for whose use they are holden desire it, to dispose of them and their proceeds in the same manner. I hold, therefore, that, be the general question of power to distribute the whole revenue settled as it may, there ought to be no question as to the power to divide moneys arising from the sales of lands. But it has been argued that, if we have the power, there is no money to divide. That when the amount is settled, the nett gain will not exceed $400,000. To this I can never agree. The United States took this trust-fund, and with it purchased Louisiana and Florida, and now we are told they have had the use of the money for nothing, and will only account for the principal. This is not the rule. If the trustee takes the trust-fund and trades upon it, he must account to the cestuy que use, for all the profits made. The question in chancery would be, not what these countries cost, but what they are worth. You cannot fix a price. Louisiana and Florida! The sovereignty and jurisdiction over them alone is worth more to this Union than all the national debt we ever owed. How much duties have we collected from their ports? How much have we avoided paying by making them our own, instead of letting them remain foreign ports? How many wars have we avoided by their purchase? In short, what would you take for them? No sum. They are beyond price to the rest of the Union. On this part of the subject, the question with me is, not what sum we now have in the Treasury, which was received for the sale of lands, but whether we have a sum in the Treasury equal to that proposed to be distributed, over and above all that is necessary to be appropriated to take care of the great interests of the country, and without debiting the States with the sums paid for Louisiana and Florida, because I am sure, upon any fair settlement, the sum due from the Union is at least equal to the sum which it is proposed now to distribute.

What sum have we, and what will we probably receive, in the course of the year? I will take round sums, disregarding fractions.

We have now in the Treasury	$32,000,000
Of this sum, the quarter ending 31st of March produced $11,000,000. Suppose the remaining three quarters to average the like sum, and we will have on the 31st December, more by	33,000,000
Add the value of our bank stock	7,500,000
Estimated amount	$72,500,000
Deduct for falling off and deficiencies,	5,500,000
	$67,000,000

After this liberal deduction, we will have sixty-seven millions at the end of the year.

Now for expenditures:

The ordinary wants of the Government ought not to exceed $15,000,000. Mr. McLane, in the report of 1831, to which I have adverted, fixes upon that as a sum amply sufficient, and it appears to me in all conscience it must be enough, unless our prosperity is to drive us into the most mad excesses.

Let us, then, take this as the sum necessary for our ordinary expenses in the course of the year

$15,000,000
Add to this, to be distributed among the States
$27,000,000

These two sums amount to	$42,000,000
--------------------------	--------------

Take forty-two millions from sixty-seven, and we will still have in the Treasury twenty-five millions of dollars, to apply to any extraordinary expenditures for the army, the navy, for fortifications, or for any other purpose whatever. The army ought to be increased so much as to render secure our frontiers. The increase of our navy may be hastened to some extent, and we ought ultimately to have a naval force more than able to chastise and drive off any foreign fleet sent to blockade or seriously to infest our coast. Larger than that we do not need and ought not to have, if it were given to us. Fortifications are only wanted for important points, at which an enemy might do much mischief to public or to private property, by a sudden incursion. The whole coast we never can, and never should attempt to defend by fortifications. If we do, we must have a large standing army to defend them; otherwise they will be applied to the protection of our enemies. We are told by the Secretary of War, in a document before me, that Old Point Comfort covers sixty-three acres of ground, and to protect it by an adequate force, would require several thousand men. We never can, we never ought, to attempt to defend our whole coast, by so many fortifications as will require any considerable increase of our army. If we do, in time of peace, these troops will come, on days of election, and as they are hired to do our fighting, they will do our voting likewise, and in a short time leave us nothing worth fortifying. Such defences are contrary to the spirit and genius of our Government, and ought never to be countenanced or tolerated to the unreasonable extent which some appear now to desire. In the same document, at pages 21, 22, from the War Department, the Secretary says no new fortification ought to be commenced until all the proposed sites are resurveyed and plans devised upon a suitable scale, and recommends a board for that purpose, which will require a small appropriation of thirty thousand dollars.

He also recommends experiments to be made in relation to steam or moveable batteries, which will require an appropriation of one hundred thousand dollars. Well, then, if we concur with the Secretary, we want at present no appropriation for new fortifications, but these two sums, equal to one hundred and thirty thousand dollars, to defray the expenses of a board, and the experiments of which I have spoken.

As to the fortifications now in progress, let such increase be made in the appropriations as can reasonably be used in the course of the year. As to the suggestion made that we ought at once to appropriate a sum large enough to complete the work, although it may be five or ten years before it can be completed, I do not think it ought to be sanctioned. It is unnecessarily, and for a long time, putting at hazard, in the hands of agents, who may prove faithless, large sums of money. From year to year let the appropriations be made, and thus avoid all unnecessary risk. According to this same document, the expense necessary for ordnance must be comparatively trifling. We can be much more readily supplied than I had imagined. Upon the whole, I think all the reasonable demands for the army, for the navy, for fortifications, ordnance, and other munitions of war, can be supplied without making any serious impression upon that large fund left in the Treasury, after providing for the distribution as proposed in this bill.

Allusion has been made to matters pending before us, when not acting as a Legislature, which, if perfected, may occasion a considerable increase of expenditure. That may be so; yet we must remember that not much of this expenditure will, or can be, this year or the next, and that these very measures will increase our resources, if not entirely equal to our increased expenditure, very nearly so. These matters, therefore, may be laid aside.

Another project for ridding the Treasury of its surplus, is that of placing it in the hands of the commissioners of the sinking fund, and authorizing them to vest it in some secure stock, yielding a reasonable profit. This might do, and is probably intended as an expedient to save the money from loss; but as to a mode of lessening the fund, it would be making bad worse; it would be devising a plan to increase our store; because we would expect a return of the principal and the interest produced by it. But, for myself, I have no idea of sending our money among stockjobbers, into the market, to be higgling for bargains, which in one way may be very good, and in some other, very bad. Far rather would I prefer they should remain where they now are.

The last scheme for adoption is that from the Post Office Committee, with the aid of steam. With the aid of this machinery, I have very little doubt, the whole can be accomplished in a very short time. The whole of this, which, without intending disrespect to the committee, I must call artful contrivance, is neither more nor less than the old system of internal improvement, with federal means, and by federal power, revived, and the more odious, because of the attempt at concealment. The old system has the merit of manliness. Its friends think the Federal Government has the power, and openly avow that they will exercise it, because in doing so they promote the public interest. This seeks to violate the constitution by stealth, and the contrivers of it must think the device is so artfully concealed that the public can never find out the design. Now, sir, I think it perfectly proper, that, where a railroad can be had, the Postmaster General ought to have the power to contract with the company to carry his mail, and I understand he has this power already; therefore, as to existing roads, the bill will be of no use. He can make just as good a contract without as with this bill. It can only operate on roads commenced and unfinished, or ones being commenced. How, then, will it operate? Say the road is to be one hundred miles long, and ten or twenty only finished, and the company to need funds, they make a contract to carry the mail, and receive at once, out of the Treasury, a sum of money, the interest on which, yearly, will be equal to the sum paid yearly, in time past, for carrying the mail; with this money the company are to progress, and make another part of the road, then the contract will be enlarged on the same principles, an additional sum paid, and thus the road be completed. Can this be anything but an enlarged, masked system of internal improvement? and if the charter of the company is for fifty or an hundred years, or forever, your contracts are to be in the same way. To carry out this system, what sum would it probably cost? No man dares to offer a conjecture. To enable us to have a glimpse of it, let us suppose one case. Upon a given route, the sum paid for carrying the mail was twenty thousand dollars per annum. We are now to give to the company presently, and to be retained as long as the charter lasts, a sum which, at an interest of six per cent., will produce twenty thousand dollars yearly. What sum would that be? No less than three hundred and thirty-three thousand three hundred and thirty-three dollars and one third. This would be but one route, and I presume of the middling class; and pray what sum would it not require, to spread this system over the United States? Suppose one of these companies, directly after receiving your money, to fail, and decline business, what then? We must lose the money, or take the road. We take the road, and employ managers and hands enough to carry on business on our own account. We should then have a little army of our own, moving to and fro by steam. Under such a system, we would be steamed out of all our money, all our character, and every thing but a handsome addition to federal patronage. Adopt this plan, and, my word for it, we will never have another argument on the subject of disposing of our surplus revenue: it will be scattered to the four winds. As this project is brought forward by a friend of the administration, it is supposed to be an administration measure; by this I mean a measure approved by the President. How this fact may be, I do not profess to know; but I have seen enough in my day here to satisfy me that it is very unfair that every measure brought forward and advocated by the members professing to be friends of the administration, should be considered as having the sanction of the President. I know not what his opinions on such subjects are now; I know what they have been, and until informed, in some authentic mode, that they have been changed, I esteem it fair to suppose they remain unchanged.

Let us hear him speak for himself, in two of his communications. In his annual message of 1830 the President says:

"In speaking of direct appropriations, I mean to include a practice which has obtained to some extent, and to which I have, in one instance, in a different capacity, given my assent—that of subscribing to the stock of private associations. Positive experience, and a more thorough consideration of the subject, have convinced me of the impropriety as well as inexpediency of such investments. All improvements effected by the funds of the nation, for general use, should be open to the enjoyment of all our fellow citizens, exempt from the payment of tolls, or any imposition of that character."

Same message, he says, farther:

"That such improvements, on account of particular circumstances, may be more advantageously and beneficially made in some States than in others, is doubtless true; but that they are of a character which should prevent an equitable distribution of the public funds amongst the several States, is not to be conceded.

"We have it constantly before our eyes, that professions of superior zeal in the cause of internal improvement, and a disposition to lavish the public funds upon objects of that character, are daily and earnestly put forth by aspirants to power, as constituting the highest claims to the confidence of the people. Would it be strange, under such circumstances, and in times of great excitement, that grants of this description should find their motives in objects which may not accord with the public good? Those who have not had occasion to see and regret the indication of a sinister influence in these matters, in time past, have been more fortunate than myself in their observation of the course of public affairs."

In his message of 1832, he says:

"I recommend that provision be made to dispose of all stocks, now held by it [the Government] in corporations, whether created by the General or State Governments, and placing the proceeds in the Treasury. As a source of profit, these stocks are of little or no value; as a means of influence among the States, they are adverse to the purity of our institutions. The whole principle on which they are based is deemed by many unconstitutional, and to persist in the policy which they indicate, is considered wholly inexpedient."

Are we to infer, after this, that he would approve of this plan? I think not. To me it appears much more probable, were we to pass such a bill as this, that it would be vetoed by him, than that he should negative the distribution bill, when he would reflect upon the altered state of things since that subject was acted on by him. Such a system as this would be one of internal improvement, with the moneys and under the patronage of the Federal Government. It would be for the benefit of companies, some of whose charters may be for long periods, or without limit as to time; they would still continue to receive their toll from the people. It would operate partially and unjust to the different sections of the country. Some would receive plenty, others none. Instead of trying to rid the Government of all connexion with stock companies, we would be forming more extensive and dangerous connexions than have ever been thought of in time past. I therefore conclude such a scheme, however plausible at first view, can never ultimately find favor from any majority in Congress.

I will now advert to some of the strongest objections which I have heard to the policy of distribution. It is thought a system of distribution will make the States feel dependent on the Federal Government, and induce them to engage in enterprises not necessary, and beyond their fair means. Ought we not to remember that it is the same people, who are represented both in the State and Federal Legislatures? That they are competent to understand their own rights, and have the power to compel obedience to their will, by their representatives at home as well as here? Will they not know that the money distributed is their own money, not a boon from Congress? How, then, will they feel dependent upon those who have done them no favor, but the simple act of justice, of paying them their own money, in place of keeping it locked up, or having it wasted by others? If the people are capable of self-government, they must be capable of understanding their own rights, and pursuing their own interests. They will not view this as a boon, but as a delivery to them of that which is their own. They will never look to distribution as a regular and certain resource for State purposes, but as an incidental addition to their other means, which will enable them to carry on with more vigor any plan which in their wisdom may be devised for improving their country, or increasing the means of education.

Again: It is said the new States may justly fear that distribution will induce the old States to keep the price of lands high, and thereby check settlements in them. It appears to me there can be no real foundation for any alarm on this account. The new States now form a very respectable minority. That minority will soon be increased to the number of ten or eleven. If we are fit to live together under one General Government, there never can, there never will, come a time when so large a minority cannot prevail upon enough to make up a majority, to do that which is not only just but liberal to them. Nothing can be so likely to prevent this as a contracted and illiberal policy on their part. If they prevent distribution, and thus prevent others from attaining any participation in a common fund, and this with a view to benefit themselves, may they not destroy all disposition to meliorate their condition? Will it not be more wise in them to let that which can well be spared from the proceeds of the public lands be distributed, and with their fair proportion of it, in common with other States, go on and make such internal improvements as the interest of their people demands, and rely upon the justice of Congress, from time to time, to make such reductions in the price of the public lands, in favor of actual settlers, as the interests of the new States may require? For one, having been raised and having lived in a new State, and knowing the difficulties they have to encounter, my feelings have been with them, and, since honored with a place here, I have ever been disposed by my votes to favor their wishes and interests, so far as it could consistently be done. I hope still to do so, let them pursue what course they may. Either now, or at any subsequent time, I am ready to vote a reduction of the price of the public lands in favor of the actual settler, the cultivator of the soil; but not to favor the speculator—he who would buy largely at a small price, to sell to the settler in small quantities at a high price. Of all the evils which can befall a new State, none is greater than to reduce the price so low as to encourage individuals or companies to purchase large quantities of the public domain. They will be held up for increased prices, and effectually check the growth, the prosperity, and wealth, of any State, where such a policy is pursued. But the actual settler may well be favored by procuring a home of his own, at a low price, where he can cultivate his own soil, and, independently of all others, maintain his family. I voted yesterday against the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi, because it did not provide for actual settlers, but only for those who represented that they wished to become settlers. Let lands be entered upon such statements, and those who entered them would, in many cases, soon change their minds, and some speculator would be found to be the true owner, at the reduced price. Whenever the lands have been so long in market, at a reasonable price, as to show that they are not of value to the General Government, let them be transferred, upon some fair terms, to the States in which they respectively lie. In the State which I have the honor in part to represent, the United States now own some lands, which never have been, and never can be, brought into market by them, so as to produce any benefit whatever; to the State they would be worth something; there is now a bill pending in the other House, which has for its object their transfer to the State, and if it reaches the Senate, which I hope it soon will, it is believed we will be able to show the propriety of passing it.

Let us now reflect a little on some of the advantages which will flow from the passage of this bill. In the first place, we will do that which is an act of justice to the individual States. Several of them, my own among the rest, have never received a dollar from the Federal Government, while others have received large donations in lands or in money. In some States, where they are opposed to internal improvements by the Federal Government, no contributions have been made for either roads or canals, while in others large sums have been expended. This inequality has produced heart-burnings and discontents. Give to each its own proportion of this fund, to do with as it pleases, and this cause of discontent will be removed. Each State is the proper judge what ought to be done with its own money; I am, therefore, opposed to giving any direction as to the objects to which it shall be applied: but I have no doubt, in most instances, it will be expended either in internal improvements or in the business of education. I have been one of those who do not believe the Federal Government has the power to carry on a system of internal improvements within the States; and I shall now think it peculiarly hard, when we find a large sum of money, which we have the power to distribute, if it should be taken and wasted upon remote and distant objects, and my State receive nothing. I should consider myself criminally negligent if I did not urge the necessity of giving that which I think is justly our due. By making this distribution, we shall withdraw from the deposit banks a large sum of money, now locked up from the common and beneficial pursuits of life, and put in circulation, not in one State or place in particular, but in every State in the Union, so that its beneficial effects will be felt by all. Now, if this money is loaned by the banks, it is evident to my mind the loans are not made to commercial men, accustomed to bank accommodations, but to companies engaged in speculations in our most valuable public lands; by means of these loans, the honest settler is driven off from your public sales, or is forced to join some company, for the sake of enabling himself to procure, at a fair price, the small piece of land on which he has settled. Formerly, we sold the public lands upon credit; while that was the case, companies were formed, and speculations carried to a great extent. I attended one of those sales, and saw enough to satisfy me, Mr. President, that if you and I could unite our capacity for business, we would not then be able to purchase, at its value, a section of land. The speculators would force us to join them, or drive us out of the market. They would tell us the land we desired to purchase was worth ten dollars per acre, and if we would give them the difference between the sum we had to give at sale, and ten dollars, then we might buy, otherwise they would run it up to twenty dollars per acre; and they would keep their word, if we did not come to terms; if we did, then we could bid off the land at a dollar and a quarter, which we would pay to the Government, and in addition we would pay the company eight and three quarters dollars per acre. The Congress determined to break up these speculations, by requiring cash payments. It worked very well till lately. Within the last year, the land speculations are revived to a fearful extent. Now, what is probably the cause? These large sums, so long on deposit, enable the banks to make to these companies large loans on long credits, and, with the money thus borrowed, your best lands are sacrificed. This is nothing but the credit system revived in a new shape. Formerly, the Government itself openly gave credit; now the banks give the credit, but the Government furnishes the funds which enable them to do so. This is a growing evil. It is like rolling a snow ball; every turn makes it larger, and if not checked, we shall soon have this matter carried to an extent which will make the mischief incurable. Divide this money, and we take from the banks the power of making these loans, and your lands will be purchased in fact, as well as in form, for money. Besides these considerations, we will prevent our deposit banks from overtrading to an unreasonable extent. If these speculations are to be persisted in, a day of reckoning will come. If a run be made on your banks, which they cannot stand, we not only lose our money on deposit, but, what is infinitely worse, we bring upon the country the evil of a depreciated currency, which always falls most heavily upon those least able to bear the loss.

Pass this bill, and we not only avoid these evils, but we furnish each State with the strongest inducements to aid your banks in maintaining a sound and wholesome currency; with their proper proportions of which, when received, I have no doubt, all will make judicious internal improvements, and take care to have the business of education suitably encouraged.

IN SENATE, MARCH 31.

OHIO RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. Ewing's reply to Mr. MORRIS, on presenting the resolutions of the State of Ohio.

Mr. EWING said, my colleague expresses dissatisfaction that I should notice the circumstance of his remarks, on presenting the resolutions, being written out and read from a paper. I did it, sir, not to convey the idea that he was unable to deliver his views orally, for, had that been the case, I should not have named it, but to show that I did not pass by, unnoticed, the deliberate nature of the attack he has seen fit to make on me here, under cover of the presentation of a paper. He has travelled out of the question. He has obtruded upon this chamber a vituperative attack upon me and upon my friends; and he has done it, not in the heat of debate; not in a moment of sudden excitement, called forth by harsh collision here, but in his own chamber, quietly at his own table, he has collected and collated all the vile trash which has filled the lowest party newspapers for the last two years, and dealt it out to us here in a labored and condensed form.

My honorable colleague says, I cannot duly appreciate the feelings with which he has performed this very painful duty. He is, doubtless, correct. I am a stranger, and trust I ever shall be, to feelings which would dictate the performance of such a duty in such a manner.

In one thing, however, we entirely agree. I concur with him in the opinion that nothing more is necessary than to bring the subject on which we differ fully before the people. Give them light upon the question; let them understand what is attempted upon the one side, and repelled on the other, and that their judgment will be right. Surely it will; their feelings and their judgment, too, will be right; and their final decision on the question, as it must again pass in review before them, will be right also.

I, sir, as one of the Senators from Ohio; one of the servants of a great State and a great people, am required by my fellow servants in another department, to whom that people have delegated no power of superintendence over me; I am required by them to do an act which I hold to be a violation of my official oath, and degrading to me as a Senator and as a man, or to resign my seat.

Now, I have never denied the right of instruction, as inherent in representative Governments, though its precise limits I have never had occasion to consider and define. But, so far as that right does exist, it is confined to the constituent, and none but the constituent has the right to instruct the representative. Then, what I do deny is, that the Legislature is the constituent, and the only constituent, whom I represent here. The constitution of the United States forbids the conclusion, and common sense forbids it. The Senators represent the people of the States, and the Legislatures are but the electoral college, designated by the constitution to select those agents for the people. In case of a vacancy during the recess of the Legislature, the Governor appoints a Senator; and if the right of instruction be, as contended for, vested in those who appoint, the Senator appointed by the Governor must obey his will, and not the will of the people. This would be absurd, and no man has been bold enough to contend for it.

This right of instruction, claimed elsewhere, is by strong implication denied to the Legislature by the constitution of Ohio. No man pretends that it is expressly delegated to them by the constitution, and there is a general clause in that instrument which provides that all powers not therein expressly delegated shall belong to the people. If, then, the right of instruction be inherent in a representative Government, that party in the Legislature who have attempted to instruct me, and who demand my resignation as the penalty of disobedience, have usurped the rights of the people. Those men are not my lawful sovereign, and I will not acknowledge their power.

I am always glad to receive information from my Legislature; to consult with them as to the common good of those whom we in common represent; to avail myself of their advice; to know from them their own wishes, and, through them, so far as possible, the wishes of our common constituents. But let no dominant party in that body, or elsewhere, which thinks fit to be my enemy because I will not be its slave, hope to bend me from my purpose, or drive me from my post, by their commands or their threats.

SENATE.]

Public Lands.

[JAN. 28, 1836.]

IN SENATE, JANUARY 28.

PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. EWING, of Ohio, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported unfavorably on several memorials that had been referred to that committee, and moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration thereof. Among them was a memorial from the Legislature of Missouri, asking a grant of land for purposes of internal improvement; and one from the Legislature of Louisiana of the same purport.

Mr. E., in presenting the reports, said, it was the opinion of the committee that, in all cases, it was better to grant money than lands, and that it was better the United States should sell the lands.

Mr. BENTON said he should be glad to have a written report from the committee, on the subject of some of these memorials, especially the one from Missouri, for a grant of land for internal improvement, which the committee had disposed of in such a summary way. He objected to this compendious process and wholesale condemnation, by which a dozen memorials were disposed of at once, on a mere motion to be discharged from their consideration, and without a word in writing. He wished to have an opportunity of showing that the State from which the chairman of the committee came, (Ohio,) had received above a million of acres of public land for internal improvement, while many of the new States had received not an acre. It was not convenient to go into this subject this morning, Mr. B. said, when other business was pressing; and he would prefer that it should be laid over for the present. Other States besides Missouri were about to be injured; and there were other gentlemen who would not sit still, and see the Senate, by a sub silentio proceeding, or an ore tenus report, do such wrong to their States. He would wish the committee to take back their motion, or that it be laid upon the table for the present.

Mr. PORTER hoped the course suggested by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] would be followed by the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, and adverted to the immense sums of money expended by the people of Louisiana in extending the levee, and to the benefit of those lands. An application had been made to the Secretary of the Navy for information relating to this subject, and he hoped that, before so decided a disposition was made of those applications, the committee would wait until that information was received. These petitions were not bottomed upon the generosity, but the interest of the Government.

Mr. EWING, of Ohio, observed that he felt no anxiety that the question should be taken on the proposition of the committee at that time. He certainly was not disposed to get rid of the papers that had been referred to them, otherwise than in a direct mode, and that mode he had supposed had been adopted by him. The other day he had presented a detailed report, in which all these subjects had been fully discussed and examined, and he would be therefore willing to lay this report on the table till the gentleman had time to look into this report and to decide whether the views he had taken on it were sound or unsound. A bill of the same nature of these petitions, which had been referred to the committee, would have been reported back on the same day that he made the detailed report, but he did not lay his hands on it at the time. In that detailed report he had said what he now repeated, "ore tenus," that it was better to make grants of money than of lands.

He was asked, why the committee did not report money in lieu of lands? Now, the gentleman who asked that question had been a member of that body for many years, and knew very well that it was not customary for the Committee on Public Lands to report money bills.

Such a report would come more appropriately from the Committee on Roads and Canals, or of Finance. In the general bill he had before referred to, there was a grant of this very five hundred thousand acres of land the State of Missouri asked for. Whenever the subject fairly came up, he was disposed to present his views, and those of the committee, fully; and if the Senate was not satisfied with them, they would cheerfully acquiesce in its decision. In the general bill reported the other day, the object was to place all the new States on the same footing; but his opinion was, that that bill, taking all circumstances into consideration, did Ohio great injustice. As that bill, however, was not then under consideration, he would not discuss it further. He was satisfied that the subject should be laid on the table till the report was printed, and the bill was brought up before them.

Mr. BENTON observed, that the Senator from Ohio, who had just taken his seat, had said that it was not regular for his committee to report a bill granting money. Now, he (Mr. B.) presumed it would be perfectly regular for them to recommend money, and also competent for the gentleman himself to say that he would vote for money in lieu of the land asked for. The gentleman remarked that they had decided, on principle, that it was better for the Government to grant money than land, and in the same breath said that the committee had reported favorably for granting 500,000 acres of land to the State of Missouri, in the distributive land bill. This is a pretty way to establish principle; a report for it, and a bill against it. So much for the principle decided on by the committee. But what (asked Mr. B.) is this 500,000 acres, that is to be thus granted to the State of Missouri? It is, said he, the same 500,000 acres which I proposed myself long before this land bill was brought in, which proposition received the favorable consideration of the Senate, having passed to a third reading and reached its third stage before that general land bill was conceived of. In this stage of its progress, this bill that he had brought in was laid on the table, and afterwards seized upon and taken away from him, the father of it, and put into a bill which afterwards received the veto of the President. Nay, more, it was continued in the same bill of this year, with the knowledge, on the part of those who framed it, of the President's message on the veto of the bill, and that he would, on principle, adhere to his objections given in that message. Where, then, was the friendship to Missouri, which the gentleman boasts of when he speaks of the grant to be in a bill the principles of which the President has vetted and must veto again? Was the State of Missouri to be treated in this manner? Were the new States to be treated in this way? And was he, a Senator, to be treated in this way, to have his bill, that he had introduced session after session, taken from him, and embodied in another that could never become a law?

Sir, said Mr. B., I mean, when this land distribution bill comes up, to move to have it disembowelled, and to take my child out of it. I want it taken from the guardianship of those who are pressing it to death, and to be delivered to me, its own father. The bill thus taken from him had been used against him in his own State; for when he voted against this distribution land bill, containing his own in its stomach, every press in his State, on a certain side of the political line, came out against him with the declaration that he had voted against his own bill; that he (Mr. BENTON) had voted against a grant of 500,000 acres of land to the State of Missouri. He did not say that such was the design of those who had taken his bill and put it into another; but such was the use that had been made of what they had done. The attempt to make the people of Missouri misunderstand him had failed; but, as respected the land, the State had lost it; and he was determined that the manner in which he had been treated, and the people of Missouri had been treated, by taking this bill from him, and putting it in another—that this attempt—he would not say attempt—but that this proceeding, having the effect to make the people of Missouri believe that there were those here who were willing to grant her 500,000 acres of land, while they placed the grant in a position which would prevent the possibility of its passing, should be fully known and understood. He moved to lay the reports, for the present, on the table.

Mr. MOORE adverted to the position in which he stood in relation to the principles involved in this matter, as one of the Committee on Public Lands. He was not in his place when the report was made. But if a bill was reported, he hoped the child would not be killed, and that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] would have it in his power, as father, guardian, or author, to give it all the support and nutriment he wished.

Mr. EWING said he had been charged by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] with inconsistency. It was not easy to discuss a report not before the Senate. The committee intended, in making their report, to treat the new States alike, and to place them all on an equality. It was the opinion of the committee that grants of lands should not be made for these particular purposes. The grant of the ten per cent. was so far a grant for those purposes. The committee did not know of the veto of the bill alluded to by the gentleman from Missouri, and, for one, he could never consent, as a member of this body, to be swerved from his course by the exercise of it. He would not consent to mould his course to meet the executive approbation. He would not be held to act in obedience to executive will. If the motion prevailed to lay the report on the table, it would place it in the power of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] to take such course in reference to it as he thought proper. He had nothing to do with his [Mr. BENTON's] State, to effect any object here, or any purpose there, but intended to act upon broad principles.

Mr. BENTON certainly had no objection that the Senator from Ohio, or any other Senator, should go on with their business, either public or private, without regarding the action of the President; but he hoped now that he might be understood, and that there would be no necessity for him again to repeat it. What he objected to particularly was the taking his bill, which had received the favorable action of the Senate, which had precedent to sanction it, which had nothing extraneous in it, which rested on its own merits, and putting it in another bill which had received the veto of the President, and which, taking into consideration the President's message, it must be known would receive his veto again. The gentleman said he had no object in acting on the State of Missouri; but what was the state of things there some years ago, at the time the vote was taken on this distribution land bill, into which his bill had been so irregularly imbedded? There was an election pending there for United States Senator, and his vote on this bill was used against him from one end of the State to the other. To be sure, when the subject came before the General Assembly, they saw and fully understood the circumstances under which he acted, and appreciated the feelings which influenced him to vote against a measure to which they, as well as he, was opposed on principle, though it did propose to give 500,000 acres of land to the State he represented. Now, as to the bill for this grant to Missouri, which he had introduced at the very beginning of this session, and which, though referred to the committee long before this distributive land bill, came limping in after it.

Sir, said Mr. B., my Legislature has adopted that bill; and, in asking for this grant of 500,000 acres, condemns this general bill into which the grant is now put; and, having their approbation, he should again vote against this general bill which, in his opinion, contained so much to condemn. Whatever was the design of gentlemen in making the grant in this way, it was entirely delusive while it was attached to a measure whose fate it must share. Now, with respect to the nature of those land bills which had been sent to the Committee on Public Lands. That committee had never, since the organization of the Government, been constituted so unfavorably for the new States as now. How stood that committee? It consisted of Mr. Ewing, of Ohio; Mr. Moore, of Alabama; Mr. Crittenden, of Kentucky; Mr. Prentiss, of Vermont; and Mr. McKean, of Pennsylvania; a majority from the old States. The first time this committee had been so organized since he had been in the Senate. The gentleman from Alabama was the only member on it from the new States; for he considered Ohio, in all that respected the public lands, as an old State. She (Ohio) had received large grants of land from the Government, upwards of a million of acres, while the chairman of the committee was from that State, and was opposed to making similar grants to the new States, who had received nothing. She had but little public land remaining to be sold. She was rich and populous, and not at all in the condition with the young States which had received no grants, or but small grants, for internal improvement, and whose population was thin, and resources weak. The real new States had but one representative on the committee. It was a committee strangely and strongly organized against the new States, and could not speak and act for them with any knowledge of their feelings and interests. He should not submit in silence to the summary and compendious mode in which that committee had undertaken to dispose of all the petitions and memorials of the new States. He would take the proper time to contest their conduct; to oppose all that they had done against reducing the price of the public lands, against granting them lands for internal improvement, as had been granted to Ohio and some others; against a delusive report for money, without any bill to grant money; against the land distribution bill; and, above all, he should take the proper time to endeavor to extract his own bill for 500,000 acres to Missouri from the stomach of the monster which had swallowed it, and from the guardianship of self-constituted protectors, who have put it where it must die, and whose gratuitous protection had deprived the State of the grant in the bill for four years past.

Mr. EWING said the Senator complained that this bill had been thrust into the land bill which had been vetoed. This bill related to the lands of one State. The committee had first provided for lands generally, and then attended to particular cases, which accounted for the circumstance of this bill coming limping in one day after the general bill.

The reports were then laid on the table.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JUNE 13.

Remarks which Mr. MASON, of Ohio, attempted to make (but was prevented by the previous question) in the House of Representatives, on the 13th of June, when the bill for the admission of Michigan into the Union was under consideration.

Mr. Speaker: Before the final vote is taken, I wish to state very briefly, and by way of proposition, rather than extended argument, the reasons why I cannot vote for this bill. But let me first declare, as I do in all sincerity, that my opposition to the bill does not proceed from any feeling of hostility or unkindness towards the people of Michigan. Between them and the citizens of Ohio commercial relations have long been established, equally beneficial to both parties. If these relations, founded in mutual interests, have been disturbed by recent events, arising out of an unfortunate controversy respecting a claim to territorial jurisdiction, still I cherish the hope that this estrangement is but temporary, and that it will speedily be succeeded by the restoration of that intercourse which once so happily subsisted between them. I would invoke both parties to obliterate from their minds the memory of all past injuries and causes of irritation, and to cultivate in future that fraternal spirit of forbearance and good will towards each other which local position and other considerations seem to inculcate as a duty of reciprocal obligation.

There is one objection to the adoption of Michigan into the Union, furnished by the attitude she has assumed, which ought to postpone her application for the present, if all the principles of the bill under consideration were such as could be sanctioned. The people of Michigan, under the influence of evil counsel, and without waiting for Congress to authorize them to hold a convention to form a constitution, preparatory to their admission into the Union, proceeded at once to throw off the Territorial Government, and subvert the laws and the authorities of the United States. Michigan has done more than this: she has, without the consent of Congress, erected an independent Government within such territorial limits as she has seen proper to prescribe for herself, and has assumed the exercise of powers that belong only to sovereign States.

If I have not greatly misunderstood her position, it is one of resistance to the laws of the United States, enacted for the government of that Territory. True, it has been urged, as an apology for this conduct, that Michigan has a right to admission into the Union "on an equal footing with the original States, in all respects whatever;" and that she derives this right from the terms of the ordinance of 1787, "for the government of the Territory of the United States northwest of the river Ohio." Suppose the right claimed be conceded, still it is a right restricted not only by the conditions specified in the instrument from which it is derived, but by the power vested in Congress to prescribe boundaries to a Territory to be erected into a State, and by the further power to prescribe the manner in which it may become a member of the family of American States.

Besides, this right, whatever may be its practical extent, was not, in its creation, secured to Michigan alone; but it belonged equally, and in common, to all of the States that have been formed out of the Territory northwest of the river Ohio.

Yet, those States were admitted into the Union under acts of Congress authorizing them "to form a permanent constitution and State Government." It never occurred to their sagacity that they could rightfully emancipate themselves from their condition of pupilage, and assume, without the consent of their guardian, the mien and port of manhood. It certainly could not derogate from the dignity of Michigan, nor abridge any of her rights, to be required to enter into the confederacy in the same way and on the same conditions that the other States were compelled to observe when they applied for admission into the Union.

This attempt to force herself into the family, unbidden, is more deserving of rebuke than encouragement. And although every appearance of mere etiquette should be scrupulously rejected from the solemnities of investing a Territory with the attributes and capacities of a State, and all puerile forms excluded from the ceremony of adopting her into the Union, yet precedents established in the better days of the republic ought not to be disregarded for slight and insufficient causes. Great and striking irregularities should not, for the purpose of securing a mere sinister and temporary object, be overlooked, in a proceeding of such paramount concernment.

No purpose, however patriotic, should be permitted to seduce Congress to connive at irregularities that may hereafter be seized on as precedents to justify still more daring innovations.

But, in addition to the objections I have urged against the admission of Michigan, arising out of her own conduct, there are others, founded on certain provisions incorporated into the bill under consideration, that deserve to be noticed. In the third section will be found the following very novel and most extraordinary provision:

"And the Senators and Representatives, who have been elected by the said State, as its representatives in the Congress of the United States, shall be entitled to take their seats in the Senate and House of Representatives, respectively, without further delay."

It would be a task of no common difficulty to reconcile this provision of the bill with the 5th section, article 1st, of the constitution, which declares that "each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications, of its own members."

As each House is, by the constitution, made the sole judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications, of its members, the question presents itself, can both Houses jointly participate in a right which is thus expressly secured to one? It may be answered that, if one of the Houses choose to share with the other the powers and privileges that belong exclusively to itself, no wrong is done to either, and no injury inflicted on any public interest. Suppose the fact asserted by this answer be admitted, the question still recurs, in all its unmitigated force, namely, whence does the House of Representatives obtain its power of adjudication in a matter which every one knows and admits is within the exclusive cognizance of another tribunal?

Congress can exercise no power not conferred by the constitution; and no one can be found willing to assert that consent gives jurisdiction. If the two Houses can act jointly in a matter where separate action is prescribed by the constitution, so may they, by consent, act separately in cases demanding their joint action. The power of legislation is not more clearly a joint power, vested in both Houses of Congress and the President, than the power to adjourn from day to day; and to judge of the elections, &c. of members is a separate power, to be exercised by each House, to the exclusion of the other. What right has this House, in its legislative or other capacity, to say that certain individuals have been elected Senators by the State of Michigan, and that they shall be entitled to take their seats in the Senate without further delay? And what right has the Senate to interfere, as it has done, and declare that the "Representative elected by the said State shall be entitled to take his seat in the House of Representatives without further delay?" Nothing can be plainer than that each House is constitutionally incompetent to say, by a solemn legislative act, that A B has been elected, and that he is entitled to take his seat in the other. And yet this is precisely what the Senate has said in regard to a person who, it is rumored, has been elected by the people of Michigan as their Representative in this House; and, also, what we are called on to say respecting two gentlemen who it is reported have been elected by the Legislature of Michigan Senators in the Senate of the United States. This we are gravely asked to do, although their credentials have never been presented to this House, and although we are wholly in the dark as to the matter of fact, as we are clearly in the wrong as to the principle involved in this proceeding.

But, further, this bill, before it can become a law, must receive the sanction of the President.

This will be to put it in the power of the Executive to say who shall and who shall not be Senators and Representatives in the Congress of the United States. Think you his decision will not be tainted with political consid erations? But what part of the constitution is it that has confided to the Executive this tremendous power of supervising the "elections, returns, and qualifications," of the members of Congress? Yield to the Executive his claim to interpret and execute the laws as he understands them, and then add to his powers, already increased to a dangerous extent by encroachments on the other departments of the Government, the one proposed to be conceded by this bill, involving the right to decide who shall and who shall not be members of Congress, and you will have concentrated all power in the hands of one person, and completed the definition of a perfect despotism.

If the provision to which I have called the attention of the House should prove to be a mere nullity, its inefficacy will not result from its intrinsic harmlessness, as some have been willing to believe, but from the fact that it is repugnant to the constitution. I am quite persuaded that the provision will be wholly inoperative, yet we cannot shield ourselves from the reproach of unconstitutional legislation, by alleging the invalidity of our own acts.

I shall stop but a moment to discuss that proposition in the 4th section, which provides "that the subject of the public lands, and the interests which may be given to the said State therein, shall be regulated by future action between Congress, on the part of the United States, and the said State, or the authorities thereof." If this provision is not enigmatical, but conveys the meaning which its language fairly imports, it introduces a new and mischievous principle into our land system. What is really intended by the expression, "the subject of the public lands shall be regulated," &c. is very difficult to comprehend; and, after considerable inquiry, I have found no one who pretends to understand it. It is said that the authors of the measure intend, what, indeed, their language obviously imports, to admit the State of Michigan to participate with Congress in the business of legislating relative to the public domain. If this is the kind of "future action" in contemplation, it amounts to a surrender of the rights of the Union to the people of Michigan; for if she is to be admitted into the confederacy without those guarantees that have been exacted from all of the other new States, for the safety of the public lands, you will never obtain the security afterwards. All just conceptions of the right to contract imply equality between the contracting parties. Michigan will demand an equivalent, a quid pro quo, for the concession of the right, improvidently granted to her by this bill, to interpose her authority in your legislation on the subject of the public lands. She will make you pay dearly for it, unless she is governed by more generous maxims than usually influence the conduct of communities. All attempts to amend the bill have been promptly resisted and put down by the majority, not so much because amendments are not necessary, as from a determination to pass it in the precise form it came from the Senate, so as to avoid the hazard, feigned or real, of returning it to that body. I am, therefore, compelled to vote against the bill.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JANUARY 23.

Remarks of Mr. McCARTY, of Indiana, on his resolution relating to the public lands.

Mr McCARTY, in substance, said, from what has fallen from gentlemen on my left, it may be expected that I should say something in defence of the proposition I am charged with presenting for the consideration of this House, and which has produced this unexpected discussion. Gentlemen greatly misapprehend the purport of the proposition, as well as the extent of the information it professes to obtain, or they would not manifest so much alarm on account of the great expense of printing the communications this call will produce. One gentleman [Mr. PLUMMER] tells the House it will cost 19,000 dollars; another gentleman [Mr. BYNUM] says from 15 to 20,000 dollars. Now, with due deference to the opinion of these gentlemen, I must be permitted to differ with them on this subject. I am convinced that the expense of printing is much exaggerated; but suppose it should cost as much as they imagine, will that be a sufficient reason for rejecting the resolution? If the rumors which are abroad be true, that frauds have been perpetrated by public functionaries in the pay of the Government, will this House, on the ground of the expenditure of a few dollars, refuse to bring these frauds to light, and to expose the names of their perpetrators? If gentlemen suppose this, I think they mistake the temper and composition of this House. But, sir, said Mr. McC., those who oppose this resolution have travelled out of the record. There is no proposition for printing before the House; that question will be a subject for consideration when the information called for shall have been received. Sir, allusions have been made to the motives which produced this resolution. One of the gentlemen from Alabama [Mr. McKINLEY] supposes this call is merely to gratify my curiosity. I confess, Mr. Speaker, said Mr. McC., that I am somewhat anxious to see the information and correspondence which I think this call will bring to light; and my curiosity has been heightened by the discussion of this question. I am reminded by another gentleman from Alabama [Mr. MARDIS] that I might obtain, in another way, the information called for in the resolution, if my motive be to ferret out fraud. Gentlemen have been kind enough to point out the course I ought to pursue, in order to obtain the desired information; but, Mr. Speaker, as men seldom act without a motive, and although I deny the right of gentlemen to question mine, yet I will state to this House the only motive which influenced me. It arises, sir, said Mr. McC., in discharge of a solemn duty I owe to the country, as one of the representatives of the American people, with a view to bring before the public information which I consider important to their interests. Sir, said Mr. McC., should the information I seek point to highly reprehensible conduct in officers of the Government, if not the perpetration of gross fraud, the fault is not mine. I introduced the resolution not without due consideration of its importance. In doing so I have pursued the course which my duty and judgment pointed out; and I will not permit gentlemen to dictate the mode by which I am to discharge my duty.

Mr. McCARTY proceeded. I am glad the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. MARDIS] has relieved me from the inference his remarks had forced upon me.

The member from Indiana [Mr. LANE] objects to the resolution because it does not locate the place in which and name the persons by whom frauds had been committed; and, further, that the resolution can accomplish no object; that if frauds have been committed, the perpetrator would not be weak enough to place the evidence on the files of the Department. The first objection needs no reply; but the second, I will say that I had supposed the gentleman's [Mr. LANE's] experience as a lawyer, in reference to frauds, would have satisfied him of the error, and that the most cunning are sometimes caught. Suppose, Mr. Speaker, it should turn out, upon examination of these papers, that officers of the Government to whom the President had confided the trust of communicating the truth on the subject of Indian transfers to him, have refused to certify sales to citizens fairly and justly made for a valuable consideration, because they were not the friends and subservient creatures of such officers, and that these officers afterwards certify, for favorites, sales made for the same or a less consideration! And suppose it should turn out that transfers have been made and certified to by an agent for a sum very far below the value of the lands transferred, and the agent should have a conveyance from the grantee to himself at the same time, would not an exhibition of such facts, with the dates, lead the administration and the public to the detection of abuses which it is their interest and their duty to correct?

One word more, Mr. Speaker, and I have done with this subject for the present. The introduction of this resolution has been attempted to be construed into an implication of or hostility to the Executive and the head of the War Department. Sir, said Mr. McC., such inferences are unjustified. No such motive operated on my mind, or ever entered my bosom. No man, Mr. Speaker, upon this floor entertains a higher opinion of the integrity and purity of purpose of the Chief Magistrate and the gentleman now at the head of the War Department than I do, and I trust my conduct towards these gentlemen for the last ten years will be sufficient to shield me from any such unmerited imputation. No, sir, my object is to undeceive these men and the nation, by exposing the deception of black and hollow-hearted pretended friends, who have wound themselves into the confidence of those at the head of the Government by the most consummate duplicity—those men who are influenced by no principle but self-interest. Do gentlemen think the heads of the Departments named in the resolution desire any concealment in reference to the matters embraced in this resolution? If they do, permit me to say they do these gentlemen great injustice. No, sir, if the distinguished individual who now fills the executive chair could be satisfied that fraud or deception had been practised by those engaged in the public service, there is no man in this nation but believes he would instantly remove him; and I am astonished, said Mr. McC., to see opposition to this resolution come from the quarter it does. Do gentlemen wish to shield offenders? do they wish to veil and cover the corrupt acts of public functionaries. If they do not, then give us the information—let the light shine, that the country may see what has been doing. I have, sir, said Mr. McC., devoted half my life to the public service, and I have never desired any concealment, nor do I think I have a constituent in the district which sent me here who does. If, however, there should be any, my aid cannot be obtained to that end; the official acts of public men should never be kept from the scrutiny of the people. I have no objection to the reference of the subject to the Committee on Indian Affairs, proposed by the motion of my friend from Kentucky, [Mr. LOVE.]

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, APRIL 12.

Remarks of Mr. BELL, upon the late mission to Ohio and Michigan, instituted upon the sole authority of the President.

Mr. BELL said he did not wish, in noticing at this time the remarks of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MASON] upon the subject of the recent appointment of two commissioners or public ministers to Ohio and Michigan, to which he had invited his attention on yesterday, to delay unnecessarily the bill under consideration. I have as much regard, said Mr. B., as any one, I hope, for the real interest of the country. I must take this occasion to say, I will not be deterred from doing what I believe to be my duty, by the taunts and jeers of members of this House, which we have constantly thrown out upon this floor against the course of those who have thought proper to take advantage of the appropriation bills to speak freely of the general course and condition of our public affairs. Gentlemen appear to have a great repugnance to what they call political speeches, when the business of appropriating money is delayed by them.

We have every day, of late, an ardent expression of hope that no more such speeches will be made. I do not doubt the sincerity of these gentlemen; but, sir, until some better opportunity shall be presented, I shall continue, as long as these bills are under consideration, to call the attention of the House, and of the country, to every case of irregularity or abuse—to every question connected with the policy, the principles, and practices, of the party in power, which I think calls for investigation. It is my privilege, it is my duty, to do so; and no means, however unpleasant, which may be resorted to to stop the further discussion of such subjects in this House, shall prevent me from pursuing the course I have set out upon, in this respect. Gentlemen seem, from the tenor of their remarks and conduct, to suppose there is some violation of rules of order or propriety in this course. I can only say to those who entertain those opinions, that they are either ignorant of my privileges as well as their own, or they are ignorant of our duties here. It is the true parliamentary practice. It is a privilege secured by the usage of this body, and never denied until now. It is the usage of the House of Commons of Great Britain—a Government less free than ours—to discuss every question connected with the principles and conduct of those who have the direction of public affairs, whenever bills appropriating the public money for the support of Government are under consideration.

But, sir, I have a better reason for exercising this privilege upon the present, and any other appropriation bill. It is that, by the practice of this House, or rather by the policy of the majority of the House, no other opportunity for the discussion of the principles and practices of the Government is permitted to those who do not approve them? How is it, I ask the gentleman from Virginia to explain how it is, that no discussion is allowed in the House; of this nature, but upon the appropriation bills? For the first time, sir, in the history of this Government, no member of this House has had the privilege of presenting a resolution upon any subject whatever, without the consent of two thirds of the House first had and obtained; unless he would agree to waive all debate and discussion! We have now been in session four months; and although I have had resolutions lying in my desk since the first week of the session, which I proposed to offer, with a view of getting an expression of the sense of this House upon various questions suggested by the practices of the Government, and which I consider destructive of every sound principle; yet, sir, I have not had the privilege of presenting any one of these, except upon the humiliating terms I have already mentioned. When were such shackles before imposed upon the liberties and privileges of the members of this House? It is indeed a new era. It should be remembered, that these privileges are not personal; they are not for our use and advantage; they are the privileges of the public—of the people. It is essential to the public interest and the public liberty that they should be enjoyed by the members. I ask again, how it has happened that the usual rights and privileges have not been allowed at the present session? Why have not the States been called over, according to the standing rule of the House, for the purpose of offering and discussing resolutions? Until the majority of this House shall restore the ancient practice—until they shall concede the former privileges of members in the minority, they must expect that the appropriation bills will be made the occasion of much general discussion. If we cannot compel the majority to vote upon questions which decide any important principle, we shall, at least, have the poor privilege allowed us of declaring our individual sentiments, and of appealing to the people to watch the course of public affairs, and to take care of their rights.

DEC. 17, 1836.]

Documents for Bureaus and Departments.

Upon the question which I suggested on yesterday, and upon which the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MASON] has just addressed the committee, I do not intend to enter into any elaborate argument. I thought the subject fairly presented by the motion to reduce the contingent fund of the State Department; for it is out of this fund that the late ministers to Ohio and Michigan were paid. It is the fund out of which most of the unlawful and improper allowances known in the practice of the Government are paid. I stated on yesterday that I knew of no authority, either of law or under the constitution, to justify the appointment of the commissioners sent by the Executive to negotiate with the Governors or other authorities of Ohio and Michigan last summer, and I requested that some gentleman who was better informed than I was would give the committee some information upon that point. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MASON] has very frankly given us his views upon the subject, and also referred us to the report made to us by the President at the first of the session upon this subject. If the gentleman from Virginia had rested the defence of these appointments upon the necessity of the case, or the extraordinary emergency presented by the belligerent dispositions of the parties to be conciliated, I would not have felt disposed to press this subject any farther at present; but the gentleman has gone much farther. He maintains the authority of the President to make such appointments, and defends it upon various grounds besides that of the extraordinary nature of the case, and the great public interest involved in preventing bloodshed between the inhabitants of two neighboring States or Territories of this Union.

It is said that there are numerous precedents of similar appointments under other administrations. I deny that there is a single precedent can be pointed out to justify the institution of the late mission to Ohio and Michigan. It is not like the case of the secret agent appointed by Mr. Jefferson to watch the movements of Burr—nor is it similar to any one of the cases alluded to by the gentleman from Virginia. The mission to Ohio and Michigan was a public one. It was announced in the official journals. All the effect of a public embassy was given to it. But, sir, I deny the authority of this appointment upon the grounds of necessity, in any view which can be taken of the subject. The Government is provided with regular organs of communication with the Governors of States and Territories. The President has a right to control the action of the officers of the Territories. If they prove faithless to their trust, he has the power to remove them, and send competent and faithful officers in their place. There were the attorney and marshal of the Territory, besides the Governor, who were under the control of this Government, and who were the proper persons to be communicated with. However alarming and perilous to the peace of the country the state of things was recently upon the borders of Ohio and Michigan, it could scarcely exceed—nay, sir, it did not by any means present—the imposing and perilous aspect which the quarrel between this Government and the State of South Carolina wore a few years ago. In that case, the conflict was between the Federal Government and one of the States of the Union. The results threatened by the collision with South Carolina were of far greater interest, and the Union itself was shaken by the conflict. So far had that quarrel proceeded, that Congress actually authorized the President to employ the army and navy in enforcing obedience to the laws in South Carolina. Well, sir, did we hear any thing about a mission? Were ministers appointed to proceed to South Carolina in that case? The commissioners appointed to negotiate with Michigan and Ohio were not private agents—they were in every sense the ministers and representatives of this Government, except that they had not the authority either of the law or constitution for the appointment. They had their regular instructions—they received a salary or allowance out of the Treasury.

The gentleman from Virginia defended this appointment upon the ground that it is the duty of the President, under the constitution, to see that the laws be faithfully executed. This is the most extraordinary doctrine of all. It is in fact giving up every thing.

If this be the true doctrine, there can be no limitation upon the powers of the President. If because it is his duty to see that the laws be faithfully executed he may appoint as many officers or agents as he pleases or thinks necessary, and that too without the advice or consent of the Senate, where is the limitation upon the powers of the Executive? Sir, could you, [Mr. PATTON,] as a Virginian, sit in your seat upon this floor, in silence, and hear such monstrous doctrines maintained, without rising in your place and repudiating them as totally inconsistent with every sound principle of construction applicable to the constitution? I deny that the President, in virtue of this clause of the constitution, can appoint any one officer or agent whatever, either with or without the consent of the Senate.

But I go still farther. I deny that the President has any right whatever, under the clause of the constitution which makes it his duty to see that the laws be faithfully executed, to employ any other means, any other instruments or agents, than such as are prescribed by law in the execution of this part of his duty. He has no discretion or election in the use of means, other than the law allows. It would be a most alarming and dangerous doctrine to say that the President can appoint what officer, and as many of them as he pleases, to aid him in executing the laws. Such a doctrine would remove every restriction upon executive power contained in the constitution. The President, under pretext of executing the laws, could fill the country with officers of his appointment, who would have no other guide for their conduct but his instructions.

The case of a late mission to Alabama has been referred to as a precedent for the more recent exercise of a similar power. That is one of the cases which I mentioned on yesterday, and which I said required explanation, as well as the mission to Michigan. The attorney of the United States for this District appears to have received upwards of three thousand dollars, in the fall of 1834, for his services in proceeding to Alabama as the representative of the Federal Government, in order to conciliate that sovereignty, and to prevent a collision which was likely to grow out of a conflict of jurisdiction between the State and Federal courts. The question, I believe, grew out of some crime alleged to have been committed within the boundary of the Creek nation of Indians. Now, sir, I do not complain of the amount of money paid in this case, nor in any other. The money expended in both these cases is of but little consequence. It is the precedent of which I complain. Where is this thing to end? What limitation is there upon such pretensions in the executive branch of the Government. I know of none, sir, if these appointments be well founded. But, sir, they are not. I repeat that they were made without authority, and it becomes our duty to say so.

I desire to say that I impute no bad or unworthy purpose to the Government in making these appointments, nor do I find fault with the motives or conduct of the gentlemen appointed. They have done some service, for any thing I know; but I care not what they did. I say they were appointed without sufficient authority.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, DECEMBER 17.

A resolution offered by Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky,

H. OF R.]

Documents for Bureaus and Departments.

[Dec. 17, 1836.]

for supplying the heads of Departments and bureaus, and other officers of the Government, with copies of the public documents, printed by order of Congress, coming up for consideration—

Mr. WISE said that he was utterly opposed to this resolution, on the score of economy; but, in another and much more important point of view, such a resolution was actually abhorrent to the principles of our Government, and to the independence of the legislation of this House. Sir, instead of being what we are by the constitution, an independent branch of the national Legislature, this resolution would resolve us into a mere committee, to report proceedings of the legislative department to the Executive! Gentlemen may not intend such an effect, but this resolution does, in semblance and in substance, recognise a responsibility on the part of this House to the Executive for its legislative acts and proceedings. What, sir! has it come to this, that we shall daily carry to the foot of the throne a report of our proceedings, in order to show—not to the President, but to his very underlings—"thus far have we gone," in order that they may say, "thus far shalt thou go, and no farther!" The executive department, sir, intermeddles already too much with the performance of our legislative duties and functions, and I do solemnly protest against resolving upon this written invitation to superintend and interfere with our action here, more than it has already done. I wish to preserve our own independence, and the checks and balances of our Government.

[Here Mr. ANTHONY, of Pennsylvania, made some remarks, which he concluded by saying that "the executive departments had a right to know what we were doing in this House."]

Mr. WISE again rose, and said that he was astonished to hear such a right admitted or claimed for the Executive on that floor. He would only call the attention of the House and the country to this claim for the Executive as a right!

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, in reply to the gentleman from Virginia, challenged him to put his finger upon any one act of executive usurpation; remarking, at the same time, that it was easy to deal in general denunciations and declarations, but more difficult to support them by facts. He (Mr. J.) looked to the voice of the people as his guide, and he doubted not that the President did. The President had been supported, in all his acts, by a large majority of the people, and could, therefore, with more reason, complain of the course of the gentleman, than the gentlemen could of his.

Mr. WISE said, in rejoinder, that the gentleman from Kentucky [Colonel JOHNSON] had called upon him to do that which it was the easiest thing imaginable to do. He would give him and the country the information asked for with the greatest pleasure, was happy to have the opportunity to give the gentleman a satisfactory and direct reply, and was ready and willing to put his finger upon some acts of executive interference with the legislation of that House. When I speak, however, of executive interference, I do not mean the acts of the President alone, and let me be so understood, but the acts of the whole of the Departments. Is it possible, sir, that the gentleman means it to be understood by his making this call, and by his manner of making it, that he himself does not suppose specifications of active intermeddling with our business of legislation can be made? Why, sir, the gentleman trips! Not specify acts of executive interference! Surely the gentleman knows that the constitution makes it the duty of the President to communicate to Congress, by his message, his (the Executive's) views of all our relations, and on all subjects of legislation. He is constitutionally bound to give us officially his opinions on what we should do and should not do as legislators.

But let not the gentleman understand me as pointing to this constitutional duty as one of my specifications of executive interference. To send us his message is no act of intermeddling; it is an act of duty and obligation. Sir, I do not intend to evade the gentleman's call. I never will evade any responsibility, on any occasion. I allude to this constitutional duty, to contrast it expressly with other acts which the President's or the Executive's duty forbids. I allude to it for the purpose of reminding the gentleman that the constitution fixes the measure and mode of executive interposition in acts of legislation. The constitution intends that the President shall, by a public message, call our attention to all subjects of legislative action, and that then the executive functions shall cease until we have performed our acts, and referred them to him for his constitutional sanction or veto. And the constitution intends, most cautiously and jealously intends, that whilst performing our acts, whilst deliberating, whilst discussing, whilst deciding upon laws to be passed or rejected, we shall be free and independent of executive influence. And now, sir, what I have said, meant to say, and mean to repeat, is, that we are not thus free and independent, that the Executive does intermeddle, improperly, dangerously, and frequently, with our legislative action! The gentleman asks for me to point to the instances, and I will specify some of them.

Was it not admitted the other day on this floor, by a member of "the party," and the chairman of a committee, [Mr. SUTHERLAND,] that our committees do not make their own reports? Who does make them?—not write them, sir—make them? Who but those who are consulted, and who advise on all our leading measures, and upon the "queue" of the "lead" of all our measures? The underlings and all tell us what is to be done, and what not! Upon the appropriation bills, particularly, who has the chief control, the executive or the legislative department? Sir, I refer to all the members of the House as witnesses. I ask of all the chairmen of committees, of every member of each committee, if the executive department do not interfere with our legislation? Not always, perhaps, with the knowledge and consent or by the order of the President, but habitually without orders, and always in pursuance of their own interests.

But this is dealing too much in generalities for my own interest, and is trifling, comparatively, with a subject of most serious moment. I will specify a more signal and a warning instance of executive interference with the legislative action of this House by the President himself, the facts in relation to which I can verify and make good before the House and the nation.

Sir, the power of the President over a single appointment alone commanded, on this floor, thirty-five votes, at least, in favor of one of the most important executive acts which ever agitated this country or affected its interests. On no other question than the great deposite question of last session, I verily believe and have reason to know—I would, if required, make oath in support of the opinion—that the majority of the House was decidedly against the act of the President, in reason, conviction, and conscience. But, sir, the true sense of the Commons was stifled. The Speaker of the House was kept in that chair, (pointing to the Speaker's chair,) with an executive promise in his pocket, until the work of the master was finished. There sat the Speaker, like a cancer on the body politic, which ramified its roots to more than two or three, or two or three dozen seats on this floor! There were no less than four chairmen of the principal standing committees, with their eyes of aspiration fixed upon that high place, each longing to be successor to the incumbent; and besides these there was another candidate, also on an important committee. To say nothing of the subordinates on these committees, who, no doubt, were some of them willing to have their chairman, respectively, elected Speaker, to create a fair vacancy for themselves, it is surely moderate in calculation to say that each of those five candidates had at least a half dozen of zealous friends—they were poor indeed if they had not. Each candidate looked to what is here called “administration votes”—a term which imports executive interference, by the by—to elect him; and according to my arithmetic, sir, the five candidates, with their six friends each, made thirty-five votes, that, according to the worth of the prize of Speaker’s chair, were morally certain to be “administration votes.” Less than one third of that number of votes would, if changed from one side to the other, have changed the vote of the House on that vital question; and I presume that no one here, who sees and knows what we all see and know, can doubt that these thirty-five votes, taken as the least possible number to be affected, were not influenced by, but left free and independent of, executive influence! By the aid of these two officers, the minister to England and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, the one executive, the other legislative—one of whom the President appoints, and the other he does not actually appoint—the President, I suppose, was not enabled to command a majority on this floor! What may not our President do in legislation, when he has our Speaker for his tool? So much for specifications, by which, let it be understood, I do not intend to be involved in any personalities.

The gentleman says that he “looks to the voice of the people!” Ay, sir, and so do I, and so do we all. The time is now short—in due time, sir—yet a little while longer, and that voice shall come up to us and to high places in tones of thunder!

The gentleman says that I have denounced the President. Denounced the President! I deny it, sir. Twice have I supported the President for his office, with a zeal, if not ability, which might exert itself equally ardent again, under the same circumstances. But, sir, nor for the President, nor for myself, will I conceal facts and truths from the people, when they are so pointedly called for both by the gentleman and the good of the country. Has it come to this, that political truth dare not be told, lest the President be denounced? Yes, sir, there is a party which makes the President “a scape-goat” for its sins, and which always takes shelter under his great name. There are those who, if their acts be denounced, always raise the cry of “denunciation against the President,” who has as much reason as any man I know of to pray God to save him from some of his friends! Why should I denounce the President in the discussion of this question? He does not, I hope, call for this resolution. For the country’s sake, I hope he does not desire this debasing obsequiousness from this House. No patriot can ask that one department of our Government shall humble itself to another. Sir, I hope that the gentleman himself, if he apprehended what I do from this resolution, would withdraw it and spurn it. I have that respect for him to believe—he knows that I am personally his friend—that if he foresaw the effects which I think I foresee from this measure, so humiliating to this House, he would abandon it at once. But, sir, I must say, not, however, in allusion to this instance, that there are too many voluntary and gratuitous offerings of fealty and flattery made to the President, which must nauseate him who is attempted to be flattered by them, which gall the spirits of freemen attached to him, and which impair the spirit of free institutions to which those freemen are still more attached. Sir, the underlings always transcend, infinitely transcend, the utmost ambition of Kings themselves in doing honor and homage; and too often are our Presidents compelled to be answerable, and made to be odious, for the officiousness of adulation and praise! I never will halt, however, in the path of my duty, because the President or his parasites stand in my way.

The gentleman has said that he did not expect such a debate as this to arise upon such a proposition. I should have been surprised, indeed, if no voice here had been raised against such a proposition. This is no small matter, either in point of the money or of the principle which is proposed to be squandered and prostrated; and I beg the gentleman to reflect that the line of march towards the concentration and consolidation of power is always begun by short steps at first, which are gradually and imperceptibly stretched into vast and fast strides, hastening onwards to the certain and fearful end of despotism!

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, then said that the gentleman had, no doubt, spoken what he believed to be true, in which he was perfectly justifiable. But what he had stated was a matter of personal opinion, in which he (Mr. J.) did not coincide. For his own part, though he had been in this and the other House for twenty-nine successive years—ever since the first session after the attack on the Chesapeake—he could conscientiously say that he had never acted under any improper influence, and had never known any other member so to act. On the occasion alluded to by the gentleman from Virginia, he had not the least doubt that every member, on one side as well as on the other, voted conscientiously, and free from executive or other improper influence. This was his opinion.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JANUARY 11.

Remarks of Mr. HANNEGAN, of Indiana, on his motion to reject a memorial purporting to come from the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Michigan.

Mr. HANNEGAN, in reply to Mr. THOMSON, of Ohio, who proposed to him to withdraw his motion to reject the memorial from “the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Michigan,” said that he felt obliged to that gentleman for the suggestion, as he entertained no doubt it was made in kindness, and so he received it; but, under existing circumstances, he must decline being governed by it. Whatever might be the opinions of the gentleman from Ohio on this question, he himself could not avoid seeing that important results to the States of Indiana and Illinois were involved. They might not be equally important to the State of Ohio; that, however, was a question to be settled by the delegation from Ohio. For himself and his colleagues, and the delegation from the State of Illinois, they were unanimous in the belief that the acceptance of the memorial by the House would be an indirect if not a direct admission of the State of Michigan into the Union, and an acknowledgment of her territorial limits as claimed by her constitution. That constitution has set up a claim to a large portion of the State of Indiana, some twelve or fifteen hundred square miles, embracing one of the fairest portions of the State, or indeed of the Union. Their right to the jurisdiction is asserted positively and arbitrarily. In so doing, they have nullified the various laws of Congress admitting Indiana into the Union, confirming her sovereignty, and defining her boundaries; all which Congress had done with a full knowledge of the facts and circumstances upon which Michigan now relied for the support of the claim she had so strongly asserted and so unwarrantably attempted to enforce. Michigan, however, had not been content with nullifying the laws of Congress alone; she had also by these acts in convention violated the federal constitution, as would be palpable to every gentleman who would examine the 3d section of the 4th article, which says, in substance, that new States may be formed, but that no new State shall be formed out of any existing States or parts thereof, without the consent of the Legislatures of such States and of Congress having been previously obtained.

Naval Service Bill.

Sir, said Mr. H., how is it possible for the House to receive a memorial, couched in language which gives it character as in this instance, without conceding the right of the memorialists to the corporate and sovereign capacity they assume? If you accept one act of the State of Michigan, acknowledge her existence as such at one point, how can you refuse to receive her in any attitude she may subsequently assume? If, without qualification, this memorial should be received and referred, as desired by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BEARDSLEY,] with what consistency could the House to-morrow deny a seat on the floor, with full privileges, to the Representative elected by the same power that gave existence to the body which assumes to address Congress in the capacity of an independent sovereignty? Certainly this House would wish to preserve itself before the world, would desire to avoid any act, seemingly inconsistent.

But there was another point of view in which it seemed to him that the House should regard the matter before acting. He alluded to the high-handed and revolutionary measures which had marked the whole course of Michigan in asserting her right to enter the Union on equal terms with its members. Instead of pursuing the example of her sisters, similarly situated on former occasions, she had rushed violently forward, and her conduct proved a determination to seize by force upon the privileges and immunities which they had desired in peace, and received under the guarantee of law. Her whole course, from the commencement, had been marked by acts of lawlessness and arrogance, disrespectful alike to the States and the Federal Government, and he hoped the House would not lend its sanction to such measures—measures more decidedly revolutionary in tone and character than had hitherto marked the history of the Union.

It had been suggested to him by gentlemen, that the rejection of this memorial would be a violation of the great constitutional right of petition. This was not the case, as would appear after a moment's examination of the ground upon which he relied. That privilege was intended for individuals, citizens of the country, or for the established authorities, recognised by the laws. In this instance, a memorial was before us, from a pretended sovereignty, whose existence had never been acknowledged, but, on the contrary, was utterly unknown. Congress had no right to receive petitions or communications from a foreign Power; they should come to us, if made at all, through the Executive. Would any gentleman pretend that this House should receive a memorial from the Government of Great Britain, or the Provincial Parliament of Canada? Certainly not. And yet to our constitutions and laws, up to this time, they are no more alien than the State of Michigan. He wished gentlemen, therefore, distinctly to understand that no one could be farther from wishing to impair, in the slightest degree, the sacred right of petition; a right holy to every friend to liberty, and only dreaded by the minions of despotism.

The pretensions now set up by Michigan would, if they were sustained by Congress, go to deprive Indiana of the very benefits reserved to her from the date of the ordinance itself. The whole object of extending her limits on the north to the southerly bend of Lake Michigan was to afford her an outlet and a harbor, within her own jurisdiction. The intention of Michigan now appeared clearly to deprive her of these benefits. What else would it amount to, if the line should be run pursuant to the claim of Michigan? Restrict her to the southern point of Lake Michigan, where, from the very nature of things, it is impossible to construct a harbor, and you make her northern territory at once tributary to Michigan. It is this state of things that Indiana would avoid, and it is this to which she will never willingly consent.

If the States of Indiana and Illinois admit no more by sitting quietly in this stage of the proceeding, we, as their representatives, feel aware that at the least it may be leaving ground upon which hereafter a point may be made before the judicial tribunals of the country. We can neither be flattered by false suggestions nor terrified by insidious threats out of a conviction so palpable to every eye. Sir, this alone is sufficient to warn us that a precipice is before us.

These States have not, they cannot, they never will, admit the jurisdiction of any tribunal over this question other than that of arbitrary force. They acknowledge no right of interference, here or elsewhere; and such interference, whenever attempted in contravention of rights solemnly and deliberately guaranteed, will be met, upon the part of the people of the State of Indiana, just as the same attempt against their rights would be met by the people of Virginia, Carolina, or Massachusetts. They will be met as the oppressed, when roused by manifold wrongs, meets the invader and the oppressor.

There is no man living who cherishes a more deep and abiding devotion to the harmony and integrity of the Union than I do. But there is a point to which, if a State once permits herself to be driven, she sinks forever a miserable and degraded object in the moral and political world. To that point the ultimate success of Michigan in relation to this boundary would drive us.

He hoped that the House would never directly or indirectly open a door to controversy involving the most serious results, and that about a matter which the repeated action of various branches of the Government had long since sanctioned as an absolute right in the States already formed.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, APRIL 7.

NAVAL SERVICE BILL.

In the debate on the naval service bill, after Mr. LANE had taken his seat,

Mr. BELL, of Tennessee, said he did not rise to notice the contemptible insinuations of the member from Indiana. He rose for the purpose of enforcing the views he had heretofore given upon this subject. My object, said Mr. B., was, from the first, to press upon this House the propriety of suspending the improvements projected at Portsmouth until we had time to examine into and settle, upon satisfactory grounds, whether the public interest does not demand that the number of navy yards shall be reduced—whether a due regard to economy does not require this—but what is of more benefit, the good of the Union. We have laid before us the views of the best and ablest judges in the country. They are not only of the highest authority in point of talents and experience in this branch of the public service, but they are the first in reputation for fidelity. They are not the opinions of politicians or party men, who seek to create and strengthen political influence—their fidelity is not to their party, but to their country. Until we have better or higher authority than theirs, I am for adopting their conclusions. The proposition now presented enables you to save to the country, upon navy yards and fortifications, twenty or twenty-five millions of dollars. Because we have an overflowing Treasury, is this sum too small to command our attention? I wish to be distinctly understood as not being opposed to liberal appropriations for the improvement of the navy. I would support a proposition for a considerable increase of our navy. I would also vote for the largest sum that could probably be judiciously expended during the year upon our navy yards, provided you will make a selection of a few sites which shall be agreed to be your great naval stations and yards of construction. Upon this question I feel no hostility to any particular section of the Union. I would this moment, if the proposition were made, vote as large a sum as could be expended profitably within the year upon a navy yard at Newport, Rhode Island, so strongly am I impressed with the belief that the public interest demands that there should be one established there. If the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. PEARCE] ever expects to have justice done to the advantages presented at this point, let me advise him that this is the favorable moment—this is the accepted time. We are about to increase largely the amount heretofore expended upon these objects; if he suffer this occasion to pass unimproved, such another is not likely to return in our time.

Florida War.

My object, I repeat, Mr. Speaker, in this motion, is not founded in any hostility to the navy. It is no economy I am in pursuit of that would be achieved at the expense of the naval service. A portion of the millions that are proposed to be lavished and distributed among seven or eight navy yards, I would concentrate upon some three or four, and while, by this course, we would be saving millions, we would also add greatly to the efficiency of the service. It is only in this way that we can ever expect to have any one of our navy yards upon a plan and a scale commensurate with the public interest in our navy—it is only by this course that our navy yards can ever become great manufactories of ships of war. Then, sir, the true object of the motion, besides the saving of millions of the public money, is to add to and strengthen this most important and popular arm of the national defence. It is upon the ocean that we are hereafter to meet our enemies; and whatever policy promises to increase our power upon that element in a proper degree, with the least waste of the public resources, is the one which it is our duty to adopt.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, MAY, 1836.

Remarks of Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, on the bill to pay money advanced by Charleston and other Southern cities to prosecute the Florida war.

It is not (said Mr. J.) to give utterance to indignant feelings at the opposition to this measure that I now address the House. It is not a party measure which is before us, but a measure which calls for concert of action with all parties. It is a subject of too great importance to admit of procrastination by indulging in party invectives. Our responsibilities are not to each other, but to our constituents and to our country. Each member of this House holds the same relation to his immediate constituents, and I am willing to refer the conduct of each to that tribunal. The whole nation is interested in the course pursued by each member; and to the test of public opinion throughout the whole country each individual must submit; whether the award be censure or applause, there can be no evasion, no appeal. It is our part to act, and the part of the country to judge of our actions.

When this murderous savage war broke out in Florida, which has spread ruin and desolation to many families, and half depopulated some fair portions of that flourishing Territory, the hostile trumpet was heard from Charleston to New Orleans, and the patriotic citizens of South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, and Louisiana, not willing to wait the dull delays of this House for authority, while their fellow-citizens were bleeding under the scalping-knife of the savage, flew to arms, and hastened to their protection. The service was national. It was no more incumbent upon these States to protect Florida than upon other States; but without waiting to inquire whether justice would be done by the nation, they met the impending danger. They justly regarded the citizens of that Territory as a branch of the American family; and that was enough to kindle in the bosoms of the chivalrous Southrons the fire of American patriotism. The palmetto was lost in the eagle, and his talons were stretched to grasp the hand which was lifted against their countrymen. The bill now before us makes provision to defray the expense. The emergency of the occasion did not admit of hesitancy, and moneys were advanced in the city of Charleston, and other towns in that and the other States, to meet the exigency. The great question now is, shall we authorize the payment? The honor and future safety of the country require that there shall be no hesitancy nor delay. Even while we are wasting the time by cold deliberation upon the subject, the threatening danger upon the Georgia and Alabama frontier may be bursting into a flame, and demanding similar advances upon the credit of our sense of national justice. An awful responsibility awaits him who can make this the unfortunate occasion for party crimination, for censures against the administration, and against the Committees of Ways and Means and on Military Affairs. To produce delay by complaints of irregularity, because the measure has been proposed by a committee, without an order from the House, or a reference from the House of an executive communication, or by motions and debates in favor of committal, is in effect to oppose the bill, or at least to deprive it, without any countervailing benefit, of much of its utility.

It is not the method of proceeding on ordinary occasions, to start objections upon these grounds; and how can it be reconciled to a proper sense of the duty which we owe the country in a case like this, connected as it is with the Florida and the Creek war?

I have been (said Mr. J.) a member of Congress for many years, and for more than twenty-five years have I been honored as chairman of some important committee; and during the whole of that period, the present mode of proceeding has been in practice. Whatever subject comes within the general scope of duties for which a standing committee is appointed, as well as subjects referred to them by the House, it has been the uniform custom for the committee to act upon, and report the result of such action to the House. This subject has in like manner been deliberated upon by the committee, and the result of that deliberation is presented in the bill before us. It is simply to refund what has been liberally advanced in the hour of danger by those patriotic States, at a time when the honor and safety of our common country required the advance for the use of the nation, before the national coffers could be unlocked for the purpose. Whether that money was paid regularly, according to specified forms, or not, or whether the requisitions in which it was paid were drawn, verbatim et literalim, according to the usual forms, is to me a matter of no importance. If one of your family is perishing with starvation, and your friend will purchase food for his relief, you will not inquire into the form in which he made the payment; it will be sufficient for you to know that the benefit was received. So, in this case, it is sufficient for me to know that the money was advanced; that it was expended in the public service, and that the country received its value. Deeds of patriotism like this merit a public acknowledgment, rather than a dull, protracted, reluctant compliance with the imperative demand of justice. We should faithfully and promptly refund the last cent advanced in such a case. We should do it, because it is the dictate of justice—because honor requires it—because the character of this House and of the whole nation demands it. We should do it to show to the world that the impulse of patriotism is not despised by a republic; and to inspire in our citizens a confidence that voluntary sacrifices in the extremity of danger shall be cheerfully and promptly remunerated.

The amendment proposed to the bill is merely to explain a former law of a similar character. It proposes to pay for the services of the volunteer militia who were called into service by the commanding general in the first moments of the Seminole war. The sudden rupture of the savages was like an unanticipated flame breaking out in the midst of a city, which requires the immediate exertions of the firemen to subdue. A little delay would involve the whole town in irrecoverable ruin. So the ravages of the Indians, if permitted to pursue the work of devastation till despatches could be sent to the seat of Government, and an order issued from the Executive for calling out the militia, would have completed the work of destruction through the whole of the country where it raged. The commanding general, as in duty bound, called for militia aid to check the ravages of this desolating war, and the patriotic citizens volunteered their services. They were gladly accepted. These are the citizen soldiers who have been braving the dangers and enduring the storm of that sanguinary conflict, whose services have been recognised by the Government, that the amendment proposes to pay. They made the first sacrifice in their country's defence; met the danger at the threshold, and voluntarily poured out their blood upon the altar of their suffering country. We intended to provide for their pay, and thought we had done so by a law already passed; but, in the multiplicity of business, there was an accidental omission in the framing of the law to meet their case. The amendment proposed is only to give such an extent to the application of that law as to embrace the case of these men, and so carry into effect our declared intention. Upon this bill and this amendment, subjects as plainly just and as clear to the understanding as the simplest proposition that could be stated, we are consuming the day, and wasting the precious time of the House, in animadversions that have no direct bearing upon the subject. Is this the proper theme for introducing fastidious complaints and party denunciations against the administration of the Government? Or are there no questions that can arise, even upon the common measure of justice between citizens and their Government, but what must be converted into party strifes? Among other complaints, imputations have been made against those who are conducting the war in Florida, as if our regular officers, whose business and whose duty it is to obey the orders of any Executive, were political partisans. These censures are, at least, premature. The officers of the regular army are in command there; men who, on former occasions, have given incontestable proof of their valor, their devotion to the country, and their capacity to conduct military operations. Though at this distance it would appear that more ought to have been done, yet we are not acquainted with all the difficulties which they may have had to encounter. The character which they have established ought to be regarded as a pledge of their good conduct in the present trial, and should at least shield them from censure till all the facts are known; and if it shall then appear that they have not done the best that could be done, of which we have as yet no evidence, it will not establish any charge against the volunteers who have obeyed the laws of the country by placing themselves under their command. The regular army is otherwise provided for; this bill and its amendment have reference only to the volunteer militia. Look at their character, and we cannot doubt their bravery nor their patriotism. The Southern volunteers have ever sustained the high character of American soldiers. Their deep sense of honor; their disregard of danger; their nobleness of soul in the camp, and their chivalry in the field, are but their common characteristics; and after volunteering their services to meet the first shock of defensive war, we cannot presume that they would prove recreant to every thing dear to themselves. We know that they are incapable of it. They have unfurled their country's banner, and have marched under it to defend it from insult; and the result must show that they will have sustained its honor. It is our part to provide the means; to pay them the pittance to which their services entitled them, and they will not be sparing of their blood in the day of battle. Let us pass this bill, with the proposed amendment, without a moment's delay, and it will be time enough for us to complain after we learn that there is cause for complaint. Till evidence appears to the contrary, let us not indulge a suspicion that an officer, bearing a commission in the American service, whether regular or militia, is deficient either in courage or conduct. Complaints, in advance of evidence, are alike dishonorable to our country and to the feelings of our gallant officers and soldiers. Let us discharge the debt of justice, and withhold our censures till a knowledge of facts shall warrant them.

Much stress appears to be laid upon the fact that, for this amendment, which provides for the payment of the volunteers, no communication has been made to the House by the Secretary of War, recommending the measure, and that the subject has not been especially referred to the committee by the House. It appears to be a very recent thing with some gentlemen to have transferred all confidence to themselves by the Secretary of War, so as to be incapable of acting upon the most simple proposition without his recommendation. I would remind them that the proposed amendment is founded on official information from the War Department; that the men who claim the pay have faithfully served their country as represented; and that no provision is made by which they can receive their pay. Now, sir, where is the independence of the members of this body, if they cannot act upon their own responsibility in matters of plain justice? When all the facts are before us, must we fear to act without the direction of an executive officer to govern us in legislation, and bear the responsibility of our measures? Our constitutional duty is to legislate, and that of an executive officer to execute the law. When all the facts are made known to us, we must act upon our own responsibility; and, right or wrong, we must bear that responsibility, whether recommended or not. In the case now before us, there is no imposition, no deception. It is a plain proposition, founded on plain matters of fact; and the House must adopt or reject it. We must in the case do justice, or withhold the demands of justice; and every member will act upon his own responsibility.

It is wise, on ordinary occasions, to refer propositions to committees, that the information out of which they grow, and their minute details, may be more thoroughly investigated; but the decisions of committees are always subject to the House, and it is the right of any member to propose amendments to measures reported to the House by committees. The practice has ever prevailed; and to be deprived of this right would be to fetter legislation with a clog which it could never bear.

Independence in legislation by the representatives of the sovereign people is of the first importance to the preservation of our liberties. It is in this House that their voice is more immediately heard than in any other branch of our Government. Its value cannot be overestimated, nor its dignity too carefully preserved. The most sacred regard to justice should characterize all its measures. It is a convention of the nation itself; and, upon the purity, the intelligence, and the independence of this House, more than upon any other department of Government, the liberties of this nation, the last hope of man, essentially depend.

Admission of Arkansas.

[H. OF R.]

It is always with reluctance that I trespass upon the time of the House; but, in defence of the Military Committee, from whom the measure emanated, I have been compelled to submit these remarks.

Debate on the bill for admitting the State of Arkansas into the Union.

On Monday, the 6th of June, Mr. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS presented to the House of Representatives the following twenty-two memorials and remonstrances:

1. Memorial of George Atkinson and 94 citizens of Harrison county, Ohio, praying that Congress would take measures to obtain a repeal of the constitution of Arkansas, which allows slavery, before admitting that State into the Union.
2. Petition of Francis B. Bacon and 327 inhabitants of Massachusetts, remonstrating against the article in the constitution of the State of Arkansas, denying to the Legislature the power of emancipating slaves without the consent of their owners.
3. Remonstrance of George Russell, Seth Drew, and 24 inhabitants of Kingston, Plymouth county, Massachusetts, against the admission of Arkansas into the Union as a slave State; and praying Congress not to sanction the article concerning slavery in the constitution of that State.
4. Remonstrance of Samuel Reed and 210 male inhabitants of Abington, Massachusetts, against the article in the constitution of Arkansas denying to the Legislature the power of emancipating slaves without the consent of their owners.
5. Remonstrance of Samuel Mullikin and 90 inhabitants of Dorchester, Massachusetts, against the slavery article in the constitution of Arkansas.
6. Remonstrance of Joseph Sawin and 72 inhabitants, male and female, of Weston and Wayland, Massachusetts, against the article in the constitution of Arkansas respecting slavery.
7. Remonstrance of M. W. Bacon and 58 ladies of Dorchester, Massachusetts, against the article in the constitution of Arkansas respecting slavery.
8. Remonstrance of Levi Vinal and 510 inhabitants of Scituate, Massachusetts, against the slavery article in the constitution of Arkansas.
9. Remonstrance of Joseph Faxon and 72 male inhabitants of Randolph, Massachusetts, remonstrating against the admission of Arkansas into the Union with the article relating to slavery in her constitution.
10. Remonstrance of Lucius W. Clark and 39 inhabitants of Plymouth, Massachusetts, against the admission of Arkansas, as a slave State, into the Union, and against the slavery article in her constitution.
11. Remonstrance of Rebecca Burbank and 100 females of Plymouth, Massachusetts, against the admission of Arkansas into the Union as a slave State.
12. Memorial of William Hamed and 11 citizens of Philadelphia, remonstrating against the admission of Arkansas, with the slavery article in her constitution, into the Union.
13. Memorial of George Russell and 13 citizens of Pennsylvania, remonstrating against the slavery article in the constitution of Arkansas.
14. Remonstrance of Fisher A. Kingsbury and 147 citizens of Weymouth, Massachusetts, against the slavery article in the constitution of Arkansas.
15. Remonstrance of H. C. Field and 255 female inhabitants of Weymouth, Massachusetts, against the article concerning slavery in the constitution of Arkansas.
16. Remonstrance of Nathaniel Philips and 55 inhabitants of Marshfield, Massachusetts, and its vicinity, against the article concerning slavery in the constitution of Arkansas.

17. Remonstrance from William Burrows and 23 inhabitants of Carver, Massachusetts, against the admission of Arkansas into the Union as a slaveholding State.

18. Remonstrance of Thomas Shotwell and about 250 citizens styling themselves inhabitants of the counties of Belmont and Monroe, Ohio, against the admission of Arkansas into the Union with the article concerning slavery in her constitution.

19. Memorial of Aaron Pancoast and 118 inhabitants of Pennsylvania, against the article concerning slavery in the constitution of Arkansas.

20. Memorial from William Smith and 80 citizens of Ohio, against the article concerning slavery in the constitution of Arkansas.

21. Remonstrance of Ethan Davis and 73 inhabitants of Holden, Massachusetts, against the admission of Arkansas into the Union as a slaveholding State.

22. Remonstrance of Artemas Keyes, and 233 inhabitants of West Boylston, Massachusetts, against the article concerning slavery in the constitution of Arkansas.

On the preceding 25th of May, the House, by the administration of the previous question, had adopted the following resolutions, reported by a select committee appointed to consider and report upon a great multitude of petitions for the abolition of slavery and the slave trade in the District of Columbia:

Resolved, That Congress possesses no constitutional authority to interfere, in any way, with the institution of slavery in any of the States of this confederacy.

Resolved, That Congress ought not to interfere, in any way, with slavery in the District of Columbia.

"And whereas it is extremely important and desirable that the agitation of this subject should be finally arrested, for the purpose of restoring tranquillity to the public mind, your committee respectfully recommend the adoption of the following additional resolution, viz:

Resolved, That all petitions, memorials, resolutions, propositions, or papers, relating, in any way, or to any extent whatever, to the subject of slavery, or the abolition of slavery, shall, without being printed or referred, be laid upon the table, and that no further action whatever shall be had thereon."

Upon these resolutions the previous question had smothered all debate. Mr. ADAMS, before voting against the first resolution, had asked only five minutes of time to explain the reasons of his vote, and to prove that the resolution was utterly unfounded, and had been refused. He had also voted against the second resolution; and when his name was called by the Clerk on the third resolution, he had risen in his place and answered, "I hold the resolution to be a direct violation of the constitution of the United States, of the rules of this House, and of the rights of my constituents."

In the journal of the House, made up under the direction of the Speaker, this answer of Mr. ADAMS was not only unnoticed, but his name was entirely omitted, as if he had not been called to answer upon the yeas and nays at all.

This error of the journal, Mr. ADAMS, when it was read the next morning, had moved to have rectified by inserting his name, as it had been called, and his answer. This rectification of the journal was refused by the majority of the House; but the fact that his name was called, and his answer, were necessarily recorded upon the journal then, by the proceedings of the House upon his motion to amend the journal, and by the yeas and nays taken upon it. When, on the 6th of June, Mr. ADAMS presented the above twenty-two memorials and remonstrances, he announced each of them separately, with the name of the first signer, and the number of signatures following it. The Speaker decided that each of them successively should, by virtue of the above-mentioned third resolution, be laid on the table, and of course that there should be no further action of the House upon them.

On Thursday, the 9th of June, the House went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union upon two bills; one to fix the northern boundary of the State of Ohio, and for the conditional admission of the State of Michigan into the Union; and the other for the admission of the State of Arkansas into the Union.

The bill for fixing the northern boundary of the State of Ohio, and the conditional admission of Michigan into the Union, was first taken up for consideration, and gave rise to debates which continued till near one o'clock of the morning of Friday, the 10th of June: repeated motions to adjourn had been made and rejected. The committee had twice found itself without a quorum, and had been thereby compelled to rise, and report the fact to the House. In the first instance, there had been found within private calling distance a sufficient number of members, who, though absent from their duty of attendance upon the House, were upon the alert to appear and answer to their names to make a quorum to vote against adjourning, and then to retire again to their amusement or repose. Upon the first restoration of the quorum by this operation, the delegate from Arkansas said that if the committee would only take up and read the bill, he would not urge any discussion upon it then, and would consent to the committee's rising, and resuming the subject at the next sitting of the House. The bill was accordingly read; a motion was then made for the committee to rise, and rejected; an amendment to the bill was moved, on taking the question upon which there was no quorum. The usual expedient of private call to straggling members was found ineffectual. A call of the House was ordered, at one o'clock in the morning. This operation, to be carried through all its stages, must necessarily consume about three hours of time, during which the House can do no other business. Upon this call, after the names of all the members had been twice called over, and all the absentees for whom any valid or plausible excuse was offered had been excused, there remained eighty-one names of members, who, by the rules of the House, were to be taken into custody as they should appear, or were to be sent for, and taken into custody wherever they might be found, by special messengers, appointed for that purpose. At this hour of the night the city of Washington was ransacked by these special messengers, and the members of the House were summoned from their beds to be brought in custody of these special messengers, before the House, to answer for their absence. After hearing the excuses of two of these members, and the acknowledged no good reason of a third, they were all excused in a mass, without payment of fees; which fees, to the amount of two or three hundred dollars, have of course become a charge upon the people, and to be paid with their money.

By this operation, between four and five o'clock of the morning, a small quorum of the House was obtained, and, without any vote of the House, the Speaker left the chair, which was resumed by the chairman of the Committee of the Whole.

The bill for the admission of Arkansas into the Union was again taken up; the amendment moved before the call of the House was renewed, discussed, and rejected; other amendments were proposed, and shared the same fate.

About 6 o'clock in the morning a motion was made that the committee should rise, and report the bills, when Mr. ADAMS moved an amendment to the eighth section of the bill for the admission of Arkansas; to understand the import and bearing of which it may be necessary to quote the part of the section into which he proposed its insertion. In the following citation, the words proposed by him for insertion are those enclosed in brackets.

"Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That the State of Arkansas is admitted into the Union upon the express condition that the people of the said State shall never interfere with the primary disposal of the public lands within the said State, nor shall they levy a tax on any of the lands of the United States within the said State; and nothing in this act shall be construed as an assent by Congress [to the article in the constitution of the said State in relation to slavery and the emancipation of slaves, or] to all or any of the propositions contained in the ordinance of the said convention of the people of Arkansas, nor to deprive the said State of Arkansas of the same grants, subject to the same restrictions, which were made to the State of Missouri, by virtue of an act entitled an act to authorize the people of the Missouri Territory to form a constitution and State Government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, and to prohibit slavery in certain Territories, approved the 6th day of March, 1820."

When the amendment had been read by the Clerk, and the question stated, Mr. ADAMS addressed the chairman of the committee to the following effect:

Mr. Chairman: On Monday last I had the honor of presenting to this House twenty-two memorials and remonstrances, most of them numerously signed, by citizens of the States of Ohio, of Pennsylvania, and of Massachusetts. Twelve of these memorials were from the congressional district which I represent, from my own constituents, male and female; for, in New England and elsewhere, the vote of the men is the vote of the women; and I consider the wives and daughters of the men who vote at my election, whether for me or for any other person, as much my constituents, for all purposes by which I can, as their representative, serve them in this House, as if every individual had deposited in the ballot-box a vote in my favor.

I was, then, bound in duty to present these memorials and remonstrances to the House; and if that duty was of perfect and irremissible obligation, with regard to those which came from my own immediate constituents, I felt it as not less imperative with regard to those which, proceeding from remoter distances, and from persons entirely unknown to me, carried with them a manifestation of confidence reposed in me by the memorialists, which it was not less my sacred duty to justify by a grateful return.

I felt it, therefore, my further duty to invite the House to listen to these memorials and remonstrances, to examine their complaints, and, so far as might be consistent with the duties of the House to their other constituents and to the nation, to relieve the complainants, and to remove the grievance against which they remonstrated.

In the memorials from my own district I recognised among the signatures the names of persons well known to me as citizens, for intelligence, integrity, and benevolence, surpassed by none others in this Union. I had made inquiries concerning the characters of others of the memorialists, not known to myself, and had received testimonials from sources entitled to unqualified credence, and from persons in nowise favoring the purposes of the memorialists; testimonials to their integrity and respectability which could leave in that respect not the shadow of a doubt upon my mind.

The memorials and remonstrances, differing somewhat from one another in their language and phraseology, all complained of one article in the newly formed constitution of Arkansas; and all the remonstrances were against the admission of Arkansas into the Union as a slave State.

The obnoxious article of the constitution of Arkansas is the first section of the second division of the ninth article, and is in the words following:

JUNE, 1836.]

Admission of Arkansas.

[H. OF R.]

"Emancipation of slaves."

"SEC. 1. The General Assembly shall have no power to pass laws for the emancipation of slaves without the consent of the owners. They shall have no power to prevent emigrants to this State from bringing with them such persons as are deemed slaves by the laws of any one of the United States. They shall have power to pass laws to permit the owners of slaves to emancipate them, saving the rights of creditors, and preventing them from becoming a public charge. They shall have power to prevent slaves from being brought to this State as merchandise, and also to oblige the owners of slaves to treat them with humanity."

Mr. Chairman, I cannot, consistently with my sense of my obligations as a citizen of the United States, and bound by oath to support their constitution, I cannot object to the admission of Arkansas into the Union as a slave State; I cannot propose or agree to make it a condition of her admission, that a convention of her people shall expunge this article from her constitution. She is entitled to admission as a slave State, as Louisiana and Mississippi, and Alabama, and Missouri, have been admitted, by virtue of that article in the treaty for the acquisition of Louisiana, which secures to the inhabitants of the ceded territories all the rights, privileges, and immunities, of the original citizens of the United States, and stipulates for their admission, conformably to that principle, into the Union. Louisiana was purchased as a country wherein slavery was the established law of the land. As Congress have not power in time of peace to abolish slavery in the original States of the Union, they are equally destitute of the power in those parts of the territory ceded by France to the United States by the name of Louisiana, where slavery existed at the time of the acquisition. Slavery is in this Union the subject of internal legislation in the States, and in peace is cognizable by Congress only, as it is tacitly tolerated and protected where it exists by the constitution of the United States, and as it mingles in their intercourse with other nations. Arkansas, therefore, comes, and has the right to come into the Union with her slaves and her slave laws. It is written in the bond, and, however I may lament that it ever was so written, I must faithfully perform its obligations.

I could not, therefore, propose or support the specific measure desired by the memorialists, which was to impose a restriction upon the people of the State of Arkansas, by requiring of them, as a condition of their admission into the Union, that they should expunge from their constitution the article concerning slavery. I did not think it within the legitimate powers of Congress, under the present existing circumstances, to impose upon the State of Arkansas any restriction whatever, with relation to slavery, in the formation of her constitution. Upon the same principle, I had been opposed to the proposal of restriction upon the State of Missouri, at the time of the first Missouri question; for there were two Missouri questions, differing much from each other, and which were debated at two successive sessions of Congress. The second was that finally adjusted by the compromise. The first was that in which the restriction was proposed, and my opinion had at the time been freely expressed against it.

But then I disapproved, as I now disapprove, of slavery as a civil institution. As a citizen, and as a man, therefore, I disapprove of that article in the constitution of Arkansas, the object of which is to perpetuate slavery. In voting for the acceptance of that constitution, and for the admission of the State into the Union, I do not hold myself bound to approve of all its internal regulations; but doctrines have been recently broached, and are now countenanced by the transfer of the lawful possessions of Michigan to the State of Ohio, which make it, in my judgment, proper, and perhaps necessary, that Congress, the representatives of that federation, compounded partly of slaveholding and partly of entirely free States, should disclaim all approbation of, or assent to, that article in the constitution of Arkansas. I propose no restriction upon her. I am content to receive her as one of the slaveholding States of this Union; but I am unwilling that Congress, in accepting her constitution, should even lie under the imputation of assenting to an article in the constitution of a State which withholds from its Legislature the power of giving freedom to the slave.

In this very section of the bill now before the committee, Congress refuse their assent to propositions, made by the convention of the people of Arkansas which formed their constitution, and were transmitted with it. My proposed amendment, very short and simple, is in perfect accordance and keeping with the remainder of the section, as it stands in the bill now before the committee; and although I cannot flatter myself that it will be satisfactory to those of my constituents and fellow-citizens who have thought proper to commit their memorials and remonstrances to me, it will at least secure to me the consciousness of having discharged my duty to them, to my country, and to that reverence for the rights of mankind, which rejects, without reserve, the principle, that, by the law of nature or of God, man can be the property of man.

Upon this topic I will not enlarge. Were I disposed so to do, twenty hours of continuous session have too much exhausted my own physical strength, and the faculties as well as the indulgence of those who might incline to hear me, for me to trespass longer upon their patience. When the bill shall be reported to the House, I may, perhaps, again ask to be heard, upon renewing there, as I intend, the motion for this amendment.

[Mr. ADAMS resumed his seat, and Mr. WISE addressed the committee. The debate was continued by Mr. BRIGGS, Mr. CUSHING, Mr. HOAR, and Mr. HARD of New York, and by Mr. WISE, in reply, particularly, to Mr. CUSHING. There was great disorder and confusion in the hall, occasioned chiefly by calls for order, and vociferations of the word "question." Personal reflections passed between some of the members, and an affair of honor afterwards followed between two Southern gentlemen, which was, however, finally adjusted without bloodshed. The chairman of the committee, with great and indefatigable exertions, succeeded so far in restoring order that Mr. HOAR was heard with respectful attention. After he took his seat, as the question was about to be put, Mr. ADAMS addressed the committee to the following import:—]

Mr. Chairman, it was not my intention to have troubled the committee with another word upon the subject of my proposed amendment. But the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] has been pleased to propound to me a number of direct questions, two or three of which I heard, and to them I am willing to give direct and explicit answers. For, however widely I differ in opinion from him on this and most other occasions of common deliberation in this hall, I will do him the justice which he has done me, and say that there is nothing of indirection or ambiguous giving out in him. His course is straight forward, and you may always know where to find him. And, sir, in the intercourse of public or private life, I hold in higher esteem an adversary of such a character, than the political vane upon the steeple, whose friendship and whose opinions swing round the compass with every variation of the winds, and are steadfast only to the breath of the breeze.

One of the gentleman's questions which I heard was, from whence this amendment came? I answer him directly that it came from me, and from me alone, without consultation with any other human being. There was no abolition gunpowder plot in it; but, in claiming it as all my own, I shall not record a specification of it in the Patent Office as for an ingenious invention or a profound discovery. It laid in my way, and I took it up. A respectable portion of my constituents, and many others of my fellow-citizens, had charged me with the duty of presenting their memorials against the slavery article in the constitution of Arkansas. Multitudes of others had intrusted to me their petitions for the abolition of slavery and the slave trade in the District of Columbia. Great numbers of petitions, memorials, and remonstrances, of the same purport, had been presented by my colleagues, and by other members of the House. I had been earnestly solicited to support, as far as my very slender influence in this House might extend, and as far as my own convictions of truth and justice would admit, the prayer of those petitions, and the purpose of those remonstrances and memorials. I could not support the immediate abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia. I could not resist the admission of Arkansas, notwithstanding the slavery article in her constitution, into the Union. But there was a point of concession to the slaveholding interests of the South, from the representatives of none but freemen in this House, where it appeared to me not only just, but indispensably necessary, to stop.

Slavery, taking advantage of political influences, operated just at this time at the North upon the prospects of the presidential election; taking advantage (I must say no very generous advantage) of that kind, friendly, and compassionate feeling of Northern freemen for their brethren and fellow-citizens, the slaveholders of the South, which, during the last twelve months, had universally pervaded the Northern region of the country, and urged our people sometimes even to riotous excess against the peaceable, warm-hearted, but honest-hearted enthusiasts of human liberty: slavery, I say, in the confidence of her temporary reinforcement from sources foreign to her own character, had changed her tone, and was aiming blows of deadly intent at the freedom of her Northern associate itself. She had struck at the right of petition and the freedom of speech in this House; she had struck at the freedom of the press, and at the freedom of the post office, both in this and the other branch of the Legislature, and by the express recommendation of the Chief Magistrate of the Union; she had struck at the liberty and the life of a free citizen of a Northern State, by demanding that he should be delivered up, innocent of all offence, as he was, against the laws of the State in which he dwelt, to the tender mercies of her felony, without benefit of clergy. I had seen the twenty-two memorials and remonstrances which I had presented, and many others of the same import, the moment they had reached the hands of the Clerk, ordered by the Speaker to be laid on the table, without reading, without knowing what they contained, without the privilege of being considered, by a general stigmatizing interdict, more insulting than would have been an absolute refusal to receive them. The article in the constitution of Arkansas, cutting off the last hope of emancipation to the end of time, by withholding from the Legislature even the power of ordaining it, I strongly disapproved. The House had treated all these memorials and remonstrances in behalf of freedom as if they were afraid to hear them read, afraid to look them in the face, afraid even to squint at them. In reading this eighth section of the bill before the committee, it appeared to me that the amendment which I offered was so congenial to its spirit, that, if inserted at the place proposed, it would appear altogether as if it had been a part of the section as originally drawn up. The amendment falls infinitely short of the Missouri restriction, and is entirely congenial to the spirit of the constitution itself. Unable as I was to propose the restriction desired by the memorialists and remonstrants, yet, believing that the occasion required of me an avowal of those opinions and principles, the only guardians of the freedom of my constituents, I was desirous of manifesting them in the form the least offensive possible to the slaveholding portion of the community. I wished to plant the standard of freedom at the very lowest point of its elevation, and, by conceding to slavery every thing required by the common compact, yet adhering to those self-evident truths proclaimed in the declaration of independence, to utter the minimum of the sentiments which I believed my constituents would never resign but with the last drop of their blood. At every former period of our history, I should have expected that the representatives of the slaveholding States in this House would readily have accepted this, as far more favorable to them than the Missouri compromise. Now, my object is to fulfil the duty devolved upon me by my constituents, and to leave the decision where it properly belongs. I am not aware of any other question of the gentleman from Virginia which requires an answer from me, particularly after the eloquent address of my colleague behind me [Mr. CUSHING] has already answered them so much more effectually than I could have done myself.

Mr. WISE rose, and inquired whether in the opinion of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] if his amendment should prevail, the State of Arkansas would, by this bill, be admitted in the Union?

Mr. ADAMS. Certainly, sir. There is not in my amendment the shadow of a restriction upon the State. It leaves the State, like all the rest, to regulate the subject of slavery within herself to her own laws; and how far that comes short of the concessions required from the slaveholding interest by the Missouri compromise, it is easy to judge by reference to the transactions of that time; for in the act of 6th of March, 1820, to authorize the people of the Missouri Territory to form a constitution and State Government, and for the admission of that State into the Union, slavery was and is forever prohibited in all the territory ceded by France to the United States under the name of Louisiana, which lies north of thirty-six degrees and thirty minutes of north latitude, not included within the limits of the State of Missouri. And this was the first Missouri compromise; not the abolition, but the prohibition by Congress, forever, of slavery in that portion of the Louisiana Territory where it had not then penetrated. And, secondly, when the constitution of the State of Missouri was formed, there was an article on the legislative power, the fourth clause of the twenty-sixth section of which, defining the powers and duties of the General Assembly of the State, was in these words: "It shall be their duty, as soon as may be, to pass such laws as may be necessary, first, to prevent free negroes and mulattoes from coming to and settling in this State, under any pretext whatsoever."

Nearly the whole of the second session of the 16th Congress was consumed in debates whether the State of Missouri should be admitted into the Union, without requiring of her that this clause should be expunged from her constitution, and the session terminated with her conditional admission, by a resolution of 2d March, 1821, in the following words:

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That Missouri shall be admitted into this Union on an equal footing with the original States, in all respects whatever, upon the fundamental conditions that the fourth clause of the twenty-sixth section of the third article of the constitution submitted on the part of the said State to Congress, shall never be construed to authorize the passage of any law, and that no law shall be passed

Admission of Arkansas.

in conformity thereto, by which any citizen of either of the States of this Union shall be excluded from the enjoyment of any of the privileges and immunities to which such citizen is entitled under the constitution of the United States: Provided, That the Legislature of the said State, by a solemn public act, shall declare the assent of the said State to the said fundamental conditions, and shall transmit to the President of the United States, on or before the fourth Monday in November next, an authentic copy of said act; upon the receipt whereof, the President, by proclamation, shall announce the fact; whereupon, and without any further proceeding on the part of Congress, the admission of the said State into this Union shall be considered as complete.

This was the second Missouri compromise; and, conformably to this resolution, the Legislature of the State of Missouri did, on the 26th of June, 1821, by a solemn public act, declare the assent of the State to this fundamental condition. A copy of this solemn act was transmitted to the President of the United States, who, after consultation with all the members of his administration, and after taking from each one of them his opinion in writing, issued, on the 10th of August, 1821, his proclamation, declaring that the admission of the State of Missouri into the Union was complete.

Now, sir, there is in the amendment proposed by me nothing comparable, as concession from the slaveholding to the free States, to this Missouri restriction. I propose no restriction at all. I simply ask that my constituents, as parties to this compact of admission with Arkansas, may not be constructively held to have given their assent to this perpetuation of slavery, placing it beyond the reach of the legislative authority.

And this reservation is entirely conformable to the spirit of the constitution of the United States. That instrument, containing in four different places arrangements having reference to slavery, does not, in any one of them, recognise the existence of slavery or of slaves; neither of the words is to be found throughout the constitution. Its founders were unwilling that the frame of Government, ordained expressly by the people, to secure to themselves and to their posterity the blessings of liberty, should be polluted even by the name of slavery. Thus, when they provided that the slaveholders should enjoy that most extraordinary privilege of representation of the persons of their slaves in this hall, they adopted a circumlocution, and, after enumerating free persons, those bound to service for a term of years, and Indians not taxed, including every description of human beings, slaves alone excepted, then endowed their masters with the right of representation for three fifths of "all other persons."

Thus, in the ninth section of the first article, which denied to Congress the power, prior to the year 1808, of prohibiting the slave trade, that detestable traffic was described, not by its proper name, but under the gentle denomination of "the migration or importation of such persons as any of the States now existing shall think proper to admit."

Again: the second section of the fourth article, which stipulates for the arrest and delivery up of fugitive slaves, does not name them as such. It says: "No person held to service or labor in one State, under the laws thereof, escaping into another, shall, in consequence of any law or regulation therein, be discharged from such service or labor, but shall be delivered up, on claim of the party to whom such service or labor may be due."

And, in the fourth section of the fourth article, it is provided that the United States shall, on the application of the Legislature or of the Executive of any one of the States, protect the same against domestic violence; an expression, if not exclusively confined to servile insurrection, undoubtedly selected with special and emphatic reference to it.

In no one of these four passages are slaves recognised as property. In the first three, where the reference to them is direct, they are expressly designated as persons—persons to be represented in Congress, not by themselves, but by the votes of their masters; persons whom the then existing States might think proper to admit; persons held to service or labor, to be delivered up on claim of the party to whom such service or labor may be due. Not only is there no recognition of slaves as property, not only are they constantly referred to as persons, but in every instance they are so described that the engagement contracted with relation to them might be applicable to classes of persons other than slaves; and this studious uniformity of language throughout the whole constitution could only arise from the determination to exclude from it any acknowledgment of slavery, as forming a component part of the supreme law of the land.

It was in this spirit of mutual concession and conciliation that the constitution of the United States was formed and adopted, and it is in this spirit that I offer the amendment now before the committee. I will trespass no longer upon their indulgence, but will submit a few observations more upon the subject, when the bill shall be reported to the House.

NOTE.—The amendment proposed by Mr. ADAMS was rejected in Committee of the Whole by a vote of 32 to 90. Mr. SLADE, of Vermont, afterwards moved another amendment relating to the slavery articles, which was also rejected; and the bill was reported without amendment to the House. On Monday, the 13th of June, it was taken up, according to the customary usages, for consideration in the House. Immediately after the bill had been read, Mr. ADAMS sent to the Chair the same amendment that he had offered in Committee of the Whole, and remained standing till it should be read, and the question upon it should be stated by the Speaker, intending to address the House in support of it. Immediately after the amendment was read, and when the question had not been stated, Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, rose and moved the previous question. Mr. ADAMS denied the right of this gentleman to make that motion at that time; he (Mr. A.) being, by the rules and usages of the House, entitled to the floor. The Speaker, fully aware that this claim was indisputable, said: "The gentleman from Massachusetts will proceed." Mr. WILLIAMS insisted upon the demand for the previous question; and the Speaker, who, not half a minute before, had called upon Mr. ADAMS to proceed, now decided that Mr. Williams was entitled to it, and that the previous question should be put. From this decision Mr. ADAMS appealed, and the decision of the Speaker was sustained by the following vote: Yeas 97, nays 87.

The constitution of the United States expressly prescribes that the yeas and nays of the members of either House, on any question, shall, at the desire of one fifth of those present, be entered on the journal. The effect of the above decision was to annul, for the occasion, that provision of the constitution of the United States. By allowing a member to move the previous question, after Mr. ADAMS had sent his amendment to the Chair, and after it had been read, but before the Speaker had stated, as was his duty to do, the question upon the amendment, he deprived Mr. ADAMS of his constitutional right of having the question upon his amendment taken by yeas and nays. The previous question was put and carried. The main question was upon the engrossment of the bill for the third reading; and by another previous question at the third reading, on the same day, the bill was passed.

The next morning, June 14, Mr. ADAMS was accidentally detained from the House, so that he was not present at the reading of the journal. Upon examining, in the course of the day, the manuscript of that record, he found that the statement of the proceedings of the House upon his proposed amendment, as first made upon the Clerk's minutes for the journal, had been so altered, by erasures and substitutions, that the decision of the Speaker, and the vote of yeas and nays, were made to appear on the face of the journal different from the fact.

The original statement on the minutes for the journal was in these words:

"Mr. ADAMS objected to the right of Mr. WILLIAMS to the floor [to move the previous question, or to make any other motion, and stated] that he had not yielded the floor, after having submitted his motion to amend, but had remained standing, [and waiting the reading of the] amendment, [and the stating the question thereon, with the intention of speaking to the said amendment.]"

This statement was conformable to the fact; but the journal, which is made up under the direction of the Speaker, was so altered, that all the words here printed in brackets were scored out with a pen, and the journal was made to read thus:

"Mr. ADAMS objected to the right of Mr. WILLIAMS to the floor, on the ground that he had not yielded the floor after having submitted his motion to amend, but had remained standing, whilst the Clerk was reading his amendment."

By this alteration, the material part of the ground upon which Mr. ADAMS's objection to Mr. WILLIAMS's right then to move the previous question had been stated by him, was suppressed; his reference to that, which was the duty of the Speaker himself, the statement of the question upon the amendment, was suppressed; and the Speaker's own decision in favor of the right of Mr. WILLIAMS, and against the right of Mr. ADAMS to the floor, appears materially different on the journal from what it was in fact. Upon Mr. ADAMS's appeal from the decision, a majority only of ten votes sustained the Speaker. Had the statement of Mr. ADAMS's objection, and the ground of his appeal, been suffered to remain on the journal as they had been entered on the Clerk's minutes, the journal would have been a record of the fact.

After discovering this alteration of the journal, so essentially differing from the fact, Mr. ADAMS, before the adjournment that evening, mentioned it to the House; and the next morning, the 15th of June, exhibited the statement to the House of the original minutes of the journal, and of the alterations made by the direction of the Speaker. And as the suppressed parts of the original minutes were the material parts of his own grounds of appeal from the decision of the Speaker, he moved that the journal of the 13th should be restored, conformably to the original minutes of the Clerk. This motion was rejected, after debate, by yeas and nays, chiefly upon the ground that the journal is amendable only at the time when it is read. But the fact of the grounds of Mr. ADAMS's appeal from the Speaker's decision, misstated in the journal of the 13th, is rectified by the entry of Mr. ADAMS's motion to amend the journal of the 13th upon the journal of the 15th.

Extracts from the journal of the House of Representatives of the United States.

MONDAY, JUNE 13.

The House then proceeded to the consideration of the bill from the Senate (No. 178) entitled "an act for the admission of the State of Arkansas into the Union, and to provide for the due execution of the laws of the United States within the same, and for other purposes."

A motion was made by Mr. John Q. Adams to amend the said bill by inserting, in the 8th section thereof, after the word "Congress," these words, viz: "to the article in the constitution of the said State relating to slavery, and the emancipation of slaves, or"—so as to cause the paragraph in said section to read, "and nothing in this act contained shall be construed as an assent by Congress to the article in the constitution of the said State relating to slavery, and the emancipation of slaves, or to all or any of the propositions contained in the ordinance of the convention of the people of Arkansas," &c.

The said amendment being read,

Mr. Williams, of Kentucky, rose, and addressed the Chair, and moved the previous question.

Mr. Adams objected to the right of Mr. Williams to the floor, on the ground that he had not yielded the floor, after having submitted his motion to amend, but had remained standing whilst the Clerk was reading his amendment.

The Speaker decided that, as Mr. Adams did not claim the floor until after Mr. Williams had addressed the Chair and made his motion, and the question thereon had been stated, he (Mr. Adams) had lost his right to the floor, and that Mr. Williams was entitled to the same.

From this decision Mr. Adams took an appeal to the House, when the previous question on the appeal was moved by Mr. Bouldin; and being demanded by a majority of the members present,

The said previous question was put, viz: shall the main question be now put? and passed in the affirmative: Yeas 109, nays 80.

The main question was then put, viz: shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the House? and passed in the affirmative: Yeas 97, nays 87.

The yeas and nays being desired by one fifth of the members present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are,

Messrs. Bean, Boon, Bouldin, Bovee, Boyd, Brown, Buchanan, Burns, Cambreleng, Casey, Chapman, Chapin, Nathaniel H. Claiborne, John F. H. WEDNESDAY, JUNE 15, 1836.

By consent, a motion was made by Mr. John Quincy Adams, that the entry in the Journal of Monday, the 13th instant, which reads thus:

Fortification Bill.

[H. OF R.]

"Mr. Adams objected to the right of Mr. Williams to the floor, on the ground that he had not yielded the floor after having submitted his motion to amend, but had remained standing whilst the Clerk was reading his amendment"—be amended to read as follows:

"Mr. Adams objected to the right of Mr. Williams to the floor to move the previous question, or to make any other motion, and stated that he had not yielded the floor after having submitted his motion to amend, but had remained standing, awaiting the reading of the amendment, and stating the question thereon, with the intention of speaking to the said amendment."

And after debate,

The previous question was moved by Mr. Cambreleng, and demanded by a majority of the members present. The said previous question was put, viz: Shall the main question be now put; and passed in the affirmative. The main question was then put, viz: Will the House agree to the amendment to the journal as proposed by Mr. Adams? and passed in the negative: Yeas 59, nays 110.

The yeas and nays being desired by one fifth of the members present,

Those who voted in the affirmative are,

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, MAY 18—23.

Speech of Mr. FORESTER, of Tennessee, on the Fortification Bill.

Mr. Chairman: It is seldom I consume the time of this House; but I feel called on, owing to the wide range of the debate, especially by the three gentlemen from the city of New York, to ask the indulgence of the committee for a short time. The bill under consideration proposes, not only the ordinary annual appropriations for completing the fortifications already commenced, but extraordinary ones to accomplish that object and other purposes; and the debate has extended to the whole naval and military defences of the country. I hope it will not be deemed improper in me, following the example set me by more experienced politicians, to give my views of the system of defence now proposed. One class of politicians are for disposing of the whole surplus revenue for these objects, which makes the amount of the surplus the first important inquiry; this will amount at the end of the present year to about fifty millions of dollars. I am opposed to this wild, extravagant, profuse, and profligate expenditure of the public money, the principal portion of which is collected by an indirect tax upon the labor and industry of the country—from those who sustain themselves by the sweat of their brow, and who should receive the protection and encouragement of the Government, instead of its oppression. The amount of money thus collected by this Government alone, under the tariff laws, which is a tax upon every thing purchased from the merchant—even salt and iron, the very necessities of life—and the sale of public lands last year, was upwards of thirty-four and a half millions of dollars. The population of the United States at present, including male and female, old and young, white and black, is something like fifteen millions; this divided into thirty-four and a half millions makes two dollars and thirty cents collected last year from each individual by this Government; and a man with a wife and five children, on the supposition that each person paid an equal proportion, was taxed in one year sixteen dollars and ten cents. Were a direct tax of this enormous amount levied on our industrious farmers, were it presented by tax collectors, their indignation could not be suppressed; yet they pay this amount, by indirect means, without a murmur; in fact, it is done without knowing the amount thus extorted from them; even the most intelligent men in the community do not know the tax they pay on each article they purchase from the merchant, as it is included with the cost and profit on the goods. Our State institutions levy their taxes directly; they send their sheriffs and collectors round among the people; and all that is thus collected is paid, in addition to the large amount above spoken of. The Secretary of the Treasury, at the beginning of this session of Congress, estimated the revenue of the present year at between nineteen and twenty millions; since that time, we have received the returns of the first quarter of the year, and upwards of eleven millions are actually paid into the Treasury. In addition to this, Congress at the present session passed a law (not with my consent) loaning about four and a half millions to the merchants and citizens of New York, in consequence, as it was alleged, of the destructive fire in that place during the past winter; but for that law, fifteen millions and a half would have been collected in three months; within four millions of the estimate of the Secretary for the whole year. Thus it will be seen, the whole revenue for the last year and the first quarter of this year, actually paid into the Treasury, was forty-five and a half millions of dollars; and, but for the bill for the relief of the citizens of New York, would have been fifty millions. If the last three quarters of this year equal the first, (that is, average eleven millions,) there will be paid into the Treasury at the end of the present year thirty-three millions more; making, in all, forty-four millions for the year 1836. But, as it is not probable that so enormous a sum should be collected in one year, I will estimate the probable amount of the three remaining quarters at twenty-six millions; this, added to the actual receipts of the last and the first quarter of this year, makes seventy-one and a half millions; add to this the New York loan of four and a half millions, and you have seventy-six millions collected in two years; but should the three remaining quarters of this year equal the first, to wit, eleven millions per quarter, you will have eighty-three millions. The charter of the Bank of the United States having expired, and the Government owning seven millions of the stock, and consequently entitled to the profits, this item may be safely estimated at seven and a half millions; this, added to the seventy-six millions, the lower estimate for the last and present years, will make eighty-three and a half millions; or which, added to the eighty-three millions, the higher estimate, will give you ninety and a half millions. The estimate of the Secretary of the Treasury for ordinary and extraordinary appropriations for the present year is twenty-three millions of dollars—eight millions more than is necessary for ordinary purposes; add to this, three millions for Indian hostilities, four and a half millions loaned to the citizens of New York, seven millions to carry into effect treaties recently made with the Cherokees and other tribes of Indians, making in all thirty-seven and a half millions; this amount deducted from eighty-three and a half millions, the lower estimate, leaves a balance of forty-six millions; or from ninety and a half millions, the higher estimate, leaves a balance of fifty-three millions, which will be in the Treasury at the end of the present year, after paying all the expenses of the Government, ordinary and extraordinary, up to that period. The Senator from Missouri, [Mr. Benton,] one of the leaders of the friends of the Vice President, and with his approbation, no doubt, introduced a resolution early in the present session, pledging the Government to appropriate this enormous sum of money, together with the ten millions in the Secretary's estimate of twenty-three millions, to fortifications and increase of the navy alone, and claimed it as a measure of the administration; meaning thereby that this wild and extravagant scheme of expending the public money met the approbation of the President; and denounced every one as an enemy of the administration and the country who dared to raise his voice against this mad proposition. The manner of the Senator from Missouri, on this occasion, displayed as much self-conceit, and a disposition as tyrannical, as the most despotic monarchs of the earth. I could not believe that a measure so well calculated to overturn the free institutions of our country, and build up a despotism in this land of liberty and freedom, could have the sanction of the President; yet it was proclaimed to the world by the friends of Mr. Van Buren as a favorite measure of his. Had this wild scheme succeeded, it would have been the entering-wedge or cornerstone of a system of defence which would have cost per annum more than fifty millions of dollars to keep it up, and given us a standing army of more than one hundred thousand men to man our ships of war and fortifications. This proposition was so abhorrent to every republican sentiment in which I have been educated, that I could not give it my sanction, even if the Father of his Country had risen from his grave and recommended it.

Standing armies are instruments used by tyrants to enslave and oppress their people. Monarchs are compelled to have them to sustain their unjust tyranny against the indignation of their subjects groaning under oppressive taxes and unrighteous exactions. Nothing but force can suppress the noble love of liberty engendered in the human bosom by our Creator. Man is born to be free; and nothing but force or fraud can deprive him of that inestimable blessing. We therefore find him always ready to assert his rights when he sees the least prospect of success; hence we see, in all monarchical Governments, a perpetual contention between liberty on one side, and tyranny on the other; or between the tyrant and his minions who oppress, and the citizens who are the unfortunate instruments of their oppression. The interests of standing armies are always identified with the Government, on which they are dependent for their pay, subsistence, and honors, and at war with the rights and privileges of the people—in fact supported by their industry and labor; so that the hand that oppresses is fed and sustained by the unfortunate victims of their oppression. Standing armies are the bane of free institutions; and are diametrically opposed to the genius of liberty. If man is capable of self-government, which is our polar star, or the fundamental principle of our free institutions, he needs no standing army to force him into subjection to laws of his own making; if the Government be just, and enact laws founded upon the eternal principles of right, he will sacrifice his life to sustain the institutions of his country. In a Government like ours, where all power is vested in the people, no such auxiliary of oppression is necessary. Here the citizen and the soldier should always meet in the same person; and those who regulate the ballot-box and control the legislation of the country should be the persons, if circumstances require, to march to the tented fields whenever her rights, honor, or interests, are assailed. Our past history proves to us and the world that the militia of our country are a safe reliance in the hours of peril and danger. Sir, by whom have those victories been achieved which raised such a halo of glory around our country? Not by standing armies, but the militia, our free citizens, who, prompted by the noble workings of patriotism and courage, flocked to the standard of their country, and rushed to the battle-field, determined to conquer or die. The victory thus achieved by the free citizens of my native State stands unrivalled and unparalleled in the history of the world. Search the annals of our country, and I defy any man to show me a victory equally brilliant and successful accomplished by our regular troops. With these facts staring us in the face, in a Government where every free man is a soldier, why should we adopt the wild scheme of Mr. Benton, and create a privileged class, inefficient in times of peril, to fatten upon the industry of our citizens, and finally subvert the liberties of our country? Sir, if we wish to hand down to our posterity the sacred boon of freedom pure as we received it from the hands of our forefathers, we must lift our voices against these mad schemes of legislating into existence privileged classes and standing armies, and let equality and justice be our watchwords, and our patriotic citizens will rally around their standard, ready to sacrifice their lives in its defence. In contemplating the proposition of the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. Benton,] and the awful consequences that would have resulted, had it been adopted, I am amazed at the boldness and recklessness of his scheme. Sir, it would have placed our Government upon a precipice, with volcanoes bursting beneath its foundations, which would have overturned and destroyed it. But we have been rescued from these perils and dangers by the Secretary of War and the President of the United States. I thank them both, in behalf of myself, my constituents, and my country, for the able and manly stand taken by them against this extravagant proposition. The Secretary of War, with the approbation of the President, in an argument, able, lucid, and overwhelming, showing a thorough knowledge of the history of other Governments, and the true situation and interest of his own, has, I hope, settled this dangerous question forever. It is to be regretted that he had not gone further, and carried out in detail, in every particular, the general principles which he so ably advocated. But, in the language of a distinguished Senator from Georgia, [Mr. King,] whom I am proud to except from the Van Buren ranks, on this subject, "he had to yield something to his friends." I regret, in making this great sacrifice to conciliate his friends, he should recommend the appropriation of money which he himself had shown most clearly to be improper and unnecessary. I, however, must again repeat, that I tender him my thanks for what he did; for, sanctioned as his course was by the high character of the President, it compelled the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON,] and his friends, to abandon his mad and destructive scheme, notwithstanding he had claimed it as an administration measure, and relied upon the reputation of the President for its success. Sir, it is difficult to tell what is an administration measure at the present time: every scheme, however detrimental to the interest of the country, which meets the views of Mr. Van Buren, and is brought forward by one of his adherents, is claimed as an administration measure. We have seen that the profligate proposition of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON,] notwithstanding his pomp and parade in the Senate about its being an administration measure, did not meet the approbation of the President, and that he, in his denunciation of every body that opposed it as being opposed to the administration and the country, was denouncing the President as its head, or, in other words, claiming that Martin Van Buren was the administration, and trying to practise a fraud upon the people, by presenting his claim under false colors and a false name. What I now understand by the friends of Mr. Van Buren, when they speak of an administration measure, is, that the proposition meets the views, not of the President, but of the Vice President only. A stranger visiting Congress, and hearing those gentlemen setting forth the claims of Mr. Van Buren, whose name they never mention, but call him the administration, would imagine General Jackson was a candidate for the presidency the third time. The newspapers through the country, advocating his claims, pursue the same course; and he who dares to raise his voice against any of these absurd and ridiculous propositions, is denounced as an enemy of the administration, though General Jackson may have opposed them all his life, and still stand in opposition to them. The timid friends of the President were awed into silence by the bold and reckless manner of the Vice President's friends, upon the abominable and absurd scheme of the Senator from Missouri. No sooner did they find they could not obtain the approbation of the President, than the whole party became enlightened on the subject, and abandoned it themselves; even the Senator himself, after gasconading in the Senate of the United States like Goliath over the stripling David, consented to become the executioner of his own wild, mad scheme.

But, sir, no sooner was this proposition abandoned than three others are immediately introduced, by the friends of the Vice President, to dispose of the surplus revenue, of a character not less objectionable in principle than that of Mr. Benton, though far less dangerous to the free institutions of the country—I mean the propositions of Mr. Grundy, Mr. Wright of New York, and that of the Committee on Foreign Affairs. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. GRUNDY] proposes that all the surplus revenue, or a large portion of it, should be given to those companies in the different States which have railroads completed and in operation, upon condition that they will consent to carry the mail and transport the property and troops of the United States, and give a mortgage to the United States upon the road, to insure the execution of the above condition. That amount is proposed to be given to each, which, at six per centum, the interest will make a sum equal to what is now paid for transporting the mail. For instance, the transportation of the mail from this city to Baltimore is twelve thousand dollars per annum, which would require two hundred thousand dollars to be given to the company, and that too forever, provided they complied with the above condition; for this sum, at six per centum, will make the twelve thousand dollars per annum. This is the old federal doctrine of internal improvement, and forming alliances with irresponsible corporations, in its most odious shape. Sir, it will be the most unjust and unequal law that was ever passed by Congress, should it take effect. The whole sum would be expended in the Eastern States, where the country is in a high state of improvement, and where they need it least; while those sections of the country that have least capital and but little improvement would not get a dollar; thus contributing to the rich abundance of those odious monopolies out of the hard earnings of the people, and, by that means, make the rich richer and impoverish the poor and unfortunate. Sir, I look upon this proposition with abhorrence and disgust, because it would operate as a tax upon my constituents, for the benefit of the purse-proud and rich. The revenue of the United States is collected from every citizen within our widely extended territory; the high, the low, the rich, and the poor, all contribute their due proportion; and therefore every citizen of the United States is entitled to an equal portion of its benefits. As our Government sets out with the principle that all our citizens are free and equal, the principle should be carried out in its burdens and its benefits. When it was found by the party that this unjust proposition of Mr. Grundy could not succeed, the Senator from New York [Mr. WRIGHT] brought forward a scheme to absorb the whole surplus revenue. The proposition of the gentleman from New York [Mr. WRIGHT] was still more degrading, to my mind; he proposed that the whole surplus revenue should be placed in the hands of the commissioners of the sinking fund, that they might enter the market, in the name of the United States, and gamble in stocks. Sir, we have individual stock jobbers and gamblers enough in the United States, without placing this great and mighty nation, the freest on earth, upon an equality with them. The idea of making our nation a gambling machine is too loathsome and degrading to dwell on with patience. The friends of Mr. Van Buren, finding that this scheme would meet with the same fate as the two former—be unsuccessful—the Committee on Foreign Affairs proposed that we should pay all the liquidated debts to rich merchants and thirsty speculators, due to our own citizens from foreign Governments, for spoiliations committed by the citizens of those Governments on the property of our own. Would it not be more charitable, benevolent, and just, to pay the debts of our own citizens, from whom the surplus has been collected, than the debts of these foreigners? What! the United States step forward and pay the debt of a foreign Government; and that, too, out of the public Treasury, collected by the toils and industry of our farmers, and leave them to grope through their own embarrassments the best way they can! Is that the principle of our Government? and shall we adopt it, in practice, to give the preference to foreigners over our own citizens? And all these schemes are claimed here as administration measures. I have little doubt that these measures will meet the same fate with the President that the proposition of the gentleman from Missouri did. Can it be believed that any President of the United States will give his sanction to propositions so unjust and so degrading? I shall never believe it until I see it, and not even then. I feel at a great loss to know what to do with the vast surplus heretofore spoken of. I am pleased with none of the propositions which have yet been submitted: neither the land bill of Mr. Clay; the steam engine of Mr. Grundy, to sweep the public money from the Treasury by steam power; the project of the Senator from New York [Mr. WRIGHT] to make us a great gambling machine; nor the benevolent proposition of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, to pay the debts of foreigners by taxing our own citizens. I still hope that some just and equitable proposition will yet be made; one which, like the dews and showers of heaven, will dispense equal benefits and blessings upon every portion of our free and happy Union. The idea advanced by Mr. Van Buren's friends, that it will corrupt the people to give them back the money that justly belongs to them, is the most absurd and ridiculous that I ever heard advanced by any set of men who claim to be intelligent. To refund to a man what you unjustly flich from him, that that will corrupt him! Sir, the gentlemen have become very tenacious and fearful for the integrity of the people; they had better look to their own household, and examine themselves. Those who can get a sight of the golden calf, and receive pay for falling down and worshipping the idol, by bribes or otherwise, are in more danger of corruption than the people. This is the situation of politicians, office-holders, and aspirants, for the temptation is held up before their eyes; and you remember the important injunction of our Saviour to his disciples, to pray "not to be led into temptation." Such a situation strongly tests the integrity of mankind. But the great body of the people, industriously engaged in their daily avocations, have no such temptations held up to their view, and are therefore beyond the reach of its influence.

Having thus presented my views upon the disposition of the surplus revenue, I will proceed briefly to make some remarks upon the system of fortifications and naval defences of the country. Our Atlantic coast, including the Gulf of Mexico, for the protection of which these expenditures are proposed to be made, is 3,000 miles in extent. It is proposed that 232 forts and 53 steam batteries shall be constructed, for the protection of this coast; making, in all, 285; or, if equally distributed, one for every ten and a half miles. These works have and will cost, according to the estimates, $39,500,000; of these forts, eleven have been finished, at an expense of $4,073,000. One hundred and ten are under construction, on which $4,015,000 have been expended. The Department estimates the expense to complete them at $14,335,000; total, near $18,500,000. One hundred and eleven forts and fifty-three steam batteries are yet to be commenced, the cost of which is estimated by the Department at $17,000,000; to furnish guns, and put them in a state of defence, arm the militia, &c., $30,000,000; making, in all, $69,500,000. Pay of men to garrison and take care of them, in time of peace, upwards of $2,000,000; in time of war, $30,000,000 per annum. Number of men, in peace, 6,731; in war, 62,232. Our fathers, without forts, destitute of munitions of war, with a population of 3,000,000, without money or credit, encountered one of the most powerful nations of the earth, and not only vanquished it, but achieved our glorious independence, and handed down to us the rich inheritance of our happy system of government. Shall we, with a population of 15,000,000, ample resources, and much character at home and abroad, surround ourselves with a wall to protect us from enemies on the other side of the Atlantic? And this, it is contended, is not only necessary for our protection, but to secure the honor and interest of the country. Is there no spark of that courage and patriotism that sustained our noble ancestors in the Revolution burning in our bosoms? Are the descendants of our revolutionary sires such craven-hearted cowards as to need a wall to protect them from real or imaginary dangers? Are we like the cowardly Chinese, who, eighteen hundred years ago, built a wall 1,500 miles long and 30 feet high, to protect them from the incursions of the neighboring Tartars, and that, too, when our enemies, if we have any, must be on the other side of the Atlantic, 3,000 miles from our coast? Such a sentiment is a slander upon my constituents. I will speak for them. They want no wall to screen them from dangers; their country is their shield, and their rifles their defence; and with the latter they will always be found ready and willing to give protection and security to the former. The little republic of Sparta disdained to surround their city with walls, though surrounded by powerful, ambitious, and warlike enemies. Her free and brave citizens were her ramparts, and afforded her ample protection from the incursions of her enemies. Shall we, then, imitate the cowardly Chinese, or the brave, noble, and magnanimous Spartan? The strong arm of all Governments consists in the bravery and patriotism of their citizens. To secure these at all times, nothing is necessary but to make that Government worthy of their devotion. Would it be politic or just, then, to paralyze the energies of our enterprising citizens, by heaping on them a load of unjust taxation, to support these extravagant propositions, intended alone to benefit the few, and oppress the great body of the people? It is proposed, by the year 1850, to increase our ships of war to one hundred and fifteen, the estimated expense of which is $7,000,000 per annum. This sum in fifteen years will amount to $105,000,000. In addition to this, it is proposed to collect materials to build ten ships of the line and ten frigates, to be kept in reserve, $3,500,000; arming, $2,000,000. The navy appropriation bill of the present session, which has passed, amounted to more than $6,000,000. A standing annual appropriation of $500,000, under existing laws, added to the naval bill of this session, will fall very little short of the estimate of $7,000,000. I merely mention these facts to let my constituents know the grand schemes proposed, at their expense, for these objects, and at the same time to express my disapprobation of such heavy expenditures. I was forcibly struck with the non-committal course of the three gentlemen from the city of New York in the discussion of the proposed system of defence on the present proposition. Instead of developing the principles of the system, and showing that it was consistent with the genius of our Government, two of them went into the history of the administration, the high character and dear-bought fame of the President of the United States. The brilliant victories and splendid services of the President of the United States are pregnant themes for the historian, the orator, and the poet, on a suitable occasion; but when they are brought in by Mr. Van Buren's friends, to sustain them in the most high-handed federal measures, a part of which we know he disapproves, (and I hope the whole,) they are applied to an illegitimate object. The great principles which have heretofore separated the two great parties in the United States cannot be amalgamated by a mere name; even the potent name of the President cannot make a high-handed federal measure a republican one. But every thing these times is called democratic; and gentlemen advocating the most abominable federal doctrine take shelter under the ample folds of the democracy of the country, and call it a democratic measure. The advocates of the bank call themselves democrats; those of a high tariff for protection, and internal improvements, call themselves democrats. Those who urge the profligate and extravagant expenditure of the public money claim to be the exclusive representatives of the democracy of the country; and one of the gentlemen from the city of New York, in advocating this system, gave us a lecture on government, taking his text on the aristocracy and democracy of the country, in abuse of the former, and high eulogies of the latter, advocating and sustaining this extravagant system on the ground that he loved the democracy and people of the country. How can any man be a friend to the rights and interests of the people, and be the advocate of measures calculated to bow them down beneath the load of taxation, create privileged classes, and give us a standing army? It cannot be; it is a misnomer; it is glossing over bitter dregs with a sweet name. Democracy is founded upon principle; it should, therefore, never be used as a mere rallying point of party—a mere name. The true democrat watches with care and anxiety the interests of the great laboring class of the community. That kind of democracy which I admire is, as far as possible to guard and protect this class of our citizens from unjust and unequal laws. The situation of many of them makes strong appeals to the benevolent feelings of our nature, and I wish this Government would never turn a deaf ear to their entreaties. Throw the mantle of the law around the rich, so as to protect them in the enjoyment of their property, and they can take care of themselves; but if bounties are to be given, let those who need them most be their recipients. I call upon those gentlemen who make such loud professions of attachment and devotion to the interests of the people, to come forward and aid me in sustaining these great principles, and in putting down these odious and abominable propositions. The gentleman avowed one sentiment which I cannot subscribe to: that there are two great antagonist interests in all Governments—capital and labor; that capital, like Hannibal's oath of perpetual hostility to the Romans, was always arrayed against, and made war upon, labor. This proposition cannot be true as regards our own Government, unless by our legislation we make it so.

We have not only declared that all men are born free and equal, but given them equal power in the legislation of the country. The poor man has precisely the same influence at the ballot-box that the rich nabob has. Girard, with his millions, was entitled to only one vote, while the husbandman, in the midst of poverty, is entitled to the same privilege. Sir, capital and labor are not natural but artificial enemies: they are the friends and allies of each other, unless the Government or Legislature of the country destroys the harmony which should always exist between them. Without labor, how could capital be employed? If a man possessed all the riches of the earth, and there was no labor, of what use would they be to him? He could not procure even the poorest necessities of life. Without capital, what encouragement to enterprise and industry! Where would the laborer reap the reward of his toils and his labors? They are as indispensable to each other as the feet and hands are to the healthy action of the body. In other Governments, where there are privileged classes exempt from the common toils and difficulties of life, where the many labor for the few, and the few live at their ease, and fatten and riot in luxury at the expense of others, this principle is true. I regret to acknowledge that it is partially true in our own country; not by the fundamental principles of our Government, but by acts of unequal legislation, in contravention, as I believe, of our constitution. The system of defence now under discussion, which meets the favorable consideration of the gentleman, is a measure of this character. The funding system, which fell with a heavy hand upon our revolutionary fathers, by which they were deprived of the little pittance promised them by the Government for their toils and sufferings in achieving our independence, to enhance the coffers of the rich speculator, was a measure of this description. It was this that gave the North the ascendancy over the South, so far as capital was concerned, which they have maintained ever since. The war-worn soldier, who exhausted the vigor of manhood in defence of his country, was compelled to part from his claim upon the Government for a mere trifle. As soon as those claims had reached the hands of the capitalists, the Government, by the funding system, liquidated the whole to those who held them, and enriched the speculator, and filled his coffers to overflowing. The charter of the old United States Bank of '91, by which Congress incorporated a company of stockjobbers, and gave them the control of the currency for twenty years, strongly partook of this unequal character. The sedition law of '93, abridging the freedom of the press and of speech, and throwing a shield around the actions of the high officers of Government, however, exceptionable, may be placed in the front rank of unjust and unequal laws. The high tariff duties for protection, and operating as a tax upon the labor of the country, for the benefit of a few manufacturers, cannot be too strongly condemned. It was a tax upon all the labor of the country for the benefit of capital, and therefore comes strictly within the principle laid down by the gentleman. The internal improvement system by the General Government, a twin sister of the latter, is partial, unjust, and unequal in its operations. The proposition of the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON,] those of the Senators from Tennessee, [Mr. GRUNDY,] and New York, [Mr. WRIGHT,] as well as the proposition of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, may be ranked high in the list of unequal, unjust, and partial legislation. And yet, strange to tell, we find the gentleman from New York, who made such loud professions for the interest of the people, advocating all these propositions, and following a leader, Mr. Van Buren, who not only approves of these, but has been the friend and advocate of most of those above enumerated. But it has been said, that Mr. Van Buren, in supporting the tariff of 1828, acted under the instructions of his Legislature. He can plead no such excuse on the woollens bill of 1827, the most unjust and oppressive of all the tariff laws. His position, like many other politicians on the Bank of the United States, is a singular one. He was not a member of Congress in 1816, when the bank was chartered; but we afterwards find him exerting his influence to get a branch extended to his own State. I suppose no one will deny that he was then the friend of this institution. The bank, confined to the city of Philadelphia, could have but little influence over this widely extended country; but, by locating branches in every State of the Union, its power and influence was so increased as to enable it to make war upon the Government itself; it was the war of giants, and for a long time the issue was exceedingly doubtful. All this time the Vice President kept his sentiments perfectly concealed from the country; but as soon as the enemy was vanquished, the victory achieved, and the bank lay prostrate at the feet of the Government, he, like a valiant soldier, rushes forward and exclaims, "Uncompromising hostility to the Bank of the United States!" There is no provision in the constitution which authorizes the General Government to establish a general system of internal improvement; this is admitted by all; but the federalists claim the power by implication, because they say it is expedient and necessary. The most obnoxious proposition which ever received the favorable consideration of Congress on this subject was that to establish turnpike gates on the Cumberland road, in the different States, and to inflict fines and punishments on those who refused to comply with the requisitions of the law. Mr. Van Buren was its warm advocate; Congress passed the bill; but Mr. Monroe, President of the United States, vetoed it. The bill to graduate the price of the public lands, intended to give a home to those unable to purchase them, met his disapprobation. He is reported to have spoken "at great length in opposition to the bill, and in reply to the various arguments which had been urged in favor of it and its various modifications." We find him in the New York Legislature voting against the admission of Missouri into the Union, unless they would first emancipate their slaves. He was then an abolitionist; what he is now, I will leave gentlemen to determine for themselves. The fundamental principle which Mr. Van Buren practises in politics is, that "the spoils belong to the victors;" thus arraying one portion of the free citizens of the United States against the other, as enemies to each other, and viewing every one so who does not embrace this anti-republican doctrine. Our Government declares all our citizens free, but this principle suffers no man to enjoy the freedom of thought and of action, except the leader of the party; all others must yield to his despotic will. Our constitution opens the offices of the Government alike to all; but this principle suffers no man to fill an office unless he becomes a slave, and tamely submits to the dictates of his file leader. Our noble ancestors left the homes of their fathers, and sought a refuge in the wilds of America, in the midst of savages, where they encountered all the privations incident to the settlement of new countries, that they might have the privilege of enjoying the freedom of opinion. Will their descendants tamely submit to have this inestimable blessing taken from them? Offices under our Government are trusts for the benefit of the people; and freedom in electing and being elected to fill them, is inseparably connected with republican Government. If the people are capable of self-government, as our constitution supposes, they are equally capable of selecting their own rulers; and no one in this country should fill an office contrary to the wishes of the people upon whom that office is to operate. Any other principle or practice, in the appointing power, makes the people, to that extent, political slaves. And yet Mr. Van Buren and his friends, who make profession of friendship for the interest of the people, set their will at defiance, and place men in office contrary to the wishes of nine tenths of those upon whom the office is to operate. The caucus system is so intimately connected in principle with the above maxim, that I shall give it a passing notice. Mr. Van Buren has reduced this system to a science in his own State, and wishes to rivet it upon the free citizens of America. Under this system, a few leaders get together and appoint those that are to fill the offices of the country, and then call upon the people to confirm their appointments; and if any one dare to refuse, they denounce him as an enemy to republicanism. Every man in the community has a right to designate whom he will prefer for an office, but he has no right to take this privilege away from another without his consent. By this system, all power is vested in the hands of a few, and they call upon the people to be the willing instruments of their own slavery. Can the people be considered free, when they are not permitted to select their own rulers? The constitution says that all power is vested in the people; but the caucus system vests it in a few intriguing, designing politicians. I am one of that kind of democrats that would rather the power should remain where the constitution placed it—in the hands of the people. They have no motive to do wrong, and no feeling but to advance the true interest and honor of their country. All they ask is just and equal laws. But how stands the case with political leaders, operated upon by feelings of rivalry and ambition, goaded by their enemies, and leagued to their friends by the powerful bonds of interest and associations, in pursuit of high offices, honors, and emoluments? Sir, with the integrity of a Cato, they are incapacitated from judging impartially and correctly on the subject. All those feelings which operate with most force upon the human mind are brought into active play to lead them astray. In the ordinary controversies which originate in society, every man wants an impartial court and jury to try his cause; and, without these prerequisites, justice is never administered. Should the people, then, on a subject infinitely more important, one on which their very liberties depend, trust to the partial, selfish, and interested politician to decide their cause? Forbid it, Heaven!

But conventions have been introduced as a substitute for the caucus system. This I consider far more objectionable, in practice, than the caucus itself. The caucus system does not purport to proceed from any person except the leaders. They assume the responsibility of acting and speaking for the people, without authority, or without any pretence of authority. Still, they boldly claim that the people should yield obedience to their dictation. But the convention claims to be fresh from the people, and the delegates pretend to speak their sentiments. If this were true, no man could object to this system, for the people have the right to do their own business in their own way. But, as it is only true in theory, and always false in practice, being a fraud upon the people, it becomes the more objectionable, like vice and falsehood when they imitate and put on the garb of truth and virtue. Does not every man know, in the selection of these delegates, that, nine times in ten, the large mass of the people are never consulted? Sometimes the delegates are self-constituted; at other times they are appointed by a few individuals to represent a large community. A meeting is got up by a small number at a grog-shop or tavern, and heralded forth to the world as the voice of the people. I have heard of an anecdote (located in Ohio, I believe) which sets forth the true character of many of these meetings. A meeting was called, and only two individuals attended; one nominated the other president, and he, not to be outdone in courtesy, appointed him secretary; a preamble and resolutions were drawn up and adopted in the usual form, calling it a large and respectable meeting. The president refused to sign it with these words in it, saying it was untrue; that two individuals could not make a large and respectable meeting. The secretary, being a large man, replied, "You are mistaken; I am large, and you will not dispute that you are respectable; therefore, it is a large and respectable meeting." How was it at the late Baltimore convention, with regard to the fifteen votes of Tennessee? A botanical doctor by the name of Rucker happened to be here for the purpose of obtaining a patent. It was ascertained by the friends of the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. JOHNSON,] who sits near me, that he could not receive the nomination of the convention for the vice presidency, unless the vote of the State of Tennessee could be procured. There had not been a single meeting in the State for the purpose of nominating delegates, and no man had received the approbation of a single individual to his nomination. But Mr. Rucker, being a citizen of the State, and being here at the time for the purpose of obtaining his straw patent, was received as a member of the convention, and actually gave away the fifteen votes of the State of Tennessee, and these votes were counted, and by that means the gentleman from Kentucky was nominated for the vice presidency; and, should he succeed, he will owe his election entirely to Mr. Rucker. Can any man pretend that the free citizens of Tennessee are bound to give their vote as Mr. Rucker directed? According to the doctrine of the convention system, they would be; but according to the principles of the constitution and the rights of freemen, (which, thank God, they will exercise as long as they live,) they will treat Mr. Rucker, and his nomination, with that contempt and detestation which his conduct so justly merits. He had a right to give away his own vote, but he had no right to pledge the vote of the State of Tennessee, as he did. But it has been alleged that Tennessee was in favor of the convention system in 1832, and, therefore, she has been charged with inconsistency. As I was one of the delegates appointed at that time, but did not attend, I feel called upon to explain the facts. I am informed that nine individuals collected together in 1832 in the city of Nashville, prepared their preamble and resolutions, and appointed fifteen delegates to the Baltimore convention. I happened to be one of the fifteen, though at that time at my place of residence, seventy-five miles distant, and neither myself nor my present constituents knew any thing about it until it was all over; yet I was appointed to represent them, without their consent or approbation.

Fortification Bill.

These nine gentlemen afterwards went to the court-house in a city containing a population of from seven to ten thousand, and were unable to collect more than fifty or sixty individuals, who adopted their resolutions, and confirmed their appointments. Two out of the fifteen attended; the others paid no attention to the meeting, or their nominations; I did not pay the slightest attention to it. I deny the right of nine individuals at the seat of Government or elsewhere to appoint me the representative of my constituents. They alone had the right, but not one of whom chose to exercise it. And this is brought forward to show that Tennessee was in favor of conventions! I hope the gentleman has better grounds to sustain the appointment of the other delegates of the convention, but I fear the most of them received their appointments in pretty much the same way. I know, Mr. Chairman, the loss of the fortification bill of the last session is a disagreeable subject to many of the members on this floor; and, as the subject has been ably discussed, I shall merely state a few facts which came within my own observation. I wish, in the first place, to call the attention of the committee to the journals of that night. It will be seen by an inspection of them that the reasons of the gentleman from New York [Mr. CAMBRELENG] for refusing to present the agreement of the committee of conference are entered upon the journal, and that, too, without the consent of the House. The proceedings of Congress may be examined, from the foundation of the Government until the present day, and no such an entry can be found on them except this. Journals are intended as a record of the facts which take place in legislative bodies, and reasons are never entered upon them except by the consent of the House. The House have refused, the present session, to suffer gentlemen to enter their reasons upon the journals. But the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CAMBRELENG,] after Congress had adjourned, without the consent of a single member, has his reasons put on the journal. Why this unusual and extraordinary course, if the gentleman intended nothing wrong? The gentleman knew that he had been the cause of defeating the fortification bill; and that the country would hold him responsible, unless he could create a false impression, and by that means throw the responsibility elsewhere. I was very much surprised at the conduct of the gentleman on the memorable last night of the session on this subject. I saw him immediately after the conference, with the agreement of the conferees in his hand, which I have always believed, and still believe, notwithstanding the gentleman's assertion to the contrary, was when the vote was taken on the Cumberland road bill. The amount agreed on by the conferees, together with the appropriation contained in the bill, was $1,650,000 for the defences of the country. He was then standing up in the aisle near where I now stand, manifesting great anxiety to present it to the House, which he told me he would do so soon as he could get the floor. In consequence of this, I expected to hear him, every moment, bring the subject before the House. After some time had elapsed, I was informed by a distinguished gentleman of this House that Mr. Cambreleng had received orders from Mr. Van Buren and Mr. Forsyth not to present it at all, but to defeat the bill. How these facts are, I know not; but one thing I do know, that the gentleman never did present it to the House; and, when called on to do so, absolutely refused, and that, too, after telling me, between an hour and two hours before, that he would bring it to the consideration of the House as soon as he could get the floor. I am glad the gentleman is present to hear my statement, as I wish to do injustice to no man. I met, on that night, the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. POLK,] and that, too, after the conversation with Mr. Cambreleng;

there was much excitement on the subject whether Congress could sit after twelve o'clock on the 3d of March. I asked Mr. Polk what had been the practice heretofore; he said that he had never known the session to continue after that time since he had been a member. He asked me what I thought of the question. I told him I had not examined it, but I was inclined to believe that the functions of Congress ceased at twelve o'clock. Then, said he, with a good deal of earnestness, "you ought not to vote." But I concluded, as the honor and interest of my country were at stake, that I would vote until I became fully convinced that I had no power to do so. And, to my utter astonishment, after giving me this advice, on taking the next vote, the gentleman answered to his own name. I thought it strange that a gentleman should tell me that I ought not to vote, and then vote himself under the same circumstances. I now take leave of this subject, which I consider disgraceful to the House of Representatives, or at least to those members who were more willing to serve their party than to protect the honor and interest of their country.

The amendment of the constitution, to prevent the election of President from coming into the House, was a favorite measure with the party to which I belonged at the last as well as the present session; in fact, I have always been anxious for this change; I have always believed that the people should have the entire control over their own elections. This is the only means they have of securing themselves against the abuse of power. But this measure, intended alone for the benefit of the people, was defeated at the last session by the friends of Mr. Van Buren. I now charge the fact upon this floor, and I defy gentlemen to deny that they did defeat this measure. My distinguished colleague [Mr. BELL] has proven from the journals these facts, which I here charge in my place to be true. Notwithstanding this, the friends of Mr. Van Buren charge Judge White and his friends with wishing to bring the election into the House, when they know they defeated the amendment of the constitution to prevent this result, which the friends of Judge White were anxious to effect.

As to the deposit banks, I have but little to say. I am one of those who sustained the President in the removal of the public moneys from the Bank of the United States; and I would do so again under similar circumstances. I then expected that Congress would regulate them by law, in the local or State banks; and I hope we never will adjourn until that object is accomplished. This subject has become one of vital importance, from the great quantity of public money accumulated in the Treasury; and it is now under the entire control of the Secretary of the Treasury, without any legal restraint. The amount at his discretion in the deposit banks was, at the last returns, thirty-eight millions of dollars. No man, however exalted his character or station, should be trusted with so much of the people's money, without legal restraint. But this subject becomes more interesting from the circumstance that Reuben M. Whitney is the agent of these banks, and receives from them a high salary for superintending their interest at the Treasury Department. I have not been able to ascertain the influence Whitney exercises over the public money in the deposit banks. The Secretary of the Treasury denies that he has any influence; and yet we find these banks, (some of them,) it is said, paying him a thousand dollars per annum. If he can do them no good, or has no influence over the public moneys, why do they pay him this enormous amount? Call upon the Secretary of the Treasury, and he says that Whitney is not the agent of the Government, and has no influence over the public moneys in the deposit banks; and yet these corporations, who always consult their own interest, pay him a high salary. The Secretary of the Treasury, nor any other person, need tell me that these banks do not receive advantages from the services of Whitney in some way; if they did not, the world knows they would not pay him this enormous sum of money. And what advantage could he be to those banks, unless he has influence in regulating the deposits in them? All the advantage they can reap is, in having the use of the public money free of interest, which they loan out to their customers at six, seven, eight, and ten per cent. The Secretary of the Treasury also says that Whitney has nothing to do in selecting the deposit banks; that he alone exercises that power; and yet a correspondence between Whitney and the agent of the Bank of Illinois was brought to light by the Legislature of that State, showing that Whitney was applied to to make it a deposit bank; which he refused to do, because the directors were opposed to Mr. Van Buren. We also see, from a circular published in the State of Missouri by him, that he directs the kind of money which shall be received in the payment of public dues. I confess all these things are mysterious to me. Why should the Secretary of the Treasury, whose duty it is to superintend the safe keeping of the public moneys, suffer Whitney to be employed by those banks in obtaining the use of the money? And this he does do, most certainly, or they never would pay him. The character of this Mr. Whitney is well calculated to increase suspicions on this subject. Of him or his character I know nothing, except from his own testimony before a committee of this House, some years past. In that he swears he left this country during the late war, settled in Canada, where he remained until some time after the close of the war, and took an oath to observe the laws of the country. He who would desert his own country, in her struggle against a mighty nation, and take an oath of fidelity to her enemy, I think is devoid of patriotism, and a traitor to her honor and her interest. Sir, I never had any confidence in Tories or traitors, and I never expect to have. This same committee before whom he was examined adopted unanimously, I believe, a resolution, (all parties concurring,) that the main facts he had sworn to were untrue. That a man of his character, both a traitor and one capable of perjury, should have any influence in regulating thirty-eight millions of dollars, collected from the laboring part of the community, and a portion from my constituents, is what I deeply regret. Personally, I know nothing of Mr. Whitney; I never saw him, and only speak of his character as he himself has given it to the world, in his own testimony.

Fortification Bill.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Wise] brought forward resolutions proposing to raise a committee to send for persons and papers, and examine into this subject, charging the Secretary of the Treasury with combining with Whitney in pilfering and stealing the public moneys; and, to my utter astonishment, a majority of Mr. Van Buren's friends opposed the adoption of these resolutions, and defeated them; for it required two thirds of the House to suspend the rules, and get the subject before them. Mr. Dromgoole introduced resolutions calling upon the Secretary of the Treasury for information on these subjects. This I considered a mere mockery, to call upon a man who is charged with a criminal offence, and who had denied that Whitney was an agent of the Government, or had any thing to do with it, to give evidence in his own behalf. I wish to know what Whitney had to do with it; why those banks should find it their interest to employ him at so great an expense. We have no right to inquire into the private affairs of men; but we have a right to know what agency any man has in keeping and disposing of the public moneys. This was intended to supersede the resolutions of his colleague, [Mr. Wise,] neither of which has been adopted. Mr. Wise said that, if Congress would give him a committee, he had no doubt he could sustain the charges he had made by proof. But still it was refused him by the House. This I regret, as my constituents and the country have a right to know what is the true situation of their own money. After these charges were made by a member in his place upon the floor, it was due to the President and those who sustained him in the removal of the public money from the Bank of the United States, and above all, to Mr. Woodbury's own character, that the investigation should have been gone into. If he were innocent, an investigation would not have injured him; if guilty, the world should know it. The people have too deep an interest in so large a sum of money, not to know its true situation. Every public man should court an investigation, when suspicion hangs upon his reputation. I know an intimate association with a man of Whitney's character is well calculated to throw a shade of suspicion over that of another. This alone may have given rise to the suspicions against the Secretary; for I know not the facts upon which Mr. Wise based his charges. Why Mr. Woodbury should have taken shelter behind the impenetrable walls of party, instead of stepping forward like a man, and asking an investigation into his conduct, as all his predecessors had done under similar circumstances, I cannot tell, unless it was to brave and defy public opinion, or cover and hide his guilt. In the ordinary transactions of life, it is the guilty, and not the innocent, who seek concealment. But the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. Pierce] placed the defence of the Secretary on the ground that his character was too high to be reached; but, as I wish to do injustice to no man, I will give his own language: "I do not," said he, "stand here as the apologist of the Secretary of the Treasury; in his life, he never needed any man to appear for him in that character; the ability, the untiring industry, and the fidelity with which he has discharged the duties of various high and responsible trusts, are known to all men of all parties in this House, and to the country; his character is elevated above individual assault, and needs not individual eulogium. His whole career, as a public officer, challenges the most scrutinizing inquiry, and stands forth its own sure and triumphant vindication." And, strange to tell, on this occasion the gentleman refuses to give us that scrutinizing inquiry into the conduct of the Secretary, where there are thirty-eight millions of the people's money involved, because, as he says, the character of Mr. Woodbury is "above individual assault, and needs not individual eulogium; it stands forth its own sure and triumphant vindication." I know not what the gentleman means, unless he intends to be understood that Mr. Woodbury's character is so exalted that it is beyond the reach of public opinion. It would be too disparaging to the gentleman's intelligence to say that he would require every member of Congress to rise at once and bring a charge against an officer of the Government before it should be investigated. What, then, can he mean by "individual assault?" The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Wise] brought forward his charges, not as an individual, but as a member of this body; not as Henry A. Wise, but as a representative of the people in the councils of the nation. The gentleman surely cannot mean, by "individual assault," that other members should have brought forward the same charge; this would have been a direct violation of the rules of the House. Sir, no man is beyond the reach of public opinion in this country. The doctrine of the divine right of kings, that the king can do no wrong, is not to be tolerated in this Government. Every officer, under our constitution, is held to a strict accountability for the manner in which he discharges his public trusts. But the gentleman places the character of the Secretary above all the high functionalities of the Government, and exempts him from the common frailties of our nature, by placing him above public opinion. Such a sentiment may be democratic in New Hampshire, but I trust it will never become so in any other portion of the Union. The metallic currency has been introduced into this discussion. I have always been a warm advocate for its adoption. Whether it can be effected or not, I cannot tell; but I will go with those who will go farthest upon this subject. The increase of specie, thus far, seems only to have increased the circulation of paper. Two years ago there were twenty-five millions of specie in the United States, and seventy-seven millions of paper in circulation; now, there are fifty-one millions of specie, and about one hundred and fifty millions of paper; one increasing in a ratio of more than three to one of the other. And as all the banks in the United States, except in this District, are under the control of the State Legislatures, Congress cannot restrain them from issuing their paper, without the aid of the State Governments, I am determined to persevere in the noble enterprise, so long as I see the least prospect of assistance from these quarters.

As to the charge of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. McKEON,] against my native State, I have but little to say; her character for intelligence and patriotism is too well known in the records of the country to need defence from me. The hardships and dangers which the early settlers encountered, in changing a wilderness into cultivated fields, are matters of history. The enterprise, courage, and patriotism of her citizens need no defence from one of her native sons. Her past history is known; from this we may judge of the future. It is written in large capitals in the records of fame, "so that he who runs can read." Her patriotic sons have always responded to the calls of their country; and their ardent love of liberty and devotion to her free institutions will impel them to the rescue, when her honor or interests are assailed. She has always poured forth her blood and her treasure in defence of herself and our beloved country; and her sympathies have burst forth in favor of those struggling for freedom throughout the world. The bones of her sons lie bleaching upon every battle-field of the Southwest; and wherever she has gone, victory has perched upon her standard, and success and honor crowned her efforts.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, MARCH 10.

Remarks of Mr. FRENCH, of Kentucky, on the bill for the payment of volunteers and militia.

The House being in Committee of the Whole on the bill, with the amendments of the Senate, entitled "An act for the payment of the volunteers and militia corps in the service of the United States"—

Mr. FRENCH said he did not profess to know much about the army regulations, or the various duties required of the different officers of the army. He had, however, attended to the discussion upon the amendment from the Senate now under consideration, with the view of collecting the facts upon which the three additional paymasters to the army are proposed to be added to the number now existing, and of making the facts disclosed his guide in voting.

He found several important facts satisfactorily established, strongly recommending to his mind the proposed amendment. We have the judgment of the Senate in its favor, and that is entitled to respect. In 1821, Congress reduced the number of paymasters to fourteen; and, when that reduction was made, it was contemplated that the duties of the paymasters would extend to the regular army alone, and it is fair to presume those duties required the number then retained. Since that reduction was made, Congress has by law made it the duty of paymasters, whenever and wherever the militia shall be called into the public service, to pay them as well as the regulars. This increase of duties requires of the paymasters more than was contemplated when their number was reduced. Your Military Committee made a report about two years ago, recommending an increase of paymasters to Congress. In that report we are informed that the army has been increased seven hundred; the number of military posts greatly multiplied and extended; that half a million of dollars had accumulated upon the paymasters, to be distributed and paid to the army of the United States; that the army has to be paid quarterly; and that the fourteen paymasters could not, owing to the increased burden of duties laid upon them, and the dispersed condition of the military posts, pay off the army at the times and in the manner required by law. Such, also, is the opinion of the Secretary of War, as disclosed in that report. Your Military Committee, of which my honorable colleague [Colonel R. M. JOHNSON] is chairman, had this bill, with the amendments of the Senate, under advisement, and recommended to the House a concurrence in those amendments. Yet, notwithstanding these facts, honorable members say there is no necessity to increase the number of paymasters. For one, he (Mr. F.) must be allowed to differ with those gentlemen. Our sea-coast and our borders, Northwestern and Southwestern borders, are almost interminable. The duties of the paymasters extend now to the militia in service, as well as to the regular army. A bloody war is raging in Florida. The citizens of that Territory are threatened with Indian massacre. Many of them have already fallen victims to savage barbarity. Many of our gallant men have repaired to the scene of action, to avenge the blood that has been shed, and to put an end to the war, by punishing the savage for his cruelty and lawless devastations. These soldiers must be fed, clothed, and paid; and this very war had greatly added to the duties of your paymasters.

He asked the House how it was with themselves. Members of Congress had a law by which they could, if they chose, draw their eight dollars every day. With that per diem pay, honorable members can enjoy themselves in this city, according to their own good will and pleasure. But the soldier, who is separated from home, compelled to undergo the fatigues and hardships of the tented field, dependent upon his Government for subsistence and pay, can only draw his pay quarterly; and could any thing be more just than that he should receive it whenever, by the laws of his country, it fell due?

He (Mr. F.) maintained that the character of the Government required punctuality of payment, even to the soldiers. The justice of the Government required it; the public service required it; the laws required it; and the soldier required it; the subsistence of the army required it, and a just responsibility upon the disbursing officers required it.

He considered the increase proposed necessary to the efficiency of that protection which all our military posts were intended to give to our coast and our exposed and widely dispersed frontiers. He maintained that no part of the nation was more interested in that protection than our Northwestern and Southwestern frontiers. He therefore should vote for the amendment of the Senate; and believed, if no Indian war existed, that the increase proposed was necessary for our permanent peace establishment.

TO THE REGISTER OF DEBATES IN CONGRESS.

TWENTY-FOURTH CONGRESS—FIRST SESSION.

MESSAGE OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, TO BOTH HOUSES OF CONGRESS, AT THE COMMENCEMENT OF THE TWENTY-FOURTH CONGRESS, DECEMBER 7, 1835.

Fellow-citizens of the Senate and House of Representatives:

In the discharge of my official duty, the task again devolves upon me of communicating with a new Congress. The reflection that the representation of the Union has been recently renewed, and that the constitutional term of its service will expire with my own, heightens the solicitude with which I shall attempt to lay before it the state of our national concerns, and the devout hope which I cherish, that its labors to improve them may be crowned with success.

You are assembled at a period of profound interest to the American patriot. The unexampled growth and prosperity of our country, having given us a rank in the scale of nations which removes all apprehension of danger to our integrity and independence from external foes, the career of freedom is before us, with an earnest from the past, that, if true to ourselves, there can be no formidable obstacle in the future, to its peaceful and uninterrupted pursuit. Yet, in proportion to the disappearance of those apprehensions which attended our weakness, at once contrasted with the power of some of the states of the old world, should we now be solicitous as to those which belong to the conviction, that it is to our own conduct we must look for the preservation of those causes, on which depend the excellence and the duration of our happy system of Government.

In the example of other systems, founded on the will of the people, we trace to internal dissension the influences which have so often blasted the hopes of the friends of freedom. The social elements, which were strong and successful when united against external danger, failed in the more difficult task of properly adjusting their own internal organization, and thus gave way the great principle of self-government. Let us trust that this admonition will never be forgotten by the Government or the People of the United States; and that the testimony which our experience thus far holds out to the great human family, of the practicability and the blessings of free government will be confirmed in all time to come.

We have but to look at the state of our agriculture, manufactures, and commerce, and the unexampled increase of our population; to feel the magnitude of the trust committed to us. Never, in any former period of our history, have we had greater reason than we now have, to be thankful to Divine Providence for the blessings of health and general prosperity. Every branch of labor we see crowned with the most abundant rewards: in every clement of national resources and wealth, and of individual comfort, we witness the most rapid and solid improvements. With no interruptions to this pleasing prospect at home, which will not yield to the spirit of harmony and good will that so strikingly pervades the mass of the people in every quarter, amidst all the diversity of interest and pursuits to which they are attached: and with no cause of solicitude in regard to our external affairs, which will not, it is hoped, disappear before the principles of simple justice and the forbearance that mark our intercourse with foreign Powers—we have every reason to feel proud of our beloved country.

The general state of our Foreign Relations has not materially changed since my last annual message.

In the settlement of the question of the Northeastern boundary, little progress has been made. Great Britain has declined acceding to the proposition of the United States, presented in accordance with the resolution of the Senate, unless certain preliminary conditions were admitted, which I deemed incompatible with a satisfactory and rightful adjustment of the controversy. Waiting for some distinct proposal from the Government of Great Britain, which has been invited, I can only repeat the expression of my confidence, that with the strong mutual disposition which I believe exists, to make a just arrangement, this perplexing question can be settled with a due regard to the well-founded pretensions and pacific policy of all the parties to it. Events are frequently occurring on the Northeastern frontier, of a character to impress upon all the necessity of a speedy and definitive termination of the dispute. This consideration, added to the desire common to both, to relieve the liberal and friendly relations so happily existing between the two countries from all embarrassment, will, no doubt, have its just influence upon both.

Our diplomatic intercourse with Portugal has been renewed, and it is expected that the claims of our citizens, partially paid, will be fully satisfied as soon as the condition of the Queen's Government will permit the proper attention to the subject of them. That Government has, I am happy to inform you, manifested a determination to act upon the liberal principles which have marked our commercial policy; the happiest effects upon the future trade between the United States and Portugal, are anticipated from it, and the time is not thought to be remote when a system of perfect reciprocity will be established.

The instalments due under the Convention with the King of the Two Sicilies, have been paid with that scrupulous fidelity by which his whole conduct has been characterised, and the hope is indulged, that the adjustment of the vexed question of our claims will be followed by a more extended and mutually beneficial intercourse between the two countries.

The internal contest still continues in Spain. Distinguished as this struggle has unhappily been, by incidents of the most sanguinary character, the obligations of the late treaty of indemnification with us, have been, nevertheless, faithfully executed by the Spanish Government.

No provision having been made at the last session of Congress for the ascertainment of the claims to be paid, and the apportionment of the funds, under the convention made with Spain, I invite your early attention to the subject. The public evidences of the debt have, according to the terms of the convention, and in the forms prescribed by it, been placed in the possession of the United States, and the interest, as it fell due, has been regularly paid upon them. Our commercial intercourse with Cuba stands as regulated by the act of Congress. No recent information has been received as to the disposition of the Government of Madrid on this subject, and the lamented death of our recently appointed Minister, on his way to Spain, with the pressure of their affairs at home, render it scarcely probable that any change is to be looked for during the coming year. Further portions of the Florida archives have been sent to the United States, although the death of one of the Commissioners, at a critical moment, embarrassed the progress of the delivery of them. The higher officers of the local Government have recently shown an anxious desire, in compliance with the orders from the parent Government, to facilitate the selection and delivery of all we have a right to claim.

Negotiations have been opened at Madrid, for the establishment of a lasting peace between Spain and such of the Spanish American Governments of this hemisphere, as have availed themselves of the intimation given to all of them, of the disposition of Spain to treat upon the basis of their entire independence. It is to be regretted, that simultaneous appointments, by all, of ministers to negotiate with Spain, had not been made; the negotiation itself would have been simplified, and this long-standing dispute, spreading over a large portion of the world, would have been brought to a more speedy conclusion.

Our political and commercial relations with Austria, Prussia, Sweden, and Denmark, stand on the usual favorable bases. One of the articles of our treaty with Russia, in relation to the trade on the Northwest coast of America, having expired, instructions have been given to our Minister at St. Petersburg to negotiate a renewal of it. The long and unbroken amity between the two Governments gives every reason for supposing the article will be renewed, if stronger motives do not exist to prevent it than, with our view of the subject, can be anticipated here.

I ask your attention to the message of my predecessor at the opening of the second session of the nineteenth Congress, relative to our commercial intercourse with Holland, and to the documents connected with that subject, communicated to the House of Representatives on the 10th of January, 1825, and 18th January, 1827. Coinciding in the opinion of my predecessor, that Holland is not, under the regulations of her present system, entitled to have her vessels and their cargoes received into the United States on the footing of American vessels and cargoes, as regards duties of tonnage and impost, a respect for his reference of it to the Legislature, has alone prevented me from acting on the subject. I should still have waited, without comment, for the action of Congress, but recently a claim has been made by Belgian subjects to admission into our ports for their ships and cargoes, on the same footing as American, with the allegation we could not dispute, that our vessels received in their ports the identical treatment shown to them in the ports of Holland, upon whose vessels no discrimination is made in the ports of the United States. Giving the same privileges, the Belgians expected the same benefits—benefits that were in fact enjoyed when Belgium and Holland were united under one government. Satisfied with the justice of their pretension to be placed on the same footing with Holland, I could not, nevertheless, without disregard to the principle of our laws, admit their claim to be treated as Americans; and at the same time a respect for Congress, to whom the subject had long since been referred, has prevented me from producing a just equality, by taking from the vessels of Holland privileges conditionally granted by acts of Congress, although the condition upon which the grant was made, has, in my judgment, failed since 1822. I recommend, therefore, a review of the act of 1824, and such a modification of it as will produce an equality, on such terms as Congress shall think best comports with our settled policy, and the obligations of justice to two friendly Powers.

With the Sublime Porte, and all the Governments on the coast of Barbary, our relations continue to be friendly. The proper steps have been taken to renew our treaty with Morocco.

The Argentine Republic has again promised to send, within the current year, a Minister to the United States.

A Convention with Mexico for extending the time for the appointment of commissioners to run the boundary line has been concluded, and will be submitted to the Senate. Recent events in that country have awakened the liveliest solicitude in the United States. Aware of the strong temptations existing, and powerful inducements held out to the citizens of the United States to mingle in the dissensions of our immediate neighbors, instructions have been given to the District Attorneys of the United States, where indications warranted it, to prosecute, without respect to persons, all who might attempt to violate the obligations of our neutrality: while at the same time it has been thought necessary to apprise the Government of Mexico that we should require the integrity of our territory to be scrupulously respected by both parties.

From our diplomatic agents in Brazil, Chili, Peru, Central America, Venezuela, and New Granada, constant assurances are received of the continued good understanding with the Governments to which they are severally accredited. With those Governments upon which our citizens have valid and accumulating claims, scarcely an advance towards a settlement of them is made, owing mainly to their distracted state, or to the pressure of imperative domestic questions. Our patience has been, and will probably be, still further severely tried; but our fellow-citizens whose interests are involved, may confide in the determination of the Government to obtain for them, eventually, ample retribution.

Unfortunately, many of the nations of this hemisphere are still self-tormented by domestic dissensions. Revolution succeeds revolution, injuries are committed upon foreigners engaged in lawful pursuits, much time elapses before a Government sufficiently stable is erected to justify expectation of redress—Ministers are sent and received, and before the discussions of past injuries are fairly begun, fresh troubles arise; but too frequently new injuries are added to the old, to be discussed together, with the existing Government, after it has proved its ability to sustain the assaults made upon it, or with its successor, if overthrown. If this unhappy condition of things continues much longer, other nations will be under the painful necessity of deciding whether justice to their suffering citizens does not require a prompt redress of injuries by their own power, without waiting for the establishment of a Government competent and enduring enough to discuss and to make satisfaction for them.

Since the last session of Congress, the validity of our claims upon France, as liquidated by the treaty of 1831, has been acknowledged by both branches of her Legislature, and the money has been appropriated for their discharge; but the payment is, I regret to inform you, still withheld.

A brief recapitulation of the most important incidents in this protracted controversy, will show how utterly untenable are the grounds upon which this course is attempted to be justified.

On entering upon the duties of my station, I found the United States an unsuccessful applicant to the justice of France, for the satisfaction of claims, the validity of which was never questionable, and has now been most solemnly admitted by France herself. The antiquity of these claims, their high justice, and the aggravating circumstances out of which they arose, are too familiar to the American People to require description. It is sufficient to say, that, for a period of ten years and upwards, our commerce was, with but little interruption, the subject of constant aggressions on the part of France—aggressions, the ordinary features of which were condemnations of vessels and cargoes under arbitrary decrees, adopted in contravention, as well of the laws of nations, as of treaty stipulations: burnings on the high seas, and seizures and confiscations, under special imperial rescripts, in the ports of other nations occupied by the armies, or under the control of France.—Such, it is now conceded, is the character of the wrongs we suffered—wrong, in many cases, so flagrant, that even their authors never denied our right to reparation. Of the extent of these injuries, some conception may be formed from the fact, that after the burning of a large amount at sea, and the necessary deterioration, in other cases, by long detention, the American property so seized and sacrificed at forced sales, excluding what was adjudged to privateers, before or without condemnation, brought into the French Treasury upwards of twenty-four millions of francs, besides large custom-house duties.

The subject had already been an affair of twenty years' uninterrupted negotiation, except for a short time, when France was overwhelmed by the military power of united Europe. During this period, whilst other nations were extorting from her payment of their claims at the point of the bayonet, the United States intermitted their demand for justice, out of respect to the oppressed condition of a gallant people, to whom they felt under obligations for fraternal assistance in their own days of suffering and of peril. The bad effects of these protracted and unavailing discussions, as well upon our relations with France as upon our national character, were obvious; and the line of duty was to my mind equally so. This was, either to insist upon the adjustment of our claims within a reasonable period, or to abandon them altogether. I could not doubt that, by this course, the interests and honor of both countries would be best consulted. Instructions were therefore given in this spirit, to the Minister who was sent out, once more to demand reparation. Upon the meeting of Congress, in December, 1829, I felt it my duty to speak of these claims, and the delays of France, in terms calculated to call the serious attention of both countries to the subject. The then French Ministry took exception to the message on the ground of its containing a menace, under which it was not agreeable to the French Government to negotiate. The American minister, of his own accord, refuted the construction which was attempted to be put upon the message, and, at the same time, called to the recollection of the French Ministry, that the President's message was a communication addressed, not to Foreign Governments, but to the Congress of the United States, in which it was enjoined upon him, by the constitution, to lay before that body information of the state of the Union, comprehending its foreign as well as its domestic relations; and that if, in the discharge of this duty, he felt it incumbent upon him to summon the attention of Congress, in due time, to what might be the possible consequences of existing difficulties with any foreign Government, he might fairly be supposed to do so under a sense of what was due from him in a frank communication with another branch of his own Government, and not from any intention of holding a menace over a foreign Power. The views taken by him received my approbation; the French Government was satisfied, and the negotiation was continued. It terminated in the treaty of July 4, 1831, recognising the justice of our claims, in part, and promising payment to the amount of twenty-five millions of francs, in six annual instalments.

The ratifications of this treaty were exchanged at Washington, on the 2d of February, 1832, and in five days thereafter it was laid before Congress, who immediately passed the acts necessary, on our part, to secure to France the commercial advantages conceded to her in the compact. The treaty had previously been solemnly ratified by the King of the French, in terms which are certainly not mere matters of form, and of which the translation is as follows: "We, approving the above convention, in all and each of the dispositions which are contained in it, do declare, by ourselves, as well as by our heirs and successors, that it is accepted, approved, ratified, and confirmed; and by these presents, signed by our hand, we do accept, approve, ratify, and confirm it; promising, on the faith and word of a King, to observe it, and to cause it to be observed inviolably, without ever contravening it, or suffering it to be contravened, directly or indirectly, for any cause, or under any pretence whatsoever."

Official information of the exchange of ratifications in the United States reached Paris whilst the Chambers were in session. The extraordinary, and to us injurious, delays of the French Government, in their action upon the subject of its fulfilment, have been heretofore stated to Congress, and I have no disposition to enlarge upon them here. It is sufficient to observe that the then pending session was allowed to expire without even an effort to obtain the necessary appropriations; that the two succeeding ones were also suffered to pass away without any thing like a serious attempt to obtain a decision upon the subject; and that it was not until the fourth session, almost three years after the conclusion of the treaty, and more than two years after the exchange of ratifications, that the bill for the execution of the treaty was pressed to a vote and rejected.

In the meantime, the Government of the United States, having full confidence that a treaty entered into and so solemnly ratified by the French King, would be executed in good faith, and not doubting that provision would be made for the payment of the first instalment, which was to become due on the second day of February, 1833, negotiated a draft for the amount through the Bank of the United States. When this draft was presented by the holder, with the credentials required by the treaty to authorize him to receive the money, the Government of France allowed it to be protested. In addition to the injury in the non-payment of the money by France, conformably to her engagement, the United States were exposed to a heavy claim on the part of the Bank, under pretence of damages, in satisfaction of which that institution seized upon, and still retains, an equal amount of the public moneys. Congress was in session when the decision of the Chambers reached Washington, and an immediate communication of this apparently final decision of France not to fulfil the stipulations of the treaty, was the course naturally to be expected from the President. The deep tone of dissatisfaction which pervaded the public mind, and the correspondent excitement produced in Congress by only a general knowledge of the result, rendered it more than probable that a resort to immediate measures of redress would be the consequence of calling the attention of that body to the subject. Sincerely desirous of preserving the pacific relations which had so long existed between the two countries, I was anxious to avoid this course if I could be satisfied that by doing so neither the interest nor the honor of my country would be compromised. Without the fullest assurances upon that point, I could not hope to acquit myself of the responsibility to be incurred, in suffering Congress to adjourn without laying the subject before them. Those received by me were believed to be of that character.

That the feelings produced in the United States by the news of the rejection of the appropriation would be such as I have described them to have been, was foreseen by the French Government, and prompt measures were taken by it to prevent the consequences. The King, in person, expressed through our Minister at Paris his profound regret at the decision of the Chambers, and promised to send, forthwith, a national ship with despatches to his Minister here, authorizing him to give such assurances as would satisfy the Government and People of the United States that the treaty would yet be faithfully executed by France. The national ship arrived, and the Minister received his instructions. Claiming to act under the authority derived from them, he gave to this Government in the name of his, the most solemn assurances, that, as soon after the new elections as the charter would permit, the French Chambers would be convened, and the attempt to procure the necessary appropriations renewed; that all the constitutional powers of the King and his Ministers should be put in requisition to accomplish the object; and he was understood and so expressly informed by this Government at the time, to engage that the question should be pressed to a decision at a period sufficiently early to permit information of the result to be communicated to Congress at the commencement of their next session. Relying upon these assurances, I incurred the responsibility, great as I regarded it to be, of suffering Congress to separate without communicating with them upon the subject.

The expectations justly founded upon the promises thus solemnly made to this Government by that of France, were not realized. The French Chambers met on the 31st of July, 1834, soon after the election; and although our Minister in Paris urged the French Ministry to bring the subject before them, they declined doing so. He next insisted that the Chambers, if prorogued without acting on the subject, should be re-assembled at a period so early that their action on the treaty might be known in Washington prior to the meeting of Congress. This reasonable request was not only declined, but the Chambers were prorogued to the 29th of December, a day so late, that their decision, however urgently pressed, could not, in all probability, be obtained in time to reach Washington before the necessary adjournment of Congress by the Constitution. The reasons given by the Ministry for refusing to convoke the Chambers at an early period, were afterwards shown not to be insuperable, by their actual convocation on the 1st of December, under a special call, for domestic purposes—which fact, however, did not become known to this Government until after the commencement of the last session of Congress.

Thus disappointed in our just expectations, it became my imperative duty to consult with Congress in regard to the expediency of a resort to retaliatory measures, in case the stipulations of the treaty should not be speedily complied with; and to recommend such as in my judgment, the occasion called for. To this end, an unreserved communication of the case, in all its aspects, became indispensable. To have shrunk, in making it, from saying all that was necessary to its correct understanding, and that the truth would justify, for fear of giving offence to others, would have been unworthy of us. To have gone, on the other hand, a single step further, for the purpose of wounding the pride of a Government and people with whom we had so many motives for cultivating relations of amity and reciprocal advantage, would have been unwise and improper. Admonished by the past of the difficulty of making even the simplest statement of our wrongs, without disturbing the sensibilities of those who had, by their position, become responsible for their redress, and earnestly desirous of preventing further obstacles from that source, I went out of my way to preclude a construction of the message, by which the recommendation that was made to Congress might be regarded as a menace to France, in not only disavowing such a design, but in declaring that her pride and her power were too well known to expect any thing from her fears. The message did not reach Paris until more than a month after the Chambers had been in session; and such was the insensibility of the Ministry to our rightful claims and just expectations, that our Minister had been informed that the matter, when introduced, would not be pressed as a cabinet measure.

Although the message was not officially communicated to the French Government, and notwithstanding the declaration to the contrary which it contained, the French Ministry decided to consider the conditional recommendation of reprisals, a menace and an insult, which the honor of the nation made it incumbent on them to resent. The measures resorted to by them to evince their sense of the supposed indignity, were, the immediate recall of their Minister at Washington, the offer of passports to the American Minister at Paris, and a public notice to the Legislative Chambers, that all diplomatic intercourse with the United States had been suspended.

Having, in this manner, vindicated the dignity of France, they next proceeded to illustrate her justice. To this end a bill was immediately introduced into the Chamber of Deputies, proposing to make the appropriations necessary to carry into effect the treaty. As this bill subsequently passed into a law, the provisions of which now constitute the main subject of difficulty between the two nations, it becomes my duty, in order to place the subject before you in a clear light, to trace the history of its passage, and to refer, with some particularity, to the proceedings and discussions in regard to it. The Minister of Finance, in his opening speech, alluded to the measures which had been adopted to resent the supposed indignity, and recommended the execution of the treaty as a measure required by the honor and justice of France. He, as the organ of the Ministry, declared the message, so long as it had not received the sanction of Congress, a mere expression of the personal opinion of the President, for which neither the Government nor People of the United States were responsible, and that an engagement had been entered into, for the fulfilment of which the honor of France was pledged. Entertaining these views, the single condition which the French Ministry proposed to annex to the payment of the money was, that it should not be made until it was ascertained that the Government of the United States had done nothing to injure the interests of France; or, in other words, that no steps had been authorized by Congress of a hostile character towards France.

What the disposition or action of Congress might be, was then unknown to the French Cabinet. But, on the 14th of January, the Senate resolved that it was, at that time, inexpedient to adopt any legislative measures in regard to the state of affairs between the United States and France, and no action on the subject had occurred in the House of Representatives. These facts were known in Paris prior to the 28th of March, 1835, when the committee, to whom the bill of indemnification had been referred, reported it to the Chamber of Deputies. That committee substantially re-echoed the sentiments of the Ministry, declared that Congress had set aside the proposition of the President, and recommended the passage of the bill without any other restriction than that originally proposed. Thus was it known to the French Ministry and Chambers, that if the position assumed by them, and which had been so frequently and solemnly announced as the only one compatible with the honor of France, was maintained, and the bill passed as originally proposed, the money would be paid, and there would be an end of this unfortunate controversy.

But this cheering prospect was soon destroyed by an amendment introduced into the bill at the moment of its passage, providing that the money should not be paid until the French Government had received satisfactory explanations of the President's message, of the 2d December, 1834; and what is still more extraordinary, the President of the Council of Ministers adopted this amendment, and consented to its incorporation in the bill. In regard to a supposed insult which had been formally resented by the recall of their Minister, and the offer of passports to curs, they now, for the first time, proposed to ask explanations. Sentiments and propositions, which they had declared could not justly be imputed to the Government or People of the United States, are set up as obstacles to the performance of an act of conceded justice to that Government and People. They had declared that the honor of France required the fulfilment of the engagement into which the King had entered, unless Congress adopted the recommendations of the message. They ascertained that Congress did not adopt them, and yet that fulfilment is refused, unless they first obtain from the President explanations of an opinion characterized by themselves as personal and inoperative.

The conception that it was my intention to menace or insult the Government of France, is as unfounded, as the attempt to extort from the fears of that nation what her sense of justice may deny, would be vain and ridiculous. But the constitution of the United States imposes on the President the duty of laying before Congress the condition of the country, in its foreign and domestic relations, and of recommending such measures as may, in his opinion, be required by its interests. From the performance of this duty he cannot be deterred by the fear of wounding the sensibilities of the people or Government of whom it may become necessary to speak; and the American People are incapable of submitting to an interference, by any Government on earth, however powerful, with the free performance of the domestic duties which the constitution has imposed on their public functionaries. The discussions which intervene between the several departments of our Government belong to ourselves; and, for any thing said in them, our public servants are only responsible to their own constituents, and to each other. If, in the course of their consultations, facts are erroneously stated, or unjust deductions are made, they require no other inducement to correct them, however informed of their error, than their love of justice, and what is due to their own character; but they can never submit to be interrogated upon the subject, as a matter of right, by a foreign Power. When our discussions terminate in acts, our responsibility to foreign Powers commences, not as individuals, but as a nation. The principle which calls in question the President for the language of his message, would equally justify a foreign Power in demanding explanation of the language used in the report of a committee, or by a member in debate.

This is not the first time that the Government of France has taken exception to the messages of American Presidents. President Washington, and the first President Adams, in the performance of their duties to the American People, fell under the animadversions of the French Directory. The objection taken by the Ministry of Charles X, and removed by the explanations made by our Minister upon the spot, has already been adverted to. When it was understood that the Ministry of the present King took exception to my message of last year, putting a construction upon it which was disavowed on its face, our late Minister at Paris, in answer to the note which first announced a dissatisfaction with the language used in the message, made a communication to the French Government under date of the 29th of January, 1835, calculated to remove all impressions which an unreasonable susceptibility had created. He repeated, and called the attention of the French Government to, the disavowal contained in the message itself, of any intention to intimidate by menace—he truly declared that it contained, and was intended to contain, no charge of ill-faith against the King of the French, and properly distinguished between the right to complain in unexceptionable terms, of the omission to execute an agreement, and an accusation of bad motives in withholding such execution—and demonstrated, that the necessary use of that right ought not to be considered as an offensive imputation. Although this communication was made without instructions, and entirely on the Minister's own responsibility, yet it was afterwards made the act of this Government by my full approbation, and that approbation was officially made known on the 25th of April, 1835, to the French Government. It, however, failed to have any effect. The law, after this friendly explanation, passed with the obnoxious amendment, supported by the King's Ministers, and was finally approved by the King.

The People of the United States are justly attached to a pacific system in their intercourse with foreign nations. It is proper, therefore, that they should know whether their Government has adhered to it. In the present instance it has been carried to the utmost extent that was consistent with a becoming self-respect. The note of the 29th of January, to which I have before alluded, was not the only one which our Minister took upon himself the responsibility of presenting, on the same subject, and in the same spirit. Finding that it was intended to make the payment of a just debt dependent on the performance of a condition which he knew could never be complied with, he thought it a duty to make another attempt to convince the French Government, that whilst self-respect and a regard to the dignity of other nations would always prevent us from using any language that ought to give offence, yet we could never admit a right in any foreign Government to ask explanations of, or to interfere in any manner in, the communications which one branch of our public councils made with another: that in the present case no such language had been used, and that this had in a former note been fully and voluntarily stated, before it was contemplated to make the explanation a condition: and that there might be no misapprehension, he stated the terms used in that note, and he officially informed them that it had been approved by the President; and that, therefore, every explanation which could reasonably be asked, or honorably given, had been already made—that the contemplated measure had been anticipated by a voluntary and friendly declaration, and was therefore not only useless, but might be deemed offensive, and certainly would not be complied with, if annexed as a condition.

When this latter communication, to which I specially invite the attention of Congress, was laid before me, I entertained the hope that the means it was obviously intended to afford, of an honorable and speedy adjustment of the difficulties between the two nations, would have been accepted, and I therefore did not hesitate to give it my sanction and full approbation. This was due to the Minister who had made himself responsible for the act; and it was published to the People of the United States, and is now laid before their representatives, to show how far their Executive has gone in its endeavors to restore a good understanding between the two countries. It would have been, at any time, communicated to the Government of France, had it been officially requested.

The French Government having received all the explanation which honor and principle permitted, and which could in reason be asked, it was hoped it would no longer hesitate to pay the instalments now due. The agent authorized to receive the money was instructed to inform the French Minister of his readiness to do so. In reply to this notice, he was told that the money could not then be paid, because the formalities required by the act of the Chambers had not been arranged.

Not having received any official communication of the intentions of the French Government, and anxious to bring, as far as practicable, this unpleasant affair to a close before the meeting of Congress, that you might have the whole subject before you, I caused our Charge d'Affaires at Paris to be instructed to ask for the final determination of the French Government; and in the event of their refusal to pay the instalments now due, without further explanations, to return to the United States.

The result of this last application has not yet reached us, but is daily expected. That it may be favorable, is my sincere wish. France having now, through all the branches of her Government, acknowledged the validity of our claims, and the obligation of the treaty of 1831; and there really existing no adequate cause for further delay, will, at length, it may be hoped, adopt the course which the interests of both nations, not less than the principles of justice, so imperiously require. The treaty being once executed on her part, little will remain to disturb the friendly relations of the two countries; nothing, indeed, which will not yield to the suggestions of a pacific and enlightened policy, and to the influence of that mutual good will and of those generous recollections, which we may confidently expect will then be revived in all their ancient force. In any event, however, the principle involved in the new aspect which has been given to the controversy, is so vitally important to the independent administration of the Government, that it can neither be surrendered nor compromised, without national degradation. I hope it is unnecessary for me to say, that such a sacrifice will not be made through any agency of mine. The honor of my country shall never be stained by an apology from me, for the statement of truth and the performance of duty; nor can I give any explanation of my official acts, except such as is due to integrity and justice, and consistent with the principles on which our institutions have been framed. This determination will, I am confident, be approved by my constituents. I have, indeed, studied their character to but little purpose, if the sum of twenty-five millions of francs will have the weight of a feather, in the estimation of what appertains to their national independence; and if, unhappily, a different impression should at any time obtain in any quarter, they will, I am sure, rally round the Government of their choice with alacrity and unanimity, and silence forever the degrading imputation.

Having thus frankly presented to you the circumstances which, since the last session of Congress, have occurred in this interesting and important matter, with the views of the Executive in regard to them, it is at this time only necessary to add, that whenever the advices, now daily expected from our Charge d'Affaires, shall have been received, they will be made the subject of a special communication.

The condition of the Public Finances was never more flattering than at the present period.

Since my last annual communication, all the remains of the Public Debt have been redeemed, or money has been placed in deposit for this purpose, whenever the creditors choose to receive it. All the other pecuniary engagements of the Government have been honorably and promptly fulfilled, and there will be a balance in the Treasury, at the close of the present year, of about nineteen millions of dollars. It is believed, that after meeting all outstanding and unexpended appropriations, there will remain near eleven millions to be applied to any new objects which Congress may designate, or to the more rapid execution of the works already in progress. In aid of these objects, and to satisfy the current expenditures of the ensuing year, it is estimated that there will be received, from various sources, twenty millions more in 1836.

Should Congress make new appropriations, in conformity with the estimates which will be submitted from the proper departments, amounting to about twenty-four millions, still the available surplus at the close of the next year, after deducting all unexpended appropriations, will probably be not less than six millions. This sum can, in my judgment, be now usefully applied to proposed improvements in our Navy Yards, and to new national works, which are not enumerated in the present estimates, or to the more rapid completion of those already begun. Either would be constitutional and useful, and would render unnecessary any attempt, in our present peculiar condition, to divide the surplus revenue, or to reduce it any faster than will be effected by the existing laws. In any event, as the annual report from the Secretary of the Treasury will enter into details, showing the probability of some decrease in the revenue during the next seven years, and a very considerable deduction in 1842, it is not recommended that Congress should undertake to modify the present tariff, so as to disturb the principles on which the compromise act was passed. Taxation on some of the articles of general consumption, which are not in competition with our own productions, may be, no doubt, so diminished as to lessen, to some extent, the source of this revenue; and the same object can also be assisted by more liberal provisions for the subjects of public defence, which, in the present state of our prosperity and wealth, may be expected to engage your attention. If, however, after satisfying all the demands which can arise from these sources, the unexpended balance in the Treasury should still continue to increase, it would be better to bear with the evil until the great changes contemplated in our tariff laws have occurred, and shall enable us to revise the system with that care and circumspection which are due to so delicate and important a subject.

It is certainly our duty to diminish, as far as we can, the burdens of taxation, and to regard all the restrictions which are imposed on the trade and navigation of our citizens as evils which we shall mitigate whenever we are not prevented by the adverse legislation and policy of foreign nations, or those primary duties which the defence and independence of our country enjoin upon us. That we have accomplished much towards the relief of our citizens by the changes which have accompanied the payment of the public debt, and the adoption of the present revenue laws, is manifest from the fact, that, compared with 1833, there is a diminution of near twenty-five millions in the last two years, and that our expenditures, independently of those for the public debt, have been reduced near nine millions during the same period. Let us trust, that by the continued observance of economy, and by harmonizing the great interests of agriculture, manufactures, and commerce, much more may be accomplished to diminish the burdens of Government, and to increase still further the enterprise and the patriotic affection of all classes of our citizens, and all the members of our happy Confederacy. As the data which the Secretary of the Treasury will lay before you, in regard to our financial resources, are full and extended, and will afford a safe guide in your future calculations, I think it unnecessary to offer any further observations on that subject here.

Among the evidences of the increasing prosperity of the country, not the least gratifying is that afforded by the receipts from the sales of the public lands, which amount, in the present year, to the unexpected sum of $11,000,000.—This circumstance attests the rapidity with which agriculture, the first and most important occupation of man, advances, and contributes to the wealth and power of our extended territory. Being still of the opinion that it is our best policy, as far as we can, consistently with the obligations under which those lands were ceded to the United States, to promote their speedy settlement, I beg leave to call the attention of the present Congress to the suggestions I have offered respecting it in my former messages.

The extraordinary receipts from the sales of the public lands invite you to consider what improvements the land system, and particularly the condition of the General Land Office, may require. At the time this institution was organized, near a quarter of a century ago, it would probably have been thought extravagant to anticipate, for this period, such an addition to its business as has been produced by the vast increase of those sales during the past and present years. It may also be observed that, since the year 1812, the land offices and surveying districts have been greatly multiplied, and that numerous legislative enactments, from year to year since that time, have imposed a great amount of new and additional duties upon that office; while the want of a timely application of force, commensurate with the care and labor required, has caused the increasing embarrassment of accumulated arrears in the different branches of the establishment.

These impediments to the expedition of much duty in the General Land Office induce me to submit to your judgment, whethersome modification of the laws relating to its organization, or an organization of a new character, be not called for at the present juncture, to enable the office to accomplish all the ends of its institution with a greater degree of facility and promptitude than experience has proved to be practicable, under existing regulations. The variety of the concerns, and the magnitude and complexity of the details occupying and dividing the attention of the Commissioner, appear to render it difficult, if not impracticable, for that officer, by any possible assiduity, to bestow on all the multifarious subjects, upon which he is called to act, the ready and careful attention due to their respective importance; unless the Legislature shall assist him by a law providing, or enabling him to provide, for a more regular and economical distribution of labor, with the incident responsibility, among those employed under his direction. The mere manual operation of affixing his signature to the vast number of documents issuing from his office, subtracts so largely from the time and attention claimed by the weighty and complicated subjects daily accumulating in that branch of the public service, as to indicate the strong necessity of revising the organic law of the establishment. It will be easy for Congress, hereafter, to proportion the expenditure on account of this branch of the service to its real wants, by abolishing, from time to time, the offices which can be dispensed with.

The extinction of the Public Debt having taken place, there is no longer any use for the offices of Commissioners of Loans and of the Sinking Fund. I recommend, therefore, that they be abolished, and that proper measures be taken for the transfer, to the Treasury Department, of any funds, books, and papers, connected with the operations of those offices; and that the proper power be given to that Department for closing, finally, any portion of their business which may remain to be settled.

It is also incumbent on Congress, in guarding the pecuniary interests of the country, to discontinue, by such a law as was passed in 1812, the receipt of the bills of the Bank of the United States in payment of the public revenue; and to provide for the designation of an agent, whose duty it shall be to take charge of the books and stock of the United States in that institution, and to close all connection with it, after the 3d of March, 1836, when its charter expires. In making provision in regard to the disposition of this stock, it will be essential to define, clearly and strictly, the duties and powers of the officer charged with that branch of the public service.

It will be seen from the correspondence which the Secretary of the Treasury will lay before you, that, notwithstanding the large amount of the stock which the United States hold in that institution, no information has yet been communicated which will enable the Government to anticipate when it can receive any dividends, or derive any benefit from it.

Connected with the condition of the finances, and the flourishing state of the country in all its branches of industry, it is pleasing to witness the advantages which have been already derived from the recent laws regulating the value of the gold coinage. These advantages will be more apparent in the course of the next year, when the branch mints authorised to be established in North Carolina, Georgia, and Louisiana, shall have gone into operation. Aided, as it is hoped they will be, by further reforms in the banking systems of the States, and by judicious regulations on the part of Congress, in relation to the custody of the public moneys, it may be confidently anticipated that the use of gold and silver, as a circulating medium, will become general in the ordinary transactions, connected with the labor of the country. The great desideratum, in modern times, is an efficient check upon the power of banks, preventing that excessive issue of paper whence arise those fluctuations in the standard of value, which render uncertain the rewards of labor. It was supposed by those who established the Bank of the United States, that from the credit given to it by the custody of the public moneys, and other privileges, and the precautions taken to guard against the evils which the country had suffered in the bankruptcy of many of the State institutions of that period, we should derive from that institution all the security and benefits of a sound currency, and every good end that was attainable under that provision of the Constitution which authorises Congress alone to coin money and regulate the value thereof. But it is scarcely necessary now to say that these anticipations have not been realized. After the extensive embarrassment and distress recently produced by the Bank of the United States, from which the country is now recovering, aggravated as they were by pretensions to power which defied the public authority, and which, if acquiesced in by the People, would have changed the whole character of our Government, every candid and intelligent individual must admit that, for the attainment of the great advantages of a sound currency, we must look to a course of legislation radically different from that which created such an institution.

In considering the means of obtaining so important an end, we must set aside all calculations of temporary convenience, and be influenced by those only which are in harmony with the true character and the permanent interests of the Republic. We must recur to first principles, and see what it is that has prevented the legislation of Congress and the States, on the subject of currency, from satisfying the public expectation, and realizing results corresponding to those which have attended the action of our system when truly consistent with the great principle of equality upon which it rests, and with that spirit of forbearance and mutual concession, and generous patriotism, which was originally, and must ever continue to be, the vital element of our Union.

On this subject I am sure that I cannot be mistaken, in ascribing our want of success to the undue countenance which has been afforded to the spirit of monopoly. All the serious dangers which our system has yet encountered, may be traced to the resort to implied powers, and the use of corporations clothed with privileges, the effect of which is to advance the interests of the few at the expense of the many. We have felt but one class of these dangers exhibited in the contest waged by the Bank of the United States against the Government for the last four years. Happily, they have been obviated for the present by the indignant resistance of the people; but we should recollect that the principle whence they sprung is an ever active one, which will not fail to renew its efforts in the same and in other forms, so long as there is a hope of success, founded either on the inattention of the People, or the treachery of their representatives, to the subtle progress of its influence. The Bank is, in fact, but one of the fruits of a system at war with the genius of all our institutions—a system founded upon a political creed, the fundamental principle of which is a distrust of the popular will as a safe regulator of political power, and whose great ultimate object, and inevitable result, should it prevail, is the consolidation of all power in our system in one central Government. Lavish public disbursements, and corporations with exclusive privileges, would be its substitutes for the original, and, as yet, sound checks and balances of the constitution—the means by whose silent and secret operation a control would be exercised by the few over the political conduct of the many, by first acquiring that control over the labor and earnings of the great body of the People. Wherever this spirit has effected an alliance with political power, tyranny and despotism have been the fruit. If it is ever used for the ends of Government, it has to be incessantly watched, or it corrupts the sources of the public virtue, and agitates the country with questions unfavorable to the harmonious and steady pursuit of its true interests.

We are now to see whether, in the present favorable condition of the country, we cannot take an effectual stand against this spirit of monopoly, and practically prove, in respect to the currency as well as other important interests, that there is no necessity for so extensive a resort to it as that which has been heretofore practised. The experience of another year has confirmed the utter fallacy of the idea that the Bank of the United States was necessary as a fiscal agent of the Government. Without its aid, as such, indeed, in despite of all the embarrassment it was in its power to create, the revenue has been paid with punctuality by our citizens; the business of exchange, both foreign and domestic, has been conducted with convenience; and the circulating medium has been greatly improved. By the use of the State banks, which do not derive their charters from the General Government, and are not controlled by its authority, it is ascertained that the moneys of the United States can be collected and disbursed without loss or inconvenience, and that all the wants of the community, in relation to exchange and currency, are supplied as well as they have ever been before. If, under circumstances the most unfavorable to the steadiness of the money market, it has been found that the considerations on which the Bank of the United States rested its claims to the public favor were imaginary and groundless, it cannot be doubted that the experience of the future will be more decisive against them.

It has been seen, that, without the agency of a great moneyed monopoly, the revenue can be collected, and conveniently and safely applied to all the purposes of the public expenditure. It is also ascertained, that, instead of being necessarily made to promote the evils of an unchecked paper system, the management of the revenue can be made auxiliary to the reform which the Legislatures of several of the States have already commenced in regard to the suppression of small bills; and which has only to be fostered by proper regulations on the part of Congress to secure a practical return, to the extent required for the security of the currency, to the constitutional medium. Severed from the Government as political engines, and not susceptible of dangerous extension and combination, the State banks will not be tempted, nor will they have the power which we have seen exercised, to divert the public funds from the legitimate purposes of the Government. The collection and custody of the revenue being, on the contrary, a source of credit to them, will increase the security which the States provide for a faithful execution of their trusts, by multiplying the scrutinies to which their operations and accounts will be subjected. Thus disposed, as well from interest as the obligations of their charters, it cannot be doubted that such conditions as Congress may see fit to adopt respecting the deposits in these institutions, with a view to the gradual disuse of the small bills, will be cheerfully complied with; and that we shall soon gain, in place of the Bank of the United States, a practical reform in the whole paper system of the country. If, by this policy, we can ultimately witness the suppression of all bank bills below twenty dollars, it is apparent that gold and silver will take their place, and become the principal circulating medium in the common business of the farmers and mechanics of the country. The attainment of such a result will form an era in the history of our country which will be dwelt upon with delight by every true friend of its liberty and independence. It will lighten the great tax which our paper system has so long collected from the earnings of labor, and do more to revive and perpetuate those habits of economy and simplicity which are so congenial to the character of republicans, than all the legislation which has yet been attempted.

To this subject I feel that I cannot too earnestly invite the especial attention of Congress, without the exercise of whose authority, the opportunity to accomplish so much public good must pass unimproved. Deeply impressed with its vital importance, the Executive has taken all the steps within his constitutional power, to guard the public revenue, and defeat the expectation which the Bank of the United States indulged, of renewing and perpetuating its monopoly, on the ground of its necessity as a fiscal agent, and as affording a sounder currency than could be obtained without such an institution. In the performance of this duty much responsibility was incurred which would have been gladly avoided, if the stake which the public had in the question could have been otherwise preserved. Although clothed with the legal authority, and supported by precedent, I was aware that there was, in the act of the removal of the deposits, a liability to excite that sensitiveness to Executive power which it is the characteristic and the duty of freemen to indulge; but I relied on this feeling, also, directed by patriotism and intelligence, to vindicate the conduct which, in the end, would appear to have been called for by the best interests of my country. The apprehensions natural to this feeling, that there may have been a desire, through the instrumentality of that measure, to extend the Executive influence, or that it may have been prompted by motives not sufficiently free from ambition, were not overlooked. Under the operation of our institutions, the public servant who is called on to take a step of high responsibility, should feel in the freedom which gives rise to such apprehensions, his highest security. When unfounded, the attention which they arouse, and the discussions they excite, deprive those who indulge them, of the power to do harm: when just, they but hasten the certainty with which the great body of our citizens never fail to repel an attempt to procure their sanction to any exercise of power inconsistent with the jealous maintenance of their rights. Under such convictions, and entertaining no doubt that my constitutional obligations demanded the steps which were taken in reference to the removal of the deposits, it was impossible for me to be deterred from the path of duty, by a fear that my motives could be misjudged, or that political prejudices could defeat the just consideration of the merits of my conduct. The result has shown how safe is this reliance upon the patriotic temper and enlightened discernment of the People. That measure has now been before them, and has stood the test of all the severe analysis which its general importance, the interests it affected, and the apprehensions it excited, were calculated to produce: and it now remains for Congress to consider what legislation has become necessary in consequence.

I need only add to what I have, on former occasions, said on this subject generally, that in the regulations which Congress may prescribe respecting the custody of the public moneys, it is desirable that as little discretion as may be deemed consistent with their safe keeping should be given to the Executive agents. No one can be more deeply impressed than I am with the soundness of the doctrine which restrains and limits, by specific provisions, Executive discretion, as far as it can be done consistently with the preservation of its constitutional character. In respect to the control over the public money, this doctrine is peculiarly applicable, and is in harmony with the great principle which I felt I was sustaining in the controversy with the Bank of the United States; which has resulted in severing, to some extent, a dangerous connexion between a moneyed and political power. The duty of the legislature to define, by clear and positive enactment, the nature and extent of the action which it belongs to the Executive to superintend, springs out of a policy analogous to that which enjoins upon all the branches of the Federal Government an abstinence from the exercise of powers not clearly granted. In such a Government, possessing only limited and specific powers, the spirit of its general administration cannot be wise or just, when it opposes the reference of all doubtful points to the great source of authority, the States and the People; whose number and diversified relations, securing them against the influences and excitements which may mislead their agents, make them the safest depository of power. In its application to the Executive, with reference to the Legislative branch of the Government, the same rule of action should make the President ever anxious to avoid the exercise of any discretionary authority, which can be regulated by Congress. The biases which may operate upon him will not be so likely to extend to the representatives of the People in that body.

In my former messages to Congress I have repeatedly urged the propriety of lessening the discretionary authority lodged in the various departments; but it has produced no effect as yet, except the discontinuance of extra allowances in the Army and Navy, and the substitution of fixed salaries in the latter. It is believed that the same principles could be advantageously applied, in all cases, and would promote the efficiency and economy of the public service, at the same time that greater satisfaction and more equal justice would be secured to the public officers generally.

The accompanying Report of the Secretary of War will put you in possession of the operations of the department confided to his care, in all its diversified relations, during the past year.

I am gratified in being able to inform you that no occurrence has required any movement of the military force, except such as is common to a state of peace. The services of the army have been limited to their usual duties at the various garrisons upon the Atlantic and inland frontier, with the exceptions stated by the Secretary of War. Our small military establishment appears to be adequate to the purposes for which it is maintained, and it forms a nucleus around which any additional force may be collected, should the public exigencies unfortunately require any increase of our military means.

The various acts of Congress which have been recently passed in relation to the army, have improved its condition and have rendered its organization more useful and efficient. It is at all times in a state for prompt and vigorous action, and it contains within itself the power of extension to any useful limit; while, at the same time, it preserves that knowledge, both theoretical and practical, which education and experience alone can give; and which, if not acquired and preserved in time of peace, must be sought under great disadvantages in time of war.

The duties of the Engineer Corps press heavily upon that branch of the service; and the public interest requires an addition to its strength. The nature of the works in which the officers are engaged, render necessary professional knowledge and experience, and there is no economy in committing to them more duties than they can perform, or in assigning these to other persons temporarily employed, and too often, on necessity, without all the qualifications which such service demands. I recommend this subject to your attention, and also the proposition submitted at the last session of Congress, and now renewed, for a re-organization of the Topographical Corps. This re-organization can be effected without any addition to the present expenditure, and with much advantage to the public service. The branch of duties which devolves upon these officers is at all times interesting to the community, and the information furnished by them is useful in peace and in war.

Much loss and inconvenience have been experienced in consequence of the failure of the bill containing the ordinary appropriations for fortifications, which passed one branch of the National Legislature at the last session, but was lost in the other. This failure was the more regretted, not only because it necessarily interrupted and delayed the progress of a system of national defence, projected immediately after the last war, and since steadily pursued, but also because it contained a contingent appropriation inserted in accordance with the views of the Executive in aid of this important object, and other branches of the national defence, some portions of which might have been most usefully applied during the past season. I invite your early attention to that part of the report of the Secretary of War which relates to this subject, and recommend an appropriation sufficiently liberal to accelerate the armament of the fortifications, agreeably to the proposition submitted by him, and to place our whole Atlantic seaboard in a complete state of defence. A just regard to the permanent interests of the country evidently requires this measure, but there are also other reasons which, at the present juncture, give it peculiar force, and make it my duty to call to the subject your special consideration.

The present system of Military Education has been in operation sufficiently long to test its usefulness, and it has given to the army a valuable body of officers. It is not alone in the improvement, discipline, and operation of the troops, that these officers are employed. They are also extensively engaged in the administrative and fiscal concerns of the various matters confided to the War Department; in the execution of the staff duties, usually appertaining to military organization; in the removal of the Indians, and in the disbursement of the various expenditures growing out of our Indian relations; in the formation of roads, and in the improvement of harbors and rivers; in the construction of fortifications; in the fabrication of much of the matériel required for the public defence; and in the preservation, distribution, and accountability of the whole; and in other miscellaneous duties, not admitting of classification.

These diversified functions embrace very heavy expenditures of public money, and require fidelity, science, and business habits in their execution; and a system which shall secure these qualifications is demanded by the public interest. That this object has been, in a great measure, obtained by the Military Academy, is shown by the state of the service, and by the prompt accountability which has generally followed the necessary advances. Like all other political systems, the present mode of military education, no doubt, has its imperfections, both of principle and practice; but I trust these can be improved by rigid inspections, and by legislative scrutiny, without destroying the institution itself.

Occurrences, to which we as well as all other nations are liable, both in our internal and external relations, point to the necessity of an efficient organization of the Militia. I am again induced, by the importance of the subject, to bring it to your attention. To suppress domestic violence, and to repel foreign invasion, should these calamities overtake us, we must rely, in the first instance, upon the great body of the community, whose will has been instituted, and whose power must support the Government. A large standing military force is not consonant to the spirit of our institutions, nor to the feelings of our countrymen; and the lessons of former days, and those also of our own times, show the danger, as well as the enormous expense, of these permanent and extensive military organizations. That just medium which avoids an inadequate preparation on one hand, and the danger and expense of a large force on the other, is what our constituents have a right to expect from their Government. This object can be attained only by the maintenance of a small military force, and by such an organization of the physical strength of the country as may bring this power into operation, whenever its services are required. A classification of the population offers the most obvious means of effecting this organization. Such a division may be made as will be just to all, by transferring each, at a proper period of life, from one class to another, and by calling first for the services of that class, whether for instruction or action, which, from age, is qualified for the duty, and may be called to perform it with least injury to themselves, or to the public. Should the danger ever become so imminent as to require additional force, the other classes in succession would be ready for the call. And if, in addition to this organization, voluntary associations were encouraged, and inducements held out for their formation, our militia would be in a state of efficient service. Now, when we are at peace, is the proper time to digest and establish a practicable system. The object is certainly worth the experiment, and worth the expense. No one appreciating the blessings of a republican government, can object to his share of the burden which such a plan may impose. Indeed, a moderate portion of the national funds could scarcely be better applied than in carrying into effect and continuing such an arrangement, and in giving the necessary elementary instruction. We are happily at peace with all the world. A sincere desire to continue so, and a fixed determination to give no just cause of offence to other nations, furnish, unfortunately, no certain grounds of expectation that this relation will be uninterrupted. With this determination to give no offence is associated a resolution, equally decided, tamely to submit to none. The armor and the attitude of defence afford the best security against those collisions which the ambition, or interest, or some other passion of nations, not more justifiable, is liable to produce. In many countries, it is considered unsafe to put arms into the hands of the people, and to instruct them in the elements of military knowledge. That fear can have no place here, when it is recollected that the People are the sovereign power. Our Government was instituted, and is supported, by the ballot-box, not by the musket. Whatever changes await it, still greater changes must be made in our social institutions, before our political system can yield to physical force. In every aspect, therefore, in which I can view the subject, I am impressed with the importance of a prompt and efficient organization of the militia.

The plan of removing the Aboriginal people who yet remain within the settled portions of the United States, to the country west of the Mississippi river, approaches its consummation. It was adopted on the most mature consideration of the condition of this race, and ought to be persisted in till the object is accomplished, and prosecuted with as much vigor as a just regard to their circumstances will permit, and as fast as their consent can be obtained. All preceding experiments for the improvement of the Indians have failed. It seems now to be an established fact, that they cannot live in contact with a civilized community and prosper. Ages of fruitless endeavors, have at length brought us to a knowledge of this principle of intercommunication with them. The past we cannot recall, but the future we can provide for. Independently of the treaty stipulations, into which we have entered with the various tribes, for the usufructuary rights they have ceded to us, no one can doubt the moral duty of the Government of the United States to protect, and, if possible, to preserve and perpetuate the scattered remnants of this race, which are left within our borders. In the discharge of this duty, an extensive region in the West has been assigned for their permanent residence. It has been divided into districts, and allotted among them. Many have already removed, and others are preparing to go; and with the exception of two small bands, living in Ohio and Indiana, not exceeding fifteen hundred persons, and of the Cherokees, all the tribes on the east side of the Mississippi, and extending from Lake Michigan to Florida, have entered into engagements which will lead to their transplantation.

The plan for their removal and re-establishment is founded upon the knowledge we have gained of their character and habits, and has been dictated by a spirit of enlarged liberality. A territory exceeding in extent that relinquished, has been granted to each tribe. Of its climate, fertility, and capacity to support an Indian population, the representations are highly favorable. To these districts the Indians are removed at the expense of the United States; and, with certain supplies of clothing, arms, ammunition, and other indispensable articles, they are also furnished gratuitously with provisions for the period of a year after their arrival at their new homes. In that time, from the nature of the country, and of the products raised by them, they can subsist themselves by agricultural labor, if they choose to resort to that mode of life; if they do not, they are upon the skirts of the great prairies, where countless herds of buffalo roam, and a short time suffices to adapt their own habits to the changes which a change of the animals destined for their food may require. Ample arrangements have also been made for the support of schools, in some instances council houses and churches are to be erected, dwellings constructed for the chiefs, and mills for common use. Funds have been set apart for the maintenance of the poor; the most necessary mechanical arts have been introduced, and blacksmiths, gunsmiths, wheelwrights, millwrights, &c. are supported among them. Steel and iron, and sometimes salt, are purchased for them; and ploughs, and other farming utensils, domestic animals, looms, spinning wheels, cards, &c. are presented to them. And besides these beneficial arrangements, annuities are, in all cases, paid, amounting, in some instances, to more than thirty dollars for each individual of the tribe, and in all cases sufficiently great, if justly divided and prudently expended, to enable them, in addition to their own exertions, to live comfortably. And, as a stimulus for exertion, it is now provided by law, that "in all cases of the appointment of interpreters, or other persons employed for the benefit of the Indians, a preference shall be given to persons of Indian descent, if such can be found who are properly qualified for the discharge of the duties."

Such are the arrangements for the physical comfort, and for the moral improvement of the Indians. The necessary measures for their political advancement, and for their separation from our citizens have not been neglected. The pledge of the United States has been given by Congress, that the country destined for the residence of this people, shall be forever "secured and guaranteed to them." A country, west of Missouri and Arkansas, has been assigned to them, into which the white settlements are not to be pushed. No political communities can be formed in that extensive region, except those which are established by the Indians themselves, or by the United States for them, and with their concurrence. A barrier has thus been raised for their protection against the encroachments of our citizens; and guarding the Indians, as far as possible, from those evils which have brought them to their present condition. Summary authority has been given, by law, to destroy all ardent spirits found in their country, without waiting the doubtful result and slow process of a legal seizure. I consider the absolute and unconditional interdiction of this article, among those people, as the first and great step in their melioration. Half-way measures will answer no purpose. These cannot successfully contend against the cupidity of the seller, and the overpowering appetite of the buyer. And the destructive effects of the traffic are marked in every page of the history of our Indian intercourse.

Some general legislation seems necessary for the regulation of the relations which will exist in this new state of things between the Government and people of the United States, and these transplanted Indian tribes; and for the establishment among the latter, and with their own consent, of some principles of intercommunication, which their juxtaposition will call for; that moral may be substituted for physical force; the authority of a few and simple laws, for the tomahawk; and that an end may be put to those bloody wars, whose prosecution seems to have made a part of their social system.

After the further details of this arrangement are completed, with a very general supervision over them, they ought to be left to the progress of events. These, I indulge the hope, will secure their prosperity and improvement; and a large portion of the moral debt we owe them will then be paid.

The Report from the Secretary of the Navy, showing the condition of that branch of the public service, is recommended to your special attention. It appears from it, that our naval force at present in commission, with all the activity which can be given to it, is inadequate to the protection of our rapidly increasing commerce. This consideration, and the more general one which regards this arm of the national defence as our best security against foreign aggressions, strongly urge the continuance of the measures which promote its gradual enlargement, and a speedy increase of the force which has been heretofore employed abroad and at home. You will perceive from the estimates which appear in the report of the Secretary of the Navy, that the expenditures necessary to this increase of its force, though of considerable amount, are small compared with the benefits which they will secure to the country.

As a means of strengthening this national arm, I also recommend to your particular attention the propriety of the suggestion which attracted the consideration of Congress at its last session, respecting the enlistment of boys at a suitable age in the service. In this manner a nursery of skilful and able-bodied seamen can be established, which will be of the greatest importance. Next to the capacity to put afloat and arm the requisite number of ships, is the possession of the means to man them efficiently; and nothing seems better calculated to aid this object than the measure proposed. As an auxiliary to the advantages derived from our extensive commercial marine, it would furnish us with a resource ample enough for all the exigencies which can be anticipated. Considering the state of our resources, it cannot be doubted that whatever provision the liberality and wisdom of Congress may now adopt, with a view to the perfect organization of this branch of our service, will meet the approbation of all classes of our citizens.

By the report of the Postmaster General, it appears that the revenue of that department during the year ending on the 30th day of June last, exceeded its accruing responsibilities $236,206; and that the surplus of the present fiscal year is estimated at $476,227. It further appears that the debt of the department, on the 1st day of July last, including the amount due to contractors for the quarter then just expired, was about $1,064,381, exceeding the available means about $23,700; and that, on the 1st instant, about $597,077 of this debt had been paid; $409,991 out of postages accruing before July, and $187,086 out of postages accruing since. In these payments are included $67,000 of the old debt due to banks. After making these payments, the department had $73,000 in bank on the 1st instant. The pleasing assurance is given, that the department is entirely free from embarrassment, and that, by collection of outstanding balances, and using the current surplus, the remaining portion of the bank debt, and most of the other debt, will probably be paid in April next, leaving thereafter a heavy amount to be applied in extending the mail facilities of the country. Reserving a considerable sum for the improvement of existing mail routes, it is stated that the department will be able to sustain with perfect convenience an annual charge of $300,000 for the support of new routes, to commence as soon as they can be established and put in operation.

The measures adopted by the Postmaster General to bring the means of the department into action, and to effect a speedy extinguishment of its debt, as well as to produce an efficient administration of its affairs, will be found detailed at length in his able and luminous report. Aided by a reorganization on the principles suggested, and such salutary provisions in the laws regulating its administrative duties as the wisdom of Congress may devise or approve, that important department will soon attain a degree of usefulness proportioned to the increase of our population and the extension of our settlements.

Particular attention is solicited to that portion of the report of the Postmaster General which relates to the carriage of the Mails of the United States upon railroads constructed by private corporations under the authority of the several States. The reliance which the General Government can place on these roads as a means of carrying on its operations, and the principles on which the use of them is to be obtained, cannot be too soon considered and settled. Already does the spirit of monopoly begin to exhibit its natural propensities, in attempts to exact from the public, for services which it supposes cannot be obtained on other terms, the most extravagant compensation. If these claims be persisted in, the question may arise whether a combination of citizens, acting under charters of incorporation from the States, can, by a direct refusal, or the demand of an exorbitant price, exclude the United States from the use of the established channels of communication between the different sections of the country; and whether the United States cannot, without transcending their constitutional powers, secure to the Post Office Department the use of those roads, by an act of Congress which shall provide within itself some equitable mode of adjusting the amount of compensation. To obviate, if possible, the necessity of considering this question, it is suggested whether it be not expedient to fix by law the amounts which shall be offered to railroad companies for the conveyance of the mails, graduated according to their average weight, to be ascertained and declared by the Postmaster General. It is probable that a liberal proposition of that sort would be accepted.

In connection with these provisions in relation to the Post Office Department, I must also invite your attention to the painful excitement produced in the South, by attempts to circulate through the mails inflammatory appeals addressed to the passions of the slaves, in prints, and in various sorts of publications, calculated to stimulate them to insurrection, and to produce all the horrors of a servile war. There is, doubtless, no respectable portion of our countrymen who can be so far misled as to feel any other sentiment than that of indignant regret at conduct so destructive of the harmony and peace of the country, and so repugnant to the principles of our national compact, and to the dictates of humanity and religion. Our happiness and prosperity essentially depend upon peace within our borders—and peace depends upon the maintenance, in good faith, of those compromises of the constitution upon which the Union is founded. It is fortunate for the country that the good sense, the generous feeling, and the deep-rooted attachment of the people of the non-slaveholding States to the Union, and to their fellow-citizens of the same blood in the South, have given so strong and impressive a tone to the sentiments entertained against the proceedings of the misguided persons who have engaged in these unconstitutional and wicked attempts, and especially against the emissaries from foreign parts who have dared to interfere in this matter, as to authorize the hope that those attempts will no longer be persisted in. But if these expressions of the public will shall not be sufficient to effect so desirable a result, not a doubt can be entertained that the non-slaveholding States, so far from countenancing the slightest interference with the constitutional rights of the South, will be prompt to exercise their authority in suppressing, so far as in them lies, whatever is calculated to produce this evil.

In leaving the care of other branches of this interesting subject to the State authorities, to whom they properly belong, it is nevertheless proper for Congress to take such measures as will prevent the Post Office Department, which was designed to foster an amicable intercourse and correspondence between all the members of the Confederacy, from being used as an instrument of an opposite character. The General Government, to which the greatest trust is confided, of preserving inviolate the relations created among the States by the constitution, is especially bound to avoid, in its own action, any thing that may disturb them. I would, therefore, call the special attention of Congress to the subject, and respectfully suggest the propriety of passing such a law as will prohibit, under severe penalties, the circulation in the Southern States, through the mail, of incendiary publications intended to instigate the slaves to insurrection.

I felt it to be my duty, in the first message which I communicated to Congress, to urge upon its attention the propriety of amending that part of the constitution which provides for the election of President and Vice President or the United States. The leading object which I had in view was the adoption of some new provisions, which would secure to the people the performance of this high duty, without any intermediate agency. In my annual communications since, I have enforced the same views, from a sincere conviction that the best interests of the country would be promoted by their adoption. If the subject were an ordinary one, I should have regarded the failure of Congress to act upon it as an indication of their judgment, that the disadvantages which belong to the present system were not so great as those which would result from any attainable substitute that had been submitted to their consideration. Recollecting, however, that propositions to introduce a new feature in our fundamental laws cannot be too patiently examined, and ought not to be received with favor, until the great body of the people are thoroughly impressed with their necessity and value, as a remedy for real evils, I feel that in renewing the recommendation I have heretofore made on this subject, I am not transcending the bounds of a just deference to the sense of Congress, or to the disposition of the people. However much we may differ in the choice of the measures which should guide the administration of the Government, there can be but little doubt in the minds of those who are really friendly to the republican features of our system, that one of its most important securities consists in the separation of the Legislative and Executive powers, at the same time that each is held responsible to the great source of authority, which is acknowledged to be supreme, in the will of the people constitutionally expressed. My reflection and experience satisfy me, that the framers of the constitution, although they were anxious to mark the feature as a settled and fixed principle in the structure of the Government, did not adopt all the precautions that were necessary to secure its practical observance, and that we cannot be said to have carried into complete effect their intentions until the evils which arise from this organic defect are remedied.

Considering the great extent of our Confederacy, the rapid increase of its population, and the diversity of their interests and pursuits, it cannot be disguised that the contingency by which one branch of the Legislature is to form itself into an electoral college, cannot become one of ordinary occurrence, without producing incalculable mischief. What was intended as the medicine of the constitution in extreme cases, cannot be frequently used without changing its character, and, sooner or later, producing incurable disorder.

Every election by the House of Representatives is calculated to lessen the force of that security which is derived from the distinct and separate character of the Legislative and Executive functions, and, while it exposes each to temptations adverse to their efficiency as organs of the constitution and laws, its tendency will be to unite both in resisting the will of the People, and thus give a direction to the Government anti-republican and dangerous. All history tells us that a free people should be watchful of delegated power, and should never acquiesce in a practice which will diminish their control over it. This obligation, so universal in its application to all the principles of a republic, is peculiarly so in ours, where the formation of parties founded on sectional interests is so much fostered by the extent of our territory. These interests, represented by candidates for the Presidency, are constantly prone, in the zeal of party and selfish objects, to generate influences unmindful of the general good, and forgetful of the restraints which the great body of the People would enforce, if they were, in no contingency, to lose the right of expressing their will. The experience of our country, from the formation of the Government to the present day, demonstrates that the People cannot too soon adopt some stronger safeguard for their right to elect the highest officer known to the Constitution, than is contained in that sacred instrument as it now stands.

It is my duty to call the particular attention of Congress to the present condition of the District of Columbia.

From whatever cause the great depression has arisen which now exists in the pecuniary concerns of this District, it is proper that its situation should be fully understood, and such relief or remedies provided as are consistent with the powers of Congress. I earnestly recommend the extension of every political right to the citizens of the District which their true interests require, and which does not conflict with the provisions of the constitution. It is believed that the laws for the government of the District require revival and amendment, and that much good may be done by modifying the penal code, so as to give uniformity to its provisions.

Your attention is also invited to the defects which exist in the Judicial system of the United States. As at present organized, the States of the Union derive unequal advantages from the Federal Judiciary, which have been so often pointed out that I deem it unnecessary to repeat them here. It is hoped that the present Congress will extend to all the States that equality in respect to the benefits of the laws of the Union which can only be secured by the uniformity and efficiency of the Judicial system.

With these observations on the topics of general interest which are deemed worthy of your consideration, I leave them to your care, trusting that the legislative measures they call for will be met as the wants and the best interests of our beloved country demand.

ANDREW JACKSON.

WASHINGTON, 7th December, 1835.

DOCUMENTS ACCOMPANYING THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

REPORT OF THE SECRETARY OF WAR.

WAR DEPARTMENT, Nov. 30, 1835.

To the PRESIDENT of the United States:

Sir: In conformity with your instructions, and with the usage of this Department, I have the honor to lay before you a statement of its operations during the past season, and reports from the various bureaux, exhibiting, in detail, their respective proceedings, as far as these appear to be sufficiently important for communication in the usual annual statements.

The general positions of the Army remain the same as at the time of my last report. Some movements, however, have taken place, which it is proper should be specially brought before you.

Fourteen companies have been placed under the command of General Clinch, in Florida, with a view to impose a proper restraint upon the Seminole Indians, who have occasionally evinced an unquiet spirit, and to ensure the execution of the treaty stipulations, providing for the removal of these Indians. As soon as this takes place, these troops will resume their proper positions.

The regiment of dragoons has been usefully employed in penetrating into the Indian country; in exhibiting to the Indians a force well calculated to check or to punish any hostilities they may commit, and in adding to our geographical knowledge of those remote regions. Colonel Kearney, with one detachment, marched through the country between the Des Moines and the Mississippi rivers; Colonel Dodge, with another, made an excursion south of Missouri towards the Rocky Mountains; and Major Mason, with a third, joined by a detachment of infantry, was employed in duties connected with the assemblage of a body of Indians, at the Cross Timbers, near the Great Western Prairie, for the purpose of establishing permanent specific relations between the remote wandering bands and the United States, and the more agricultural Indians, who have migrated, under the public faith, to that region, or who seemed disposed to improve their condition by more settled habits. The duties committed to these troops have been well performed.

The information concerning the discipline and morale of the army is satisfactory. The officers are engaged in a great diversity of duties, growing out of various acts of Congress, many of which have no direct connection with their professional avocations. These duties are satisfactorily executed, and the expenditures to which they lead are generally made with fidelity, and accounted for with promptitude.

I beg leave to ask your attention to the report of the Chief Engineer, in relation to the state of the corps under his command. The number of officers in that corps is not sufficient for the performance of the various duties committed to it. The consequence is, that, in some instances, the public works have been neglected or delayed, and in others they have been prosecuted by those who had not the necessary professional skill and experience. Persons in civil life, possessed of competent scientific knowledge, will not often enter into the temporary service of the Government for such compensation as is provided by law for the Engineer officers. The progress of improvement through the country creates a demand for those qualifications which are required in the military and topographical engineer service; and a higher rate of compensation is allowed than it has been the usage of this Department to grant. A gradual and moderate addition to the corps offers the only remedy for this state of things; and I am satisfied that considerations of economy, as well as a due regard to the proper execution of a most important class of public works, calls for this arrangement.

The same considerations apply in a considerable degree to the Topographical Corps, and I ask your favorable consideration for the measure recommended by the officer at the head of it. One of the plans suggested will accomplish the object without any addition to the public expenditures; and will make adequate provisions for a branch of service connected with the defence of the country, and which has also the advantage of furnishing information that may prove highly valuable to every portion of the community.

Agreeably to a provision in an act of the last session of Congress, that part of the Cumberland road between the town of Cumberland and the Ohio river, has been surrendered to and accepted by the States through which it passes; and arrangements have been made by the authority of these States for the collection of such tolls as will keep it in proper repair. The funds appropriated for the completion of this road have been applied to the object, and will be fully adequate to its attainment. The work, with the exception of some of the bridges, and of a few necessary repairs, is nearly finished, and is passable in its whole extent. All accounts concur in representing it as constructed in the most faithful manner. Captain Delafield, who has superintended the operations, and the officers engaged with him, are entitled to commendation for the zeal and professional ability they have displayed.

The United States are exonerated from all future claims on account of this road, while competent provision has been made for its preservation.

The progress in the other works of internal improvement is shown in the report of the Chief Engineer. Among these, one of the most remarkable, as well from its importance, as from the unexpected facility with which it has so far been executed, is the removal of the raft over Red river. An immense body of timber, extending one hundred and eleven miles along that stream, had covered a large portion of its surface, and interrupted all communication. This has probably been collecting for ages; and not only was this great natural highway thus shut up by it, but a fertile and extensive region along the river was inundated, and the whole country in its vicinity subject to local diseases having their origin in this submersion.

This work has been in progress, upon the present system, little more than two years, and the whole expenditure including a sum of twenty-three thousand dollars, which was applied in previous experiments that failed, has been about one hundred and thirty-five thousand dollars. It is estimated that an additional appropriation of forty thousand seven hundred and thirteen dollars will be required to complete it; and which, with the sum of ten thousand dollars now in the Treasury, will make for the whole cost one hundred and eighty-five thousand seven hundred and thirteen dollars. The river has been cleared a distance of eighty-eight miles, and there yet remains twenty-three miles of obstructions to remove. This portion it is expected will be finished early in the next season, if the necessary appropriations are made in time.

Before the present plan of effecting this work was adopted, there were various projects suggested for its accomplishment; but the most sanguine projector could not have anticipated such a great physical change, as is already taking place, within the time and the means that have been devoted to the work. A loose estimate of the land which will be reclaimed and rendered valuable by this improvement, which has been made by Colonel Brooks, formerly Indian agent in Louisiana, and intimately acquainted with the region upon Red river, places it at upwards of a million of acres; and it will form one of the most productive districts in the Union. This operation, as a mere matter of pecuniary value, will return many times the amount expended upon it.

I have brought the subject to your view at this time, not only on account of its intrinsic importance, but from the encouragement it affords to the introduction and prosecution of a system of improvement, by which the public lands upon the lower Mississippi, and some of its tributaries, may be reclaimed from their present condition, and rendered fit for agricultural purposes. Whether the object be attainable, within the limits of a reasonable expense, there are not satisfactory data for determining. But its great results to the country, in health, in power, and in wealth, are obvious.

No appropriations having been made at the last session of Congress for the prosecution of the works upon the fortifications, it has been deemed proper to submit additional estimates of these objects. And as some of the forts first commenced have been completed, estimates have also been approved by you for the commencement of others, which have been recommended by the Board of Engineers in the continuation of the system of defence devised by them and submitted to Congress. A number of our most important harbors and inlets are yet either wholly undefended, or so partially protected, as to render their situation altogether insecure in the event of exposure to hostile attempts. An adherence to the general plan of defence, and a gradual prosecution of the work as the national finances and other considerations may justify, seem to be demanded by a just regard to the circumstances of the country, as well as by the experience which the events of the last war forced upon us.

In addition, however, to these permanent fortifications, there are some of our most extensive roadsteads, in which floating steam batteries ought to be employed. Among these are the Chesapeake and Delaware bays, and the harbor of New York. The peculiar situation of these estuaries, as well with relation to their exposure, as to the best measures for their defence, and the immense value of the navigation and commerce of which they are the outlets and inlets, render their security a matter of deep interest to the whole country. When the present system of defence was projected, I understand, the Board of Engineers contemplated the eventual construction of these moving batteries, as a part of their plan. The great improvements which have since taken place, in all that relates to the application of the power of steam, furnish additional motives for providing these co-operative defences. Alternately protecting and protected by the fixed batteries, these moveable ones will be found to be of the highest importance. In fact, with an adequate force of this description, stationed in the vicinity of our permanent military works, and enabled to take refuge under their cover, whenever necessary, a hostile fleet would scarcely venture to pass the position, and thereby expose itself to the hazard of annoyance in detail, and of being captured and destroyed, whenever a calm, a change of wind, or any other of the many accidents to which a maritime force is liable, might furnish a favorable opportunity for the action of the steam batteries. Our Atlantic frontier will not be properly secured till this means of efficient co-operation in its defence is introduced.

In my last annual report I communicated the facts which appeared to render it proper that the operations upon two of the most important works, Fort Calhoun and the Delaware Breakwater, should be temporarily suspended. Experiments have been made to test the effects and probable extent of the causes which were in operation, and which threatened to injure, if not destroy, the utility of these works. It is believed that the depression of the foundation of Fort Calhoun is so nearly checked, that further danger is not to be apprehended. But as will be seen by the report of the Quartermaster-General, the experiments at the Breakwater have not been so decisive as to settle the question connected with that work, and it has been thought best to ask of Congress an appropriation only for one hundred thousand dollars, which, under any probable circumstances, can be judiciously expended. It is to be hoped that the experiments which will be continued, and the scientific examination it is proposed to make next season, will furnish data for a just conclusion on the subject of this important structure, and indicate, either that the causes which have threatened to injure its utility have produced their full effect, or that they may be counteracted by some change in the original plan. This artificial harbor is too valuable to an extensive commerce peculiarly exposed, not to engage every effort in completing it, and preserving it from destruction.

The Report of the Visitors appointed to inspect the Military Academy, and the documents transmitted by them, are submitted for your consideration, together with the suggestions they have made, and which are calculated, in their opinion, to promote the efficiency of that institution. These annual examinations by a body of highly respectable citizens, called from various parts of the country, are not only useful as checks upon any improper tendency to which all public establishments are more or less liable, but they are satisfactory, when they bear testimony to the value of the system, and to the correctness of its administration, and practically advantageous by the suggestions they offer. That improvements may be made in the several departments of the Military Academy cannot be doubted. Nor can it be doubted that a thorough examination by Congress of its various concerns, whether administrative, financial, or instructive, would be highly useful, and would tend to its permanent melioration. Its results, so far as these can be judged by the character, conduct, and qualifications of the officers of the army, about two-thirds of whom have been educated at this institution, have been decidedly beneficial. The standard of acquirement for the military profession has been raised; habits of discipline and subordination, necessary first to learn, before the duty of command can be properly executed, have been acquired; elementary knowledge peculiarly adapted to a military life has been more extensively and accurately taught, and we have been better enabled to keep pace with those improvements which the nations of Europe have made and are making in this important branch of modern science.

Agreeably to your permission, I have introduced into the estimates an additional sum for the armament of the fortifications. Without going into any unnecessary detail upon this subject at the present time, I will barely remark that this measure is called for by the actual state of our preparations, and by a provident regard to the duty of self-defence. If no increase takes place in this branch of the service, many years must elapse before our fortifications and arsenals are sufficiently provided.

A resolution passed the House of Representatives, at the last session, requiring the Secretary of War to procure certain information, having relation to the establishment of a national foundry in the District of Columbia. The information which has been collected will be communicated in obedience to the resolution; but I am so impressed with the importance of the measure, that I am induced to bring it to your notice in this report.

The United States have no establishment for the manufacture of cannon. The supplies wanted, as well for the field artillery of the army and militia as for the armament of the fortifications, are now procured from four private foundries: one near Richmond, one at Georgetown, one opposite West Point, and one at Pittsburg, which appear to have been established, at several periods, in the expectation that their products would be received by the Government, as the public necessities might require, and at such prices as might, from time to time, be judged reasonable. As there is no private demand for this manufacture in our country, it is obvious that no person would make the requisite preparations, which are understood to demand considerable investments, and the employment of skilful workmen, practically acquainted with this branch of business, unless expectations of a just reimbursement were held out. Contracts for limited periods have, from time to time, been made, providing for the delivery of stipulated quantities; but, as I had the honor to communicate to you in my annual report of November 21st, 1831, the act of Congress of 3d March, 1809 seems to present serious difficulties in the way of such an arrangement, and since that time no formal contract has been made for the supply of cannon. The proprietors of these foundries have been annually informed that, if the appropriations would permit, and if cannon of designated quality and size were fabricated, these would be purchased. In this manner the subject has lingered, without any action on the part of Congress, and without any authority on the part of this Department, to make more efficient arrangements. During the present year, the appropriation for the armament of the fortifications has been principally expended in procuring iron gun-carriages; and the foundries have not been employed in the fabrication of cannon for the military branch of the service. It is believed that this circumstance, by deranging their operations, has been seriously injurious, and, if it again occur, it may induce some of them to discharge the workmen specially employed upon this business, and who may hereafter be collected with great difficulty. The Government now depends upon this temporary and uncertain arrangement for the supply of this indispensable element of national defence. The circumstances which required a change, I had the honor to submit four years since. They have lost none of their force during the period which has intervened; and, independently of the considerations presented having relation to the uncertain condition of these establishments, there are others, bearing upon the quality of the material and the workmanship, which render it important that the Government should be its own manufacturer of this article. The cost of cannon, while this is kept within a reasonable limit, is not an object, compared with the two qualities of strength and lightness. With the exertions of the present manufacturers of cannon, so far as the necessary facts are known to me, I have reason to be satisfied. But it is sufficiently obvious that, in a branch of business where a slight difference in the material, and slight neglect in the process, may produce irreparable mischief, and where, from causes not easily ascertained, these defects may disclose themselves in the midst of the most active service, and after the guns have resisted all the usual proofs, the manufacture of the article should be carried on where these neglects are least likely to happen; where, in fact, there can be no interest to use any other than the best materials, nor to employ any other than the most skilful artisans. Time and experience are necessary to found and perfect an establishment for this purpose upon a scale suited to our wants.

It does not seem necessary to exhibit in detail the number of cannon now in the possession of the Government, and distributed in its forts, arsenals, and temporary posts, and the number that will be required to complete the armament of the fortifications already constructed, of those in the process of construction, and of those projected, and the number necessary for the proper demands of field service. It is sufficient to observe here, that the quantity is far more than enough to justify extensive and vigorous arrangements; and this without reference to the accidents of time and service, which must always operate to reduce the stock on hand.

Such an establishment as the one contemplated could be employed as well for the Navy as Army; but, while I allude to its general usefulness, it is proper I should avoid all details peculiarly appropriate to another department.

The defective organization of the militia is universally acknowledged. But little practical utility results from the administration of the present system; and if this great element of national defence is worth preservation and improvement, it is time the whole subject should be examined, and that a plan, suited to the exigencies of the country, should be adopted. I am unwilling to believe that there are such inherent difficulties in this subject as to render it impracticable, or even very difficult, to organize this great force, so peculiarly adapted to our institutions, and in such a manner as to render it active and efficient in those junctures when the country may be called on to exert its power. I presume few would be found to advocate the maintenance of a standing military force, adequate to all the purposes of peace and war. When, therefore, these exigencies arise, from which no nation can expect exemption, and which call for an extension of our physical means, we must resort to an increase of the Army, or to the embodying of the militia. It is obvious, from the extent of the country, that we can never keep, at all the exposed points, such a permanent force as circumstances may occasionally require. The natural, and, in fact, the necessary dependence must be upon the militia; and, if it be unorganized, we shall be found without the means to repel a foreign enemy, or to repress internal disturbances, should these evils occur. To depend upon organizing a system when the exigency arises, is to reject all lessons of experience, and to procrastinate for examination, what should then be the subject of action. Besides, a permanent plan of organization should be devised in a time of leisure and peace, so that it may be introduced and thoroughly known before the force provided by it is required to be exerted. It should, as much as possible, be ingrafted upon the habits of the country, and become a part of our institutions. The basis of an efficient organization of the militia must be a selection for instruction and service of that part of the population best qualified for these duties. Age and physical capacity present the proper considerations for such a selection. The principle is stated with his usual force by Mr. Jefferson, in his message to Congress of December, 1805, wherein he said:

"Whether it will be necessary to augment our land forces will be decided by occurrences probably in the course of your session. In the mean time, you will consider whether it would not be expedient for a state of peace, as well as of war, so to organize or class the militia as would enable us, on a sudden emergency, to call for the service of the younger portions, unencumbered with the old and those having families. Upwards of three hundred thousand able-bodied men, between the ages of eighteen and twenty-six years, which the last census shows we may now count within our limits, will furnish a competent number for offence or defence, in any point where they may be wanted, and will give time for raising regular forces, after the necessity of them shall become certain; and the reducing to the early period of life all its active services, cannot but be desirable to our younger citizens of the present as well as future times, inasmuch as it engages to them, in more advanced age, a quiet and undisturbed repose in the bosom of their families. I cannot, then, but earnestly recommend to your early consideration the expediency of so modifying our militia system as, by a separation of the more active part from that which is less so, we may draw from it, when necessary, an efficient corps, fit for real and active service, and to be called in regular rotation."

Had the general principles here recommended been practically adopted, and a corresponding system established, with the necessary details, first for instruction, and then for active service, it cannot be doubted that the course of events, which marked the commencement of the late war, would have been avoided, and an immense expenditure of blood and treasure saved to the nation. The warning voice, which was not heeded then, may perhaps be heard now; and if it is, it may produce incalculable benefits.

A Board of officers of the Army and Militia was organized some years since, under the instructions of this Department, and by virtue of a resolution of Congress, for the purpose of examining this subject, and of devising a practicable plan for the organization, improvement, and efficient action of the militia. Their report contains the outline of a projet, which, with some modifications, appears to me to combine as many advantages as any other that can, probably, be adopted. The basis was a classification of the adult male population of the United States, and a selection of so many persons from it, above the age of twenty-one years, as should be necessary to complete the number required to be enrolled and organized at all times for actual service; beginning in all cases with the youngest above the prescribed age. Their report stopped at the number they deemed necessary for constant equipment. As regards instruction and preparation, this limitation is no doubt proper; but still it would probably be deemed advisable, so far to organize the whole body, within certain ages, as to produce a classification, and to afford the requisite facilities towards calling them into service in succession, should any contingency demand a larger force than the first division could supply. This arrangement would render available for the defence of the country its whole physical force; not that any event could require it all to be embodied at the same time, but because a particular section might sometimes be peculiarly exposed, and call for the services of a large proportion of its population; and the continuance of the pressure might render it necessary to discharge, in succession, those who had performed their prescribed terms, and to require the services of others.

A mere organization would avail but little, unless inducements were held out for proper instructions and equipment. And I consider, therefore, some provision for elementary instruction, and for such equipment as may be necessary to excite a proper emulation, indispensable to any improvement of our militia system—indispensable, I may add, to its very existence. An arrangement for these objects would embrace the first class only. It would, to be sure, involve expense, for an adequate compensation must be allowed to the persons required to be embodied at these schools of instruction, for a few days in the year. And it would probably be found expedient to continue the present plan of voluntary corps, with some changes, and to require them also to meet for improvement. It is in vain to expect that the whole adult male population of the country can or will furnish themselves with the articles required by law, or that their collection for any number of days they can afford to devote to this object, and under the usual circumstances of such assemblages, can produce any beneficial effect to themselves or their country. Already, in a number of the States, the system has sunk under the weight of public opinion; and the practical question now is, whether we shall remain in fact defenceless, or resort to a large standing military force in time of peace, that just dread of all free governments, or adopt an efficient plan, which will prepare for the public defence the greatest force at the least cost, and without danger. The blessings we have inherited cannot be preserved without exertion, nor without expense. It were idle to sit still and flatter ourselves with the hope that war is never to overtake us; and it would be worse to delay all efficient organization of our physical means, till the time for its active employment arrives. Nearly fifty years have elapsed since the adoption of the present constitution. During all that time, no essential change has been made in our militia system; and it has gradually declined in utility and efficiency, and in public confidence; and there is reason to fear its entire abandonment, unless it undergoes important modifications. In this long interval, the value of the system seems to have been appreciated by all the Presidents of the United States, as well those who, from the habits of their lives, could best estimate its value by their personal observation, as by those whose opinions may have been well formed from the course of events having relation to this matter; and in their annual communications, commencing with the inaugural address of General Washington, this subject has been almost constantly pressed upon the attention of Congress,

For the purpose of showing its importance in the opinion of these eminent citizens, I have caused their communications to be examined, and find that the subject has been presented to the Legislature and the nation no less than thirty-one times in their official recommendations. I indulge the hope that the present state of public affairs may lead to a re-examination of the system, and to such changes as may render it permanently useful.

I am gratified in being able to announce to you that the Indians residing east of the Mississippi river, appear to be yielding to the conviction that their removal to the territory assigned for their residence in the West, offers the only rational prospect of any permanent improvement in their condition, and that this measure is essential to their prosperity. Both in the North and South the reports of the officers having charge of this matter are encouraging, and we may anticipate the full establishment of our present policy, and with the fairest prospects of success, if the pre-existing prejudices, which have so long operated to retard our efforts, can be removed.

The considerations which render this change of residence necessary are sufficiently obvious, and are founded upon results that have heretofore attended our intercourse with the Indians. The causes which have so long continued to reduce and depress them in their present situation within our borders, are yet in active operation. Their food derived from the chase is disappearing. Their habits are inveterate, and they cannot or will not accommodate themselves to the new circumstances which press upon them, in time to save themselves from extinction. And, above all, their contact with a white population has entailed and is entailing upon them evils, which, if not checked, must lead to their ruin. They appear to acquire with much greater facility the vices than the virtues of civilized life; and during the whole period they have been known to us, they have abandoned themselves, with strange improvidence, to the use of ardent spirits. From my own observation of the Indian character, I consider the indulgence of this habit as the great barrier against any improvement of that portion of this race which, from their position, are enabled, at pleasure, to gratify this propensity. The difficulty of putting a stop to this traffic while the Indians are intermingled with our citizens, is sufficiently obvious. And if they are to be rescued from its effects, they must be removed beyond the sphere of the traffic. This is certainly one of the most prominent reasons for the faithful prosecution of the system; and Congress, apparently impressed with its force, has provided by law that all ardent spirits found in the Indian country may be destroyed. The agents of the Government will not now be compelled, as formerly, to resort to legal process for the interdiction of this traffic, at the hazard of the trouble, expense, and uncertainty attending such prosecutions upon a remote frontier.

I consider the experiments which have recently been made to provide for the maintenance of the Indians, by reservations for their use, and with the power of alienation, however guarded, to have wholly failed. These tracts are too often sold for a very inadequate consideration, and the amount received is dissipated in expenditures either positively injurious or altogether useless.

As soon as the remaining tribes shall have been established in the West, we may look forward to a happier destiny for the Indians. And if this expectation be disappointed, the failure must be attributed to the inveterate habits of this people, and not to the policy of the Government. The arrangements for the comfortable establishment of the Indians have been projected upon a scale suited to their wants and condition, and to the duties of the United States. With a view to appreciate the advantages which have been secured to them, I deem it proper briefly to recapitulate provisions that have been made. These are not applicable, in all their details, to each tribe, as some receive more and some less in amount, while certain articles are given to some and not to others. But the general principles of distribution apply to all. An extensive country has been reserved for them, and has been divided into districts for the several tribes. To this they are removed at the expense of the United States,

They are provided with the necessary subsistence for one year after they reach their new residence.

Annuities, in specie, to a greater or less amount, are payable to each tribe.

Agricultural instruments, domestic animals, seed corn, salt, looms, cards, spinning wheels, iron, steel, cloths, blankets, rifles, ammunition, and other articles, are distributed among them.

Mills are erected and kept in operation. Council houses, churches, and dwelling houses for chiefs, are built.

Mechanics are engaged and supported; schools are established and maintained; and the missionary institutions among them are aided from the Treasury of the United States.

These are the principal arrangements made for the benefit of this unfortunate people, who will soon have been removed, at great expense, when this new system will be in full operation, and where their peculiar institutions can be preserved with such modifications as a progressive state of improvement may require. They will be separated, too, from the settled portions of the country by a fixed boundary, beyond which our population cannot pass.

The operations of the Department of Indian Affairs are shown in detail by the report of the Commissioner, and by that of the Commissary General of Subsistence. It was anticipated that a considerable body of the Creeks of Alabama would, ere this, have been on their way to the West. But recent information induces the belief that their journey has been postponed, but under circumstances which will probably insure their early removal in the spring. The treaty with the Seminoles of Florida, for their removal, is in the process of execution. A portion of the tribe were not prepared to go at the time arrangements were first proposed to be made for their removal, and when by the treaty they might have been required to depart. At their earnest solicitations, the measure was postponed until the coming winter, and assurances were given by them that they would then be prepared to remove. A majority avow their readiness to comply with their engagements, and will no doubt quietly go as soon as the arrangements for their departure shall have been completed. But some of them exhibit a refractory spirit, and evince a disposition to remain. As they now hold no land in Florida, and would become a lawless banditti if suffered to remain, their pretensions cannot be submitted to. They will, probably, when the time for operations arrives, quietly follow their countrymen. Should they not, measures will be adopted to insure this course, equally dictated by a just regard to their own welfare, as well as to that of our citizens in the vicinity of their residence.

Governor Stokes, General Arbuckle, and Major Armstrong, were appointed Commissioners to make a treaty with the roving tribes of Indians who inhabit the great Western prairie, with the view of establishing permanent pacific relations between these predatory tribes and the United States, and also between the same tribes and the other Indians of that region. The lamented death of Major Armstrong deprived the Government of the services of that valuable officer; but the other Commissioners succeeded in effecting a pacification, which I hope will lead to a friendly intercourse among all the tribes in that quarter.

Under the authority of an act of the last session of Congress, an arrangement has been made by Colonel Brookes with the Caddo Indians, for the cession of their claims to land in the State of Louisiana and Territory of Arkansas. This will be submitted to you at the proper time, for the consideration of the Senate.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient servant,
LEW. CASS.

REPORT OF THE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, 5th Dec. 1835.

To the President of the United States:

SIR: In presenting to your consideration the condition of our Navy for the past year, it affords me great satisfaction to state, that all the available means for its improvement have been successfully applied, and that its operations in protecting our commerce, although inadequate to the exigencies of that great and growing interest, have been highly honorable to the officers serving upon our naval stations, at home and abroad.

Since my report of the 29th of November, 1834, the ship of the line, North Carolina, has been thoroughly repaired in her hull, has been lately taken out of dock, and may be fitted for sea in eighty days.

The repairs of the ship of the line Independence, now in dock at Boston, have been commenced, and are progressing with great despatch. The frigates Constitution and Constellation have been equipped and sent to sea. The frigate United States has been prepared, and is ready for the reception of a crew. The hull of the frigate Columbia, at Washington, has been so nearly completed under the law for the gradual improvement of the navy, that she may be launched in the course of this month.

The sloops of war Peacock and Vandalia have been equipped and sent to sea. The sloop of war Warren is taking in her crew, and will sail in a few days. The sloops of war Concord and Boston have been prepared, and are ready for the reception of their crews; and the Lexington will be equally prepared in a few weeks.

The repairs of the sloops of war Falmouth and Natchez, and of the schooner Grampus, have been recently commenced, and it is believed that in a few weeks, they may be ready for the reception of their crews.

The building of a store ship, authorized by a law of the 30th of June, 1834, has been commenced at Philadelphia; and a steam vessel has been commenced at New York, but will not be ready for service until some time in the summer of 1836.

The ships of the line Alabama, Vermont, Virginia, Pennsylvania, and New York, and the frigates Santee, Cumberland, Sabine, Savannah, Raritan, and St. Lawrence, are on the stocks, well protected from the weather, and as nearly completed as it is proper they should be, until it is determined to launch them.

For a more detailed statement of the condition of those vessels, as well as that of the ships of the line, Franklin, Washington, Columbus, and Ohio, and their means of repair, I beg leave to refer to a report of the Commissioners of the Navy Board herewith submitted, marked K. And for the amount of timber, iron, and other materials, procured for the gradual improvement of the navy, I refer to their report marked L.

The ship of the line Delaware, the frigate Potomac, the sloop John Adams, and the schooner Shark, have been employed in the Mediterranean during the last year. The frigate Constitution sailed for that station on the 19th of August last from New York. The frigate United States returned from the Mediterranean on the 10th of December last. The Delaware is ordered to the United States, and is daily expected.

On the West India station, the sloops of war Vandalia, St. Louis, and Falmouth, and the schooners Grampus and Experiment have been employed. The Vandalia, after undergoing considerable repairs, sailed from Norfolk on the 14th of January last, to resume her station in the West Indies. The Falmouth returned from that station on the 1st of August last, and is now at Norfolk. The schooner Experiment also returned from that station in April last, and has been employed on the survey of the coast. The Grampus returned to Norfolk on the 23d of September last, is undergoing repairs, and will soon resume her station in the West India squadron. The frigate Constellation sailed for the West Indies on the 8th of October last from Norfolk.

The sloops of war Natchez, Erie, and Ontario, and the schooner Enterprise, composed the squadron on the Brazilian station. The Natchez has lately returned to the United States, having arrived at New York on the 3d of October. The schooner Enterprise has been detached from that station, and ordered on a cruise to the East Indies. She sailed in company with the sloop Peacock, from Rio, on the 12th of July last—the Peacock having sailed from

New York for that station on the 23d of April. In June last, the Ontario was ordered to the Coast of Africa, with instructions to visit the Island of St. Thomas, Bassa Cove, Cape Palmas, and Mesurado.

The vessels which have been employed in the Pacific are, the frigate Brandywine, and sloops Fairfield and Vincennes, and the schooners Dolphin and Grampus. The Vincennes has been ordered home by the way of the East Indies, and the Fairfield has lately arrived at Norfolk.

The events of the last year furnish much additional evidence that our naval force in commission, is not adequate to the protection of our rapidly increasing commerce. The frequent insurrections and revolutions in the Governments of South America and of Mexico, endanger our merchant vessels upon the Atlantic as well as Pacific ocean, and in the Gulf of Mexico, and even upon our own coast. Influenced by a knowledge of these circumstances, and in accordance with your suggestions, I have asked and obtained from the Board of Navy Commissioners, an estimate of the increased annual expense of adding two frigates, three sloops of war, and four steam vessels to our force now in commission, to be employed upon foreign stations, as well as upon our own coast. By their report, it appears that such an addition to our vessels in commission, would require annually an appropriation of four hundred and seventy-eight thousand dollars; but as not more than one steam vessel can be finished in the next year, the appropriation wanted for 1836, for this purpose, needs not exceed four hundred and thirty-four thousand dollars. This sum is small compared with the benefits that may be fairly calculated to result from its expenditure, in affording protection to our commerce, independently of the advantage to the efficiency and discipline of our navy, by calling into active service a large number of officers now unemployed. A large portion of the entire expenditure for the additional force proposed, must be incurred, even if it should not be called into service. The vessels necessary for such increase of force, (except the steam vessels,) will, if not so employed, remain at our wharves, affording no benefit to the country, and suffering more from decay than they would do if at sea; and a large portion of the officers necessary for their command, although earnestly asking for service, will remain on shore, receiving pay, but performing no duty; adding nothing to their professional skill, but losing their habits of discipline, which can only be preserved by constant exercise. Should the proposed increase of force be sanctioned by Congress, we shall have in commission, in the year 1836, one ship of the line, six frigates, fourteen sloops of war, five schooners, and one steam vessel; with an addition of three steam vessels in succeeding years, as soon as the same can be prepared; the estimated expense of which appears by the report of the Commissions marked D, 1.

Appropriations for the gradual improvement of our navy yards, are the next in importance to like appropriations for the gradual improvement of our navy. The necessity of more ample means for protecting our shipping, as well as the immense amount of public property in the different yards, must be apparent to every one who is acquainted with the subject; and the expediency of increasing the facilities for constructing and repairing our ships, is not less apparent. Moderate appropriations, in addition to those that are usual, for three or four years, would accomplish these important objects. In accordance with this view of the subject, I submit a letter of the Board of Navy Commissioners, marked E, No. 1, together with an estimate of the probable cost of the proposed improvements, which amount to three millions five hundred thousand dollars, including that of the dry dock at New York, amounting to nine hundred thousand dollars.

A National Foundry for the purpose of casting cannon, shot, and shells, as well for the army as the navy, was a subject of discussion before the two Houses of Congress, at their late session, but was postponed in consequence of the shortness of the session, and the pressure of more urgent business. No doubt can be entertained of the importance of such an establishment, when we consider the great improvements made in the fabrication of small arms at the different armories of the United States. In our future wars, especially on the ocean, we must rely much upon the excellence of our cannon. The bursting of a single gun may cause, as it often has done, the loss of a battle. The disasters from this cause, that occurred during the Revolutionary as well as the late war, admonish us to guard against like disasters in future; which, it is believed, may be avoided by the means proposed.

It is only by a long series of experiments, and these attended with great expense, that we can hope to discover the best material for making cannon which our country affords, and the art of fabricating them with the most perfect accuracy and efficiency. Believing that such discoveries and improvements are attainable, and that they would be highly important in the army, and still more so in the navy, I must be permitted to express a hope that the subject will be reviewed at the approaching session of Congress, and that the plan of a national foundry will be adopted.

The importance of rearing a body of Seamen, by enlisting into the service of our navy Boys over the age of thirteen, and under the age of eighteen, until they should arrive at the age of twenty-one years, has already attracted the attention of Congress. At the last session, a bill for this purpose was introduced into the Senate. Every year the importance of this measure becomes more apparent. Able seamen are much wanted, while there are boys enough in our cities, leading lives of idleness and vice for want of employment, who, if thus enlisted, under judicious regulations, would in a few years afford us a sufficient corps of able seamen to man our navy, and in the mean time render services to their country worth their pay.

The compensation to be given by the late pay bill to Professors of Mathematics, is such as to command the services of those who are every way competent to perform the duties of this station. A regulation is adopted, to appoint none to this station who shall not receive a certificate of competency, after submitting to a rigid examination by scientific gentlemen, who shall be appointed for that purpose. This will be of great advantage to the young officers of the Navy; and if a large portion of them should be called into active service by employing an additional naval force for the protection of our commerce, they will be enabled to perfect themselves in seamanship, the most important part of their education, and which can be acquired only at sea. But to make them accomplished officers, something more is required than what can probably be derived from those sources: a knowledge of military tactics, of engineering, and drawing, is deemed indispensable in the education of an officer of the Army, and which ought to be deemed equally so in the education of a naval officer. So much of chemistry, mineralogy, geology, and natural history, as is taught at the Military Academy, although not absolutely essential to the military or naval officer, yet is decidedly more important to the latter than to the former. If provision should be made for the admission of a class of one hundred midshipmen at a time at the Academy at West Point, to pursue such studies as should be prescribed by the Navy Department, and to be succeeded at the end of one or two years by another class, all in their turn might receive the advantage of this course of studies, highly necessary to their education as accomplished officers of the Navy, and at a small expense, as the midshipmen, while at the Academy, would receive no more pay than if attending the schools at the navy yards, or if waiting orders.

A National Observatory, although not immediately necessary to the defence of our country, is remotely so; and considered with reference to the bearing it would have upon our navy, our commerce, and scientific pursuits, it assumes an importance worthy of the consideration of Congress. It is hardly to be doubted that we shall, at some future period, make such an establishment; and I will venture to express an opinion, that no time can be more propitious for such an undertaking than the present. It would not be attended with any great expense. It is necessary now to employ an officer of science to keep our maps and charts, to regulate our chronometers, and to preserve all mathematical and philosophical instruments required for the naval service; and buildings are necessary for these purposes. These duties would properly devolve upon the superintendent of an observatory; and the buildings necessary to such an establishment would be amply sufficient for the preservation of our maps, charts, and instruments.

Under the act concerning Naval Pensions and the Navy Pension Fund, eighteen invalid pensions have been granted since my last report, making the number on the roll 305, and the annual amount required to pay them $24,944; and forty-one widows' pensions have been granted, making the number on the roll one hundred and fifty, and the annual amount necessary to pay them $32,594. The annual charge, therefore, according to the present roll, will amount to $57,538. It is not probable that all on the list will claim; but as the death of a pensioner is not officially known, except when the account is settled by his or her representative, the number is made out from the rolls in this Department. Some have not claimed for two, three, four, and five years; but as they are not known to be dead, their names are still continued on the rolls. The receipts and expenditures on account of the fund, to 30th September last, will be seen in the statement marked M, and the amount and description of stocks belonging to the fund, in the statement M, 1.

Under the act of the 19th of June, 1824, respecting pensions chargeable to the Private Pension Fund, since my last report, six widows have received five years' pension each, amounting to $2,400; more than five years having elapsed since the date to which they were last paid. Two invalid pensions have also been granted, making the number on the roll thirty-six, and the annual amount required to pay them $3,184. The account of stock, and of receipts and expenditures will be seen in statement N.

The condition of the Navy Hospital Fund, including receipts and expenditures, will appear in statement O. The annual receipts are much greater than the disbursements; and, as they will probably continue to be greater for several years, I respectfully repeat the suggestion, in my last report, that authority be given to vest the surplus in some well-secured stock, for the benefit of the fund.

Under the act of the 30th of June, 1834, the widows of all officers, seamen, and marines, who have died in the naval service since the first day of January, 1824, or who may die in said service, by reason of disease contracted, or of casualties by drowning or otherwise, or of injuries received while in the line of duty, are entitled to pensions equal to half the amount of the pay to which their husbands respectively were entitled at the time of their deaths. The act of the 3d of March last, "to regulate the pay of the Navy of the United States," and which increased the pay of many officers, is silent as to pensions. A difficulty arises in ascertaining the proper amount of pension to be allowed to widows of naval officers whose pay has been increased by this act. The pay of a Captain in command of a squadron, was increased to four thousand dollars a year; when on other duty, to three thousand five hundred dollars; and when off duty, to two thousand and five hundred dollars. A corresponding increase of pay is made to other officers. In the case of a Captain dying when in command of a squadron on a foreign station, a question arises whether his widow should receive a pension to the amount of six hundred dollars a year, to which she would have been entitled if this act had not passed, or whether she shall receive the half of the amount of pay to which her husband was entitled at the time of his death as a Captain commanding a squadron, as a Captain on other duty, or as a Captain off duty. After much deliberation, it has been decided to allow a pension in such case, of $1,135 62 a year, being the half pay of a Captain commanding a squadron, reduced by the amount $1,728 75, equal to his allowance before this act. The salary of $4,000 a year to a captain in command of a squadron, is in lieu of former pay and emoluments. Those emoluments, excepting one ration a day, amounted to $1,728 75; which sum, deducted from $4,000, leaves $2,271 25, the half of which, $1,135 62, is considered as the proper amount of the widow's annual pension. Questions on pensions, more complicated than this, may arise under this act; especially in the case of the death of surgeons and assistant surgeons, whose grades of pay are more numerous than those of captains.

The necessity of an explanatory act to obviate these difficulties is respectfully suggested.

By the act of Congress of the 10th of July, 1832, it is required that any surplus money belonging to the navy pension fund, shall be vested in the stock of the Bank of the United States. The amount so vested is six hundred and nineteen thousand dollars; and this Department has no authority to make a different investment of this money without the further action of Congress.

Previously to the passing of the act of the 30th of June, 1834, for the better organization of the United States marine corps, double rations had been allowed to the commandant of that corps, and to the officers of the same commanding at the navy yards at Portsmouth, Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Washington, Norfolk, and Pensacola; and the senior marine officers in the squadrons in the Mediterranean, the West Indies, the Brazilian coast, and the Pacific ocean; all receiving the sanction of Congress by their appropriations. By this act the officers of the marine corps are to receive the same pay, emoluments, and allowances, as are given to officers of similar grades in the infantry of the army. The act of the 16th of March, 1802, fixing the military peace establishment of the United States, authorizes allowances to the commanding officers of each separate post, of such additional number of rations as the President of the United States shall, from time to time, direct.

These provisions of this last act were continued by an act of the 3d of March, 1815, fixing the military peace establishment.

The paymaster of the marine corps made payments for double rations to officers heretofore receiving the same, from the 1st of July to the 30th of September, 1834. But the accounting officers of the Treasury did not think proper to allow the same, inasmuch as the commands of these officers had never been designated as separate stations, agreeably to the rule prescribed by the army. This is a case of difficulty which, it is respectfully suggested, requires the interposition of Congress.

Being still of the opinion expressed in my last report, that the public interest would be promoted by having the marine barracks placed without the navy yards to which they are attached, as early as may be practicable, estimates are submitted for purchasing sites and erecting barracks at places where they are deemed most necessary.

In performance of my duty under the act of the 3d of March last, authorizing the construction of a dry dock for the naval service, in the harbor of New York, or its adjacent waters, I proceeded in May last to the city of New York, where I was met by an able engineer, Laomi Baldwin, Esq. whom I had previously engaged to make the soundings and other examinations necessary to a proper selection of a suitable site. After a long and laborious examination, Mr. Baldwin made his report, which has been submitted to your consideration; by which it appears that the proposed dry dock may be advantageously constructed in the navy yard at Brooklyn. A selection of this place, for this purpose, is recommended by the consideration that the land occupied as the navy yard belongs to the United States; and that the public buildings upon it, which are of great value, cannot be abandoned without serious loss.

One difficulty presented itself, which created some delay in making this selection. A building for the purpose of distilling turpentine had been erected so near to the navy yard, as greatly to endanger the public property. Other buildings for similar purposes, or for purposes equally dangerous, might be erected near the yard, if not prevented by some act of legislation. I am happy to state that the Common Council of Brooklyn, when the case was laid before them, promptly passed an ordinance, which it is believed will effectually secure the property in the navy yard from the danger of this nuisance, and all similar ones. And it cannot be doubted that the Common Council of Brooklyn will grant all reasonable protection and accommodation to this navy yard; and that the State of New York will protect and promote the interests of the same, by any legislative acts that may be found to be necessary and proper. I shall therefore proceed, under your direction, with as much despatch as present and future appropriations will permit, to cause the dry dock, thus authorized by law, to be constructed in the navy yard at Brooklyn.

Under the act of the 30th June, 1834, "authorising the Secretary of the Navy to make experiments for the safety of the steam engine," and appropriating five thousand dollars for that purpose, many proposed improvements have been submitted for the purpose of being tested by experiments. Some of these were so easily tested by those having steam engines in operation, that the aid of Government was not needed; others were attended with greater difficulty, and could not be tested without the expense of constructing boilers and other machinery for the purpose. These proposed improvements have not been such, as in my opinion, to warrant a large expenditure of money; and no experiments have been made upon them. Such experiments, however, would have been made, if they could have been so made, without the expense of constructing engines.

The act seemed particularly to require that the steam engine devised by Benjamin Phillips, of Philadelphia, should be examined and tested; and that Mr. Phillips should be employed in making the experiments. Mr. Phillips was therefore employed to construct a model engine, with boilers and other machinery which he deemed necessary for the purpose of testing his improvements, which he brought to this District, where he remained several weeks making his experiments before many members of the two Houses of Congress, before the officers of the different Departments, and others.

I attended very carefully to these experiments, but have not been able to perceive in them any improvements; increasing the safety of the steam engine.

The money paid for Mr. Phillips's machinery, preparations, and experiments, amounts to five hundred and nineteen dollars and seventy-five cents; the residue of the appropriation remains unexpended.

The fourth report of Mr. Hasler, superintendent of the coast survey, upon the operations performed in that work between the months of May and December, 1835, together with his detailed estimate of the appropriations required for the same for the next year, are herewith submitted marked T.

Much work appears to have been done on the secondary triangulations, on the topographical operations, and by the sounding parties. That more has not been done in the primary triangulations, is explained in the report.

Of the appropriations heretofore made for this survey, there remained, on the first day of this month, an unexpended balance of eight thousand eight hundred and twenty-three dollars.

The duties of the sounding parties are performed by the officers and seamen of the navy; and the chief part of the expense is charged to the navy appropriations. As, however, there are some expenses which cannot be charged to those appropriations, they must necessarily be charged to the appropriations for the coast survey. In September, 1834, the schooner Jersey, not wanted for any purposes of the navy, was purchased for the sounding party under the command of Lieutenant Gedney. The price of this vessel, $3,350, therefore, could not be charged to the naval appropriations—it was properly charged to the appropriations for the coast survey. For the same reason, the boats, equipments, and other expenses for the schooner, amounting to $1,888 60, were charged to the same appropriation, as was also the charge for extra pay to the officers, amounting to $659 in all, for the year 1834, to $5,888 60.

During the present season, the expense of this schooner, chargeable to the coast survey, has amounted to $1,398, making the whole expense of this schooner, for the years 1834 and 1835, chargeable to the coast survey, amount to $7,287 60.

It is not probable that the expense of this schooner, chargeable to the coast survey appropriation, will, for the next year, exceed $1,500.

The schooner Experiment, employed by the sounding party under Lieut. Blake, belongs to the navy. The coast survey appropriation has, therefore, been charged only for equipments which were not necessary for the purposes of the navy. These, with other expenses attending the operations of the sounding party on board this schooner, from the 1st of July last, when she was sent upon the survey, to the 30th of September last, amounted to $2,517 73.

As most of the equipments of these schooners will last for several years, with but little expense for repairs and supply of articles which may be lost by accident, it is believed that the expense of both schooners and the sounding parties on board of them for the next year, chargeable to the coast survey, will not exceed $4,000.

It will be seen, that this differs widely from the statement of Mr. Hassler, which may be explained by the circumstance, that he did not derive his information from the books of the Treasury Department.

By a statement heretofore annexed, marked P, it appears that of the appropriations heretofore made for the suppression of the slave trade, there remains in the Treasury a balance of thirteen thousand four hundred and eighty-nine dollars and fifty-five cents.

In my last report, I took the liberty of stating that some of the clerks in my department did not receive salaries proportioned to their services, or adequate to the decent support of themselves and families; and I respectfully solicited that the salaries, particularly of the chief clerk of the navy board, the warrant clerk, and the clerk keeping the register of correspondence of this department, whose duties are arduous, requiring both talent and experience, should be increased, so that the first might receive $1,700 per annum, and the others $1,400 each. I repeat the solicitation, from a thorough conviction, that their faithful services fully merit this increase of compensation.

The superintendent of the southwest Executive building receives but $250 per annum for his services, which it is believed is a compensation too small to command the services of one competent to perform the duties of the station.

The sergeants acting as clerks to the commandant and staff officers of the marine corps, are paid at the rate of less than $700 a year for all their services, which it is respectfully suggested is not an adequate compensation.

The necessary references to papers and documents connected with this report, will be found in a schedule hereunto annexed.

All which is respectfully submitted.

MAHLON DICKERSON.

REPORT OF THE POSTMASTER GENERAL.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT, December 1, 1835.

To the President of the United States:

SIR: During the year ending the 30th June, 1835, the post routes of the United States covered about one hundred and twelve thousand seven hundred and seventy-four miles.

In daily and less frequent trips, the mails were carried on these routes about 25,869,486 miles, viz:

16,874,050 miles in four-horse post-coaches, and two-horse stages,
7,817,973 miles on horses and in sulkies,
906,959 miles in steamboats,
270,504 miles in railroad cars.

The number of post offices on the 30th of June last, was ten thousand seven hundred and seventy, being an increase of fifty-four within the preceding year.

The system upon which the Books of the Department have always been kept, precludes an exact statement of the revenue and expenditure which have accrued within any given period. The following is believed to approximate nearly to the actual income and accruing responsibilities, for the two last fiscal years, viz:

24th Cong. 1st Sess.]

Documents accompanying the President's Message.

Gross revenue for the year ending 30th of June, 1834	$2,823,749 34
Compensation to postmasters	$897,317 20
Incidental expenses	87,744 27
Transportion of the mails	1,925,543 52

Total expenditure	$2,910,605 08
Balance against the Department	$86,858 74

Gross revenue for the year ending 30th of June, 1835	$2,993,556 66
Compensation to postmasters	$945,417 84
Incidental expenses	92,924 92
Transportation of the mails	1,719,007 32

Total expenditure	2,757,350 08
Balance in favor of the Department	$236,206 58

In the first part of the year 1835, additional allowances were authorized, as is alleged, amounting on the 1st May last, to about $157,000, which have since been suspended, and do not enter into the foregoing statement. If finally admitted, they will reduce the balance in favor of the Department that year to about $79,000.

The old books will be closed when all the pecuniary transactions of the Department, prior to the 1st of July last, are brought upon them. Statements made out from these books, and other data, show the condition of the Department on that day to have been about as follows, viz:

Due to contractors and others	$702,381 92
Due to banks	272,000 00

Whole debt of the Department	$1,064,381 92
Amount due to the Department	$1,128,319 29
Deduct for bad and doubtful debts	131,327 36

Debt esteemed to be good	996,991 93
Cash on hand	43,689 40

Whole available means	$1,040,681 33
-----------------------	----------------

Balance of debt over available means on 1st of July last	23,700 59
If the suspended allowances be added	157,000 00

It will make the debt exceed the available means on 1st of July last	$180,700 59
--	--------------

The accounts of the Postmasters for the quarter ending 30th September last, have been so far examined as to show satisfactorily, that the increase of gross revenue over that of the corresponding quarter of last year, is about twelve per cent. The annual saving in the recent letting of contracts was about $30,000. Predicated on an average increase of revenue throughout the current fiscal year of ten per cent. and on a saving of $25,000 when the contracts recently let shall be executed with necessary alterations, an estimate of the gross revenue and accruing responsibilities for the year ending 30th June, 1836, and indicates the following results, viz:

Gross revenue for the year ending 30th June, 1836	$3,292,692 00
Compensation to Postmasters	$1,039,958 00
Incidental expenses	70,000 00
Transportation of the mails	1,706,507 00

Total expenditures	2,816,465 00
Balance in favor of the Department	$476,227 00

Although the whole of this sum may not be available, on account of the usual losses and defalcations, it is not doubted, that, aided by collections of outstanding balances, it will be sufficient to pay off the debts of the Department, and leave a considerable amount applicable to an extension of mail accommodations.

When the undersigned took charge of this Department, his attention was immediately called to the condition of its finances; but it was soon found that no satisfactory account of its debts or its means could, within any short period, be obtained from its books. It was only perceived, from current incidents and detached accounts, that the unsatisfied demands of contractors from every quarter of the country, were daily accumulating; that there was a debt of near $300,000 due to banks; that the outstanding acceptances of the Treasurer exceeded $300,000; that a considerable portion of the revenue of some of the large offices, for the present calendar year, had been anticipated by drafts discounted in banks, which they had been instructed to pay at maturity; that additional allowances had been recently authorized to a considerable amount; that to provide the means to meet the demands on the Department at Washington, created by the system of acceptances, upwards of two thousand of the most considerable post offices had been directed to deposit their income in banks; and that these means proving insufficient, the Department was subjected to continual embarrassments in devising ways and means to meet its engagements. At the same time, it was believed on all hands, that the current revenue of the Department considerably exceeded its current expenditure, and that the aggregate of debt was in progress of diminution. In this state of things, it was deemed expedient to make an effort to extricate the Department from its embarrassments. The measures resorted to for that purpose, were as follows, viz:

1. A suspension of all recent allowances from the credit of the contractors.

2. A refusal to accept or pay any drafts drawn on the Department, except by special arrangement.

3. The application of the income of the current quarter to the payment of that quarter's expenses, the surplus only to be applied to the payment of pre-existing claims.

4. The introduction of a system which should effect a more prompt collection and application of the current income of the Department.

The allowances suspended amounted to about $157,000. Without reference to their merits, it was believed that a preference ought to be given to other claims in making payments.

The discontinuance of acceptances was essential to enable the Department to command its means. A revenue arises wherever the mails are carried, and it would seem obviously appropriate, as well as convenient, that the services of contractors should be paid for in the sections of country where they are rendered, and, as far as practicable, out of the income which they produce. But the practice of suffering the contractors to draw for their pay, subjected the Department to the inconvenience of collecting its funds from the post offices throughout the Union, and transferring them to Washington to meet the drafts. The slowness and uncertainty of this operation made it an insufficient reliance to meet its acceptances, produced the necessity of looking elsewhere for the means, and rendered it difficult to manage its finances with any convenience or regularity.

By paying the expenses of the current quarter at its close, and announcing a determination to pay in like manner at the close of each succeeding one, applying only the surplus to the discharge of former debts, it was believed that the credit of the Department would immediately be elevated, and thenceforward sustained.

Orders to deposit in banks, and drafts on postmasters in favor of contractors, constituted the system of collection found in operation. Upwards of two thousand post offices had orders to deposit, and upwards of eight thousand were instructed to retain their postages until drawn upon. Many of the deposit offices were dilatory, and defalcation among them was not uncommon. Many of the other offices were not drawn upon for several quarters, on account of the smallness of their income, or other circumstances. The necessities of the Department compelled it to draw on the more productive offices at the end of each quarter, before their accounts could be adjusted; and its drafts being predicated on estimates, could not be for the exact sum in hand. To avoid the danger of a protest, in consequence of drawing for too much, the Treasurer generally drew for too little, thereby leaving small balances in all the draft offices also. There were, consequently, balances remaining in the hands of more than eight thousand postmasters, which, though generally small, amounted in the aggregate to a large sum.

For the purpose of promptly bringing into action the means of the Department, at the end of each quarter, the undersigned divided the offices into three classes. The first class, called "Collection Offices," are upwards of nine thousand in number. The postmasters of this class have been instructed to pay on demand, at the close of each quarter, the whole amount due to the Department on account of the postages of that quarter, to the contractors who carry the mails along their respective routes, and forward their receipts to the Department. The contractors are instructed to forward acknowledgments, setting forth the whole amount received from each and all the postmasters, and to report forthwith every postmaster who fails to pay, and his reasons therefor, if known to them. To secure promptness and fidelity on the part of the contractors, they are permitted to collect only from so many postmasters as may pay them about seventy-five per cent. of their quarterly compensation, and they are informed that the balance will not be paid them until they shall have collected from every office, on their list, or shown, by reporting the delinquent postmasters, that they have used due diligence to do so, and are not in fault for the failure.

The second class, called "Depositing Offices," about five hundred and fifty in number, are instructed to deposit their income in banks quarterly, monthly, or weekly, according to its amount. This class embraces all the large offices, and most others which can as conveniently deposit as pay to contractors, together with the most considerable offices on interior routes, which yield a surplus revenue, and whose proceeds cannot be used in paying the contractors who supply them.

The third class, called "Draft Offices," about two hundred and fifty in number, embrace those not convenient to banks, whose proceeds cannot be paid over to contractors at the close of the quarter, without danger of their being overpaid, but may generally be drawn for, in whole, or in part, to pay the balances due, after giving the contractors credit for all their collections.

The interest of the contractors induces them promptly, after the quarter ends, to push their collections, and report all delinquents. During the same time, the Depositing Offices are placing their funds in the banks. When the contractor's acknowledgment for moneys collected comes in, his account is examined. If the balance due, or any part of it, can be paid by draft, on one or more of the Draft Offices, it is done; and that which cannot be so discharged, is paid by check on some convenient bank.

The results anticipated from these measures have been fully realized. On the first July last, payments on claims, accruing prior to the preceding quarter, were suspended; and all the energies of the Pay Clerks were devoted to paying the debts of that quarter. These payments were completed on the 19th day of August, leaving a considerable amount of funds in bank. The payment of the old debts was then resumed. From that moment the Department was disembarrassed. In no instance since has the payment of any claim been refused for the want of funds.

On the first of October last, the new system of collection came into action. Encouraged by its favorable operation, and finding the funds of the Department in bank to exceed $140,000, the undersigned, on the 18th of the last month, directed the payment of the bank debts in Baltimore and Boston, amounting to $67,304 38.

The entire debt on the 1st July, as above stated, was	$1,064,381 92
Of this debt there has been paid out of postages accruing before the 1st of July, about the sum of	409,991 34
Out of postages accruing since the 1st July, the sum of	187,086 14
	$597,077 48

Old debt remaining unpaid on this day, about	$467,304 44
--	---------------------

Of this debt, about $205,000 is due to banks, and the balance to contractors and others.

The statements of the amount of debt, and the amount paid out of postages accruing prior to the 1st of July, are not supposed to be exact, but they do not vary materially from the actual amounts.

The result of these operations is :

That the claims of contractors and others against the Department, arising within the quarter ending 30th June last, have been paid, with the exception of a few suspensions;

That the claims arising within the quarter ending 30th September last, have been paid as far as they were ready for adjustment;

That one hundred and eighty-seven thousand and eighty-six dollars of the pre-existing debt, have been paid out of postages accruing since 30th June last;

That the funds in bank on this day, are seventy-three thousand seven hundred and thirty-seven dollars.

The payment of an amount of the old debt so far beyond the available surplus of the last quarter, leaving a large sum on hand, will create no surprise, when it is recollected that, in addition to that surplus, the Department has been able to avail itself of a considerable amount stopped from contractors, on account of overpayments, and a still larger sum arising from the deposits of the weekly and monthly Depositing Offices, on account of the current quarter.

The debt of the Department, except that portion of it which is due to Banks, and the suspended allowances, is now perfectly manageable, and cannot hereafter embarrass its operations. The Bank debt is reduced to about two hundred and five thousand dollars.

The following statement of the quarterly income and expenditure of the Department, for the last two years, which, though not accurate, may be relied upon for all practical purposes, will more fully show the progress of its financial concerns, and its prospect of speedy redemption from debt.

As it has already been ascertained from examination of the returns, that the revenue of the last quarter exceeds that of the corresponding quarter of the last year about twelve per cent., it may be safely stated that the surplus of revenue over expenditure for that quarter, will be about $120,000; and that there was, on the 30th September last, a surplus of available means over the whole debt of the Department, amounting to about $100,000. It is confidently expected that this surplus will be increased, at the end of the current quarter, to about $220,000; and, at the end of the next quarter, to about $340,000. The old debts due to contractors and others, are now paid as fast as they are presented and can be adjusted; and the accumulation of funds, notwithstanding these payments, is so considerable as to justify a belief that $100,000 of the remaining bank debt may be paid in January next, and the balance in April.

The undersigned takes pleasure in presenting you with the data which justify this anticipation. He is happy to say, that so far from needing any pecuniary aid from the Treasury, the Department may be presented to Congress, before the termination of their approaching session, substantially free from debt, with a clear annual surplus exceeding $400,000, applicable to the establishment of new mail routes, and the improvement of old ones. Even should the suspended allowances be finally paid, the anticipated result cannot be delayed beyond the month of July, 1836.

A balance of the books of this department has not been effected for about twenty years. After a full consideration of the subject it was deemed expedient to close them, and open a new set from the 1st of July, 1835. The balances of accounts are not carried forward from the old books to the new, but all collections made of moneys due before that day, are credited to an account headed "Arrearages," on the new books; and all payments made on debts contracted prior to that day, are charged to the same account. That account, when closed, will show the exact amount of debt and of available means at the commencement of the present fiscal year; facts which cannot be sooner ascertained with exactitude.

In keeping the new books, an attempt is making, through the agency of General Accounts, to show specifically from what sources the revenue of the Department is derived, and to what purposes it is applied. The accruing revenue is credited to General Accounts, headed "Letter Postages," "Newspapers and Pamphlets," and "Fines." The expenditures are charged to General Accounts, headed, "Compensation of Postmasters," "Transportation of the Mails," "Ship, Steamboat, and Way Letters," "Wrapping Paper," "Office Furniture," "Advertising," "Mail Bags," "Blanks," "Mail Locks and Keys, and Stamps," "Mail Depredations and Special Agents," "Clerks, &c. for Offices," and "Miscellaneous." When the entire business of a quarter is brought upon the books, the credit General Accounts will be balanced by transfer to the credit of a general account, headed "Post Office Department," which will thus exhibit, at a glance, the entire income of the Post Office Department for the quarter, and the sources whence it is derived. In like manner, the debit General Accounts will be closed by transfer to debit of "Post Office Department," which will thus show, on a single page, the whole expenditures of the quarter, with the objects of expenditure. The balance of this account, thus made up, will exhibit the condition of the Department at the end of each quarter.

It has long appeared to the undersigned, that, by a system of this kind, the application of the public moneys may be shown more specifically than by any other system of specific appropriation.

The efficiency of a department with so many thousand agents in its employment, essentially depends on the vigilance and energy of the directing and supervising power. Impressed with this conviction, it is the policy and the effort of the Department to make the supervision so complete, that every individual in its service shall feel that he acts directly under the eye of some of its officers or clerks.

To secure promptitude in the rendition of accounts, the postmasters, with the exception of a few at the large offices, have been required to forward their accounts within two days, or by the first mail, after the close of each quarter. As a means of enforcing this requisition, the post offices are divided into four classes, in reference to their distance from Washington, and other circumstances. For the arrival of the accounts of the first class, ten days are allowed; for the second, twenty; for the third, thirty; and for the fourth, forty. It is made the special duty of a clerk to note the day on which each quarterly return arrives, and promptly call all delinquents to account, when the allotted time shall have expired. This plan of supervision was put in operation at the commencement of the present quarter.

To produce an ever-active supervision over contractors, it is made the duty of postmasters at the ends of all post-routes, to keep, and return to the Department, weekly or monthly, according to the importance of the route, registers, showing the exact time of arrival and departure of every mail, with such remarks as the occasion may require. It is made the duty of a clerk, in each division, to see that the postmasters keep and return these registers, to examine them when returned, and note all delinquencies of contractors. This plan is not yet in full operation.

It is intended to apply the same principle of strict supervision to the return of receipts by Postmasters; to the making of deposits by the depositing offices, and the forwarding of certificates of deposit; to the printing and furnishing of blanks; and, as far as practicable, to all services required by law, and the regulations of the Department.

Sufficient attention has been given by the undersigned to the manner in which newspapers and other printed matter are conveyed by mail, to satisfy him that it is radically defective. No supervision or power of punishment, exercised or possessed by the Postmaster General, is adequate to prevent, on some occasions, the canvass bags in which printed papers are stowed, from being left behind, so long as they are carried separately from the letter mails, or on the outside of coaches and stages. To prevent the evil in some degree, it has been provided in the contracts lately awarded on the main routes to the West, that, on the outward trip, no passengers shall be carried in the inside of the mail coach, but that it shall be devoted exclusively to the mails; and, on similar routes along the seaboard, the same restriction will be applied in both directions. It is believed that the enforcement of the contracts in this respect, will ensure the safe conveyance of the newspapers as far as they travel on these routes.

A further improvement in this respect is anticipated from arrangements now in progress, to run steamboat mails on the western rivers, during the season of steamboat navigation, and on a portion of the Mississippi, during the whole year.

It is well known that an immense correspondence is carried on during the business season, in steamboats, upon these waters. So long as the Department has no mails upon the rivers, it is difficult, if not impracticable, to enforce the Post Office laws, and bring the letters so transmitted into the post offices. Regular lines of boats are now formed and forming on the Ohio and Mississippi rivers. A contract has been made with the owners of one of these lines to carry a mail three times a week between Pittsburg and Cincinnati, during the season of navigation, for $1,800 a year. A proposition has been received and accepted to convey a mail, except when prevented by ice, on the Ohio and Mississippi rivers, between Louisville and St. Louis, three times a week, and between Louisville and New Orleans three times a week during the business season, and twice a week during the rest of the year, touching at all the considerable intermediate points, for $30,000 a year for the whole service. It is in contemplation to put this mail into operation early in the coming year. From giving regular river mails to the business of the West, it is expected that they will convey almost the entire correspondence upon those waters, and increase the revenues of the Department in a sum at least equal to their cost. This facility being furnished to the community, the Post Office laws can, with more propriety, be enforced in relation to letters conveyed in other boats. Nor is it one of the least advantages anticipated from these mails, that they will relieve the land mails, in the West and Southwest, of an immense mass of mail matter, and render its conveyance the more safe, at the seasons when the roads are most difficult, and in the Mississippi country during the whole year.

The multiplication of railroads will form a new era in the mail establishment. They must soon become the means by which the mails will be transported on most of the great lines of intercommunication; and the undersigned has devoted some attention to the devising of a system which shall render the change most useful to the country.

The cities and large towns on the great lines constitute centres, from which the mails diverge to pervade and supply the surrounding country. At these points, generally, are the distributing post offices. The great whole will evidently be most speedily and effectually served, by causing the mails to pass, with all possible expedition, by night and by day, along the main lines, through these numerous centres, stopping for no local object, and pausing at the distributing offices only long enough to exchange mails. The distribution through the country around must be made after the great mail has passed on, by means of coaches, stages, or other vehicles, and horses, as the interest of the Department and the country may mutually require. Or, if any immediate offices be supplied by the railroads, it should be those only where the cars stop, unless a mode of exchanging mail-bags, without stopping, can be introduced for the accommodation of others.

The means of transportation between Washington and Boston, are now so complete, that this system might be advantageously introduced, at least during the season of steamboat navigation. The time occupied in passing from Washington to Baltimore, by the railroad, is but two and a half hours. To pass from Baltimore to Philadelphia, by steamboats and the Newcastle and Frenchtown railroad, requires about nine hours. From Philadelphia to New York, by the Camden and Amboy railroad and steamboats, occupies about eight hours; from New York to Providence, about fifteen hours; and from Providence to Boston two and a half hours. The travelling hours from Washington to Boston, are about thirty-seven. Allowing half an hour at Baltimore, Philadelphia, New York, and Providence, each, for exchange of mails, the time occupied in transmitting a mail from Washington to Boston would be thirty-nine hours.

This is the speed of present conveyances. In the course of the next year, it is expected that Baltimore and Philadelphia will be connected by railroad, when the time occupied in passing from city to city will not exceed six hours. New York will soon be connected with Boston by similar roads, when the time occupied between them will not exceed fifteen hours. So that, when a railroad line from Washington to Boston shall be completed, a mail may pass from one to the other in thirty-four hours at most, and probably in a few years, from the progressive improvements of locomotives, in less than thirty hours.

Within the quarter of the Union embraced in the recent letting of contracts, there are several railroads; some of them made no offers, and the rest demanded prices far beyond the usual cost of transporting the mails on the same routes heretofore, and beyond what was asked by individual citizens. Anxious to give the mails the greatest possible expedition between Washington and New York, the undersigned made an effort to bring the companies, in whose hands are the means of conveyance on that great line, to act in concert with each other, and with the Department, by which means two daily mails might be run through that line, performing the trip each way, and conveying passengers from city to city in about twenty-three hours. The effort failed, in consequence of the very heavy compensation asked by them.

Not despairing of being able to induce the companies to take a more enlarged view of their own and the public interest, and to abate materially in the amount of their demands, the undersigned sent his Chief Clerk to confer with the managers of all the railroads on the line, whether finished or not, with a view to ascertain whether any reasonable arrangements could be made with them, present or prospective, for the conveyance of this important mail. Although the agent performed the service with distinguished zeal and ability, his efforts were almost wholly fruitless.

The company owning the railroad between Washington and Baltimore, demanded $10,000, or about $250 per mile, merely to haul one daily mail from depot to depot, without other responsibility, and $14,000 for two daily mails.

The companies owning the several railroads now constructing from Baltimore to Philadelphia, demanded 30,000 dollars, or upwards of $320 per mile, to haul one daily mail from city to city.

The company owning the Camden and Amboy road demanded $26,000, or near $300 per mile, for one daily mail, and $3,000 for a second.

The companies composing the upper line through New Jersey, demanded $23,000, or about $250 per mile, for the conveyance of one daily mail, and $8,000 for a second.

Aware that the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads of the House of Representatives had had the subject of the transportation of the mails on railroads under consideration at the last session, and had unanimously proposed to restrict the Department to seventy-five dollars per mile for the service; and, moreover, considering the sums demanded disproportionate to the service, and wholly unreasonable, the undersigned determined not to accept any of the propositions. To leave no means untried, however, to form a satisfactory arrangement, he offered a contract for merely hauling a box containing the mail, from depot to depot, daily, to the Baltimore and Washington Railroad Company, at $100 per mile, which they promptly declined.

The undersigned does not intend to pay the prices demanded by these companies, unless directed to do so by those who have a right to control him. He will sooner put post-coaches or mail-wagons on the old roads, and run them there until public opinion, or the voice of superior authority, induces the associations, which have been permitted to monopolize the means of speedy conveyance on these routes, to abate in their terms. To enable you to present the whole subject to the legislative body, a copy of the instructions to the agent, and his correspondence with the companies, and the subsequent correspondence of the Department with them, is herewith submitted.

The undersigned is happy to state, that indications of a spirit more in accordance with the great object of public accommodation, which has induced the Legislatures of the States to sanction the construction of these improvements by private companies, have manifested themselves in other quarters. The Boston and Providence Railroad Company have intimated a willingness to carry two daily mails between those cities, embracing the New York steamboat mail, for $2000 a year, being at the rate of about $25 per mile for a single mail, and a contract has been authorized.

The New Jersey Railroad Company, whose road when completed will extend from Jersey City to New Brunswick, have offered to carry the great mail from New York along their road, one year, at $100 per mile, or four years at $150, and to carry two mails for $200.

The company owning the Portsmouth and Roanoke road have contracted to carry the mail three times a week, from Norfolk to Halifax, N. C., a distance of ninety miles, for the compensation paid the former contractor, which is equal to about $26 per mile, the mail to be conveyed on their Railroad as far as completed.

The Tuscumbia, Courtland, and Decatur Railroad Company have offered to carry the mail three times a week, on their road, at the lowest rate of post-coach transportation in the Southern States, which amounts to about $26 per mile.

It is conceded that the mails carried on all these roads, except the New Jersey road, are much less than the great mail between Washington and New York; but they probably bear a greater proportion to that mail than the compensation asked for the former service, does to that offered by the Department for the latter.

Referring to the instructions given to his Agent for his further views in relation to the Railroad Companies, the undersigned submits the question to your disposition, and will await the instructions of Congress as to the course hereafter to be pursued with these Companies, and other monopolies of like character, in contracting with which the Department is unable to avail itself of the spirit of moderation superinduced by an active competition. Indeed, the Post Office law, so far as it relates to the advertising and making of contracts, is predicated upon the expectation that there would be a general competition for them, and does not provide for cases where the Department has to deal with monopolies, no such state of things having then been anticipated.

A new question has arisen in the administration of this Department. A number of individuals have established an association in the Northern and Eastern States, and raised a large sum of money, for the purpose of effecting the immediate abolition of Slavery in the Southern States. One of the means resorted to has been the printing a large mass of newspapers, pamphlets, tracts, and almanacs, containing exaggerated, and, in some instances, false accounts, of the treatment of slaves, illustrated with cuts calculated to operate on the passions of the colored men, and produce discontent, assassination, and servile war. These they attempted to disseminate throughout the slave-holding States, by the agency of the public mails.

As soon as it was ascertained that the mails contained these productions, great excitement arose, particularly in Charleston, S. C., and, to ensure the safety of the mail in its progress southward, the postmaster at that place agreed to retain them in his office until he could obtain instructions from the Postmaster General. In reply to his appeal he was informed that it was a subject upon which the Postmaster General had no legal authority to instruct him. The question again came up from the Postmaster at New York, who had refused to send the papers by the steamboat mail to Charleston, S. C. He was also answered that the Postmaster General possessed no legal authority to give instructions on the subject; but as the undersigned had no doubt that the circumstances of the case justified the detention of the papers, he did not hesitate to say so. Important principles are involved in this question, and it merits the grave consideration of all departments of the Government.

It is universally conceded that our States are united only for certain purposes. There are interests, in relation to which they are believed to be as independent of each other as they were before the Constitution was formed. The interest which the people of some of the States have in slaves, is one of them. No State obtained by the Union any right whatsoever over slavery in any other State, nor did any State lose any of its power over it, within its own borders. On this subject, therefore, if this view be correct, the States are still independent, and may fence round and protect their interests in slaves, by such laws and regulations as in their sovereign will they may deem expedient.

Nor have the people of one State any more right to interfere with this subject in another State, than they have to interfere with the internal regulations, rights of property, or domestic police, of a foreign nation. If they were to combine and send papers among the laboring population of another nation, calculated to produce discontent and rebellion, their conduct would be good ground of complaint on the part of that nation; and, in case it were not repressed by the United States, might be, if perseveringly persisted in, just cause of war. The mutual obligations of our several States to suppress attacks by their citizens on each others' reserved rights and interests, would seem to be greater, because, by entering into the Union, they have lost the right of redress which belongs to nations wholly independent. Whatever claim may be set up or maintained, to a right of free discussion within their own borders, of the institutions and laws of other communities, over which they have no rightful control, few will maintain that they have a right, unless it be obtained by compact or treaty, to carry on such discussions within those communities, either orally, or by the distribution of printed papers, particularly if it be in violation of their peculiar laws, and at the hazard of their peace and existence. The constitution of the United States provides that "the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States;" but this clause cannot confer on the citizens of one State higher privileges and immunities in another, than the citizens of the latter themselves possess. It is not easy, therefore, to perceive how the citizens of the Northern States can possess, or claim, the privilege of carrying on discussions within the Southern States, by the distribution of printed papers, which the citizens of the latter are forbidden to circulate by their own laws.

Neither does it appear that the United States acquired, by the constitution, any power whatsoever over this subject, except a right to prohibit the importation of slaves after a certain date. On the contrary, that instrument contains evidences, that one object of the Southern States, in adopting it, was to secure to themselves a more perfect control over this interest, and cause it to be respected by the sister States. In the exercise of their reserved rights and for the purpose of protecting this interest, and ensuring the safety of their people, some of the States have passed laws prohibiting, under heavy penalties, the printing or circulation of papers like those in question, within their respective territories. It has never been alleged that these laws are incompatible with the constitution and laws of the United States. Nor does it seem possible that they can be so, because they relate to a subject over which the United States cannot rightfully assume any control under that constitution, either by law, or otherwise. If these principles be sound, it will follow that the State laws on this subject are within the scope of their jurisdiction, the supreme laws of the land, obligatory alike on all persons, whether private citizens, officers of the State, or functionaries of the General Government.

The Constitution makes it the duty of the United States "to protect each of the States against invasion; and, on application of the Legislature, or of the Executive, (when the Legislature cannot be convened,) against domestic violence." There is no quarter whence domestic violence is so much to be apprehended, in some of the States, as from the servile population, operated upon by mistaken or designing men. It is to obviate danger from this quarter that many of the State laws in relation to the circulation of incendiary papers, have been enacted. Without claiming for the General Government the power to pass laws prohibiting discussions of any sort, as a means of protecting States from domestic violence, it may safely be assumed, that the United States have no right, through their officers or departments, knowingly to be instrumental in producing, within the several States, the very mischief which the Constitution commands them to repress. It would be an extraordinary construction of the powers of the General Government, to maintain that they are bound to afford the agency of their mails and post offices, to counteract the laws of the States, in the circulation of papers calculated to produce domestic violence; when it would, at the same time, be one of their most important constitutional duties to protect the States against the natural, if not necessary, consequences produced by that very agency.

The position assumed by this Department is believed to have produced the effect of withholding its agency, generally, in giving circulation to the obnoxious papers in the Southern States. Whether it be necessary more effectually to prevent, by legislative enactments, the use of the mails, as a means of evading or violating the constitutional laws of the States in reference to this portion of their reserved rights, is a question which, it appears to the undersigned, may be submitted to Congress, upon a statement of the facts, and their own knowledge of the public necessities.

The experience of the undersigned has confirmed his prior impressions, that the Post Office Department requires re-organization. The arrangement of the administrative branch of the Department is not particularly objectionable; but the organization of its financial branch is neither convenient nor safe, and it may be doubted whether it be constitutional.

It is not convenient, because it imposes on the Postmaster General, whose administrative duties are sufficient for any one man, the responsibility of settling near fifty thousand accounts annually, and disbursing upwards of two millions of dollars.

It is not safe, because the entire nett revenue of the Department, which now exceeds $2,000,000 annually, is by law put at the disposition of the Postmaster General, subject to be paid over to his check, draft, or order, without other safeguards than those he chooses to impose on himself.

It is of doubtful constitutionality, because the constitution requires that "no money shall be drawn from the Treasury, but in consequence of appropriations made by law;" thereby pre-supposing that the revenues of the Government are first paid into the Treasury, whereas, no part of the tax collected from the people in postages, amounting now to more than $3,000,000 annually, ever appears upon the Treasury books; and it is all expended without appropriation. If so large a revenue may be properly raised and expended, without going into the Treasury, by one department of the Government, it is not perceived why the other departments may not be authorized to sustain themselves in a similar way; thus evading entirely the constitutional provision. The more safe construction would seem to be, that all moneys collected by the Government, whatever may be the mode, shall, in the legal acceptance of the phrase, be paid into the Treasury, to be expended in conformity with appropriations made by Congress.

There would be nothing impracticable or seriously inconvenient, in the application of this principle to the revenues of the Post Office Department. To effect this object, it is not necessary that the moneys be collected and deposited in banks, or any other designated place, or that the existing system of collection should be deranged. Almost a third of the gross revenue is absorbed in commissions to Postmasters, and the expenses of their offices. Upon settlement of the Postmasters' accounts, the sums thus expended may be carried to the debit and credit of the post office appropriation at the same time. The amounts received by contractors from postmasters, may be disposed of in a similar way. The result would be, that although the treasurer would have open accounts only with the Deposit Banks of the Post Office, his books would exhibit the whole amount received from the people, and expended by the Government, on account of the mail establishment.

There is another feature, in which the present organization of the Post Office Department is defective and unsafe. It is believed to be a sound principle, that public officers who have an agency in originating accounts, should have none in their settlement. The War and Navy Departments are in general organized upon this principle. In the orders, contracts, and regulations of the heads of those departments, or their ministerial subordinates, issued and made in conformity with law, accounts originate. The moneys are generally paid by another set of agents, but partially dependent on the heads of the departments; and the accounts are finally settled by a third set, who are wholly independent of them. If, from any cause, an illegal expenditure be directed by the head of a department, it is the duty of the disbursing agent not to pay the money; and if he does pay it, it is the duty of the Auditors and Comptrollers to reject the item in the settlement of his account. But the Postmaster General practically unites these three functions in his own person. He issues orders and makes contracts and regulations, producing the expenditure of money; settles the accounts and pays the money. Although he is required to render a quarterly account to the Treasury, to be settled as other public accounts are, this requisition has long ceased to constitute any practical check upon him, nor can it ever be otherwise under the existing system.

Herewith is submitted a printed pamphlet, exhibiting the interior organization of the Post Office Department, as it now exists. The most important improvement required, is to separate the settlement of accounts entirely from the Post Office Department, and vest it in an Auditor, appointed by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, whose duties shall in general correspond with those assigned to the Accountant under the present organization.

The Postmaster General would then be placed on a similar footing with the other heads of Departments. His power over the funds of the Department should extend only to a superintendence over the rendition of accounts, to prescribing the manner in which postmasters shall pay over their balances, to making drafts for the collection and transfer of post office funds, to issuing warrants on the Treasury for the purpose of paying balances reported to be due by the Auditor, and making advances in special cases. The remaining portion of his duties would be those of a ministerial character, now performed upon his responsibility, modified by salary restriction upon his discretion.

VOL. XII.—D

To enable him to exercise an effectual supervision over postmasters and contractors a third assistant should be given to the Department. These services have almost doubled since a second assistant was added, and have been recently extended, making them too onerous to be performed by two assistants, however distinguished for their industry and devotion to the service. Moreover, these duties are constantly increasing, and will be greatly enlarged by the extension of mail service which is anticipated within the coming year. If the United States were, for this purpose, divided into three divisions, and an assistant assigned to each, the stations would still be among the most laborious and responsible in the Government.

Three Assistants, on the footing of auditors as to salaries, with eight clerks each; a chief clerk on the footing of chief clerks in the other Departments; twelve clerks for other miscellaneous duties, including the dead-letter service; an agent to superintend the Post Office building and property, and attend to purchases of stationary, furniture, &c.; a messenger, an assistant messenger, a laborer, and two watchmen; would constitute a force with which the ministerial duties of the Department could be performed with comfort, promptitude, and efficiency.

The Auditor's office would be the most extensive and laborious accounting office in the Government, meriting corresponding provision in clerks and salaries. Like other auditors, he should have a chief clerk for general duties. The examination of postmasters' accounts, amounting to about 42,000 annually, sending out errors, and other attendant services, constitute a severe duty, and requires 18 clerks. The registration of postmasters' accounts, after examination, and keeping the ledgers of the Department, requires eight clerks. To keep the pay books, see that postmasters pay over their balances and return the receipts, and prepare contractors' accounts for settlement, requires nine clerks. To collect balances from former postmasters and others, make out statements of the accounts, and superintend suits and prosecutions, requires at present seven clerks. Over each of these considerable branches of duty there must be, as at present, a principal clerk, for whom liberal provision should be made. It is but just to the gentlemen employed in this arduous portion of the public service, to say, that their compensation, in general, compared with that given in other Departments of the Government, has hitherto been disproportioned to the labor required of them, and, as to married men, inadequate to the support of their families, and the education of their children. To complete the organization of that office, there must also be a messenger and one assistant messenger.

The proposed re-organization would somewhat reduce the number of persons employed in the business of the Post Office, by rendering useless the clerks now occupied in making out the Postmaster General's accounts for the Treasury, as also the clerks employed in examining them in the Fifth Auditor's office, if not also those in the Comptroller's office, assigned to the same duty.

The utility of requiring all the Post Office accounts to be reported to the Comptroller, is not perceived. It would perhaps promote the ends of justice and operate as a salutary check upon the Auditor, if an appeal were allowed to the Comptroller, at the instance of the claimant or Postmaster General, should either, in any case, be dissatisfied with his decision.

If the business of the Post Office Department were thus organized, it might be required of the Postmaster General to furnish to Congress, annually, specific estimates, setting forth the sums expected to be required under each head of general account now appearing on the books, and any others that Congress might require to be opened; and after obtaining an appropriation of the aggregate for the support of the Post Office Establishment, not to exceed the current revenue, to render an account at the next session of the amount expended for each purpose specified in his estimates. It would be a further improvement if all allowances were prohibited, other than for services rendered in pursuance of some pre-existing law, contract, or lawful regulation, and a small contingent appropriation were assigned to the Postmaster General, like those made to the service of the other Departments to meet necessary expenditures, which cannot be foreseen or provided for by contract or regulation.

Essential improvement might be made, as is believed, in some portions of the law regulating the details of duty assigned to the Postmaster General, particularly as to the making of contracts. Additional precautions are necessary against irresponsible bidding, and to prevent combinations injurious to the Department. If bidders were required, in all cases, to furnish the names of responsible securities with their bids, who should be bound from the date of acceptance, it would prevent the bids of worthless men and mere speculators, which now produce great inconvenience to the Department, and sometimes serious loss. And if, on the other hand, combinations to prevent competition were punishable by perpetual exclusion from the service of the Department it would, it is believed, have an excellent effect on its interests, as well as on the character of its contractors.

It is worthy of consideration whether it would not be expedient to change the rates of letter postage, making them conform to the national currency, in gradations of 5, 10, 15, 20, 25, and 30 cents. Such a provision would save almost half the labor now required in the examination of accounts in the Department, and prevent numberless errors. It would also much simplify the system, if the number of miles to which these rates should apply, were doubled at each increase of rate from the lowest to the highest.

There have been so many changes in mail routes since their original establishment, that it is now difficult, if not impracticable, to trace them from their origin in the law, through all mutations, down to their present condition. It would contribute greatly to the convenience of the Department if they were all re-established in one act, with such alterations and additions, as the accommodation of the public may require, and the interest of the Department admit. A portion of the surplus revenue will be required to make improvements on existing routes; but, it is believed, the Department can, without inconvenience, put into operation new routes, not exceeding in cost $300,000 a year, as soon as they can be established, and the necessary arrangements made.

The aid of legislation is required to close, equitably, some of the old claims against the Department. Various demands exist for services rendered by authority of the Department, in a measure sanctioned by usage, which, though to some extent just, cannot, in the opinion of the undersigned, be adjusted and paid without the sanction of Congress. It is hoped that power may be vested in the Auditor, if one be created, with the sanction of the Comptroller, to settle these claims upon principles of justice and equity; or, if this course be not deemed expedient, that Congress will provide some other means for their speedy adjustment.

The undersigned cannot close this communication, without paying an humble tribute to the worth of a patriot and friend—the late Postmaster General. It may be said of him, as the Head of this Department, that the reason he had not a better fortune was, that he was too good a man. In other positions, and under other circumstances, he would have been one of the greatest and most useful, as he was one of the best, and most highly endowed, of our public men. Having for more than twenty years been acquainted with Mr. BARRY, and been honored with his friendship; knowing his private worth, his love of country, and his disinterestedness; and having always had an abiding confidence in his integrity and honor, it would be to the undersigned a source of lasting regret, if any thing said or done by him, in the administration of this Department, should be understood as intended or calculated to depreciate his virtues, or cast a stain upon his memory.

I have the honor to be, your obedient servant,

AMOS KENDALL.

Postmaster General's instructions to the Agent to negotiate with the Railroad Companies.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT, Oct. 31, 1835.

SIR: It is important for the business of the country, and essential to the interests of the Post Office Department, that the public mails should be transported by the most speedy means of conveyance which modern improvements afford. To give them the utmost practicable degree of usefulness, they should travel in all the main routes by night and by day, stopping only at the most important offices, and there only long enough to be exchanged, leaving it to the ordinary mails to supply other offices on the main, as well as the diverging and less important routes.

By liberal arrangements with the Railroad Companies, these objects may, within a short period, be accomplished on the great line running from Washington through Baltimore and Philadelphia to New York, and probably to Boston.

That the Railroad Companies have an interest in carrying travellers through with all possible expedition, is abundantly evident to every man who has witnessed the increase of travel within the last few years, and contemplated its causes.

No people appreciate more highly economy in time than the people of the United States.

In general, when they start on a journey, they hurry to its end in the shortest possible time, without regard to the dangers and discomforts which may await them in travelling. By existing arrangements between Washington and the North, travellers are obliged to stop in the large cities, where their tavern bills bear a large proportion to the entire expense of transportation. If they had the means of passing onward and saving these heavy bills, as well as the time lost while incurring them, multitudes would travel who now are not able to afford it, and the receipts of the Railroad Companies would probably be doubled.

The time now occupied in travelling from Washington to Baltimore is about two hours and a half. We are informed that by the 1st of November, 1836, a railroad will be completed from Philadelphia to Baltimore, upon which the mails may run through in five hours. Allowing one hour for change of mails, &c. in Baltimore, and the mail may then go through to Philadelphia from Washington in less than nine hours. When the continuous railroad communication through New Jersey shall be completed, it may run through to New York in six hours, which, allowing an hour's delay in Philadelphia, will give a mail from Washington to New York in eighteen hours. If the means of conveyance through New Jersey shall remain as at present, it may be carried through in nineteen, or at most twenty hours. Through Long Island Sound, from New York to Providence, it may now be carried with much regularity in sixteen hours, and two hours and a half more will bring it to Boston by the Boston and Providence railroad. Allowing one hour's delay in New York, and half an hour in Providence, and we have a mail carried from Washington to Boston, a distance of five hundred and thirty-six miles, in about forty hours.

By a liberal arrangement with the several companies in possession of the means of communication upon that line, this object might now be accomplished in forty-two hours; and as soon as we have an uninterrupted chain of railroad between the principal cities, the time may be greatly reduced.

It is unquestionably the interest of the Department to prefer contracting with those companies which can furnish uninterrupted railroad land transportation; for in that case the inconvenience, irregularity, and expense of shifting from one line to another, upon the change of weather and seasons, would be avoided. You are, therefore, requested to wait upon the president and other managers of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, and apprise them of the earnest desire of the Department to make an arrangement with them for the transportation of the principal mail between Washington and Baltimore, on terms which shall be satisfactory to all parties, and promise to be permanent. You will press upon them the idea, which is undoubtedly justified by all reasoning and experience, that their own interest is deeply involved in giving to the mails, and to travellers, the promptest possible conveyance between the two cities, and promise them that the stage lines run by contractors of the Department, and terminating in the two cities, shall be made to connect with their lines of cars at the most convenient hours of departure.

The specific propositions to be made by you, must be left very much to your discretion. The following suggestions, however, may be found useful :

If the railroad company will agree to run a train of cars at such hours as may accommodate and expedite the mail, it is the desire of the Department to impose as little responsibility upon them as possible. If they will enclose, in a strong and substantial manner, a portion of their baggage car, or some other car, to be devoted exclusively to the mails, the Department will cause them to be placed in it at one depot, and taken out at the other, without requiring anything from the company in the way of service or responsibility, but to haul it from the one to the other. In that event, it would be proposed that a strong lock should be placed on the apartment, to which only the postmasters at Washington and Baltimore should have keys, so that the mail should not be accessible to any one between the two depots.

Or, the Department will furnish a strong fire-proof box or chest, so constructed that it may be readily transferred from a wagon to a car prepared for the purpose, into which the entire mails shall be put and locked up at one post office, not to be molested or opened between the two cities, which shall be delivered and received at the depots on the road, without any service or responsibility on the part of the company, beyond the transportation from one depot to the other. Or, if wheels can be constructed which can be used alike upon the railroad and the streets of the cities respectively, then the Department will furnish an entire car, containing the mails to be delivered at one depot and received at the other, asking nothing of the company but to haul it from the one to the other.

You will ascertain for what additional charge they will undertake themselves to transport this box or car between the post offices and their depots—pressing this arrangement as the one which would be most acceptable to the Department.

You will earnestly press upon them the immense importance to the entire business of the country, of having the mails on the main routes of which their road constitutes a part, travel by night as well as by day, as already suggested; and if they cannot be induced, without a compensation which the Department cannot afford to pay, to run a night line, then you are instructed to solicit from them for the Department, the privilege of putting on the road a locomotive, for the sole purpose of carrying the mail with a suitable guard. It is believed that the importance of the object will induce the public-spirited men who manage this concern, to permit the Government, for a suitable consideration, to use their road for a purpose so useful to their fellow-citizens, at hours when they may not think proper to use it themselves.

It is not deemed necessary to press upon them any supposed rights which the Government may have to use railroads owned by private companies for public purposes, allowing such compensation as may be fixed, in a way to be pointed out by Congress. Yet it may be useful to call their attention to that point. The constitution confers on Congress the power "to establish post offices and post roads." So far as it respects roads, this delegation of power has been construed to mean that Congress may designate the roads on which the mails shall be carried. To this construction, the practice of the Government has hitherto conformed. Congress have designated the roads on which mails shall be carried, embracing State roads, county roads, township roads, streets of cities, and turnpike roads belonging to private companies. Penalties are prescribed by law for obstructing the mails upon these roads; and a preference is given to the horses and vehicles by which they are conveyed.

None of those horses or vehicles can be stopped, not even by the law process of the States for the debts of their owners, while actually employed in the conveyance of the mails.

These laws are based upon the unquestionably sound principle that, when a power is clearly delegated by the constitution to the General Government, it is not within the constitutional rights of any State, or company, or individual, to prevent or obstruct its execution.

Railroads differ from turnpikes owned by private companies only in the fact that in the former case the companies own the means of conveyance as well as the road. But if established under the authority of Congress as post roads, is it possible for those companies to prevent the carrying of the mail upon them? If they attempt to do so, either directly or by running their cars at inconvenient hours, or by asking an unreasonable price, may not the Department fulfil the law and accomplish its object by placing locomotives upon the road for the purpose of conveying the mail, to which every thing else must give place? If it be not so, and if these Railroad Companies may refuse to carry the mails at the hours required in the execution of the laws, or may, by any means, direct or indirect, prevent their transportation, then may they obstruct if not defeat one of the powers unquestionably delegated to Congress. For it must be apparent to the most casual observer that, if the mails are driven from the railroads and obliged to depend on stage or horse transportation on the main routes, they will soon cease to be of any considerable value, and this important and useful branch of the Government will sink into contempt.

You are not desired to assume the position indicated by this argument; but you may find it useful to present it for consideration with all the grounds which occur to you in its support, taking care to assure the Company that the Department is anxiously desirous to avoid all such questions now and forever, by a permanent arrangement for the transportation of the mails which shall not be liable to any just exceptions, either on the part of the Government or the Company. In discussing the amount which ought to be allowed for the transportation of the mail, you will not forget to avail yourself of the fact that the great object of chartering the railroad by the State was to cheapen transportation of every kind, and that nothing has higher claims to that advantage than the mails of the United States, in which are involved the interest of millions. You will know how to amplify this argument, and all others which have been suggested. Nor will you forget to press the fact that, at the last session of Congress, the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads in the House of Representatives, by a unanimous vote, inserted a clause in the bill for reorganizing the Post Office establishment, restricting the Department to $75 per mile for railroad transportation of the mails, and represent that we cannot venture to exceed that limit to any great extent. You are requested to use the utmost frankness in your communications and discussions with the company; to make them sensible that the Department desires nothing which is unreasonable; that it seeks only that which will promote the interest of the public and enhance the prosperity of our common country; and that, in seeking after these results, it is ready to contribute liberally, but not extravagantly, to the profit of a company which has done so much in facilitating the means of intercourse and trade between our associated communities.

You will by no means consider yourself as restricted to the propositions or arguments herein suggested; but you will propose any other arrangement which intercourse with the company may suggest to you, subject to the ratification of the Department; and you will use such arguments as may occur, consistent with reason and truth, to effect the object of your mission. Having completed your business with the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, you will visit the President and other managers of the railroad from Philadelphia, through Wilmington to Baltimore, and by urging similar propositions and views, endeavor to form a prospective contract with them, subject to the approval of the Department, for the conveyance of the great mail on their road, when it shall be completed. No change occurs to me as necessary in the propositions suggested, other than that the postmaster at Wilmington should have a key to the box or car in which the mail shall be transported, that he may there open it and exchange mails.

If no satisfactory arrangement can be made with the managers of this road, then you will inquire into the practicability of making an arrangement with the managers of the railroad said to be in progress to connect the road from Philadelphia to Columbia, with the city of Baltimore, when that road shall be completed.

Having finished your inquiries and discussions on those routes, you will proceed to New Jersey, and open similar negotiations with the managers of the road from Philadelphia to Trenton, and through by New Brunswick to New York. It is thought a preference should be given to that over the Amboy route, because, in avoiding all steamboat or water transportation, it is likely to afford a more regular and certain means of conveyance. For the sake of uniformity as well as safety, it is desirable that the same plan of sending the mails in a separate box or car should be here also adopted. If a portion of the transportation be upon the turnpike from Trenton to New Brunswick, the mail-box may be readily transferred from the Railroad car to a carriage constructed to receive it, and at the end of the turnpike again transferred to the railroad car, so that the mail shall not be exposed or disturbed. At Trenton and New Brunswick the postmasters may have keys, and exchange mails.

If no satisfactory arrangement can be made on this route, then you will confer with the Managers of the Amboy road, and, if practicable, make an arrangement with them. If these companies cannot be induced to run a night line, then you will ascertain for what compensation they will transport the great mail by day, and also for what they will carry a second mail between the two cities. But in all your negotiations with these companies, as well as those already adverted to, you are particularly instructed to ascertain whether they will carry a mail by night, and on what terms, and what difference they will make between carrying the great mail by night and by day, and also what difference they will make for carrying a second or small mail in the same manner.

Having finished your negotiations in New Jersey, you will proceed to New York, and confer freely with the President and Managers of the Boston and Providence Railroad Company, with a view to a contract with that Company during steamboat navigation, to carry from New York the entire Eastern mail, distributed at Providence and Boston. Here, also, let the same secure mode of conveyance be suggested.

You are further instructed to inquire of each of the railroad companies with which you may confer, for what sum of money, paid in hand, they will undertake to convey the mails once per day, and for what sum twice per day, at such hours as may from time to time be prescribed by the Department during the continuance of their respective charters. You will apprise them that this inquiry is made with a view, if their terms be reasonable, to ask Congress for an appropriation to purchase the freedom of their roads for the United States mails. If it be found impracticable or inconvenient for you to finish your negotiations with any company on your outward trip, then you can put them in train, and complete them on your return.

It is desirable that this service be concluded with all practicable expedition; you will from time to time report progress.

Very respectfully,

AMOS KENDALL.

P. S. LONGBOROUGH, Esq.

ANNUAL TREASURY REPORT.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, December 8, 1835.

In obedience to the directions of the "act supplementary to the act to establish the Treasury Department," the Secretary of the Treasury respectfully submits to Congress the following report:

1. Of the Public Revenue and Expenditures.

The balance in the Treasury on the 1st of January, 1833, was - $2,011,777 55

The actual receipts into the Treasury during the year 1833, from all sources, were - 33,948,426 25

Making the whole amount in the Treasury in that year - 35,960,203 80

The actual expenditures during the same year, including the public debt, were - 24,257,298 49

Hence, the balance in the Treasury on the 1st of January, 1834, had increased to 11,702,905 31

In addition to this balance, the receipts from all sources during the year 1834, were - 21,791,935 55

Viz:

From customs - $16,214,957 15

Lands - 4,857,600 69

Dividends on bank

stock, &c. - 234,349 50

Sales of bank stock 152,300 00

Incidental items 132,728 21

These, with the above balance, made an aggregate of - 33,494,840 86

The expenditures during 1834, on all objects, were - 24,601,982 44

Viz:

Civil list, foreign intercourse, and miscellaneous subjects - 4,404,728 95

Military service, including fortifications, ordnance, Indian affairs, pensions, arming militia, and internal improvement - 10,064,427 88

Naval service, including gradual improvement - $3,956,260 42

Public debt - 6,176,565 19

This being an excess of expenditures over the receipts of $2,810,046 89, a balance was left in the Treasury on the 1st of January, 1835, amounting to only - 8,892,858 42

For the details of the receipts and expenditures in 1834, reference is made to the annual account thereof, which is this day submitted to Congress, in a separate communication, accompanied, as will be seen, by similar details of the receipts and expenditures for the three first quarters of the year 1835, and of the whole estimates for 1836.

The receipts into the Treasury, ascertained and estimated, during 1835, are computed to be $28,430,881 07. Of these, the actual receipts during the first three quarters, are ascertained to have been $23,480,881 07.

Viz:

From customs - $13,614,459 26

Lands - 9,166,590 89

Dividends on bank

stock - 506,480 82

Sales of bank stock 62,800 00

Incidental items 130,520 10

$23,480,881 07

Those during the fourth quarter, it is expected, will be $4,950,000.

Thus, with the balance on the 1st of January, 1835, they form an aggregate of $37,323,739 49.

The expenditures of the whole year are ascertained and estimated to be - $18,176,141 07

Of these, the expenditures during the first three quarters are ascertained to have been - 13,376,141 07

Viz:

Civil list, foreign intercourse, and miscellaneous - 2,827,196 16

Military service, including fortifications, &c. 7,555,819 41

Annual Treasury Report.

[24th Cong. 1st Sess.]

Naval service, &c.	-	-	$2,929,219 39
Duties refunded	-	-	4,756 04
Public debt	-	-	59,150 07

$13,376,141 07

The expenditures for the fourth quarter, it is expected, will be 4,800,000 00

Thus leaving on the 1st of January, 1836, subject, however, to the deduction hereafter mentioned, an estimated balance of money on hand equal to 19,147,598 42

This includes what has heretofore been reported as unavailable funds, now reduced to about $1,100,000, making the computed available balance on the 1st of January, 1836 18,047,598 00

On that are already imposed by Congress the following charges, by current and permanent appropriations, which have not yet been expended.

First, of former appropriations, except those towards the sinking fund, it is supposed that there will remain unexpended at the close of the present year the sum of $8,126,794.

Of that amount it is computed that only $7,306,765 will be required to accomplish the objects intended by them, leaving $844,707 to be applied in aid of the appropriations for the ensuing year, without reappropriations, (as will be seen in the estimates,) and the balance of $475,322, which has not been required, either at all, or seasonably, for the objects contemplated in its appropriation, will, therefore, be carried to the surplus fund. Secondly, on what is properly embraced in the appropriations towards the sinking fund, there is an outstanding charge of about $253,556, for unclaimed interest and dividends on the funded debt, and of $37,233 for unfunded debt.

These, though chargeable on the Treasury, under existing acts of Congress, and subject at any moment to be demanded, are not all likely to be called for immediately, if ever.

Computing, however, all the existing charges of every kind on the Treasury at the end of the present year, to be about $7,595,574, the balance of available funds, then on hand, would, it is estimated, be sufficient to meet the whole at once, and leave to be hereafter applied by Congress to new and other purposes, the sum of about $10,450,024.

The next subject deserving consideration, is the action of this Department since the last Report in relation to the final extinguishment of the

II. Public Debt.

Before the close of the year 1834, ample funds were deposited with the U. States Bank, as Commissioner of Loans, to discharge all the public funded debt, which was then outstanding.

Of the funds so deposited heretofore, and still unclaimed by the public debtors, there remains in the possession of the Bank, the sum of $143,570 63

Since the 1st of January, 1835, there has been paid from the Treasury of interest and dividends outstanding and before unclaimed on the funded debt the sum of 60,000

There still remains of the same debt, due and unclaimed, but ready to be paid whenever demanded, an amount equal to about 253,556

Similarly situated is a small unfunded debt of $37,513 05 which may hereafter be claimed, and on which has been paid during the past year only $220

It consists of claims, registered prior to 1798, for services and supplies during the Revolutionary war, equal to $27,437 96
Treasury notes issued during the war of 1812, 5,755 and Mississippi stock, 4,320 09

III. The Estimates of the Public Revenue and Expenditures for the year 1836.

The receipts into the Treasury from all sources during the year 1836, are estimated at $19,750,000

Viz:

Customs,	$15,250,000
Public Lands,	4,000,000
Bank dividends, and miscellaneous receipts,	500,000

To which add the balance of available funds in the Treasury on the first of January, 1836, estimated at $18,047,598, and they make together the sum of 37,797,598

The estimates of expenditures, submitted for all specified objects, both ordinary and extraordinary, for the service of 1836, and including the contingent for the usual excesses, are, 23,133,640

The expenditures during that year for specified ordinary purposes, are, estimated at 16,756,815

Thus the permanent and new appropriations for those purposes, required for the service of that year, are estimated at 16,412,108

Under former appropriations, there is included in the estimates for 1836, a sum proposed to be used for the service of 1836, without re-appropriation, equal to 6,344,707

And these two sums amount to the before-mentioned aggregate of 16,756,815

They are divided among the different branches of the public service, as follows, viz: new appropriations for civil, foreign intercourse, and miscellaneous items 3,041,081

Military service, pensions, &c. 8,602,319

Naval service, and gradual improvement 4,768,708

Previous appropriations to be used for 1836, for civil, &c. $5,192, for military, &c. $339,515. By virtue of former acts of Congress, there will probably be wanted, during 1836, for the payment of interest and dividends unclaimed on the funded debt, and of unfunded debt itself, yet unpaid, the sum of $50,000.

To these add such contingent excesses of new appropriations by Congress for ordinary purposes as are not included in the estimates, but which are likely to be deemed proper by that body, and the grounds of which were explained in the last annual report, $3,000,000. The estimates of expenditures in 1836, for extraordinary purposes, which are submitted in connection with the military and naval services, amount to $3,326,825

Making, as estimated for the service of 1836, all the new appropriations of every kind, specifically called for, to be $17,515,933; and all the expenditures of every kind, for the service of the same year to be in the aggregate $23,133,640

On the supposition that the appropriations outstanding and unexpended at the ends of the years 1835 and 1836, will be similar in amount, this would leave an available balance in the Treasury at the close of the year 1836, or, on the 1st of January, 1837, estimated at about $14,500,000, provided the receipts be as computed, and Congress make no larger appropriation for extraordinary or other purposes, at their present session, than those enumerated in the estimates submitted. From this amount, after deducting about eight millions to pay the outstanding appropriations, to which the Treasury will then probably stand pledged, there will be left, at the close of 1836, a nett balance of only from six to seven millions applicable to any other use, which Congress may now, or then, be pleased to designate, instead of about ten and a half millions, the nett balance estimated to be left so applicable at the close of 1835. In other words, the expenditures will, in the ensuing year, for only the objects specified in the estimates, probably exceed the receipts in that year about four millions of dollars, and thus to that extent, reduce the balance now on hand.

IV.—Explanation of the estimates for 1836, with some suggestions on the probable changes till 1842.

The basis on which the above estimates rests will now be exhibited and explained.

In the peculiar condition of the country at this time, without any debt to absorb our surplus receipts, and amidst the great changes which have recently happened, and will probably continue to happen in our whole revenue and expenditures, till after the essential alterations made by existing laws shall cease in 1842, this Department feels bound to enter more into detail than usual concerning the grounds of its estimates, and to disclose more fully every material consideration which has led it to the results presented. Congress will thus be better enabled to judge of their accuracy and to correct any unintentional errors. For convenience in reference, a tabular statement is annexed (A) which presents separately for 1833, 1834, and 1835, so far as the last is ascertained, the general estimates in one column, the actual appropriations in another, and the expenditures in a third. To these are added, in other columns the whole revenue, with the exports and imports for each of those years. For a similar reason the Register has been requested to have the detailed estimates for 1836 prepared with a second column, showing against each the actual appropriation in 1835 towards a like object.

Explanation of the estimates of receipts from Customs.

In respect to the estimated receipts in the Treasury for 1836, so far as derived from customs, they have been computed on an importation of foreign merchandize, expected to be near the average of the last three years, but much less than the importation of the year ending in September, 1835.

Under our present system of revenue, derived usually in the ratio of 3-4 to 6-7 from customs, the amount of imports have a very important bearing on our whole receipts. The amount of exports is likewise material, as in some degree influencing the imports, and in the present condition of the country throwing much light on its great agricultural prosperity, and furnishing with the others highly useful indications concerning the extent and increase of our foreign commerce.

The imports during the year ending September 30th, 1835, are ascertained and estimated at $151,030,368.

They show, compared with the preceding year, an increase of $24,509,036. Those during the three past years have, on an average, been about $128,556,670.

The exports during the past year are ascertained and estimated at $118,955,239; of these $98,531,026 were in domestic, and $20,424,213 in foreign products. Compared with the preceding year they exhibit an increase of $14,618,266.

As some evidence that our estimates of the whole importations the ensuing year are founded on correct data, it appears from a document annexed (C) giving their amount from 1790, that they have constantly and sometimes largely fluctuated between particular years, though comparing most terms of a few consecutive years with former ones, they have generally increased. Thus the whole imports during the five years prior to 1835 exceeded those of any former period of similar length by nearly fifty millions, except on one occasion, almost thirty years since, when they approached near, and another, about twenty years since, when they exceeded, their recent amount; in consequence at the former period of our extraordinary share in the carrying trade, and at the latter one of the large demands to supply the deprivations which had been caused by war, and to meet the increased calls of numerous new commercial enterprises, fostered by returning peace. But the very fact of our recent importations having been so large is one of the causes why a considerable diminution in the whole amount in 1836 is anticipated. Some further causes will hereafter be specified, in connexion with other considerations, which, it is believed, will tend to produce the same conviction. When we proceed to examine the free or dutiable character, rather than the amount of our imports during only a few years past, with a view to estimate more critically the revenue which will probably be received from them in 1836, and to form some general conjectures upon the subject thenceforward to 1842, it is a fact, deserving careful notice, that while the whole amount of imports has for some years been increasing, that portion paying duties has greatly diminished; and, at the same time, the portion exported and entitled to drawback, has not diminished in a similar ratio.

A statement is subjoined, which furnishes important details on this point since the late great changes in the tariff (B.)

The general results from them are, that while the importations paying duties have fallen off in 1833 about eleven millions, and in 1834 about seventeen millions more, and the free goods increased in even larger proportions, the exportation of dutiable articles has fallen off in the corresponding years only about six and two millions, leaving the actual consumption in the United States of such foreign merchandize as pays duties at little more than one-third of our whole imports, and quite twenty millions less than in 1832. This computation as to the consumption is made on the probable hypothesis, that the stock of such merchandize on hand remained about the same at the close of each year, which, though not correct in some single years, on account of wars and various vibrations in trade, would in any series of a few years be near the truth. The importations, however, in 1835, and especially in the last quarter, as they have been unprecedentedly large, exceeding, it is computed, in that alone, more than fifty-three millions, and mostly not yet consumed, may be thought to constitute some exception to the above rule; and hence, coupled with the fact that the returns are still incomplete, and depend in part on estimates, their amount and character have not been introduced into this comparison. But they are inserted in the table, as far as ascertainable, and if considered without any unusual limitations or deductions, would show a great fluctuation in the consumption, both of all foreign merchandize and of that which is not free.

The rate of duty has in many articles been so essentially reduced, or entirely removed, as to lessen the whole receipts from customs over twenty-four millions in the last two years, and produce most of the above differences in the character of our imports. With a view to enable Congress to form a just estimate of the probable receipts from customs the ensuing year, there should be made to any changes occasioned by the above causes, such additions and diminutions for the past and the future as are required by the difference, which often happens between the amount of duties accruing and the amount actually received in any particular year.

In some instances this difference happens by large changes in the amount of bounties paid or duties refunded; or, as in 1833, by the substitution of cash duties for credits, and by giving short instead of longer credits, and in others, by the bonds due after the commencement of some years, as in 1834, having been larger in amount than in 1835, some having been given for duties on certain articles, which afterwards became free, and others having been given for more duties on the same kind and amount of articles before the biennial reduction took effect, than they were subject to afterwards. Without new legislation, however, none of these circumstances, except the last one, can operate much hereafter till 1842; and the effect of that will generally not exceed a quarter of a million of dollars, and is a gain to be felt not till 1837. Another difference arises sometimes from larger collections of old debts due for customs, as when in 1835, but not anticipated in 1836, nearly one quarter of a million has been collected on a single claim, originating as long as ten years ago, independent of many smaller collections on still older claims.

The only remaining difference of much importance in our receipts from customs the ensuing year, compared with the last one, will probably result from the biennial reduction in duties of nearly a million of dollars, which the existing laws provide shall take place after the close of the present month. This reduction of duties might, under some circumstances, be chiefly obviated by an increased importation and consumption of foreign merchandize. But it has been already stated, that the whole importations were of late so unusually large, as with other causes hereafter explained, not only to forbid any reasonable expectation of their increase in 1836, but to render a reduction probable; and, it is further believed, a careful inquiry will show, that the consumption of all kinds of foreign merchandize in the United States has generally enlarged in a smaller ratio than is supposed by many, and especially that the use of such as pays duties, which is the cardinal tests of our receipts from customs, will rather lessen than increase in 1836, and be not materially enlarged till after 1842. By the table before referred to, (C.) which is the most accurate the records of the Treasury enable me to prepare, it will be seen what our consumption of foreign merchandise of all kinds has been during each of the last forty-five years. By comparing, not single years with others, but a series of three years, as, for instance, 1792, '93, and '94, with other similar series after intervals of ten years, and paying less regard to the first and third series, as the former rests on estimates made now and not on valuations at the time, and the latter being in a period of war, is too irregular for a guide, it appears that the average increase of consumption of all foreign merchandise has been not three per cent. annually in the last thirty years, and has been not equal to the increase of our population during the same period by over one and a half per cent.

While the increase of the latter has also been very uniform, varying between every census, and for the whole time very steadily between four and a half and five per cent. that of the former has fluctuated largely, rising under the great impulse given to credit, industry, and enterprise, by the adoption of our Constitution, to near seven per cent. yearly, during most of the first ten years, and then falling to only about one per cent. the next twenty years. After that, by one of those customary tides in trade which almost periodically occur soon after checks to overtrading, an exhaustion of old stocks of goods, and enlarged means to purchase, from abundant crops, their high prices, or any other cause, the rate of increase in consumption rose again; and by reason of so many free goods, and especially the unprecedented imports of specie in 1833 and 1834, amounted, on an average, during the last ten years, to four per cent. annually. Deduct, however, that excess of specie alone, and the increase would not much exceed three per cent. on the consumption of all kinds of foreign merchandise; while on that of such merchandise as pays duties, there has, as before detailed, been a great decrease; and there is no likelihood of much permanent increase, till the whole importations shall be greatly augmented, or the tariff be again extended to a larger list of articles. By the customary reflux of that tide from opposite causes, and the greater substitution of some kinds of domestic products, it is believed that the above rate of increase as to all foreign articles, will again soon decline, and probably remain much below that of our population, until new legislation, or the essential alterations now going on in the tariff, shall materially enlarge the amount of goods paying a low duty. As the capacity of the country to purchase foreign goods will, all other things remaining equal, be then enlarged in the ratio of what it does not pay for duties, such alterations, when their influence shall be fully felt in 1842, will, as the great alterations in 1832 and 1833 have already done, doubtless tend again to augment somewhat the whole importation and consumption of foreign articles. Another comparative view, perhaps more striking, of this consumption, is, that according to the value of the articles as estimated at the custom house, its average amount in 1790 and '91 was about seven dollars per head to our population; in 1800 and 1801, over ten dollars per head; in 1810 and '11, about seven; but in 1820 and '21, only about six; and in 1830 and '31 only about five, or one-half of what it was thirty years before.

This great difference has probably arisen, not only from the increased domestic production of certain manufactures, such as cottons, woollens, salt, and iron, and of some articles more immediately connected with agriculture, such as sugar and molasses, but from a fall in the price of many articles, making the value less of a similar quantity consumed, and from the greater extension of our population into the West, where the independent habits of the people, and the comparatively enhanced cost of foreign articles, would tend to cause a smaller consumption of them than near the seaboard, where their price is lower, and it is customary to depend more on foreign supplies.

It will be noticed that all the above computations have been made of the value, and not the quantities, of the articles consumed. The latter would be more difficult to exhibit in so great detail and fulness. But if they could be, the result would, in a view connected with political economy, be more satisfactory, as showing more clearly the comparative habits of our population at different periods; because prices, especially of some manufactures, have fallen during the last forty years; probably, on an average, over fifty per cent., and our whole consumption of foreign articles has, without doubt, diminished more in value than in quantity.

But the difficulties before mentioned have prevented any further exhibit, coupled with the circumstance, that, in respect to the amount of duties, the inquiry now most pertinent and material, the result, in the present state of the tariff, would be much less important than some might at first imagine, as it would be wholly unaltered in all cases of specific rates of duty, whether the values of the quantities be detailed in the statements, and equally unaltered in over half of all the foreign goods now imported, they being at present free, and the rate of increase in their consumption by additions to our population, or other causes, having no influence whatever on the revenue.

Hence, in looking to the future, it is essential to notice that, if the increase in consumption of all foreign goods should continue to be on an average till 1842, as large as during the last thirty years, it would only add yearly about one and one quarter millions to the imports of goods which are now dutiable, and on which the average revenue would not probably exceed two hundred and fifty thousand dollars per annum. But, it is presumed that the increasing substitution in our importations for consumption, of free for dutiable goods, when the former will answer the desired purposes of the community, will, on account of their comparative cheapness, make the free rather than the dutiable goods usually increase, and be frequently in a ratio quite large enough to counteract or neutralize the effects of any tendency to augment the revenue by an increased consumption of all kinds of foreign goods.

The commercial returns for 1835 were not received so as to be used in any of the above computations; but so far as now ascertained and estimated, they are given in the table, and furnish another illustration of the fluctuating character of our foreign trade, and the uncertainty of any statements founded on it, which do not extend to comparisons of various and distant periods of time.

The exports of domestic produce the ensuing year will, as before remarked, exert some influence on the amount of importations, and hence on the revenue from customs. But the effect of those exports on our importations for immediate consumption, including all but specie, and other articles to be again exported, will in reality always be less than is sometimes supposed; provided the domestic supplies of similar articles should, as of late years, continue rapidly to increase, and should prove to be equal in quality, and not higher in price, than similar ones imported from foreign nations. In that event, though the ability of the people to buy foreign goods will fortunately be greater, where the exports are large, yet the permanent returns from abroad will generally be more in money to be expended at home, and less in goods to be consumed. But the diversity of opinion which exists, concerning some of these considerations, has led me to submit the document annexed, (D.)

From this it appears that our whole exports, of every kind, in the last five years, including the estimates for 1835, have not exceeded those during a similar term, from 1803 to 1807, inclusive, but about forty millions, and being an excess no larger than at most intervening periods, while an extraordinary increase has taken place in our exports of domestic products, exceeding in value those during that term more than one hundred and fifty millions, and being quite double the excess at most intervening periods. Indeed, it will be seen that they have been almost a hundred per cent. larger than they were in any similar term of years previous to 1816, and have exceeded those during such a term only ten years ago, by the sum of about one hundred and fifteen millions, a difference greater than the whole amount of all our exports of domestic products during the first five years under our present form of government. The recent average rate of increase in these exports, however, has not been large, independent of the article of cotton; nor is it likely to augment during the few ensuing years. Adopting a comparison between every term of ten years, from 1792-'3, and '4, to 1832-'3, and '4, and including all articles, it appears that the whole exports of domestic produce exhibit an increase in the last thirty years of less than three per cent. annually, or a rate considerably lower than that of our population, though, in the previous term of ten years, by the great prosperity from our new form of government, and the rapid progress in the cultivation of cotton, that increase was near eight per cent.; and in the high price and large exports of this article in the last term of ten years, it has been about five per cent. annually. But as that price has of late been unusually high, and is now lower, and as the demand for cotton abroad in the ensuing year is not likely to exceed, if it equals, the late customary ratio, and on which some interesting facts may be seen in the statement annexed; (E) the value of our whole domestic exports (over one-half of which now consists of cotton) will probably be less in 1836 than in 1835. This result, therefore, fortifies, rather than impairs, the correctness of the diminished estimate of our whole importations in 1836, and of the anticipated receipts of duties therefrom.

On the whole, then, as the biennial reduction in those duties which exceed twenty per cent. takes place on the 31st instant, and will amount to near one million of dollars, as in the ensuing year, the whole importations will, by the estimates, be less, and the consumption of foreign articles paying duties is, for that and other reasons, not likely to increase, it results from these and some circumstances before mentioned, that the whole amount of revenue which will be received from imports during the year 1836, will probably be from one to two millions less than in 1835. If we look forward to 1842, when the tariff is, by our present laws, to undergo a great change, and if we regard, in the intervening time, the probable exports of domestic produce, and imports of foreign merchandise, or the presumed consumption of that small portion of the latter paying duties, it may fairly be concluded, that, after making due allowances as to all these, on account of our increasing population and wealth, and deducting those allowances from the biennial reduction, not only will the revenue accruing from customs probably diminish at the average rate of about one-third of a million per annum, or near two-thirds of a million every second year until the first of January, 1842, but then, at one blow, over two and a half millions more of the duties above twenty per cent. is to be struck off; and on the first of July the same year, over two and a half millions more, and some new articles, for the first time, be rendered entirely free. All the reduction which is to take place in that year alone, will thus amount to between five and six million of dollars; and the whole annual revenue from customs will, by 1843, have probably fallen to about nine, instead of its present amount, of about seventeen millions of dollars.

Explanation of the Estimates of Receipts from Lands.

The revenue from lands the ensuing year has been estimated at four millions of dollars. In submitting the estimates for 1835, the amount expected to be received from this source, was, for reasons then stated, calculated half a million higher than it had ever been before, and was described as still too low, if the Department had not anticipated that large sales would be made for the Indians, the proceeds of which were not to go into the Treasury for public uses. But these last sales, delayed till the first month in the next year, have unexpectedly given place to others, all whose proceeds have so gone into the Treasury. This change, with the operation, in such unexampled force, of the circumstances detailed in those reasons, aided by such an eager thirst for the investment of surplus capital in new lands, and the bright prospects of large profits from their immediate cultivation for cotton in the Southwest, with the extraordinary number of pre-emption claims allowed, has caused the actual receipts from their sales, during the year 1835, to exceed those of any previous year, by the sum of probably more than six millions of dollars.

From the fact that many of these sales have not been made to actual settlers, and that much of the land thus sold will remain in the market to aid in supplying hereafter such purchasers—from the probability that some diminution in the price of cotton, with the increased cost of labor, will lessen somewhat the ardor for new investments in land in the Southwest from the circumstance that much fewer pre-emption claims exist, and that fewer public sales of lands whose proceeds belong to the Government, by over two millions of acres, will be advertised the ensuing year—and from the presumption that the surplus capital to be re-invested, derived from the final payment of our public debt, and from the unusually great exports the last two years, will be reduced, it has not been deemed safe to estimate the receipts, for public purposes, from sales of land in 1836, at more than four millions of dollars.

Besides those receipts, the sales of the Chickasaw lands, postponed as before remarked, to the ensuing year, will probably be considerable, as the quantity offered will be about six millions of acres; and though, by treaty, the proceeds of them must be invested for the Indians, yet the sales will, to their extent, diminish the demand for other lands, whose proceeds would go into the Treasury. In looking beyond the next, and a few succeeding years, as connected with this subject, it is true, that the whole lands still owned by the United States, within the boundaries of the present States and Territories, exceed the vast quantity of three hundred and thirty millions of acres; and, west of Missouri and Arkansas, perhaps seven hundred and fifty millions more, of which only seventy or eighty millions have yet been specially assigned to the Indians, or in any other way absolutely appropriated. But though three hundred and thirty millions of acres would alone be enough in quantity, at even the rate of the recent large sales, to continue, for a considerable time, to yield an important share of revenue, it must be remembered, that the demand for it will be limited generally by the extent of the increase of our population and capital; and that large portions of it, perhaps one-fourth, ought to be deemed waste and water; and probably half of it, as well as much of that which lies west of the present States and Territories, be considered of such an inferior quality, that it cannot be sold for cultivation till our population reaches an amount and density which will probably require ages to effect. In illustration of some of these views, it is a remarkable fact, that, of the whole quantity of land surveyed and offered at public sale, from 1789 to 1834, being about one hundred and twenty-two millions of acres, not one-third of it has been sold for any purpose whatever; and that the whole receipts, being a little under fifty millions of dollars, from the whole sales of public lands during that period, have furnished only a small amount, not exceeding three or four millions of nett revenue, beyond the whole cost, in various ways, attending their purchase and management.

But a considerable nett revenue from them, hereafter, if neither given away nor divided, can with safety be expected, and they would then tend to furnish that relief under the common burdens, and that aid towards the common and legitimate objects of the Union, which were intended to be promoted by their original cession to the General Government. The present rate of increase in our population engaged in agricultural pursuits, will not, it is presumed, for six or seven years, create a regular annual demand for immediate cultivation of over one million of acres of the public lands; and it is calculated that from two to four millions more will be bought yearly for investment of capital and re-sale.

The estimate for that time proceeds on the probable presumption that no very large portion of our old cultivated lands will be wholly abandoned, and that new lands annually put into cultivation in the whole Union, have been, and will be to the amount of quite one-half of those bought of the actual settlers, not directly of the United States, but by the several States, or of individual owners. As the wild lands owned by several of the States, and by companies or individuals, whether belonging to them through gift, sale, or otherwise, from either former Governments or the United States, shall increase or diminish in quantity and price, the new sales by the United States are likely to be less or more, and the above proportions to become by those as well as by numerous other circumstances, somewhat affected. The whole sales of public lands for speculation and investment, as well as for immediate cultivation will, therefore, from various causes, some of which have already been specified, probably fluctuate between two and five millions of acres, producing from three to six millions of dollars a year till 1842, and indeed not often exceeding the maximum till most of the rich soils are gone.

A document has been carefully prepared, (F) which in some degree verifies these general views, as it shows that the whole sales to the close of 1834, deducting about six and one-third millions of acres, which reverted under our former system, have been only about thirty-seven and a half millions of acres during forty-five years, or on an average only about three-fourths of a million of acres yearly, for immediate cultivation, and every other purpose. This quantity sold, with about sixteen millions given away as bounties in the last war, and for schools, colleges, internal improvements, and other public objects in the new States, being together almost half as much as all the sales would, through the whole time, be taken from the public lands by both gift and sale, and for all purposes, little more, if any, when compared with our population, and the additions to it at different periods, than three millions of acres would annually be now. It may be instructive in respect to the estimate of our future proceeds from lands, to recollect that, after the present system commenced, the sales never amounted in fact to one million of acres a year till 1815, nor to two millions a year till the temptations of the credit system, and the great rise in the price of cotton to 26 and 34 cents per pound, induced larger purchases, extending to over two millions of acres in 1817, and about five and a half millions in 1819; and thus even fifteen years ago exceeding in quantity, by nearly a million of acres, the large sales of 1834, and exceeding them in the sums promised to be paid, by the almost incredible amount of more than twelve millions of dollars. But the fall of cotton in 1820, to only about half its former price, combined with other causes, left the purchasers in debt to the Government over twenty-two millions of dollars, and with the change from the credit to the cash system, reduced the sales again to much less than a million of acres a year, caused nearly six millions of the former sales to revert, and kept them down to less than a million in every year after, till the rise of cotton in 1825 gave a new impulse, which being aided by other powerful causes, the sales gradually enlarged, till they reached a million again in 1829. Since that, increasing still more rapidly, they have exceeded, during 1834, four millions of acres, and during 1835 probably nine millions. Among those other causes, the more extensive introduction of steam power on the western rivers and northern lakes, with the public improvements in their navigation, and the increased facilities of intercourse by railroads and canals, have of late added much to the sales of the public lands beyond previous years, and beyond the proportional increase of population. To the force of these causes have been joined, during the last three years, as formerly suggested, the effect of the pre-emption law, the increase in the price of cotton, and the unusual abundance of surplus capital in 1835, seeking new investments. But much of the great difference to be produced by these causes has, perhaps, happened already. What extraordinary increase of population and demand for new lands in the United States, may hereafter occur by emigration from Europe, compared with former years, must depend on so many contingencies both here and there, such as good or bad governments, prosperity or decline of manufactures, and a taste for emigration to new lands in other quarters of the world, as at present to prevent any person from making a safe estimate.

Difficulties in Estimates as to Customs and Lands.

Comparative and speculative views, connected with the subject of our receipts from customs and lands, could be further extended, but their practical utility might be deemed problematical, as sufficient is believed to have been already stated for all general purposes. Greater confidence is felt in the estimate submitted for the receipts from customs in 1836, as that offered last year for 1835, founded on somewhat similar data, has not varied from the ascertained and estimated actual receipts over a million of dollars; but the actual receipts from lands have, for the various reasons before explained, differed largely; and, united with the failure to pass some usual and anticipated appropriations at the last session of Congress, have caused most of the increased surplus now in the Treasury.

The difficulty in attaining much certainty in estimating the receipts from either customs or lands in any particular year in a country so new, enterprising and prosperous as ours, has ever been considerable, in addition to the fluctuations we always shall be liable to from short crops, pestilence, and war. But this difficulty will be more strikingly exemplified till 1842, under the material alteration from credit to cash payments, and under the continued biennial changes to which the tariff is now subjected. It was shown in 1822, in a Report of a Committee of the House of Representatives, that, from 1802 to that time, the estimates of our whole receipts differed, either by excesses or deficiencies, from the actual receipts in different years, from one to forty-three per cent. and in customs alone, from three to seventy-three; being an average of about sixteen per cent. per annum. The difference since 1822 has been carefully examined, and is found to vary from less than one per cent. to over forty-one, and averages annually about thirteen per cent. But the effects of the irregularity of our actual receipts into the Treasury in any particular year, whether over or under the estimates, were less noticeable, and were of less comparative importance before the final payment of the public debt, at the close of 1834, as that payment, from time to time, corrected any irregularity, and superseded what will often hereafter be inevitable without due precaution: the necessity of a resort to new legislation whenever any considerable excess or deficiency happens to occur in the whole revenue. Beside what has already been remarked on the influence which the increased cultivation of cotton in this country has in various ways exercised, and is likely to exercise hereafter in our revenue from customs and lands, it might be made a subject of further and very interesting inquiry, in connexion with the uncertainty of the estimates on those subjects, affecting, as that cultivation does, more remotely, not only our revenue from lands and customs, the balance of trade and the export of specie, as well as the continuance, by means of mutual dependence among great interests, of many of our peaceful and prosperous relations, both at home and abroad. But without entering, on this occasion, into further details concerning any of these points, it may be mentioned as a very striking result connected with the last one, and as furnishing a strong presumption in favor of greater exemption hereafter from fluctuations by war and commercial restrictions, that while the quantity of cotton exported from this country has increased from half a million of pounds, 1790, to over 380 millions, in 1835, and has exceeded in value, during six of the last ten years, all our other exports of domestic products of every description, the manufacture of it at home, and chiefly in the northern States, has increased from consuming only a few bales, to more than ninety millions of pounds yearly, and to that extent creates a new and strong bond of reciprocal advantage and harmony. And that while we now furnish, instead of the small quantity in the first years of our Government, quite fifteen-sixteenths of the whole consumption of raw cotton by England, and seven-tenths of that by France, all the present exports of it to Europe, from all the rest of the world, do not probably equal, if those two nations could obtain the whole, one-third of what they now consume, or one-fourth of what they now import from the United States alone. And thus, while neither of them produces any of the raw article, except a little in some remote dependencies, that they have an annual manufacture now relying on it, and chiefly on the United States, equal in France to eighty millions of dollars, and in England to one hundred and eighty millions of dollars; and constituting in the latter, after it supplies her own large necessities at home, over one-half in value of her great annual exports to all quarters of the globe.

Explanation of estimated receipts from Miscellaneous sources.

The estimate of receipts from Bank dividends has been made at the usual rate, computed on the present amount of stock still owned by the United States, independent of what belongs to the navy pension fund. Should the Bank divide a part of its capital, after the 3d of March next, and before the close of the year 1836, the dividends received for interest or profits will probably be somewhat lower; but, on the other hand, there will then be received into the Treasury, instead of them, a due proportion of the capital stock.

This Department made seasonable inquiries of the Bank itself, as to its probable course, in respect to the division of its capital, with a view to apprise Congress of the revenue which ought to be anticipated from that source in 1836; but, extraordinary as it may appear, at a period so near the close of its charter, and after the discontinuance of several of its branches, it will be seen by the correspondence annexed, (G,) that the Bank had then come to no decision on the subject.

The sales of Bank stock to the navy pension fund will probably not be deemed advisable by Congress, after the 3d March next, and hence the receipts from those sales have been estimated less than usual.

It is supposed that the other receipts from miscellaneous sources will correspond nearly with those in 1835, except that the sum of $6,235, belonging to this Government out of the Neapolitan indemnity, for the transportation of seamen, at the time our vessels were seized, having in the first instalment been promptly and honorably paid, according to treaty, has, since the last annual report, been adjusted, and credited under this general head. It gives me pleasure to add that about $100,000 more has been secured by means of that indemnity, on debts of long standing, due from several of the claimants to the United States, and one-fifth of it has already been paid into the Treasury. In pursuance of the act of Congress on this subject, the balance of the first instalment, as soon as the awards were completed, was paid to those entitled to it, and certificates were issued for the remainder. All due under the second instalment has since been punctually discharged by the King of the Two Sicilies, to the agent of the Treasury abroad, and after some delay in its remittance from Naples to Paris, with a view to make it in a manner most advantageous to the claimants, the whole has been received here, and the nett proceeds, as soon as ascertainable, immediately paid over.

Explanation of the Estimates and Expenditures.

The expenditures in 1836, for ordinary purposes, arc, it has been seen, estimated at a still lower sum than they were for 1835. But as the present is a long session of Congress, the contingent excesses of appropriations beyond the general estimates, explained in the last annual report, have been submitted as likely to be half a million larger. It is gratifying to state that, independent of the payments towards the national debt, leaving the community with all its capital and energies entirely from that cause unburdened and untrammelled, the actual expenditures of the General Government have, on other subjects, since 1833, been reduced about four and a half millions of dollars a year, or near nine millions in 1834 and 1835, and the country at large, during the same period, relieved from taxation by reductions in the tariff, equal to nearly twelve and a half millions a year, or about twenty-five millions in all. The probabilities as to still further reductions in our expenditures for ordinary purposes during a number of ensuing years, excluding any extraordinary grants on account of the present large surplus, or other causes, can best be weighed by a retrospect to the chief subjects of increase during a few past years, and by a discrimination between the items, which are in their character permanent or temporary, and which still exist or have already expired.

The chief items of increased expense during those years, which (from an increase in some of our national establishments, caused by obvious reasons, in most cases, such as greater population and business, and rapidly extending frontier) will probably be somewhat permanent, if not in some instances progressive, are most of the large additions to the legislative expenses—the gradual augmentation in appropriations for the Judiciary and the salaries of District Judges—the new Bureau of Solicitor of the Treasury—the corps of mounted dragoons in the army—the increased number of, and pay to, officers in the navy, and the extra compensation to officers of the customs since the great reductions in the tariff. The chief additional items of expenditures during the last few years, which may be deemed temporary in their nature, but which still continue in a greater or less degree, are the large increase in the extinguishment of Indian titles, and in grants of Revolutionary pensions; the payment of Virginia commutation claims; great additions to our light-houses and custom-houses; opening many new roads in the Territories; the continuation of the Cumberland road; the survey of the coast; more numerous allowances of miscellaneous claims, and the building of branch mints, commenced the present year, though their future support will be a new item of permanent expense. The issue of Virginia land scrip, virtually receivable instead of money for lands, is, in substance, though not in form, another large item; because, though not included in the usual exhibit of expenditures, it has in the last four years exceeded a million of dollars, and will in this and the ensuing year, probably extend to eight hundred thousand more. The items of magnitude in our expenses, which have lately existed, but are now either terminated or suspended, are the building of the Potomac bridge, though its repairs, lighting, and draws, may hereafter be a durable charge; Macadamizing Pennsylvania avenue, and several grants of money for other purposes in the District of Columbia; repairs of the Cumberland road; finishing and enlarging some of the public buildings here; refunding large amounts of duties under former laws; the expenses of the war with the Northwestern Indians in 1833; repayments for advances during the war of 1812; a large reimbursement of the naval pension fund; several special expired appropriations towards naval objects; and almost every thing connected with the public debt. A tabular statement further illustrating many of these changes, as well as others under all the most important heads of expenditure, by exhibiting the sums yearly paid under each material one from 1816 to 1834, inclusive, has been prepared with care, but is so voluminous that it will not be submitted to Congress until some other appropriate occasion.

In the estimates for extraordinary purposes the present year, it will be seen that most of the increase is called for by the omission to pass the annual appropriations last year for fortifications, and by the unusually large surplus in the Treasury, which is not wanted for ordinary objects, and which, it is supposed, can be applied usefully to hasten those great improvements connected with our military and naval defences, and which are of a character admitted by all to be national, beneficial, and constitutional. Under our high state of financial prosperity, and reposing in peace, the best period for due preparation for war, the undersigned considers the Treasury in a proper condition to meet any measures which the Executive or the appropriate Departments have recommended for these desirable objects, as well as any similar and additional measures which Congress may be likely to think required by prudent foresight, and a proper regard for national character and safety.

V. Surplus in the Treasury and disposition of it.

It has been shown that the available balance in the Treasury over all outstanding appropriations, on the 1st of January, 1836, is estimated at about ten and a half millions; the expenditures for the ensuing year, for all purposes, whether ordinary or extraordinary, enumerated in the schedules at more than twenty-three millions, and the receipts at less than twenty millions. Hence it follows, that, if the appropriations made, and the revenue received in 1836, shall be as large as the estimates and no larger, the nett surplus now applicable to new and other objects will probably, in the course of the ensuing year, become reduced to a sum between six and seven millions. This sum, therefore, would in those events remain on the 1st of January, 1837, at a nett surplus, unexpended and unpledged. Consequently, most of it could now be applied to other purposes, not included in the estimates, and liberally aid in promoting any constitutional objects, which Congress may deem most expedient.

An unprecedented spectacle is thus presented to the world of a Government, not only virtually without any debts, and without any direct taxation, but with about one-fourth of its whole annual expenses defrayed from sales of its own unincumbered, and immense tracts of public lands, and no resort to even indirect taxation necessary, except for the other three-fourths; and the proceeds of that indirect taxation, though largely and frequently reduced, yet accumulating so fast as to require further legislation to dispose of, or invest a considerable surplus on hand. Whether this state of enviable prosperity be justly attributable to the form of our Government—to the administration of it—to the character of our people—the physical advantages of our country—or to all combined, it is a subject of strong congratulation, and exhibits a very remarkable phenomenon in the history of taxation and finance. Without dwelling on these primary causes of our fortunate condition, or discussing any secondary ones, such as the great demand and reward in this country for either labor or capital, the more appropriate inquiry, under these novel circumstances, and on an occasion like the present, seems to be to discover the most judicious course to pursue in using this surplus, and in preventing or regulating its future accumulation.

The balance now on hand, or anticipated, does not differ so much in amount from that at several prior periods, as to require any extraordinary steps, if the same available mode existed, of employing it legally and beneficially, without new legislation. There were three former years in our history, viz: 1815, '16, and '17, when our balances on hand, on the 1st of January each year, were respectively over 13, 22, and 14 millions of dollars, and in 1833, over 11 millions. But these balances were either unavailable for a time, or, whenever productive, were soon able to be applied in the discharge of the public debt, and thus to prevent longer and larger accumulations, and to save interest. In that way, being reduced from time to time, they at no other period have ever exceeded ten millions, though on four other occasions they have accumulated beyond nine millions. But, happily for the country, it is no longer compelled to part with its resources to discharge heavy burdens, imposed in former times; and in the present prosperous state of our finances, it is respectfully submitted, that, in order to reduce the present surplus, there might be first, and judiciously authorized, for purposes not enumerated in any of the estimates, other beneficial expenditures for objects clearly lawful and useful. Not considering it the province of this Department, in an annual report, to enter into minute details in relation to the selection of those objects, the undersigned would merely advert to a few prominent ones, about which no constitutional difficulties interpose; such as the erection of suitable and necessary buildings for the use of the General Government, whether in this city or the different States, and the earlier commencement of important works contemplated, and the more rapid completion of others already begun, which are essentially connected with the commerce, the navy, or the frontier defences of the country.

Since the general estimates were closed, but appended to them in a note, various additional improvements at the navy yards alone, requiring the appropriation of three and a half millions, have been specified and submitted by the Navy Department, and which, in its opinion, could be now usefully undertaken. If so many works of these descriptions should now be authorized, or hastened by Congress, as were unquestionable in their utility and character, and were likely to be sufficient to absorb the present and anticipated surplus of revenue in the Treasury from ordinary sources, it is hoped that, ere long, additional receipts from our stock in the Bank of the United States, would probably be more than sufficient to ensure their completion. But if the surplus from all sources should hereafter, from any cause, appear likely to become earlier exhausted, some of those works could be suspended, or again, as heretofore, be less rapidly hastened.

If it be not deemed expedient, in this or any other manner, now to appropriate all the present surplus, this Department thinks that the most eligible course concerning any probable residue, after deducting all outstanding appropriations which may be made, and enough to render our fiscal system efficient, easy, and prompt, would be, that Congress retain such residue under its control, and provide for its investment for a short period as a provident fund, to be ready to meet any contingencies attending the great reduction contemplated in our revenue hereafter; or, in the mean time, to strengthen our financial position under the additional burden of any large claims now pending, which Congress may deem it just to allow, or at any future moment to aid under those inevitable and great fluctuations in revenue and expenditure from which no country is exempt, and which no human sagacity can wholly prevent. For all such occurrences it is often economical, and, especially in our present prosperous condition, with surplus money on hand, it is consistent with a wise foresight and sound political prudence, to be previously and well guarded. Whatever demands on such a fund may occur before 1842, it is certain, under our existing laws, as before explained, that the revenue from customs must then, within a few months, be reduced in the large sum of nearly six millions of dollars. It is further probable that our whole revenue from customs will, by the close of that year, have fallen to only nine millions; and from lands, (for public uses,) have risen not to much above four millions of dollars, both making but thirteen million of dollars, instead of their present annual amount of over twenty. For that great and sudden change, it is very desirable that the country should then be prepared by a diminished expenditure, and a proper surplus on hand, to meet any probable deficiency, so as not to require new or increased taxation to defray the expenses then necessary. It may reasonably be expected, that the Revolutionary pension list will by that time have chiefly disappeared—the Indian titles have been mostly extinguished—our necessary and convenient public buildings throughout the country mostly finished, and our fortifications and navy, if the appropriations in the meantime be liberal, will have been placed in a proper attitude to meet any hostile aggressions without the continuance of extraordinary appropriations. By this system, evincing a just and far-sighted liberality in grants to objects clearly national and necessary, and pursuing a course of rigid economy and due retrenchment, where the great interests of the Union will permit, our expenses, though they must from our rapidly extending population, business, and frontier, increase in some particulars, in nearly a corresponding ratio, and may not, as a whole, become reduced exactly to the amount of revenue received; yet they will, if no unforeseen calamities occur, so nearly approach it, that a surplus of a few millions, duly invested and retained, would doubtless obviate the necessity of a resort then, or soon after, to more taxes.

The investment of this, or any other surplus not soon wanted, could be effected, till wanted, in any mode most agreeable to Congress, in whom the whole power on this subject resides, and without whose express authority nothing can be taken from the Treasury for any purpose whatever. But, as it may not be deemed necessary or expedient soon to resort to any such investment, an explanation at this time of the different modes in which it might be accomplished, with the opinion of the Department on their peculiar merits and demerits, would perhaps be considered useless, and consequently only two general principles will now be proposed, which are respectfully suggested, as proper to have a material bearing on the whole subject. First, that, whatever mode may be adopted, it should conform to the spirit of the act of March, 1817, which has been in successful operation ever since the surpluses became likely to be large and frequent, and which required, before the investment of them in purchase or extinguishment of the public debt, that enough should be left in the Treasury to meet all outstanding appropriations, and two millions more to secure facility and promptitude in its various and distant operations. And, secondly, that, following the analogy of the above act, which separated the investment of any surplus for pecuniary profit entirely from the management of the public deposits and the duties of Deposit Banks, it should leave the Bank agents of the Treasury, as they and all its other fiscal agents, from the foundation of the Government, have been left, wholly disconnected, so far as practicable, in regard to their agencies, with the dangerous relation of borrowers from the Treasury, for relending and for private gain. Should either of the above courses not be deemed advisable, so far as to exhaust all the unnecessary surplus on hand, the residue, if not large, could be gradually disposed of by making a further reduction, whenever just and safe, in the revenue hereafter accruing from customs.

To obtain the balance estimated to exist in the Treasury at the end of 1836, the sum of fifteen millions is computed to be received from that source, and chiefly to accrue in the ensuing year; and if a part of it should be considered not desirable for any purposes whatever, it could be much, and perhaps usefully, lessened, by an early diminution of the existing duties on certain articles not supposed to be vitally connected with our domestic manufactures. The most prominent of these articles are Wines and Silks from beyond the Cape of Good Hope. They both yield, in duties, over half a million per annum; or, in 1834, Wines, over $445,000, and India Silks, over $171,000; all of which might well be repealed unless Congress should consider the former a judicious tax on a luxury, and the latter as an encouragement to the domestic product of Silk, which is becoming widely and successfully established; and which, if deemed a proper object of incidental protection by legislation, (contrary to the views lately entertained by Congress,) would require a restoration of the duty on European Silks now entirely free. Other articles could be selected, on which the present duties could be reduced and repealed, at least to the extent of $400,000 annually, without injuring, it is anticipated, any domestic manufactures, or agricultural branch of industry, or impairing the spirit and good faith of the compromise intended by the act of Congress of March 3, 1833, and which the undersigned would most scrupulously preserve unviolated. On this subject a detailed report will soon be presented to the Senate, in conformity to a resolution of that body, passed at the last session. It is his deliberate opinion, that such of those reductions as are deemed permissible, under the above limitations, should now be made; and the balance remaining, if too great for common fiscal purposes, be temporarily and profitably invested, rather than a large surplus should continue to be collected for the express end of being, in any way, finally disposed of, otherwise than by appropriations to useful and constitutional objects.

The people, themselves, it is believed, can best manage all their own money, which they and their representatives think may not be wanted for public purposes, and it would seem to be far preferable to leave it originally in their possession, than to withdraw it for the expensive operation of returning it substantially to the place whence it came, and that, probably, in a manner not conformable to the constitution, till after the delay of procuring an amendment to it, and even then, not expedient, because calculated, injudiciously, to strengthen the General Government, and to render the States more dependent on a great central power for yearly and important resources. Indeed, a reduction in the price of public lands, whose unusually large sales the past year are the source of most of the present surplus, would, if their sales should not thereby be much increased, seem another mode far more natural to obviate the present difficulty. But before adopting it, this and various other considerations must be weighed, and it must be fully considered, whether all the revenue anticipated from them at their present prices, would not be necessary after the great reductions in the tariff, in 1842, and whether a resort to a higher tariff would not then become indispensable, if the average receipts from lands or customs should from any new legislation become then much diminished, below the estimates which have been submitted on the present occasion.

VI. Deposit Banks and the Currency.

This Department takes pleasure in stating that the public money continues to be collected and deposited, under the present system of selected Banks, with great ease and economy in all cases, and with greater in some, than at any former period. The transfers of it to every quarter of the country, where it is needed for disbursement, have never been effected with more promptitude, and have been made entirely free of expense to the Treasury. The payments to creditors, officers, and pensioners, have been punctual and convenient, and the whole fiscal operations through the State Banks have as yet proved highly satisfactory. Incidental to this, the facilities that have been furnished to the commercial community in domestic exchanges, were probably never greater, or at so moderate rates. In the course of this year, additional depositories have been selected in four States, where no new ones before existed, and all the branches of the United States Bank, for some months, have been discontinued for ordinary fiscal purposes. They are, however, still used, as claimed by the Bank, under acts of Congress, for the payment of the outstanding portions of the funded debt, and of invalid and other pensions, prior to 1832, except where the Department has been notified that the Branches were withdrawn, as in New Hampshire, Connecticut, Kentucky, Ohio, Missouri, Western Pennsylvania, Maryland, South Carolina, and the interior of New York. The whole number of selected Banks, without including branches, is thirty-four, being, notwithstanding the addition of four new ones, less by six than last year.

This diminution has been effected by the discontinuance of various old, and to the Treasury, unimportant institutions, employed before 1833, in connection with the United States Bank, and by adding no new ones, except where the public interests seemed to render it imperative or expedient. A great, though not the chief cause of some loss, which formerly happened in the deposits in the State Banks, is believed to have been the multiplication of them to something over one hundred in number. The system is now arranged so as probably to require, hereafter, few changes except in two or three instances, concerning which a correspondence is now pending, unless, as is not anticipated, such onerous conditions should be exacted by Congress, of the present safe and efficient depositories, as to derange the system, induce some of them to withdraw, and compel the Department to intrust the public funds to other agents, less cautious, skilful, and trustworthy. Great care has been exercised in preparing from the last returns made to this Department, and from data since obtained by an extensive correspondence, tabular statements, which show in the most essential particulars, as near the 1st of January, 1835, and as fully as could be obtained, the names and condition of each of the State Banks in the Union, of each of the selected Banks, of the United States Bank, and of all combined. They exhibit further, the capital and situation of all the Banks in each of the large cities in the United States, as well as of all in each State, arranged together for convenience of reference, and the changes which have since happened, in the condition of the Deposit and United States Banks. So far as regards the capital, discounts, &c. of all the State Banks, only the general exhibit of the aggregate results in each State, is now communicated; but in a few days, all the voluminous details on those points will be submitted to the House of Representatives, in compliance with its resolution of the 10th of July, 1832. (H1.)

It will be seen that the situation of the selected Banks, as a whole, bears an enviable comparison with the rest.

In all cases deemed proper, they have given collateral security, and are believed to be entirely safe, to the extent they have been confided in. Their discounts have been, in general, somewhat increased, but, though tempted by the enterprising spirit of the times, not usually increased in a degree disproportioned to all their immediate available means. They have also, in some cases, been able to aid, and have liberally aided, other banking institutions in their neighborhood, by as large and long balances, and other indulgences, as would generally appear to have been sanctioned by correct principles. The names of each, with the amount of money in each belonging to the Treasury, and subject to draft, not only at the commencement of the present year, but at the very last returns received, can be seen in three of the columns of the statement. (H. Nos. 2 & 3.) The distribution of these sums is generally that which has been given to them by circumstances connected with their collection and disbursement. No occasion has arisen, in which the Department felt justified in making transfers of the public money, except from points where it had accumulated in the natural course of collection, much beyond the present and early anticipated wants of the Government in that neighborhood, or in sums not proportioned to the responsibility of the public depositories there, and to points where it either would be better secured, or probably soon be needed for disbursement, or could, from the course of trade and exchange, be more readily applied to any new objects which Congress would be likely soon to sanction. These transfers, when rendered necessary, have been performed in such directions, and so gradually, that, it is believed, they have tended to obviate rather than create any pressure in the money market, and to aid materially the course of business in exchanges, and the other commercial operations of the country.

The Department is aware that, in the present overflowing condition of the Treasury, the regulation of these operations, with the selection and superintendence of the Deposit Banks, is a task of no small difficulty and delicacy, and when governed by a strict and uniform adherence to sound principles, as has been attempted, must necessarily lead to many disappointed applications. But in the absence of that specific legislation on the subject which has been, and still is, earnestly requested—the Department has not hesitated (it is hoped faithfully) to discharge, and frankly to explain the duties, and the high and painful responsibility, which so much discretionary power has imposed.

For various reasons of public importance, it was deemed desirable, and measures have been adopted, and recommendations urged, that the specie in the vaults of a number of selected Banks should be still more increased, in comparison with their issues and deposits, and that a still larger portion of the whole currency of the country, especially for small purposes, should be metallic. In improvement of the currency during the past year, many of the selected Banks have not only continued to obtain and pay, when wanted, to the public creditors, American gold, but have entered into salutary arrangements for the redemption, in our large cities, of most of their bills, which may be received in payment of the public dues. It is hoped, that in the progress of time, these beneficial arrangements may be further extended to most, if not all, of the bills in circulation, of the large institutions, and the introduction of hard money for the ordinary uses of life, be facilitated, by all the Banks ceasing to circulate bills of small denominations. It is gratifying to find, that since the adjournment of Congress, in addition to the States of Pennsylvania, Maryland, Virginia, Georgia, Tennessee, Louisiana, North Carolina, Indiana, and Kentucky, which, before that time, are believed not to have allowed the circulation of bills under five dollars: others, viz: Maine, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, and Alabama, have united in similar legislative measures, except Connecticut, has, as yet, extended the prohibition to only one and two dollar bills.

In Mississippi and Illinois, it is understood that bills under five dollars have not recently been issued, and Missouri has no bank issuing bills of any denomination. So that more than two-thirds of the States have already usages or laws in existence, on this subject, of a highly salutary tendency. The great benefits which have already resulted to the general condition of the currency where such measures have been tested, besides numerous others to the security of the banks themselves, and to the less moneyed classes of society, detailed in the supplement to the last annual report from this Department, would seem to be a sufficient inducement for similar legislation on this important subject in all the States. In some of them, where no laws have yet been passed to suppress the circulation of small notes, their Deposit Banks have voluntarily entered into arrangements not to issue certain descriptions of them, and most of the Deposit Banks have, in a correspondence with the Department, evinced a willingness to co-operate in the suppression of small notes, whenever the regulation can be made general. The Treasury, so far as seemed practicable and judicious with its present powers, has endeavored to promote so desirable an end, not only by instituting the inquiries in that correspondence, but by instructions to its collecting officers not to receive in payment any bills under five dollars after the 30th of September, 1835, (1). It proposes to go further on this point the ensuing year, so as to prevent the receipt for public dues of all bank notes under ten dollars, unless Congress in the mean time shall adopt some new provisions on this subject, similar, it is hoped, to what previously have been, and still are, urged by this Department, not only as to the Deposit Banks, and the kind of bills received for the revenue, but as to the suppression entirely in the District of Columbia of the circulation of any bank notes under ten dollars in amount.

The means for a sound currency in this country are at present ample. Within the last two years, or from October 1st, 1833, to November 1st, 1835, in addition to the former stock of specie, there has been imported into the United States, beyond the exports from it, with a due allowance for what does not appear on the Custom House books, more than twenty-seven millions; and the produce of our own mines within that period is estimated to have been over three millions. Hence the whole amount of specie now in the country probably exceeds the sum of sixty-four millions, and the means of the community to obtain more from abroad, to meet any contemplated changes in the character of our currency, were never greater. The actual amount of specie returned, and estimated as belonging to all the Banks in the United States, about the 1st of January, 1835, was near forty-four millions. As a portion of that may have been bullion, a sum quite equalling, if not exceeding the remainder of twenty millions probably consists of the amount of specie in active circulation, which has been somewhat increased throughout the country during the last two years, so that if the remaining small bills in circulation under five dollars in the whole Union, which are chiefly in seven States, and which probably do not exceed six or seven millions, were withdrawn, it would not require, to supply their places, one-third of the addition which has been made in the last two years to the national stock of the precious metals. The specie on hand in banks will in this way, as it ought, soon bear a larger proportion to their notes in circulation, and the security and real usefulness of all banking institutions to the community be thus greatly augmented. The specie in active circulation, thus increased by excluding small notes, will constitute, while retained in the country, a great and safe reliance for banks to depend on, (beside what belongs to them in their vaults,) whenever an unfavorable course of exchange abroad, or a panic at home, should cause an unusual demand for specie to be shipped abroad, to meet a balance of trade against us, or to be used in circulation at home, by those whose confidence, from real or imaginary causes, may for a time become diminished in the security of banks. When the further suppression of small notes, extending to all under ten dollars in amount, shall be deemed advisable by Congress and the States, no doubt is entertained that sufficient specie can and will be readily found to supply their place, in connexion with what now exists in the country. The proportion of specie to bank notes in circulation will not then be so great as it is in all the most commercial nations in Europe. (See Table of Circulation, in Sup. Rept. 1834.) How much further it may be deemed feasible to go, with a fair prospect of advantage to the community and our currency, can be better settled at that time than the present.

Under its new valuation, the coinage of gold at the mint from the 1st of August, 1834, to the 1st of November, 1835, has been $5,471,505, or over treble the amount supposed to have been coined in any previous period of similar length. The ratio has been somewhat lessened the last six months by several causes, of which an important one has been the desire to provide more quarter eagles, and a full supply of silver change to meet the increasing demand in several States from the withdrawal of small notes from circulation. The coinage of silver has been extended in the first eight months of this year to over eight and a third millions of pieces, which is believed to be much beyond the number in the same portion of any preceding year. The building of the three branch mints, and the procuring of their appropriate machinery, authorized by the act of the 3d of March last, was devolved by the President of the United States on this Department, and has been prosecuted with all practicable despatch.

The estimates and views of the Director on that subject, as well as on other improvements connected with this important and increasing establishment, will, with its whole operations; the current year, and the details on the progress made in the new buildings and machinery, be seasonably presented in a separate communication; and this Department does not, on this occasion, deem it necessary to invite special attention to any thing further connected with either the Mint or our coinage, except the several recommendations relating to them, which were contained in its last annual report.

The same reasons then assigned for closing, by a special act of Congress, the concerns of the sinking fund, and of the connexion of the Government, after the 3d of March next, with the United States Bank, on the subject of both the national debt and of pensions allowed previous to 1832, apply now with increased force. It is considered that nothing need be added to the suggestions then made on these points, or on the subject of the seizure of the dividends due the United States by the Bank for its claim for damages on what is called the bill of exchange on the Government of France.

As Congress has never yet given its sanction to that claim, or made any appropriation for its payment, it is very desirable that, in its final proceedings concerning the affairs of the Government with the Bank, some special direction should be included on that subject, as well as on the reports to be required, and agency exercised over the interests of the United States in the Bank the ensuing two years, by any public officer. A direction seems proper also, as in 1812, concerning the receipt of the bills of the Bank for public dues, after the 3d of March next; and on the disposition or investment of the interest of the United States in its capital stock, whenever paid over to the Treasury. Some explicit action of Congress on the subject of the above claim for damages, is very desirable in another view, so as to enable this Department, in case of the receipt of any part of the French indemnity, to decide correctly whether the dividends seized by the Bank should, in any event, be considered the loss of the United States; or should be deducted from the amount received for the claimants under the treaty, in whose behalf the business was transacting, in which the demand for damages originated, and to whose credit the present act of Congress requires shall be paid into the Treasury only "the net proceeds" of each instalment.

VII. Miscellaneous subjects.

In the course of the past year, the Department has, at various ports, discontinued, as not necessary, fourteen custom-house officers, and at others reduced the compensation of a few. This has enabled it to augment the number and compensation at some other points, where the increase of business appeared to demand it, though not, in all places, to the extent desired. From the diminished temptation to smuggling, under our reduced tariff, this Department has felt justified in lessening the number of revenue cutters two, or one-tenth of the whole; the number of boats three, and the number of officers and men over fifty, making hereafter an annual saving in these respects, of about $20,000. After full inquiry, all has been effected on this subject which the public interests appear now to justify, the expenses of collection in this and other particulars should be considered in reference to the gross, and not as is sometimes inadvertently done, the net revenue; the former being the amount which the custom-house establishment must actually assess, and the difference between them being in part paid out for other objects than the mere expenses of collection; such as bounties on the fisheries, and refunding of duties. In deciding on the reasonableness of those expenses, it must be manifest that a certain number of officers, cutters, boats, &c. equal to the collection of a large sum, cannot be dispensed with, at many places, if any revenue, however small, is to be collected; else there would be no adequate security against illicit trade, and no means of furnishing proper entries, clearances, and other papers, to those engaged in navigation, though their trade may be almost exclusively in the present large amount of free goods, or in our widely extended coasting business.

In computing the rate per cent. for collecting the revenue, it must also be remembered that the rate is larger, as the amount collected diminishes, and smaller as it increases, though the whole actual expense of collection per annum remains the same. Furthermore, the necessary cost of collecting thirty millions of dollars at the same ports obviously need be but little more than to collect half that sum, though the per centage, in one case, will be double what it is in the other. This Department, since the reduction of the whole duties to be collected in 1833, and the corresponding decrease in the inducements to smuggle, has endeavored to reduce the whole actual expenses, and has, in some degree, been successful, though the whole cost of collection may still constitute a larger per centage than at some former periods, as the whole amount of revenue is so much lessened.

Thus, from 1790 to 1794, that cost, though small in itself, rose, in some of those years, to more than 5 1-2 per cent. on a small revenue, or to about the same as in 1833 and '34, and which is quite 2 per cent. lower than the average in England, and 4 per cent. lower than in France. But, in most intermediate years, for reasons before stated, and others too obvious for recital, the cost of collecting our revenue from customs, as well as lands, has seldom exceeded 3 1-2 per cent. and from the latter is now probably not half that rate. Besides the explanations already given on this subject, it is hoped that the new expenses will ere long cease, which have recently been imposed on the collection of the revenue, by the necessary preparations for making, and the actual manufacture of useful and important standard weights and measures, and uniform sets thereof, for all the custom-houses in the United States.

In addition to the recommendations in the last annual report as to light houses, it may be observed that this Department, during the recess of Congress, deemed it proper to cause a thorough inquiry to be instituted into the whole subject. The inquiry extended to the propriety of discontinuing any of the present light-houses, or of building others; the expediency of changing the height or material of any of these edifices; the best manner of lighting them, in respect to the kind or number of lamps or reflectors; the various substances used, and most suitable to give the best light at the smallest expense; and, in fine, the economy of managing the whole establishment. With this was combined a system of uniform instructions to the light-house keepers, for the discharge of their public duties. The report of the Fifth Auditor, and the correspondence growing out of this inquiry, develop some interesting facts, and the whole proceedings will, with pleasure, be laid before Congress on some other appropriate opportunity.

The report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office is accompanied by so many long and important documents, that it is herewith submitted in a separate communication. Beside the remarks made a year since by this Department, on the rapid increase of duties in that bureau, and the corresponding necessity for an increase of clerks to dispose of it promptly and correctly, the experience of the present year has, by the vast sales of lands which have occurred, added new force to all that was then urged. Taking either the number of acres sold, or the amount of money received as a guide, it will be seen by the table (F) that the business has more than doubled within the past five years.

The recommendations contained in the Commissioner's report will, it is hoped, receive that early and grave attention which the convenience and interests of the whole country, and especially of the southwest and west, seem imperiously to require. As a subject of retrenchment, connected with this bureau, where the character of the business will permit, it is suggested to Congress, whether it might not be advisable to discontinue the offices in a few districts, and annex them to the adjoining ones, on the ground that the public sales recently made at them, or anticipated hereafter, are not sufficient to justify the expense of continuing them as distinct offices.

Several other subjects suggested for consideration to the last Congress, and not finally acted upon, are again respectfully urged on its attention, without going into a repetition of the views then submitted in relation to them.

Among the principal were, the change in the commencement of the fiscal year; a re-organization of the Treasury Department, especially to increase some of its checks; further control over some of its discretionary powers, by more specific regulations as to the Deposit Banks, and the keeping and disbursing of the public money—the revision of the laws as to the Marine Hospital fund—re-building the Treasury Offices—legislation on the provisoes in the act of July 14, 1832, and other points to enforce the spirit of the present tariff—and making new provisions on the number and compensation of Custom-house Officers. In the report and bill connected with this last matter, were included several suggestions for further changes in the present system for collecting our Revenue from Customs, to which, on some future occasion, will be subjoined such as have since occurred, from additional experience and inquiries.

Various other subjects, specially devolved on the Head of this Department, have received the attention and labor which they appeared to deserve; but from the length to which this Report has already extended, the proceedings in relation to them will, at an early day, be separately communicated to Congress.

All which is respectfully submitted.

LEVI WOODBURY,

Secretary of the Treasury.

To the Hon. JAMES K. POLK,

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

REPORT FROM THE COMMISSIONER OF THE GENERAL LAND OFFICE.

GENERAL LAND OFFICE,

December 5, 1835.

SIR: I have the honor herewith to transmit statements exhibiting the operations of the several Land Offices during the year 1834, and the first, second, and third quarters of the year 1835, indicating the quantity of land sold—the amount of cash and scrip received in payment therefor—the amount of incidental expenses—and the amount of moneys paid into the Treasury by the receivers of public money during the said periods.

There are also herewith transmitted copies of the estimates of appropriations required by this branch of the public service during the ensuing year.

In estimating the expenses of the General Land Office proper, upon the present establishment, the Commissioner must be ruled by the organization contemplated and provided for by the act of the 25th April, 1812, and of the 2d of March, 1827—a scheme devised in inexperience, and obviously incompetent to the despatch of the increasing business, apart from the accumulated load of arrears, and incapable of discharging all the obligations which good faith and good policy impose upon the Government, in the operation of its land system.

For some years past, Congress has partially complied with the urgent requests of the office for more clerical aid, and by temporary appropriations for extra clerk hire for writing of patents, &c., has afforded sensible relief; but considering, as I do, that the continuation of such temporary appropriations for the ensuing year, even to a much greater amount, would form but an imperfect and exceptionable substitute for the organic system upon which this branch of the public service ought to be established, in order to secure the correctness, economy, and expedition in the administration of its concerns, demanded by exigencies derived from the past, and becoming more pressing with the augmenting sales, and the increasing perplexity in which time involves the private land claims of thirty years' standing, from which the attention of the Commissioner has, unavoidably, been too much diverted, I respectfully invite your attention to the expediency of a reform.

The estimate for additional clerks, now offered, is indispensable, so long as the Legislature may choose to adhere to the measure of regular force prescribed by the 6th section of the act of 2d March, 1827; but I cannot refrain from indulging a strong hope that Congress, perceiving the insufficiency of such temporary expedients, will substitute, in the course of the coming session, a scheme better suited to the weight of the circumstances that press upon and overburden the office; and I very respectfully suggest, that the attention of Congress be requested to measures that may place this institution in the condition of efficiency required by the public interests, as well as by justice to a great portion of the population of our country, whose interests are intimately connected with the prompt and correct execution of the duties imposed by law upon the General Land Office. I beg leave, moreover, to observe, that the impolicy of extra appropriations for specific services in the office, is found in the fact that it has been impracticable, from the nature of the duties, to restrict the labors of the clerks employed under such appropriations to the specific heads of service for which such appropriations were made. The circumstances attending the business have been such as always to demand the application of the auxiliary force, according to the pressure of duties, and in view of their comparative importance.

In the representations made by my predecessor in 1833-34, to the Secretary of the Treasury and to Congress, I have not discovered the least exaggeration of the difficulties under which the General Land Office had labored, and continued to struggle, for want of timely adaptation of plan and means to the current business, and to the arrears postponed by the causes he described, which remain in abeyance, while the progress of time adds to the difficulty of disentangling the most complicated from their embarrassment. This posture of affairs appears to call urgently upon the Legislature to revise the laws fixing the organic principles by which the General Land Office has now to be governed, and enact provisions whereby a more perfect supervision of labor and duty can be practised; responsibility made more sensible in the various branches of this service; and the Commissioner, in a measure, relieved of details that divert his attention from more important affairs, but which cannot be neglected, as they occur, without occasioning delays, and perhaps confusion, in the several bureaux, where justice and expediency would recommend that the relative compensation of the principals should bear a proportion to the responsibility incurred, and the abilities, attention, and industry required.

The annual cost of an improved system, equal to the new business constantly occurring, and to bringing up what remains behind, in a reasonable time, would, probably, be greater during a few years than the sum now estimated for the next; yet, in the ultimate result of the experiment, there would be a saving in this respect, it is thought, of several times the difference; a difference of small comparative moment, in calculating the value of reform.

In reference to the estimates for additional clerk hire in the offices of the Surveyors General, I have to make the following remarks. The embarrassments which have existed in those offices have heretofore been fully communicated to Congress in a report, dated 21st January, 1833, under a resolution of the Senate; (printed as Senate document, No. 50, of the second session of the twenty-second Congress;) in consequence whereof, partial appropriations have heretofore been made, to enable those officers to bring up the arrears of work in their respective offices. One principal object of those appropriations, (as submitted in former estimates,) is the transcribing of the field notes of surveys, with the view of having copies of them filed, and preserved at the seat of Government. Lest this object should not be fully understood, I would briefly remark that "the field notes," so called, are, technically, the surveys.

The laws in relation to surveying the public lands, by a singular oversight, do not require that copies of the field notes should be multiplied. On the contrary, the existing provisions of law require the Surveyors General to furnish with the township plats, instead of copies of the field notes of survey, a document which is called a "description" of the township, indicating the quality of the lands on the sectional lines and between the corner posts, and referring to the character of the corner posts or bearing trees. Such descriptions, however, answer not the same purposes as the field notes, and no protractors can be made from them. The original field notes are filed in the offices of the Surveyors General; no copies of them are extant by law; and if such originals should be lost or destroyed by the burning down of the Surveyors' offices, or otherwise, there would be no record of them in existence, and the loss would be irremediable, unless by re-surveys of the lands, requiring the expenditure of immense sums of money.

The fact that the office of the Surveyor General for Alabama was destroyed by fire many years ago, and with it all the original field books of surveys, of which no transcripts were ordered to be preserved by law, is one of the strongest inducements that could present itself in favor of the additional appropriation for clerk hire in the Surveyors' offices, now submitted with a view to effect that object.

This office was enabled to supply, to a considerable extent, the loss occasioned by the destruction of the Surveyor's office in Alabama, because the Surveyor General, in departing from the custom, had returned the field notes.

The labors in the Surveyors' offices have been greatly increased by the operation of the act of 5th April, 1832, entitled "An act supplementary to the several laws for the sale of public lands," by reason of the new and minute subdivisions of fractional sections necessary to be exhibited on the township plats. Previous thereto, the smallest legal subdivision was the 80 acre tract, (half-quarter section,) made such by a line running North and South. The act referred to confers the additional privilege of locating quarter-quarters of sections, the divisional line running east and west restricting the privilege of making those small entries to two quarter-quarter sections by any one purchaser, and to those purchasers only who enter them for cultivation, or for the use of their improvements. To make this law available, it was found necessary to require the Surveyors General not only to exhibit on all future township surveys protracted by them respectively, the minute subdivisions of fractional sections into forty acre lots, as nearly as practicable, (under regulations prescribed by the Department, in pursuance of law,) but also to make new protractors and calculations of the vast number of fractional sections in market, and remaining unsold, at the passage of the act, and to make returns to this office, as well as to the District Land Offices. The maps and diagrams so required have to be prepared in triplicate. The magnitude of this work, and the pressing demands made by purchasers for the receipt of those returns of subdivision at the several Land Offices, have, as may be inferred, (in the midst of the increasing demand for new lands to be brought into market,) greatly encroached on the time which otherwise would have been devoted to the bringing up of the old arrears, and transcribing the field notes. Hence, it has been frequently found necessary to apply the whole force in the Surveyors' offices to the current business, as the exigencies of the public service have from time to time imperatively demanded, to the delay of those special objects for which the additional appropriations were required.

The propriety of making an allowance to the Surveyors General for office-rent and fuel, is respectfully submitted. The want of ample accommodations for the clerks allowed them by law, of necessity tends to retard the progress of those important objects for which the appropriations of clerk hire have been made. The officer is now personally charged with all expenses of house rent and fuel for his clerks in the public service, and his emoluments not increasing by commissions and fees, (as those of the Registers and Receivers, in a given proportion to the amount of their business,) it is certainly an evil that the appropriation of increased force in aid of the public service has the direct effect to diminish his own emoluments by the expenses attending the accommodations he has to provide for his clerks. In view of all these circumstances, I beg leave to present the estimate of appropriation for two thousand one hundred dollars for office rent and fuel at the Surveyors' offices.

To show the progress of the public surveys and the fields of operation that may be expected to be occupied by the surveyors during the ensuing year, I have deemed it proper to submit herewith such reports of the Surveyors General, together with their respective estimates, as this office is at present enabled to furnish.

IN OHIO.

The whole of the lands in this State which have been ceded to the United States have been surveyed, and, with the exception of some small former Indian reservations, have been offered at public sale.

IN INDIANA.

In this State all the lands which have been ceded have been surveyed; but about ninety townships and fractional townships have not been proclaimed for sale. They will, however, be brought into market early next season.

IN THE PENINSULA OF MICHIGAN.

In this part of the Territory nearly all the ceded lands have been surveyed and brought into market. The unsurveyed portion is principally situated in the neighborhood of Saginaw Bay, and, should the interests of the public and of the settlers render it expedient, a portion thereof will be surveyed and placed in market before the close of 1836.

IN MICHIGAN, WEST OF LAKE MICHIGAN.

In this section of the Territory, the whole of the lands within the Wisconsin land district, have been surveyed; and in addition to the surveys within the Green Bay district which have been proclaimed for sale, the office is advised of the survey of about sixty-five townships and fractional townships in that district, which have not yet been proclaimed, but which can be brought into market early in the next year if required.

The united nation of the Chippewa, Ottawa, and Pottawatamie Indians having, by the treaty of 1833 and 1834, ceded to the United States the lands in Illinois and Michigan west of and between the lake and the lands previously ceded by the Winnebago and other Indians, the Surveyor General was instructed, in August last, to have that portion of the cession situate in Michigan run off into townships; and since that time he has been instructed to have those townships subdivided. The survey of this cession and of some of the adjoining townships, in the previous sessions, will not only complete the surveys in this district, but of all the lands between Lake Michigan and the Mississippi which have been ceded to the Government.

IN ILLINOIS.

In this State the office is advised of the survey of ninety-eight townships, and fractional townships, embracing the whole of the Pottawatamie cession of 20th October, 1823, and such portions of the adjacent cessions as had not been surveyed, thus completing the surveys in the Danville district, and in the southern part of the Chicago district. The whole of these surveys can be brought into market during the next spring.

In the Northwestern land district, the Surveyor General has contracted for the survey of all the lands north of the old Indian boundary, and west of the extension of the third principal meridian, into townships, and for the subdivision of a portion of those townships into sections; and although the office is not advised of the number of townships which will be prepared for market in that part of the district during the next year, yet it may be safely calculated that sufficient progress will have been made to admit of one or more public sales. Instructions were given to the surveyor general, in August last, to have that portion of the lands ceded by the treaty of 1833 and 1834 with the Chippewa, Ottawa, and Pattawatamie Indians, which is situated in Illinois, run off into townships, and he has been since directed to subdivide those townships into sections, preparatory to their being brought into market.

An appropriation of $500 having been made at the last session of Congress for surveying the confirmed lots at Peoria, the necessary instructions were given to the surveyor general to carry the act into effect.

IN MISSOURI.

In the northern part of this State the office is advised that the surveyor general has contracted for the survey of the exterior lines of about 138 townships, and for the subdivision of 30 of those townships. The surveyor general has also informed the office of his having contracted for running the exterior lines of about 189 townships, principally upon the waters of the Osage and Grand rivers, and adjoining the surveys already made.

An appropriation of $20,000 having been made in 1834 for surveys in the southwest part of the State, the surveyor general has been engaged in executing surveys in that section of the State, and the whole of the amount appropriated for that object has been remitted to him for their payment; but as yet it is not in the power of this office to say what number of townships have been surveyed, or state the precise time when they can be brought into market, although it is confidently expected that the wishes of the settlers will be complied with by proclaiming some of those lands during the next season.

IN THE STATE OF LOUISIANA.

The information derived from the surveyor general enables me to say that, by the middle of March next, there will be about 248 townships and fractional townships surveyed and returned, which have not been proclaimed for sale. Some of these townships would have been offered during the present year, if the land offices had not been again opened by the act of the 6th of February last, for the investigation and decision of the private claims to land in that State, and the consequent apprehension that difficulties might arise from offering those lands for sale during the period in which individuals are allowed to bring forward their claims. If, however, the office can satisfactorily ascertain that any portion of those lands can be offered without the risk of interfering with such alleged claims, such lands will be brought into market during the next year.

IN MISSISSIPPI.

The office of the surveyor for the public lands in this State having necessarily been closed since the termination of the last session of Congress, no surveys are known to have been made during the present season. It is estimated, however, that only about 40 townships are now required to be surveyed, to complete the survey of the lands ceded by the Choctaw treaty of 1830.

From the representations which have been made to this office, it is greatly to be apprehended that such numerous errors have been committed, many years ago, in locating and surveying the confirmed private claims in that part of the Augusta district south of the 31st degree of latitude, as to render it indispensably necessary that the subject should be examined by the land officers and the surveyor general, in order that the nature and extent of those errors might be correctly ascertained; and instructions had been given to them in relation thereto, when the closing of the surveyor's office prevented any progress being made in such examination. Whenever the office is filled, the surveyor general will be required to go on with the examination.

In that part of the State included in the limits of the Chickasaw cession of 1832, and where the operations are carried on under the directions of a surveyor general specially provided for by the treaty, it is believed that almost the whole of the operations in the field will be completed during the present season, with the exception of some townships in the Mississippi swamp, and of such of the lands bordering on the line between that cession and the Choctaw cession of 1830 as could not be surveyed in consequence of that line not being run and marked; but as the surveyor general has been advised of the course of the line, and directed to have it surveyed, it may be expected that the whole surveys will be completed during the next year.

IN ALABAMA.

In this State all the ceded lands, with the exception of some townships south of the 31st degree, and of some bordering upon the undecided boundary between this State and the State of Georgia, have been surveyed.

Owing to the complaints which had been made respecting the surveys of the lots in the city of Mobile, and of the claims adjacent thereto, and in consequence of the great value of the property in question, it was thought advisable that the surveyor general should personally examine the subject, and have the surveys corrected under his own immediate superintendence; and he therefore devoted a part of the last winter and spring to the accomplishment of that duty, which it is hoped has now been correctly and satisfactorily performed.

IN FLORIDA.

The surveys of the public lands in West Florida having been almost entirely completed, the attention of the surveyor general, for the last year, has been principally directed to the extension of those in the peninsula and along the Atlantic border of East Florida; but, in consequence of the nature of the country on each side of the tract formerly reserved for the Seminole Indians, but which was ceded to the United States by the treaty of the 9th May, 1832, it has been thought advisable to suspend the extension of the surveys in that section of the country until the Indians shall be removed under the provisions of the treaty. This suspension will not, however, cause any inconvenience to the public, as it will enable the surveyor general to prepare for market those surveys which have already been made, and which the reported sickness of his clerks, and want of aid in his office, have heretofore prevented him from doing.

During the last season, a survey of the confirmed claims, and of the public property in the city of St. Augustine, was made under the provisions of the act of the 28th June, 1832.

IN ARKANSAS.

By information received from the surveyor general, it appears that about 85 townships and fractional townships have been surveyed, of which the plats have not been received at this office; and that about 64 townships and fractional townships were under contract for subdivision into sections. Some of these lands will be offered for sale during the next year.

Not only as showing the nature of the work contemplated to be performed during the next season in the different districts, and for which appropriations are now asked, but also the manner in which it has been found absolutely necessary to apply the appropriations heretofore made for extra aid in the offices of the surveyors general, I beg leave to refer to the accompanying reports from those officers.

The paper marked G, herewith transmitted, is a statement showing the amount of forfeited land stock issued and surrendered at the United States land offices to the 30th September, 1835; also, the amount of military land scrip surrendered to the same period.

24th CONG. 1st SESS.]

Land Office Report.

The paper H is an exhibit of the periods to which the monthly accounts of the registers and receivers of the public land offices have been rendered, and showing the balance of cash in the receivers' hands at the date of the last monthly accounts current, and the period to which the receivers' quarterly accounts have been rendered.

The act of Congress of 3d March last, 2d section, appropriates an additional quantity of land for the satisfaction of warrants granted by the State of Virginia to the officers, soldiers, sailors, and marines of her State and continental establishments during the revolutionary war, to the amount of 650,000 acres, and provided that if, on the 1st September, 1835, the amount of warrants filed should exceed the amount of land so appropriated, the Commissioner should apportion the said six hundred and fifty thousand acres of land among the warrants "which may be then on file, in full satisfaction thereof."

The amount of warrants filed on 1st September last so far exceeded the quantity of land appropriated by the law as to require the deduction of ten per cent. from the nominal amount of each warrant; the scrip has been ordered to be prepared accordingly, and considerable progress has been made in the issue.

I have the honor to be, sir, with great respect, your obedient servant,

ETHAN A. BROWN.

Secretary of the Treasury.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, GENERAL LAND OFFICE, December 5, 1835.

ETHAN A. BROWN, Commissioner.

PUBLIC LANDS.

JANUARY 27, 1836.

Mr. Ewing made the following report.

The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred a bill to appropriate, for a limited time, the proceeds of the sales of the public lands of the United States, and for granting lands to certain States, report:

That they look upon the leading measure proposed by the bill as one of great national importance. The gradual operation of a system, devised in the early history of our Government, for the support of the public credit, and for reducing the public debt, has, within a short time past, produced its full and final effect. The public debt is discharged, and existing commercial regulations, which the condition of our country renders indispensable, together with the sales of the public lands, bring yearly a large surplus fund into the Treasury. This fund, which is no longer taken up in the payment of a national debt, and which still remains unappropriated, has already arisen to the amount of about twenty-four millions of dollars; and as it does not arise from transient causes, it goes on increasing, and must continue to increase. This state of things is not at all desirable. Its natural tendency is to produce extravagance in the appropriation and wastefulness in the expenditure of public money. Indeed, it seems to be conceded by all, that this large surplus ought not to remain and accumulate in the public Treasury; and there have been suggested, as means of lessening the amount and preventing a future accumulation—

First. The reduction of the customs.

Second. Increased expenditures in the navy and fortifications.

Third. A reduction of the price of public lands, and the surrender of large portions of them to the States in which they lie; and,

Lastly, This bill, which proposes to distribute the proceeds of the public lands among the several States, leaving the receipts from customs to defray the ordinary expenses of Government in time of peace.

The first-named measure—a reduction of the customs—cannot be resorted to without awakening feeling dangerous to the peace and harmony of the country. The tariff law now in force is the result of a compromise of the opinions of citizens of different sections of the Union, and ought not to be disturbed, unless a strong political necessity call for its modification. Under this law, or, indeed, any law, keeping up such duties as are necessary for the proper regulation of commerce, it is believed that the customs will produce a revenue at least equal to the ordinary wants of the Government. The surplus, therefore, cannot be reduced by lessening the amount of the customs.

The next measure proposed, is a large increase of appropriations upon our fortifications and navy, so as to absorb the surplus revenue, and at the same time put the country in an attitude of defence in the event of a foreign war. Such increased appropriation, to some extent, is, in the opinion of your committee, necessary and proper. There ought to be dealt out with a liberal hand, all that can be well applied to render the seaboard safe from foreign aggression; but the amount asked by the Executive for both these purposes does not, with the other current expenses of Government, exceed the probable receipts from customs for the ensuing year, if the country be not involved in war. And it is not, in the opinion of your committee, proper that an expenditure should be made in the construction of fortifications or naval armaments for the purpose of exhausting the surplus revenue. If it be, the expenditure of money is made at once the primary object, and the improvement of the national defences but subordinate or auxiliary thereto. This would be true in fact as well as in form. If much money were expended, it would necessarily be applied to little purpose. We might on a sudden emergency, in a short time, by large expenditure, prepare fortifications which would serve the purpose of a temporary defence; but all those substantial works which are to stand as our future and permanent fortresses require time, a selection of materials, and skilful engineers, which it is not in our power to supply much beyond what is necessary in expending judiciously and skilfully our ordinary appropriations. So, also, with respect to the navy.

But to this project there is another and a serious objection. The expenditures in support of the Government are, much the larger portion of them, upon our seacoast, and in our great commercial cities. This proposed extraordinary expenditure would very much increase that amount, and draw to the seacoast other large sums of money which ought properly to have a general distribution over the whole United States. Nor could we expect such a system, if once adopted, to cease, or even to diminish, for ages. No nation was yet ever known voluntarily to lessen its expenditures. If we commence a system of fortifications for the purpose of expending money, chiefly, and but in a secondary degree only, for defences, there will be no limit or end to the means it will furnish us of exhausting our national resources. Hundreds of millions may be expended with a tolerable show of public necessity or convenience, when it is not, on the other hand, deemed necessary to guard and to save the public treasure. It appears clear to your committee, therefore, that an amount of money large enough to exhaust the surplus revenue, could not, at present, be expended in this manner advantageously to the country.

The reducing of the price of the public lands, and ceding them to the States in which they lie, is another mode proposed to lessen the receipts into the Treasury, and thus prevent the influx of a surplus revenue.

Propositions such as these were referred to the Committee on Manufactures, at the first session of the twenty-second Congress, and on the sixteenth of April, eighteen hundred and thirty-two, they presented a detailed report to the Senate, in the general views and reasoning of which your committee concur; and they herewith present the same, and make it a part of their report. That paper, in the opinion of your committee, demonstrates the injustice and impolicy of such a disposition of the national domain; and subsequent experience has confirmed their reasoning.

But other similar propositions, varying from those considered in that report, in some of their features, have been referred to your committee. Among these are—

A proposition to graduate the price of the public lands according to quality; and

To grant the lands to the States in which they lie, after they shall have been offered for sale for a given time.

To each of these your committee have given a careful consideration.

These propositions appear to be suggested for the benefit of the States in which the public lands are situated; for it is easy to prove that the interests of the United States, as the great landed proprietor, would not be subserved by either of them. The graduation of the price of the public lands is in nowise necessary or expedient, as a measure to effect their sale. Lands which have been long in market become surrounded by settlements. If they be hilly, they become valuable for their timber and stone, and other mineral productions. If swampy, or barren, they form a convenient appendage to neighboring farms for pasturage; and if not worth entering at the minimum price for any of these purposes, the public suffers no loss in permitting them to remain open and unappropriated.

Experience has fully shown, that the rise in the value of the public lands increases in proportion to the time that it is in market, or, rather, to the number of the sales and density of the settlement near and around it. This fact is strongly illustrated by a reference to the sales of the public lands at the several land offices for a series of years. By this it will be seen that a larger per centum of the lands actually in market at private sale, has generally sold at the old than at the new offices, and that per centum has generally increased in proportion to the time the lands have been in market. It is a remarkable fact, bearing upon this proposition, that in no State or Territory has the sales of public lands at private sale been so great, in proportion to the quantity in market, within the last five years, as in Ohio, in which State the public lands have been longest exposed to sale.

Your committee are also of opinion, that such graduation or reduction in the price of the public lands would operate to the injury, and not the benefit, of the section of country in which such lands lie. If the amount of public land the price of which was thus reduced, be great, its first and immediate effect would be to reduce the value of all the lands in its vicinity, pro rata with the reduction of the public lands. To those who were full handed, and able to make large purchases, it might open a fine field for speculation, and profitable investment of capital; and if the price were reduced low, so as to make it an object with the capitalist, the public lands would be purchased up at once, on speculation, and retailed at an advanced price. It would thus cause a fluctuation in the value of land, a fall and a rise in its price, which is ever favorable to the sharp-sighted and sagacious speculator, but inimical to the interests of the agricultural portion of the community. Your committee therefore think, that no interest which ought to be cherished and protected by the Government requires the graduation of the price of the public lands.

The proposition to cede the public lands to the States in which they lie, after they shall have been offered for sale a given number of years, is liable to many and serious objections. This project is, no doubt, well calculated to meet with favor in those States in which there is yet much public land unsold, as it holds out to them an apparent prospect of a vast accession to their resources. But it is, in the opinion of your committee, entirely delusive. The several States which form parties to the national compact have all an equal right to, and an equal interest in, the national domain, and such an application of it to the use of some of the States, which is not just to all, cannot be expected to meet with general favor.

Such a disposition of the public lands would be, indeed, a violation of a solemn contract which was adopted by, and made binding under, the constitution of the United States. The deed of cession of Virginia, by virtue of which we hold by far the largest and most valuable portion of our territory east of the Mississippi river, contains a clause, common to all the cessions of the several States, which provides that, after certain reservations shall have been made, and certain bounties satisfied, that the lands so ceded "shall be considered a common fund for the use and benefit of all of the United States, members of the federal alliance," "and shall be faithfully and bona fide disposed of for that purpose, and for no other use or purpose whatsoever." This deed of cession was made by Virginia and accepted by Congress prior to the adoption of the constitution. It therefore became and was a compact before the adoption of the constitution, and is referred to and made binding by the first section of the fifth article of that instrument. It is, in the opinion of your committee, too clear to require an argument, that the giving of all the residue of these lands to the States in which they lie, after they shall have been offered for sale for a period of years, will not, if any lands of value remain unsold, be disposing of them bona fide for the benefit of all the States, according to the requisition of this solemn compact. The principle on which grants of land have been made to the several States in which the public lands lie, for public works of any kind, is, that the United States, being a large landholder, have, in the management of that property, a right to do what any other landholder, who consulted his own interest, would do—appropriate a portion of his lands, or their proceeds, to open roads and canals, and to construct public works in their neighborhood, so as to enhance their value or bring them sooner to a market. But this proposed gift or cession of the residue of the lands, after they shall have been in market five or ten years, cannot be sustained on that ground. A gift or conveyance of a part, on condition that it be so applied as to make the residue more valuable than the whole would otherwise have been, is a bona fide disposition of such part of the fund for the use of all those who are entitled to share in it; but, if we give away the whole residue at any time, when that residue possesses value, we as certainly misapply the fund and abuse the trust; for, in that state of things, nothing remains to be enhanced in value, and the gift is to one State or to a few States—whereas, the trust is for all, and Congress is required to dispose of the land bona fide for the benefit of all.

But, if Congress had the right to give the residue of the lands, after they should have been offered for sale five or ten years and still remained unsold, to the States in which they lie, such a disposition of them would be unequal among themselves, and therefore unjust. It would not give them lands in proportion to the population of each, or to the amount that each, or the citizens of each, had paid for lands into the public Treasury. The State of Ohio would receive, on this proposition, certainly less than four millions of acres, (the amount depending upon the time the land should begin market before it be surrendered,) that is, about four acres to each individual in the State, while the public lands in the State of Ohio have brought into the Treasury about seventeen millions of dollars, besides satisfying, to a large amount, the debts of the Government.

Missouri, upon a like mode of distribution or surrender, would have not less than twenty-five millions of acres, or about one hundred and sixty acres to each individual, black and white, according to the census of 1830. Thus, one inhabitant of Missouri would receive a quantity of land equal to what would be received by forty inhabitants of Ohio; and, while the lands in Ohio have brought seventeen millions into the public Treasury, the lands in Missouri have brought in less than three millions. This disparity, therefore, would be very unjust to Ohio, but still more so to the other States of the Union having equal rights, and which, on this principle of surrender, would receive nothing. It cannot, therefore, be expected by any one, however strongly solicitous he may feel for the advancement of the new States, that such a measure will be adopted. Something more equal and more just must be thought of by those who wish to promote their interests and add to their prosperity.

There are other measures proposed which, if adopted, would affect, more or less, the interest of the United States in the public land, by lessening its general value and rendering its management more complicated and difficult. One of the first, and not the least important of these, is the law granting pre-emptions to actual settlers, which was first passed on the 29th day of May, 1830, and which, with some modifications, is still in force. The intent of this law was that of kindness and benevolence. It was enacted for the benefit of the poorer class of citizens, who, having pushed forward beyond the lands offered for sale, settled and improved the public lands, and made themselves a home, with some comforts around them, and had become able, by their industry, to pay for these lands at the minimum price. It seemed hard that these pioneers, who had thus improved the lands by their labor, should be compelled to enter into competition with new adventurers at the sales, and thus pay for improvements which they themselves had made. Such appear to have been the reasons for the enactment of these laws. They provided that, when two individuals cultivated one quarter section of land, each should be entitled to the pre-emption of half the tract so jointly cultivated, and each, also, to a pre-emption of eighty acres any where in the same land district; and, by a supplementary law, the claims were made assignable.

Your committee have satisfactory information that these laws have been the cause of frauds and perjuries, to an amount and number almost incredible. Thousands of pre-emptions have been proved under them, and certificates granted, when the whole case was without the least shadow of foundation. In other cases, the cutting down of a single tree, the marking it with a hatchet, or encamping for the night, has been made the ground of pre-emption claims. In most of the last-named cases, two individuals would together cut down their sapling, or tie each his horse upon the same quarter section of land; this, with the oath founded upon it, which appears to be always according to form, would get for each of the individuals a certificate or warrant, now familiarly called "a float," which they might lay on any of the lands of the United States which was surveyed, and not offered for sale; thus taking, at the minimum price of $1 25 per acre, lands worth, in many instances, more than twenty times that sum. Large companies, it is believed, have been formed, who procure affidavits of improvements to be made, get the warrants issued upon them, and whenever a good tract of land is ready for sale, cover it over with their floats, and thus put down competition. The frauds upon the public within the past year, from this single source, have arisen to many millions of dollars.

Your committee believe that a great error was committed by the passage of these laws, and that no amendment or modification will guard against the mischiefs which they have heretofore produced. Claims of this kind cannot, in the very nature of things, be subjected to judicial investigation; or, if they were, the means of eliciting truth, the confronting of witness against witness by parties, who are stimulated on both sides to the uttermost to rebut and repel, cannot be brought to bear upon the examination of these claims. Hence a few individuals, whose evidence can be purchased with a price, and who can appear under different names at pleasure, may, under the auspices of these laws, divert millions of money from the public Treasury into the coffers of their employers.

The system early adopted for the disposition of the public lands of the United States is admirable, and, in the opinion of your committee, ought not to be broken in upon or departed from. The pre-emption laws have, more than any other cause, tended to unsettle and derange them, and they have thrown upon the General Land Office a mass of labor, most unpleasant in its character, and difficult to be performed. The good which they do bears no comparison to the evil; for every dollar which the poorer settlers save by them, hundreds are lost by the Government; and fraud, and perjury, and unlawful combination and lawless violence, to put down competition at public sales, have arisen out of their provisions. In the opinion of your committee, they ought to cease.

There are also, connected in some measure with this subject, several bills and memorials referred to your committee, proposing or praying for grants of land for seminaries of learning, for public education, or to aid in constructing works of internal improvement. These are all meritorious objects, and your committee are disposed to give them the most favorable consideration. But there are many difficulties attending the action of Congress on these special subjects. The very great extent of our country, the general feeling that all parts of it have equal rights to the munificence of Congress, the impossibility of determining which, among many institutions in the same State, ought to have such bounty as Congress might be disposed to bestow on objects of this kind, all lead to the conclusion that it were better to put it in the power of the several States to confer these bounties, and select the most worthy objects, than to attempt here to perform that office.

The rapidity with which the public lands now sell, the ease with which they are converted into money, the abundance of money now in the Treasury, and the moral certainty that there will be, for a long time, enough, and more than enough, to meet the current expenses of the Government, have impressed strongly upon your committee the opinion, that it is impolitic and inexpedient to make a donation of land for any object, where a donation of money may be as lawfully made, and will effect the same end. These donations or transfers of land are liable to the objection that they tend more or less to confuse and complicate the land system. They all add something to the duties of the officers of the United States who have charge of the public lands, and they serve to embarrass the purchaser, who has not, as he would without them have, one set, and one only, of land offices to whom he is to resort for the entry of lands. There is another objection. Though it be the fact that a donation of land by law is equivalent to a donation of money, yet we do not always feel it exactly so. There is a natural tendency to consider it more highly than it deserves, and to treat it too highly in legislation.

Your committee, on the whole, believe that it is better, if Congress have the constitutional power, to distribute among the several States, according to their respective rights, the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, allowing the States to use it for any or all of the purposes set forth and recommended in these bills and memorials. But that the lands themselves should not be assigned over, given away, or granted by Congress; that the ancient system of sales should be carefully preserved, and that all the deviations from it, which have caused much waste and confusion, should, as soon as possible, be corrected, and the former order of things fully restored.

The question of constitutional power has occupied the careful and sedulous attention of the committee; and they here present to the Senate the course of reasoning on that subject which they consider sound and just, and which has led them to the conclusion that Congress possesses the power to distribute the proceeds of the public lands according to the principles of this bill.

At the time the deed of cession from Virginia was made and accepted, the Union was held together by the articles of confederation of 1778, which, in its 8th article, provides "that all charges of war and other expenses that shall be incurred for the common defence, or general welfare, and allowed by the United States in Congress assembled, shall be defrayed out of a common Treasury, which shall be supplied by the several States."

The mode of determining the proportion which each of the States shall bear of the public charges is particularly pointed out, and it is there provided that "the taxes for paying that proportion shall be laid and levied by the authority and direction of the several States." To this state of things, existing at the time of the delivery of the Virginia deed of cession, its provisions must necessarily apply. It was to a confederacy of independent States, who kept up a common Treasury out of contributions from each of its several members, according to a determinate regulation, that this deed was made, and after making certain reservations, specially set forth, it declares the trust in the following distinct and unequivocal terms: "That all the lands within the territory so ceded to the United States, and not reserved for or appropriated to any of the before-mentioned purposes, or disposed of in bounties to the officers and soldiers of the American army, shall be considered as a common fund for the use and benefit of such of the United States as have become, or shall become, members of the confederation, Virginia inclusive, according to their usual respective proportions in the general charge and expenditures, and shall be faithfully and bonafide disposed of for that purpose, and for no other use or purpose whatsoever." If, then, we had still continued, down to the present time, a confederation of States, bound together by the articles of 1778, and if, as is now the case, the public debt were discharged, the public expenses borne by revenues from other quarters, and the public land pouring its millions into the Treasury, what ought Congress, as the trustee of that common fund, to do with it? It is a trust fund, placed in the hands of Congress "for the use and benefit of the several States," and it is to be disposed of "bonafide" for that purpose, "and for no other use or purpose whatsoever." So long as there was a public debt to be paid, this fund was well applied for the common benefit in the payment of that debt, as a debt was a common charge upon all, "according to their usual respective proportions in the public expenditures." And so long as it was necessary for the support of Government, its application to that purpose was right, for the same reason; but when this state of things has ceased, when the proceeds of the public lands are no longer necessary for either of these purposes, what is it the duty of the trustee to do with it, according to the letter and spirit of the deed of trust? And what, were it a case between individuals, would a court of equity compel him to do? The answer is plain and obvious. He not only might pay it, but he would be bound to pay it over to those for whose benefit he held it. If it were not necessary to disburse it for them, he must restore it to them. This, as between individuals, would be a plain case, and your committee cannot perceive how it is varied when applied between States and nations. If, then, we had remained, as we were, members of the old confederation; if the constitution had not intervened, to change, in anywise, the relations of the States to each other, or to the whole, it would have been not only the right but the duty of Congress, pursuant to the spirit of that deed of cession, to have distributed among the several States the proceeds of the sales of the lands contained within the bounds of that grant. The delivery and acceptance of this deed amounted to a contract, and the above is, according to the opinion of your committee, the just construction of that contract.

But the rights and duties of the United States, as a contracting party, are not at all changed by the adoption of the constitution. The 1st section of the 6th article of that instrument provides "that all debts contracted, and engagements entered into, before the adoption of this constitution, shall be as valid against the United States under this constitution as under the confederation;" so that our rights and our duties, with regard to this trust, are the same precisely that they would have been under the old confederation. All that has been said relative to the deed of cession from Virginia, applies equally to the cessions from the other States, except Georgia, whose deed bears date after the adoption of the federal constitution; but, with this exception, it is in tenor and spirit the same with the deed above considered.

Your committee are hence led to the conclusion, that with respect to the proceeds of all the lands north of the 31st degree of latitude, and east of the Mississippi river, Congress not only has the constitutional power to make the proposed distribution, but it is a duty enjoined on them by a contract which is recognised and adopted by the constitution.

As to the land lying within the bounds of the original purchase of Louisiana and Florida, our right so to apply it rests upon less satisfactory grounds. We have no compact concerning it; no constitutional provision, or any agreement recognised by the constitution, which expressly authorized the purchase of this additional territory, or which places the land so purchased in the same situation with that which was originally transferred to Congress by the States. But the right to acquire the additional territory is no longer an open question. It has been settled, and, by virtue of its adjustment, we have already received into the Union two States, and the prosperity of the whole country has been thereby greatly enhanced. It would seem, that when a large extent of territory was added to that which heretofore belonged to the United States, it ought to be subjected to the same constitutional and legal principles which governed in the disposition and management of the lands which we held at the time of the formation of the constitution. It has been so, strictly, in all things, so far as it related to jurisdiction: it would seem just and reasonable that it should be so as to soil also.

But, in every estimate which has been as yet presented of the costs and the proceeds of the public lands, whether by the Secretary of the Treasury or by committees of Congress, the money paid for Louisiana and Florida has been charged to this fund, and it continues to be so down to the last report of the Secretary of the Treasury, of the 8th of December, 1835. If this be correct, if the public lands have been made the fund out of which this large purchase has been paid, it is in truth but a conversion of the receipts for land into other lands, which would, as a necessary consequence, follow the same law of distribution which applied to the original subject out of which the payments were made. The fact that other great and important advantages were derived to the Union from the purchase of these two Territories, does not at all weaken the force of the argument, but leaves it, in this particular instance, precisely as it would have stood if there had been a purchase of land merely out of the funds arising from the sales of lands; and, by the well-known principles of equity, the trust attends the fund, whosoever invested.

Your committee have not taken into consideration the question whether Congress have power, under the constitution, to distribute a portion of the general revenue among the several States, but have chosen to rest the measure proposed by this bill on its own special grounds.

The expediency of this measure appears from considerations heretofore suggested, nor those alone. The distribution of the proceeds of the public lands among the several States would cause a watchful censorship over this branch of the public revenues, which has fallen into confusion by past negligence and inattention. The representatives in Congress from the several States would be induced, by the interest which their immediate constituents must feel in the subject, to prevent the waste of the public lands as well as of public money, and to watch over the national domain as a matter in which those to whom they are responsible have a direct and immediate interest.

It would withdraw from the Treasury of the United States the surplus revenue, without infringing on the constitution, or touching any of its provisions. The money so withdrawn will be, in effect, restored to the pockets of the people, as it will thus enable the several States to exempt their citizens from a direct and burdensome taxation, which they now of necessity impose to effect those public improvements which the situation of the whole country demands, and which are requisite to the prosperity and advancement of each particular State. So long as the law may be continued in force, it will be a steady, regular, and certain resource for these and like purposes to the several States, nor ought they, nor will they feel that it is a gift gratuitously given and submissively received. If our views of the subject be just, it is, in the present state of the Treasury, their own as a matter of equity, not of mere favor; and State pride would not be humbled, or State independence endangered, by receiving it.

By a provision of the constitution of the United States, the several States are denied the right of laying imposts upon commerce—that easy and indirect mode of raising a revenue which is hardly felt by a people. They are, therefore, generally compelled to resort to direct taxes upon land and goods, and, in the Western States, on land especially, to provide for the wants of Government, and to construct such works of internal improvement as their wants and welfare may require; and in some of the States, those taxes have borne heavily upon the people. That burden, by the distribution proposed by this bill, would be lightened, and a large annual fund placed in the hands of the several States, which would enable them to extend the benefit of their improvements as fast and as far as the general interests might require.

Your committee entertain no doubt, that if our country continues in a state of peace, and if no unforeseen calamity should visit it and mar its prosperity, that the receipts from customs, brought down to the lowest standard that existing laws contemplate, will still be amply sufficient for all the current expenses of the Government, economically administered. The estimates which are sent us from the Secretary of the Treasury of those probable receipts, have not for some time past approached very nearly to accuracy; they, therefore, cannot be received as the basis of an estimate.

The increased population and business of the country, the very force of circumstances, which none can control, pours into the Treasury millions upon millions, which its officers were not led to anticipate, and which they hardly seem yet to realize. In the report of the Secretary of the Treasury of the 8th of December, 1835, he estimates the revenue of the last quarter of that year at $4,950,000. But, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of the 5th of the present month, he shows that the actual receipts for the same quarter have in fact amounted to about $11,149,000, exceeding the amount of the estimate by about $6,200,000, while the whole receipts of the year 1835 have exceeded his estimate by about $14,629,000.

Having formed the opinion that it is within the constitutional power of Congress to pass this measure; that the finances of the nation will not be too much diminished or at all deranged by it; and that the general prosperity of the country would be increased by its adoption, your committee have thought it within the range of their duty to estimate, as nearly as may be from the data within their power, the probable annual amount which will arise from the sales of the public lands, and be subject to distribution, should this bill become a law.

In looking into the future of human affairs, and judging of them from the past, we are constantly liable to error, arising from the difficulty of estimating all the disturbing causes which may intervene to produce a fluctuation in the course and current of events. On this subject, however, there are more stable and constant elements, which go to make up the data of our calculations than generally enter into financial estimates.

The sales of the public lands rest essentially on the wants of the husbandman, and are limited to a quantity little exceeding those wants. It is true, when the price is much below its actual value, it may become a subject of extensive speculation, but even then the amount of sales resolves itself into the same element, and speculation merely goes in advance of the farmer, who purchases for actual occupation, without increasing the aggregate of sales in a series of years. The principles of population which have developed themselves in the United States in the last forty years will not, probably, change materially in a like period to come; for, within that time, none of those causes which operate as checks upon population can, in the ordinary course of things, have existence here; nor is it probable that the pursuits of the great body of the people will essentially change; for the same causes which have made us an agricultural community are likely to continue without diminution, so long as the means of subsistence remain, as now, abundant and easy to be procured; and so long as there is a wide public domain parcelled out and ready for sale on moderate terms, placing a home and a freehold in the power of all that have the wish to possess them. The population of our country is, therefore, likely to continue its ratio of increase, and the habits and pursuits of our people to remain the same. Hence the investments in land for the use of the agriculturists will increase in like ratio as heretofore with the increase of our population.

Prior to the year 1800, but little land had been sold by the United States, and there was at that time of wild and uncultivated land within the bounds of the now States of Maine, Vermont, New York, Pennsylvania, Virginia, Georgia, Tennessee, Kentucky, and Ohio, belonging to the States and individuals, a very large quantity, the amount of which cannot be very accurately ascertained, but it is safe to say that it exceeded one hundred millions of acres. This has all, or nearly all, since passed into the hands of actual settlers; and there has been sold and granted of the lands of the United States within that period about fifty millions of acres. Thus it appears there have been taken up and converted to the use of the husbandman, within the last thirty-five years, about one hundred and fifty millions of acres of wild land; and in the mean time little or none heretofore cultivated has been abandoned. The population of the United States in 1800 was four millions, nearly; at this time it is about fourteen millions five hundred thousand; and as the increase upon four millions has, in thirty-five years, required one hundred and fifty million acres of new land, it follows that a like increase upon fourteen million five hundred thousand will, in a like period, require about five hundred and forty millions of acres, rising from the beginning to the end of the period in a ratio of progression; the average amount being about fifteen millions per year.

From the above data, your committee estimate the average receipts from the sales of the public lands for the next ten years, if the country continue in peace, if the land system be faithfully preserved, and if the sales be guarded from combination and fraud, at an average of something more than $10,000,000 per annum. There is already in hand, to be divided by the terms of this bill, $20,571,125 75; of this, the several States will be entitled to receive the sums shown by the annexed table, and of the receipts of each succeeding year, until the next census, in nearly the same proportions.

Your committee report the bill back with amendments, and recommend its passage.

[Report referred to in the preceding.]

APRIL 16, 1832.

Mr. Clay, from the Committee on Manufactures, made, to the Senate, the following report:

The Committee on Manufactures have been instructed by the Senate to inquire into the expediency of reducing the price of public lands, and of ceding them to the several States within which they are situated, on reasonable terms. Far from desiring to assume the duty involved in this important inquiry, it is known to the Senate that a majority of the committee was desirous that the subject should have been referred to some other committee. But, as the Senate took a different view of the matter, the Committee on Manufactures have felt bound to acquiesce in its decisions; and, having bestowed on the whole subject the best consideration in their power, now beg leave to submit to the Senate the result of their inquiries and reflections.

The public lands belonging to the General Government are situated, 1st, within the limits of the United States as defined by the treaty of peace which terminated the revolutionary war; and, 2dly, within the boundaries of Louisiana and Florida, as ceded by France and Spain, respectively, to the United States.

1st. At the commencement of the revolutionary war, there were in some of the States large bodies of waste and unappropriated lands, principally west of the Allegany mountains, and in the Southern or Southwestern quarters of the Union, whilst in others, of more circumscribed or better defined limits, no such resource existed. During the progress of that war, the question was agitated, what should be done with these lands in the event of its successful termination? That question was likely to lead to paralyzing divisions and jealousies. The States not containing any considerable quantity of waste lands contended that, as the war was waged with united means, with equal sacrifices, and at the common expense, the waste lands ought to be considered as a common property; and not be exclusively appropriated to the benefit of the particular States within which they happened to be situated. These, however, resisted the claim, upon the ground that each State was entitled to the whole of the territory, whether waste or cultivated, included within its chartered limits. To check the progress of discontent, and arrest the serious consequences to which the agitation of this question might lead, Congress recommended to the States to make liberal cessions of the waste and unsettled lands to the United States; and, on the 10th day of October, 1790, "Resolved, That the unappropriated lands that may be ceded or relinquished to the United States, by any particular State, pursuant to the recommendation of Congress of the 6th of September last, shall be disposed of for the common benefit of the United States," &c.

In conformity with the recommendation of Congress, the several States containing waste and uncultivated lands made cessions of them to the United States. The declared object having been substantially the same in all of these cessions, it is only necessary to advert to the terms of some of them. The first, in order of time, was that of New York, made on the 1st day of March, 1781, by its delegation in Congress, in pursuance of an act of the Legislature of the State; and the terms of the deed of cession expressly provide that the ceded lands and territories were to be held, "to and for the only use and benefit of such of the States as are, or shall become, parties to the articles of confederation." That of Virginia was the next in date, but by far the most important of all the cessions made by the different States, both as respects the extent and value of the country ceded. It comprehended the right of that Commonwealth to the vast territory northwest of the river Ohio, embracing, but not confined to the limits of, the present States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois. The deed of cession was executed by the delegation of Virginia in Congress, in 1784, agreeably to an act of the Legislature passed in 1783; and, among other conditions, the deed explicitly declares "that all the lands within the territory so ceded to the United States, and not reserved for, or appropriated to, any of the before-mentioned purposes, or disposed of in bounties to the officers and soldiers of the American army, shall be considered a common fund for the use and benefit of such of the United States as have become, or shall become, members of the confederation or federal alliance of the said States, Virginia inclusive, according to their usual respective proportions in the general charge and expenditure, and shall be faithfully and bonafide disposed of for that purpose, and for no other use or purpose whatsoever." Passing by the cessions which other States, prompted by a magnanimous spirit of union and patriotism, successively made, we come to the last in the series, that of the State of Georgia, in 1802. The articles of agreement and cession entered into between that State and the United States, among various other conditions, contain the unequivocal declaration, "that all the lands ceded by this agreement to the United States shall, after satisfying the above-mentioned payment of one million two hundred and fifty thousand dollars to the State of Georgia, and the grants recognised by the preceding conditions, be considered as a common fund for the use and benefit of the United States, Georgia included, and shall be faithfully disposed of for that purpose, and for no other use or purpose whatever."

Thus, by the clear and positive terms of these acts of cession, was a great, public, national trust created and assumed by the General Government. It became solemnly bound to hold and administer the lands ceded, as a common fund for the use and benefit of all the States, and for no other use or purpose whatever. To waste or misapply this fund, or to divert it from the common benefit for which it was conveyed, would be a violation of the trust. The General Government has no more power, rightfully, to cede the lands thus acquired to one of the new States, without a fair equivalent, than it could retrocede them to the State or States from which they were originally obtained. There would indeed be much more equity in the latter than in the former case. Nor is the moral responsibility of the General Government at all weakened by the consideration that, if it were so unmindful of its duty as to disregard the sacred character of the trust, there might be no competent power, peaceably applied, which could coerce its faithful execution.

2d. The other source whence the public lands of the United States have been acquired, are, 1st, the treaty of Louisiana, concluded in 1803; and, secondly, the treaty of Florida, signed in 1819. By the first, all the country west of the Mississippi, and extending to the Pacific ocean, known as Louisiana, which had successively belonged to France, Spain, and France again, including the island of New Orleans, and stretching east of the Mississippi to the Perdido, was transferred to the United States, in consideration of the sum of fifteen millions of dollars which they stipulated to pay, and have since punctually paid, to France, besides other conditions deemed favorable and important to her interests. By the treaty of Florida, both the provinces of East and West Florida, whether any portion of them was or was not actually comprehended within the true limits of Louisiana, were ceded to the United States, in consideration, besides other things, of the payment of five millions of dollars, which they agreed to pay, and have since accordingly paid.

The large pecuniary considerations thus paid to these two foreign Powers were drawn from the Treasury of the people of the United States; and, consequently, the countries for which they formed the equivalents ought to be held and deemed for the common benefit of all the people of the United States. To divert the lands from that general object; to misapply or sacrifice them; to squander or improvidently cast them away, would be alike subversive of the interests of the people of the United States, and contrary to the plain dictates of the duty by which the General Government stands bound to the States and to the whole people.

Prior to the treaties of Louisiana and Florida, Congress had adopted a system for surveying and selling the public lands, devised with much care and great deliberation, the advantages of which having been fully tested by experience, it was subsequently applied to the countries acquired by those treaties. According to that system, all public lands offered for sale are previously accurately surveyed, by skillful surveyors, in ranges of townships of six miles square each, which townships are subdivided into thirty-six equal divisions or square miles, called sections, by lines crossing each other at right angles, and generally containing 640 acres. These sections are again divided into quarters, and prior to the year 1820, no person could purchase a less quantity than a quarter. In that year, provision was made for the further division of the sections into eighths, thereby allowing a purchaser to buy only eighty acres, if he wished to purchase no more. During the present session of Congress, further to extend accommodation to purchasers of the public lands, and especially to the poorer classes, the sections have been again divided into sixteenths, admitting a purchase of only forty acres.

This uniform system of surveying and dividing the public lands applies to all the States and Territories within which they are situated. Its great advantages are manifest. It insures perfect security of title and certainty of boundary, and consequently avoids those perplexing land disputes, the worst of all species of litigation, the distressing effects of which have been fatally experienced in some of the Western States. But these are not the only advantages, great as they unquestionably are. The system lays the foundation of useful civil institutions, the benefit of which is not confined to the present generation, but will be transmitted to posterity.

Under the operation of the system thus briefly sketched, the progress of the settlement and population of the public domain of the United States has been altogether unexampled. Views which the committee will hereafter present conclusively demonstrate that, whilst the spirit of free emigration should not be checked or counteracted, it stands in no need of any fresh stimulus.

Before proceeding to perform the specific duty assigned to the committee by the Senate, they had thought it desirable to exhibit some general views of this great national resource. For that purpose, a call, through the Senate, for information, has been made upon the executive branch of the Government. A report has not yet been made; but, as the committee are desirous of avoiding any delay, not altogether indispensable, they have availed themselves of the report from a Secretary of the Treasury to the House of Representatives, under date the 6th April, 1832, hereto annexed, marked A, and of such other information as was accessible to them.

From that report, it appears that the aggregate of all sums of money which have been expended by the United States in the acquisition of the public lands, including interest on account of the purchases of Louisiana and Florida up to the 30th day of September, 1831, and including also expenses in their sale and management, is $48,077,551 40; and that the amount of money received at the Treasury for proceeds of the sales of the public lands to the 30th of September, 1831, is $37,272,713 31. The Government, therefore, has not been reimbursed by $10,804,838 90. According to the same report, it appears that the estimated amount of unsold lands, on which the foreign and Indian titles have been extinguished is 227,293,684 acres, within the limits of the new States and Territories; and that the Indian title remains on 113,577,869 acres within the same limits. That there have been granted to Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Alabama, for internal improvements, 2,187,665 acres; for colleges, academies, and universities, in the new States and Territories, the quantity of 508,009; for education, being the thirty-sixth part of the public lands appropriated for common schools, the amount of 7,952,588 acres; and for seats of Government in some of the new States and Territories, 21,539 acres. By a report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, communicated to Congress with the annual message of the President of the United States in December, 1827, the total quantity of the public lands, beyond the boundaries of the new States and Territories, was estimated to be 750,000,000. The aggregate, therefore, of all the unsold and unappropriated public lands of the United States, surveyed and unsurveyed, on which the Indian title remains or has been extinguished, lying within and without the boundaries of the new States and Territories, agreeably to the two reports now referred to, is 1,090,871,753 acres. There has been 138,983,224 acres surveyed, and the quantity only of 19,239,412 acres sold up to the 1st January, 1826. When the information called for shall be received, the subsequent surveys and sales up to the present period will be ascertained.

The committee are instructed by the Senate to inquire into the expediency of reducing the price of the public lands, and also of ceding them to the several States in which they are situated, on reasonable terms. The committee will proceed to examine these two subjects of inquiry distinctly, beginning first with that which relates to a reduction of price.

1. According to the existing mode of selling the public lands, they are first offered at public auction for what they will bring in a free and fair competition among the purchasers; when the public sales cease, the lands remaining unsold may be bought, from time to time, at the established rate of one dollar and a quarter per acre. The price was reduced to that sum in 1820, from $2 per acre, at which it had previously stood from the first establishment of the present system of selling public lands. A leading consideration with Congress, in the reduction of the price, was that of substituting cash sales for the credits which had been before allowed, and which, on many accounts, it was deemed expedient to abolish. A further reduction of the price, if called for by the public interests, must be required, either, 1st, Because the Government now demands more than a fair price for the public lands; or, 2dly, Because the existing price retards, injuriously, the settlement and population of the new States and Territories. These suggestions deserve separate and serious considerations.

I. The committee possess no means of determining the exact value of all the public lands now in market; nor is it material, at the present time, that the precise worth of each township or section should be accurately known. It is presumable that a considerable portion of the immense quantity offered to sale, or held by the United States, would not now command, and may not be intrinsically worth, the minimum price fixed by law; on the other hand, it is certain that a large part is worth more. If there could be a discrimination made, and the Government had any motive to hasten the sales beyond the regular demands of the population, it might be proper to establish different rates, according to the classes of land; but the Government, having no inducement to such acceleration, has hitherto proceeded on the liberal policy of establishing a moderate price, and by subdivisions of the sections, so as to accommodate the poorer citizens, has placed the acquisition of a home within the reach of every industrious man. For $100 any one may now purchase eighty, or for $50, forty acres of first-rate land, yielding, with proper cultivation, from fifty to eighty bushels of Indian corn per acre, or other equivalent crops.

There is no more satisfactory criterion of the fairness of the price of an article than that arising from the briskness of sales when it is offered in the market. On applying this rule, the conclusion would seem to be irresistible, that the established price is not too high. The amount of the sales in the year 1828, was $1,018,308 75; in 1829, $1,517,175 13; in 1830, $2,328,356 14; and, during the year 1831, $3,000,000. And the Secretary of the Treasury observes in his annual report, at the commencement of this session, that "the receipts from the public lands, during the present year, it will be perceived, have likewise exceeded the estimates, and indeed have gone beyond all former example. It is believed that, notwithstanding the large amount of scrip and forfeited land stock that may still be absorbed in payment for lands, yet, if the surveys now projected be completed, the receipts from this source of revenue will not fall greatly below those of the present year." And he estimates the receipts during the current year, from this source, at three millions of dollars. It is incredible to suppose that the amount of sales would have risen to so large a sum if the price had been unreasonably high. The committee are aware that the annual receipts may be expected to fluctuate, as fresh lands, in favorite districts, are brought into market, and according to the activity or sluggishness of emigration in different years.

Against any considerable reduction of the price of the public lands, unless it be necessary to a more rapid population of the new States, which will be hereafter examined, there are weighty, if not decisive considerations.

1. The Government is the proprietor of much the largest quantity of the unseated lands of the United States. What it has in market bears a large proportion to the whole of the occupied lands within their limits. If a considerable quantity of any article, land, or any commodity whatever, is in market, the price at which it is sold will affect, in some degree, the value of the whole of that article, whether exposed to sale or not. The influence of a reduction of the price of the public lands would probably be felt throughout the Union; certainly in all the Western States, and most in those which contain, or are nearest to, the public lands. There ought to be the most cogent and conclusive reasons for adopting a measure which might seriously impair the value of the property of the yeomanry of the country. Whilst it is decidedly the most important class in the community, most patient, patriotic, and acquiescent in whatever public policy is pursued, it is unable or unwilling to resort to those means of union and concert which other interests employ to make themselves heard and respected. Government should, therefore, feel itself constantly bound to guard, with sedulous care, the rights and welfare of the great body of our yeomanry. Would it be just towards those who have heretofore purchased public lands at higher prices, to say nothing as to the residue of the agricultural interest of the United States, to make such a reduction, and thereby impair the value of their property? Ought not any such plan of reduction, if adopted, to be accompanied with compensation for the injury which they would inevitably sustain?

2. A material reduction of price would excite and stimulate the spirit of speculation, now dormant, and probably lead to a transfer of vast quantities of the public domain from the control of Government to the hands of the speculator. At the existing price, and with such extensive districts as the public constantly offers in the market, there is no great temptation to speculation. The demand is regular, keeping pace with the progress of emigration, and is supplied on known and moderate terms. If the price were much reduced, the strongest incentives to engrossment of the better lands would be presented to large capitalists; and the emigrant, instead of being able to purchase from his own Government upon uniform and established conditions, might be compelled to give much higher and more fluctuating prices to the speculator. An illustration of this effect is afforded by the military bounty lands granted during the late war. Thrown into market at prices below the Government rate, they notoriously became an object of speculation, and have principally fallen into the hands of speculators, retarding the settlement of the districts which include them.

3. The greatest emigration that is believed now to take place from any of the States, is from Ohio, Kentucky, and Tennessee. The effects of a material reduction in the price of the public lands would be, 1st. To lessen the value of real estate in those three States. 2d. To diminish their interest in the public domain, as a common fund for the benefit of all the States. And, 3dly. To offer what would operate as a bounty to further emigration from those States, occasioning more and more lands situated within them to be thrown into the market, thereby not only lessening the value of their lands, but draining them both of their population and currency.

And, lastly, Congress has, within a few years, made large and liberal grants of the public lands to several States. To Ohio, 922,937 acres; to Indiana, 384,723 acres; to Illinois, 480,000 acres; and to Alabama, 400,000 acres; amounting together to 2,187,665 acres. Considerable portions of these lands yet remain unsold. The reduction of the price of the public lands, generally, would impair the value of those grants, as well as injuriously affect that of the lands which have been sold in virtue of them.

On the other hand, it is inferred and contended, from the large amount of public land remaining unsold, after having been so long exposed to sale, that the price at which it is held is too high. But this apparent tardiness is satisfactorily explained by the immense quantity of public lands which have been put into the market by Government. It is well known that the new States have constantly and urgently pressed the extinction of the Indian title upon lands within their respective limits, and, after its extinction, that they should be brought into market as rapidly as practicable. The liberal policy of the General Government, coinciding with the wishes of the new States, has prompted it to satisfy the wants of emigrants from every part of the Union, by exhibiting vast districts of land for sale in all the States and Territories, thus offering every variety of climate and situation to the free choice of settlers. From these causes, it has resulted that the power of emigration has been totally incompetent to absorb the immense bodies of waste lands offered in the market. For the capacity to purchase is, after all, limited by the emigration, and the progressive increase of population. If the quantity thrown into the market had been quadrupled, the probability is that there would not have been much more annually sold than actually has been. With such extensive fields for selection before them, purchasers, embarrassed as to the choice which they should make, are sometimes probably influenced by caprice or accidental causes. Whilst the better lands remain, those of secondary value will not be purchased. A judicious farmer or planter would sooner give one dollar and a quarter per acre for first-rate land, than receive as a donation land of inferior quality, if he were compelled to settle upon it.

It is also contended that the price of the public land is a tax; and that at a period when, in consequence of the payment of the public debt and the financial prosperity of the United States, the Government is enabled to dispense with revenue, that tax ought to be reduced, and the revenue arising from the sales be thereby diminished. In the first place, it is to be observed that if, as has been before stated, the reduction of the price of the public lands should stimulate speculation, the consequence would probably be, at least for some years, an augmentation of the revenue from that source. Should it have the effect of speculation supposed, it would probably also retard the settlement of the new States, by placing the lands engrossed by speculators, in anticipation of increased value, beyond the reach of emigrants. If it were true that the price demanded by Government operated as a tax, the question would still remain whether that price exceeded the fair value of the land which emigrants are in the habit of purchasing? and, if it did not, there would be no just ground for its reduction. And assuming it to be a tax, it might be proper to inquire who pays the tax? the new or the old States—the States that send out or the States that receive the emigrants? In the next place, regarded as a tax, those who have heretofore made purchases at the higher rate have already paid the tax, and are as much deserving the equitable consideration of the Government as those who might hereafter be disposed to purchase at the reduced rate. It is proper to add that, by the repeal and reduction contemplated of duties upon articles of foreign import, subsequent purchasers of the public lands, as far as they are consumers of those articles, will share in the general relief, and will consequently be enabled to apply more of their means to the purchase of land.

But in no reasonable sense can the sale of the public lands be considered as the imposition of a tax. The Government, in their disposal, acts as a trustee for the whole people of the United States, and, in that character, holds and offers them in the market. Those who want them buy them, because it is their inclination to buy them. There is no compulsion in the case. The purchase is perfectly voluntary, like that of any other article which is offered in the market. In making it, the purchaser looks exclusively to his own interest. The motive of augmenting the public revenue, or any other motive than that of his own advantage, never enters into his consideration. The Government, therefore, stands to the purchaser in the relation merely of the vender of a subject which the purchaser's own welfare prompts him to acquire; and, in this respect, does not vary from the relation which exists between any private vender of waste lands, and the purchaser from him. Nor does the use to which the Government may think proper to apply the proceeds of the sale of the public lands give the smallest strength to the idea that the purchase of them is tantamount to the payment of a tax. The Government may employ those proceeds as a part of its ordinary revenue, or it may apply them in any other manner, consistent with the constitution, which it deems proper. Revenue and taxation are not always relative terms. There may be revenue without taxation. There may be taxation without revenue. There may be sources of established revenue which not only do not imply, but which supersede, taxation. Is the consideration paid for land to a private individual to be deemed a tax, because that individual may happen to use it as a part of his income?

2. Is the reduction of the price of the public lands necessary to accelerate the settlement and population of the States within which they are situated? Those States are Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, Alabama, Mississippi, and Louisiana. If their growth has been unreasonably slow and tardy, we may conclude that some fresh impulse, such as that under consideration, is needed. Prior to the treaty of Greenville, concluded in 1795, there were but few settlements within the limits of the present State of Ohio. Principally since that period, that is, within a term of about forty years, that State, from a wilderness, the haunt of savages and wild beasts, has risen into a powerful Commonwealth, containing, at this time, a population of a million of souls, and holding the third or fourth rank among the largest States in the Union. During the greater part of that term, the minimum price of the public lands was two dollars per acre; and of the large quantity with which the settlement of that State commenced, there only remain to be sold 5,586,834 acres.

The aggregate population of the United States, exclusive of the Territories, increased, from the year 1820 to 1830, from 9,579,873 to 12,716,697. The rate of the increase, during the whole term of ten years, including a fraction, may be stated at thirty-three per cent. The principle of population is presumed to have full scope generally in all parts of the United States. Any State, therefore, which has exceeded or fallen short of that rate, may be fairly assumed to have gained or lost by emigration nearly to the extent of the excess or deficiency. From a table accompanying this report, (marked B,) the Senate will see presented various interesting views of the progress of population in the several States. In that table, it will be seen that each of eleven States exceeded, and each of thirteen fell short, of an increase at the average rate of thirty-three per cent. The greatest increase, during the term, was in the State of Illinois, where it was one hundred and eighty five per cent., or at the rate of, $18\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. per annum; and the least was in Delaware, where it was less than six per cent. The seven States embracing the public lands had a population, in 1820, of 1,207,165, and in 1830 2,238,802, exhibiting an average increase of 85 per cent. The seventeen States containing no part of the public lands had a population in 1820 of 8,372,707, and in 1830 of 10,477,895, presenting an average increase of only 25 per cent. The thirteen States, whose increase, according to the table, was below 33 per cent., contained in 1820 a population of 5,939,759, and in 1830 of 6,966,600, exhibiting an average increase of only seventeen per cent. The increase of the seven new States upon a capital which, at the commencement of the term, was 1,207,165, has been greater than that of the thirteen whose capital then was 5,939,759. In three of the eleven States, (Tennessee, Georgia, and Maine,) whose population exceeded the average increase of 33 per cent., there were public lands belonging to those States; and in the fourth, (New York,) the excess is probably attributable to the rapid growth of the city of New York, to waste lands in the western part of that State, and to the great development of its vast resources by means of extensive internal improvements.

These authentic views of the progress of population in the seven new States demonstrate that it is most rapid and gratifying; that it needs no such additional stimulus as a farther reduction in the price of the public lands; and that, by preserving and persevering in the established system for selling them, the day is near at hand when those States, now respectable, may become great and powerful members of the confederacy.

Complaints exist in the new States, that large bodies of lands in their respective territories, being owned by the General Government, are exempt from taxation to meet the ordinary expenses of the State Governments, and other local charges; that this exemption continues for five years after the sale of any particular tract; and that land being the principal source of the revenue of those States, an undue share of the burden of sustaining the expenses of the State Governments falls upon the resident population. To all these complaints it may be answered that, by voluntary compacts between the new States, respectively, and the General Government, five per cent. of the nett proceeds of all the sales of the public lands included within their limits are appropriated for internal improvements leading to or within those States; that a section of land in each township, or one thirty-sixth part of the whole of the public lands embraced within their respective boundaries, has been reserved for purposes of education; and that the policy of the General Government has been uniformly marked by great liberality towards the new States, in making various, and some very extensive, grants of the public lands for local purposes. But, in accordance with the same spirit of liberality, the committee would recommend an appropriation to each of the seven States referred to of a further sum of ten per cent. on the nett proceeds of the sales of that part of the public land which lies within it, for objects of internal improvement in their respective limits. The tendency of such an appropriation will be not only to benefit those States, but to enhance the value of the public lands remaining to be sold.

II. The committee have now to proceed to the other branch of the inquiry which they were required to make, that of the expediency of ceding the public lands to the several States in which they are situated, on reasonable terms. The inquiry comprehends, in its consequences, a cession of the whole public domain of the United States, whether lying within or beyond the limits of the present States and Territories. For, although in the terms of the inquiry, it is limited to the new States, cessions to them would certainly be followed by similar cessions to other new States, as they may, from time to time, be admitted into the Union. Three of the present Territories have nearly attained the requisite population entitling them to be received as members of the confederacy, and they shortly will be admitted. Congress could not consistently avoid ceding to them the public lands within their limits, after having made such cessions to the other States. The compact with the State of Ohio formed the model of compacts with all the other new States, as they were successively admitted.

Whether the question of a transfer of the public lands be considered in the limited or more extensive view of it which has been stated, it is one of the highest importance, and demanding the most deliberate consideration. From the statements, founded on official reports, made in the preceding part of this report, it has been seen that the quantity of unsold and unappropriated lands lying within the limits of the new States and Territories is 240,871,753 acres, and the quantity beyond those limits is 750,000,000, presenting an aggregate of 1,090,871,753 acres. It is difficult to conceive a question of greater magnitude than that of relinquishing this immense amount of national property. Estimating its value according to the minimum price, it presents the enormous sum of 1,363,589,691 dollars. If it be said that a large portion of it will never command that price, it is to be observed, on the other hand, that, as fresh lands are brought into market and exposed to sale at public auction, many of them sell at prices exceeding one dollar and a quarter per acre. Supposing the public lands to be worth, on the average, one half of the minimum price, they would still present the immense sum of 681,794,845 dollars. The least favorable view which can be taken of them, is that of considering them a capital yielding, at present, an income of three millions of dollars annually. Assuming the ordinary rate of six per cent. interest per annum as the standard to ascertain the amount of that capital, it would be fifty millions of dollars. But this income has been progressively increasing. The average increase during the six last years has been at the rate of twenty-three per cent. per annum. Supposing it to continue in the same ratio, at the end of a little more than four years the income would be double, and make the capital 100,000,000 dollars. Whilst the population of the United States increase only three per cent. per annum, the increase of the demand for the public lands is at the rate of twenty-three per cent., furnishing another evidence that the progress of emigration, and the activity of sales, have not been checked by the price demanded by Government.

In whatever light, therefore, this great subject is viewed, the transfer of the public lands from the whole people of the United States, for whose benefit they are now held, to the people inhabiting the new States, must be regarded as the most momentous measure ever presented to the consideration of Congress. If such a measure could find any justification, it must arise out of some radical and incurable defect in the construction of the General Government properly to administer the public domain. But the existence of any such defect is contradicted by the most successful experience. No branch of the public service has evinced more system, uniformity, and wisdom, or given more general satisfaction, than that of the administration of the public lands.

If the proposed cession to the new States were to be made at a fair price, such as the General Government could obtain from individual purchasers under the present system, there would be no motive for it unless the new States are more competent to dispose of the public lands than the common Government. They are now sold under one uniform plan, regulated and controlled by a single legislative authority, and the practical operation is perfectly understood. If they were transferred to the new States, the subsequent disposition would be according to laws emanating from various legislative sources. Competition would probably arise between the new States in the terms which they would offer to purchasers. Each State would be desirous of inviting the greatest number of emigrants, not only for the laudable purpose of populating rapidly its own territories, but with the view to the acquisition of funds to enable it to fulfil its engagements to the General Government. Collisions between the States would probably arise, and their injurious consequences may be imagined. A spirit of hazardous speculation would be engendered. Various schemes in the new States would be put afloat to sell or divide the public lands. Companies and combinations would be formed in this country, if not in foreign countries, presenting gigantic and tempting, but delusive projects; and the history of legislation, in some of the States of the Union, admonishes us that a too ready ear is sometimes given by a majority in a legislative assembly to such projects.

A decisive objection to such a transfer for a fair equivalent, is, that it would establish a new and dangerous relation between the General Government and the new States. In abolishing the credit which had been allowed to purchasers of the public lands prior to the year 1820, Congress was principally governed by the consideration of the expediency and hazard of accumulating a large amount of debt in the new States, all bordering on each other. Such an accumulation was deemed unwise and unsafe. It presented a new bond of interest, of sympathy, and of union, partially operating to the possible prejudice of the common bond of the whole Union. But that debt was a debt due from individuals, and it was attended with this encouraging security, that purchasers, as they successively completed the payments for their lands, would naturally be disposed to aid the Government in enforcing payment from delinquents. The project which the committee are now considering, is, to sell to the States, in their sovereign character, and, consequently, to render them public debtors to the General Government to an immense amount. This would inevitably create between the debtor States a common feeling, and a common interest, distinct from the rest of the Union. Those States are all in the Western and Southwestern quarter of the Union, remotest from the centre of federal power. The debt would be felt as a load from which they would constantly be desirous to relieve themselves; and it would operate as a strong temptation, weakening, if not dangerous, to the existing confederacy. The committee have the most animating hopes and the greatest confidence in the strength and power and durability of our happy Union; and the attachment and warm affection of every member of the confederacy cannot be doubted: but we have authority, higher than human, for the instruction, that it is wise to avoid all temptation.

In the State of Illinois, with a population, at the last census, of 157,445, there are 31,395,669 acres of public land, including that part on which the Indian title remains to be extinguished. If we suppose it to be worth only half the minimum price, it would amount to $19,622,480. How would that State be able to pay such an enormous debt? How could it pay even the annual interest upon it?

Supposing the debtor States to fail to comply with their engagements, in what mode could they be enforced by the General Government? In treaties between independent nations, the ultimate remedy is well known. The apprehension of an appeal to that remedy, seconding the sense of justice, and the regard for character which prevail among Christian and civilized nations, constitutes, generally, adequate security for the performance of national compacts. But this last remedy would be totally inadmissible in case of delinquency on the part of the debtor States. The relations between the General Government and the members of the confederacy are happily those of peace, friendship, and fraternity, and exclude all idea of force and war. Could the Judiciary coerce the debtor States? On what could their process operate? Could the property of innocent citizens, residing within the limits of those States, be justly seized by the General Government, and held responsible for debts contracted by the States themselves in their sovereign character? If a mortgage upon the lands ceded were retained, that mortgage would prevent or retard subsequent sales by the States; and if individuals bought, subject to the encumbrance, a parental Government could never resort to the painful measure of disturbing them in their possessions.

Delinquency on the part of the debtor States would be inevitable, and there would be no effectual remedy for the delinquency. They would come again and again to Congress, soliciting time and indulgence, until, finding the weight of the debt intolerable, Congress, wearied by reiterated applications for relief, would finally resolve to sponge the debt; or, if Congress attempted to enforce its payment, another and a worse alternative would be embraced.

If the proposed cession be made for a price merely nominal, it would be contrary to the express conditions of the original cessions from primitive States to Congress, and contrary to the obligations which the General Government stands under to the whole people of these United States, arising out of the fact that the acquisitions of Louisiana and Florida, and from Georgia, were obtained at a great expense, borne from the common treasure, and incurred for the common benefit. Such a gratuitous cession could not be made without a positive violation of a solemn trust, and without manifest injustice to the old States. And its inequality among the new States would be as marked as its injustice to the old would be indefensible. Thus, Missouri, with a population of 146,455, would acquire 38,292,151 acres; and the State of Ohio, with a population of 935,884, would obtain only 5,586,834 acres. Supposing a division of the land among the citizens of those two States, respectively, the citizen of Ohio would obtain less than six acres for his share, and the citizen of Missouri upwards of two hundred and seventy-two acres as his proportion.

Upon full and thorough consideration, the committee have come to the conclusion that it is inexpedient either to reduce the price of the public lands, or to cede them to the new States. They believe, on the contrary, that sound policy coincides with the duty which has devolved on the General Government to the whole of the States, and the whole of the people of the Union, and enjoins the preservation of the existing system, as having been tried and approved after long and triumphant experience. But, in consequence of the extraordinary financial prosperity which the United States enjoy, the question merits examination, whether, whilst the General Government steadily retains the control of this great national resource in its own hands, after the payment of the public debt, the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, no longer needed to meet the ordinary expenses of Government, may not be beneficially appropriated to some other objects for a limited time.

Governments, no more than individuals, should be seduced or intoxicated by prosperity, however flattering or great it may be. The country now happily enjoys it in a most unexampled degree. We have abundant reason to be grateful for the blessings of peace and plenty, and freedom from debt. But we must be forgetful of all history and experience if we indulge the delusive hope that we shall always be exempt from calamity and reverses. Seasons of national adversity, of suffering, and of war, will assuredly come. A wise Government should expect and provide for them. Instead of wasting or squandering its resources in a period of general prosperity, it should husband and cherish them for those times of trial and difficulty which, in the dispensations of Providence, may be certainly anticipated. Entertaining these views, and, as the proceeds of the sales of the public lands are not wanted for ordinary revenue, which will be abundantly supplied from the imposts, the committee respectfully recommend that an appropriation of them be made to some other purpose, for a limited time, subject to be resumed in the contingency of war. Should such an event unfortunately occur, the fund may be withdrawn from its peaceful destination, and applied, in aid of other means, to the vigorous prosecution of the war, and, afterwards, to the payment of any debt which may be contracted in consequence of its existence. And, when peace shall be again restored, and the debt of the new war shall have been extinguished, the fund may be again appropriated to some fit object other than that of the ordinary expenses of Government. Thus may this great resource be preserved, and rendered subservient, in peace and in war, to the common benefit of all the States composing the Union.

The inquiry remains, what ought to be the specific application of the fund under the restriction stated? After deducting the ten per cent. proposed to be set apart for the new States, a portion of the committee would have preferred that the residue should be applied to the objects of internal improvement, and colonization of the free blacks, under the direction of the General Government. But a majority of the committee believes it better, as an alternative for the scheme of cession to the new States, and as being most likely to give general satisfaction, that the residue be divided among the twenty-four States, according to their federal representative population, to be applied to education, internal improvement, or colonization, or to the redemption of any existing debt contracted for internal improvements, as each State, judging for itself, shall deem most conformable with its own interests and policy. Assuming the annual product of the sales of the public lands to be three millions of dollars, the table hereto annexed, marked C, shows what each State would be entitled to receive, according to the principle of division which has been stated. In order that the propriety of the proposed appropriation should again, at a day not very far distant, be brought under the review of Congress, the committee would recommend that it be limited to a period of five years, subject to the condition of war not breaking out in the mean time. By an appropriation so restricted as to time, each State will be enabled to estimate the probable extent of its proportion, and to adapt its measures of education, improvement, or colonization, or extinction of existing debt, accordingly.

In conformity with the views and principles which the committee have now submitted, they beg leave to report the accompanying bill, entitled "An act to appropriate, for a limited time, the proceeds of the sales of the public lands of the United States."

A.

Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting reports as to the quantity of public lands unsold; the quantity granted for internal improvements, education, and to charitable institutions; the amount paid for title to public lands; the expenses incurred in the sale of the public lands, and in settling titles of claimants, and the amount received for lands sold.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,

April 6, 1832.

SIR: In compliance with the two resolutions of the House of Representatives, passed on the 25th of January last, in the following terms:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to furnish this House with a statement showing the quantity, in acres, of public land unsold at the time of the last quarterly return of sales, and within the limits of the several States and organized Territories, distinguishing that part to which the Indian title had been extinguished; also the number of acres which have been appropriated for internal improvements, education, or charitable institutions, showing, under separate heads, the quantity of land unsold in each State and Territory, and to what States and Territories, or bodies politic, grants of land have been made, and the quantity to each.

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury inform this House what amount of money has been paid by the United States for the title to the public lands, including the payments made under the Louisiana and Florida treaties, the compact with Georgia; the settlement with the Yazoo claimants; the contracts with the several Indian tribes, and the expenditures for compensation to commissioners, clerks, surveyors, and other officers employed by the United States for the management and sale of the Western domain; also, the gross amount of money received at the public Treasury as the proceeds of sales of public lands, and the sum still due from supposed solvent purchasers;”

I have the honor to transmit a statement from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, marked (a,) containing the information required by the first resolution; and a statement from the Register, marked (b,) containing that required by the second resolution.

In answer to the inquiry respecting “the sum still due from supposed solvent purchasers,” I have to remark, that, agreeably to law, all lands which had been further credited under the relief laws passed in the years 1821, 1822, and 1823, and which were not paid for on the 4th July, 1829, have reverted to the United States, and the moneys paid thereon are declared to be forfeited. There is, therefore, at the present time, no debt due from purchasers of public lands.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully,

Your obedient servant,

LOUIS McLANE,
Secretary of the Treasury.

To the honorable the SPEAKER of the House of Representatives of the United States.

	9,579,873	12,716,597			32.74	3,136,724

Population of the 24 States in 1820 - 9,579,873
Do do in 1830 - 12,716,597

Actual increase - 3,136,724

Rate of increase - 32.74

Of the 11 States whose ratio of increase is greater in the annexed table than 32.74, the aggregate population was in 1820 - 3,640,114
Do do in 1830 - 5,749,997

Actual increase - 2,109,883

Ratio of increase - 57.96

Of these 11 States, the 7 containing the public domain had a population, in 1820, of - 1,207,165
Do do in 1830 - 2,238,702

Actual increase - 1,031,537

Ratio of increase - 85.43

The remaining 4 of the 11, viz: Tennessee, Georgia, New York, and Maine, had a population, in 1820, of - 2,432,949
Do do in 1830 - 3,511,295

Actual increase - 1,078,346

Ratio of increase - 44.32

The 17 States having none of the public lands had a population, in 1820, of - 8,372,707
Do do in 1830, of - 10,477,895

Actual increase - 2,105,188

Rate of increase - 25.14

The 13 States whose increase according to the annexed table is below 32.74 had a population, in 1820, of - 5,939,759
Do do in 1830 - 6,966,600

Actual increase - 1,026,841

Rate of increase - 17.28

In 1820, the population of the seven States containing the public lands, viz: Illinois, Alabama, Indiana, Missouri, Mississippi, Ohio, and Louisiana, bore to the whole population of the United States the proportion of 1 to 7.95, or about 1-8. In 1830, it was at 1 to 5.23, a little less than 1-5.

In 1820, the population of the same seven States was to the population of the remaining 17 States as 1 to 6.94, or about 1-7. In 1830, it was as one to 4.68, more than 1-6, and nearly 3-10.

In 1820, the population of the same seven States was to that of the remaining four of the 11 whose increase is above the common ratio, viz: Tennessee, Georgia, New York, and Maine, as 1 to 2.015, or something less than 1-2. In 1830, it was as 1 to 1.55, or about 2-3.

In 1820, the population of the same seven States was to that of the 13 States whose increase is below the common ratio, as 1 to 4.92, or about 1-5. In 1830, it was 1 to 3.11, or about 1-3.

In 1820, the population of the seven land States was about 1-8 of the population of all the States. Their increase in 10 years is to the whole increase as 1 to 3.04, or about 1-3.

In 1820, the population of these seven States was equal to about 1-7 of that of the other 17 States. The increase of the former in 10 years is to that of the latter as 1 to 2.04 or about 1-2.

In 1820, the population of these seven States equalled about 2-3 of that of the four other States whose increase is above the common ratio, viz: Tennessee, Georgia, New York, and Maine. The increase of the former in 10 years is to that of the latter as 1 to 1.04, or very nearly equal.

In 1820, the population of these seven States was about 1-5 of that of the 13 States whose increase is below the common ratio. The increase of these former in 10 years is to that of the latter as 1 to 0.995, a little more than equal.

GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
January 28, 1836.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of 23d inst. propounding various inquiries as to the practical operation of the pre-emption laws: whether any frauds have been practised upon the Government under the color of those laws, and, if so, of what nature, and to what extent; whether, in my opinion, it is practicable to guard against their repetition, if those laws continue in force, &c.; and have to state that, in the midst of my accumulated duties, I cannot probably better answer those inquiries than by transmitting the enclosed copy of a letter of this date to the Secretary of the Treasury, on a call from the Committee on Public Lands in the House of Representatives.

As all the documents which it is intended to send with that report cannot be copied to-day, I have concluded to send the enclosed without delay, and the copies hereafter.

With great respect, your obedient servant,

ETHAN A. BROWN.

Commissioner.

Hon. THOMAS EWING,
Chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, Senate.

GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
January 28, 1836.

SIR: You have been pleased to refer to me a letter from the Hon. A. G. Harrison, accompanied by a resolution of the Committee on Public Lands; the letter advising you that a bill granting pre-emption to actual settlers, then before the committee, had been drawn with an eye particularly directed to the frauds alleged to have been committed, and expressing that the great desire of the committee to adopt such provisions as will prevent the future possibility of such frauds, had led to the communication, believing that you may have it in your power to give additional light on the subject. The resolution of the committee aforesaid being in these words: "Resolved, That the resolution of the House, instructing the committee to inquire into the expediency of modifying the different acts of Congress granting pre-emption rights to settlers on the public lands, so as to protect the rights of settlers and prevent frauds against the United States," "be referred to the Secretary of the Treasury, and that he be requested to furnish the committee with the best plan which occurs to him, of securing the right of pre-emption to actual settlers and of preventing said frauds." I have attentively considered the said letter and resolution, and have the honor to report:

"The Committee on Public Lands apply to you, sir, for all the information in your department concerning the alleged frauds."

Most of the knowledge possessed by the General Land Office concerning frauds practised in relation to pre-emptions, of which I am now able to speak, consists of uncontradicted general reports, in general currency and credit; of oral communications to me, and letters to me and others, from persons in high standing; most of the writers either requesting that their names may not be published, or not giving authority for such publication. The terms of these communications are rarely sufficiently specific and tangible to fix particular instances, except in the cases of interested correspondents, some of whose representations have been verified, others not; while want of time and opportunity have delayed an investigation of the greater part of this last class.

The requisition of the committee, above mentioned, is sufficiently comprehensive in terms to include every case and its circumstances, as well as the general representations that have reached this office. I must take the liberty to observe that a literal compliance with the requisition cannot be speedily yielded. It would render the report very voluminous, and require to search the files of an immense correspondence, and the investigation of many tens of thousands of pre-emption cases reported, which we have not yet been able to take up for examination. To particularize every exceptionable case, even of those that have attracted attention since the act of 1834 has been in operation, would require more time in the revision and narration than would seem to comport with the desire of the committee to act soon upon the bill alluded to by Mr. Harrison; and, therefore, with your permission, I will confine myself, on this occasion, to the imputations currently believed, and general heads of impositions attempted and practised, which have been detected in some of the contested cases examined, or which common fame has represented as having been but too common in some quarters; and without comment on the conspicuous cases of the military reservations at Chicago, and the missionary stations in Mississippi, I proceed to remark that the loudest and most numerous complaints, arising from the pre-emption policy, that have reached the General Land Office, have been against the alleged abuse of the privilege commonly called floating claims. Some who claim to be bonafide cultivators and occupiers under the act of 1834, complain of being vexed and disturbed by these "floats." A more numerous class, not comprised in the provisions of the act, are said not to be the less clamorous, because the floats have been lawfully located on their chosen spots; but chiefly the virtuous and patriotic citizens of Louisiana have been disgusted and alarmed by the extent to which fraud and perjury is asserted to have been carried in the manufacture of such claims within that interesting State, threatening to cover a large portion of the most valuable lands that have been surveyed. These representations are made by individuals in highly respectable standing, besides our own officers. And it is said, on creditable authority, that preparations appear to be making, in hopes of a pre-emption act at this session of Congress, to acquire by such means, at minimum cost, a great part of the precious lands on Red river. No particular instance of these practices has been indicated to me, but the opinion is prevalent that they are transacted. It is believed that the number of bonafide pre-emptions in Louisiana is comparatively small, as information derived from persons distinguished by public confidence in that State represents a belief that a claim to pre-emption was not often heard of on the island of New Orleans, nor west of the Mississippi, before this multiplication of "floats" was devised to be laid on the finest vacant land.

This iniquitous scheme appears to be of late date in that region, as the first intelligence of it seems to have been communicated to the General Land Office some time after it was placed in my charge. Agreeably to your direction, sir, circumspection and vigilance were recommended to the land officers in Louisiana, in order to guard against imposition; and I ventured to direct the surveyor general to retain the plats in his hands which were destined for the land offices, until further orders. Other steps have recently been taken at this office, to put in train a rigorous scrutiny into the legitimacy of the floating pretensions in that State. Letters and copies of letters on this subject, Nos. — to —, are herewith transmitted. Contrivances have been brought to light in other places, showing where a family occupying the same tenement, where father and son, and mother and son, dwelling together, have set up the pretence of separate cultivation and occupancy, to divide a quarter section, and obtain a float for each half.

Claimants of another reprehensible description are they whose pretensions are founded on depositions in general terms, or wearing the appearance of being artfully worded, admitting a subterfuge in the attempt to give a legal coloring to their proceedings, by construing the statute to suit their purposes. The law, as its title imports, is in favor of settlers; but pretensions have been set up by persons dwelling in town with their families, and there following mercantile or other pursuits, while they caused a little show of improvement, that scarce deserved the name, to be made for them by others; no proof being produced of their personal superintendence or direction on the spot. Cultivation by slaves or hirelings in 1833, and one or the other, or a growing crop on the place on the following 19th of June, have been assumed as fulfilling the required conditions.

Among the pretences to cultivation, there have been disclosures, as follows, viz: where the cutting and burning a small patch of cane; where an enclosure, not entitled to be called a fence, around a space only large enough for a very small garden, and the planting a few culinary vegetables; and where scattering an undefined quantity of turnip or grass seeds; and, in one case, planting a few turnips or onions, have been claimed as cultivation, to meet this condition. Further remarks upon constructive possession may be dispensed with.

The registers and receivers are made judges of the credibility and sufficiency of the proofs, except in contested cases, which are required to be sent to the Commissioner for decision.

My predecessor ordered the evidence in every case to be forwarded; but, during near five months of my superintendence, it has been quite impossible to scrutinize the proof in about sixteen hundred of the former class, without neglecting duties that appeared more pressing and imperative. In those examined, contradictions, prevarications, and other circumstances, have occasionally placed parties and witnesses in no favorable point of view.

In the contested class, the land officers must be presumed, prima facie, to have acted correctly. If honest, they would not knowingly pass a fraudulent claim; if conniving, they will hardly be expected to expose themselves voluntarily. The necessary quantum of evidence can hardly be prescribed, the same proof being more or less convincing to the different persons.

The bill mentioned by Mr. Harrison as having for subject the granting of pre-emptions to actual settlers, and to prevent the future possibility of such frauds as are alleged to have been committed, forms no part of your reference, and it would, perhaps, be improper to allude to it in this place, if the letter did not seem to indicate an intention on the part of the writer, and of the committee to which he belongs, to extend the grants of pre-emption to others than those who come within the provisions of the act of 1834. Believing such a disposition to be implied, and that a new law to that effect will go far to form the pre-emption policy into a durable system, involving considerations of great importance to the Treasury, and materially affecting the land establishment under my particular charge, I hope it will not be considered officious or impertinent to submit a few remarks, though not expressly called for, upon the hypothesis that such an extension of the pre-emption privilege is contemplated.

The pre-emption laws originated and bestowed rights, but recognised none in the settlers as previously existing. I conceive they have no other rights in this respect than what the law confers; and that the pre-emption privilege may be considered little else than a mere benevolence, enabling the adventurer to appropriate to himself the choicest lands, most valuable mill seats, and localities for towns, at a vast cost to the public; or, in other words, preventing the receipt of vast sums into the Treasury. It is confidently believed that these privileges, covering at least four millions of acres of land, joined with outrageous combinations to intimidate purchasers, and other unjustifiable confederacies, have diminished the receipt for public lands, in the year 1835, full three millions of dollars, at a moderate estimate, below what they would have brought in fair competition. If frauds in pre-emptions were unknown, if no one obtained a pre-emption but upon a faithful compliance with the conditions prescribed, still, the selections of the most valuable lands and most desirable situations, at the minimum price, would produce an effect upon the revenue too considerable to be overlooked by the financier. I should step out of my province as Commissioner, by arguing, officially, the questions, whether other considerations of public policy counterbalance this cost, or whether the settlers have extraordinary merits transcending this calculation, and accordingly abstain from the discussion.

If the propriety were conceded of making the pre-emption policy a part of our land system, there would be still no evident fitness in extending the concession to a full quarter section of land. An allowance of half that quantity of the very best land is surely munificent; and if presumed poverty be one of the considerations for the grant, it may be observed that many a good farm in the West contains no more than an eighth of a section.

"The committee request you, sir, to furnish them with the best plan which occurs to you, of securing the right of pre-emption to actual settlers, and of preventing said frauds, viz: against the United States."

In relation to the first branch of this request, I have to observe, that the act of 1834, and the precautions already taken by the Commissioner, with the advice and approbation of the Secretary of the Treasury, appear to have provided sufficiently for the fair claimants under the present law.

The resolution is silent respecting the nature and extent of any future grants of this kind that may be contemplated, and the difficulty of devising a plan for their protection, under such circumstances, must be apparent.

The second part of the request presents a difficulty extraordinary. The temptation to abuse the charity of the Legislature is so radically intermixed, and so inextricably interwoven with the operation of the pre-emption laws, that I should despair of laying before you a plan altogether effectual for the prevention of fraud on the part of claimants. It seems to me a hopeless task to project any modification of existing enactments, that shall silence perjury and defeat the devices of sagacious speculators, so long as their ingenuity shall be sharpened and stimulated by the prospect of an immense gain attending their success. The conscientious will resort to no dishonest tricks; but the contagion of speculation is proverbial; and when an expectation may be entertained of obtaining, by indirection, for the lowest price, land worth from five to forty dollars per acre in the market, the inducement to perjury and fraudulent shifts will be too strong to be resisted by many of weaker morality. A scheme of extreme liberality towards the settlers might diminish the number of fraudulent cases, by partially removing the motive to such practices; but I do not imagine any project to defeat them altogether, so long as there remain legal restrictions upon the invasion of the public property by unlicensed intruders, who, by a statute unrepealed, are considered as trespassers, liable to be prosecuted as such, and to be forcibly removed, at the discretion of the President, as has heretofore been done. It will be seen, in the preceding remarks, that protection of the rights bestowed by the pre-emption act of 1834, is considered to be well provided for by that act, and by the liberal construction it has received, in instructions that have emanated under your sanction; and that similar provisions will suffice for similar cases in future concessions of the pre-emption privilege.

The practices by which the United States have been most defrauded in claims of this nature, are believed to consist, principally, of the misstatements or improper coloring of facts, and the evasions and prevarications of parties and witnesses. To obviate such iniquitous proceedings, it will be proper to provide a mode of subjecting the deponents to the test of a rigorous interrogation and cross-examination. I ask leave, however, to suggest that the interest of the Treasury seems to demand a guard against force as well as fraud. I allude to that system of terror that threatens the competitor for the purchase of public land with the vengeance of the settler with whose usurpation he may interfere.

In some quarters, this state of things is become formidable; probably finding its origin, in a great measure, in the pre-emption laws, whose repeated enactment may have led the settlers to the erroneous persuasion that they have acquired rights not given by law. Be this as it may, experience has shown that, by mutual support and open menace, they have succeeded in deterring others from bidding against them at the public sales; and it is evident that the prospect for the future is not less threatening. The injurious effect of the continuance of such acts upon the Treasury will be obvious to you.

Respectfully submitted.

E. A. BROWN, Commissioner.

Estimated quantity of land within the limits of the United States, west of the Mississippi river, and west of the organized limits of States and Territories—715,000,000 acres.

A. This quantity includes the lands sold at New York and Pittsburgh, and the special sales to John Cleves Symmes and the Ohio Company, prior to the organization of the district land offices.

B. The lands ceded to the United States by the Chickasaw Indians, lying within the limits of the States of Mississippi and Alabama, by the treaty of 1832, and estimated to contain 6,422,400 acres, are not included in the lands "surveyed and offered for sale" in those States.

JUNE 15, 1836.

Mr. Walker made the following report:

The Select Committee on the subject of graduating and reducing the price of the public lands to actual settlers, made the following report:

Our committee have given the subject referred to them that attention to which it is so justly entitled, and report a bill embracing, with some modifications, most of the principles contained in the act submitted for their consideration. They have adopted the principle that the public lands should be held as a sacred reserve for the cultivators of the soil; that monopolies, by individuals or companies, should be prevented; that sales should be made only in limited quantities to actual settlers, and the price in their favor reduced and graduated.

We also propose that the new States should be placed upon an equal footing in relation to grants of the public domain, and, consequently, that the same quantity of land granted to Ohio by the General Government should be ceded to all the other new States of the Union, and to each of the Territories, upon their admission, as States of the Union.

The sale of the public lands in limited quantities to actual settlers only, was proposed by the President of the United States in his annual message to Congress of December, 1832. In that message the President recommended that the public lands, at moderate prices, "should be sold to settlers in limited parcels." A sale for settlement only, and not for speculation, is certainly most conformable to the great purposes for which these lands were ceded to the General Government.

The great object for which Virginia ceded the Northwestern territory is, as declared by her act of cession, that the territory so ceded "should be laid out and formed into States, containing a suitable extent of territory, not less than 100 nor more than 150 miles square, or as near thereto as circumstances would admit; and that the States so formed should be distinct republican States, and admitted members of the Federal Union, having the same rights of sovereignty, freedom, and independence, as the other States." The same language, substantially, will be found in the other acts of cession of the public domain. States can only be formed by the settlement of a country. The settlement, then, of this territory, was the primary object of those who made as well as those who accepted the cession. A sale to settlers only, is then most in consonance with the spirit of the compacts by which these lands were acquired. It never was contemplated that the settlement of this territory should be arrested by the transfer of the soil from the Government to wealthy monopolists. Sales were intended for settlement, and not for speculation. Until within a few years past the sales were made almost exclusively for settlement; but now, the reverse is the fact. The sales within the last year have amounted to nearly thirteen millions of acres, being almost three times the amount sold in any preceding year. Eight millions of acres of these sales have probably been made for speculation, and not for settlement. This spirit of speculation in the public lands is increasing with alarming rapidity. Companies are forming in all directions to monopolize the ownership of the public domain, and thus be enabled to arrest the settlement and regulate the prosperity of the new States and Territories of the Union. A total and complete monopoly of the public lands by speculators is now contemplated, and the consequent withdrawal from the Government of all its power over this subject. This system will be deeply injurious to the interest of the old as well as of the new States. Vast sums will be taken from investment in the channels of productive industry in the old States, and invested in purchases of uncultivated lands. It is a bounty offered by Government for the annual withdrawal of capital from the useful pursuits of productive industry, for investment in waste lands, producing nothing, and, consequently, adding nothing to the general prosperity of the country. Agriculture, commerce, and manufactures, are all injuriously affected by this process. For a great period of time the moneys thus invested might as well be sunk in the ocean. Agriculture is not benefited, for settlement is retarded and not advanced by this system. Commerce and manufactures are injured by the annual sinking of so much of the active capital of the country. The vast sums thus invested during the present year have certainly greatly contributed to create the existing embarrassments; and as the evil progresses, the embarrassments will be increased and aggravated. It is then the interest of the old as well as the new States to arrest this annual investment of millions in unproductive pursuits. Were it arrested, these millions of dead capital would be adding yearly to the commerce, agriculture, and manufactures, of the whole country. When money is invested, even from the old States, in lands for settlement and cultivation only, in the new States, the annual products of the soil increase the wealth and prosperity of the whole country, and soon give back to the old States, through the channels of trade and business, more than the amount of the purchase-money of the land. But, if the citizens of a nation appropriate millions annually in the purchase of property yielding no income, the result is a great national loss. It is, then, the interest of the whole Union that these monopolies of the public lands should be arrested, and that capital should continually flow in the various channels of productive industry. If, among other causes, the existing embarrassments are now greatly attributable to the speculating investment of millions, during the past year, in wild lands, what will be the result if the system is permitted to continue for a series of years unabated? It is easy to foresee that the necessary consequence will be increasing distress and embarrassment, or at least a diminution of the national prosperity.

Your committee, then, present a bill, which will at once arrest the progress of this evil. To effect this great object, they propose, in the first place, to break up the system of sales of the public land at public auction, which, upon the aggregate of the sales of the last year, has produced but two cents and a small fraction per acre above the minimum price. Secondly, where two or more applications are made by different persons at the same time, for the same section of land, the preference in the purchase or entry shall be given to the first occupant, and when the tract has never been occupied by any of the applicants, then to the most aged of them. Thirdly, that no entry shall, in any case, be made by any one person, under the provisions of this act, for an amount exceeding one section of land. Fourthly, that no purchase or entry shall be made, in any case, without a previous affidavit by the applicant, that the land is designed to be entered for the use of the applicant only, and for the purpose of settlement and cultivation. Fifthly, that no patent shall, in any case, issue until three years after the purchase or entry, and proof on oath by at least two credible witnesses, before the register and receiver of the proper land district, of three years' continued occupancy and cultivation subsequent to the date of the entry, accompanied also by the affidavit of the applicant to the same facts. Sixthly, that any sale, contract for sale, lease, or contract for lease, prior to the emanation of the patent, shall be utterly null and void, and operate as a forfeiture of the purchase-money and title to the United States. Seventhly, that a failure to commence the occupancy of the land entered under the provisions of this law, within four months after the date of the entry, by the person who shall have made such entry, shall operate as a forfeiture of the title and purchase-money to the United States; and an abandonment of the occupancy by such person, within three years after the commencement thereof, shall operate a like forfeiture of the money and title to the United States. Eighthly, that no second purchase from the Government, or entry, shall be permitted, by any one who shall enter a section upon the terms and under the provisions of this law. Ninthly, that any one who is, at the date of this act, actually occupying and cultivating a tract of land, of which such person was the proprietor prior to the passage of this law, is permitted to purchase from the Government or enter any unoccupied adjoining tract, not exceeding one section, upon affidavit that the purchase or entry is made for the purpose of enlarging his or her farm, and not for speculation, and that no patent shall issue for such tract until the expiration of three years from the date of the purchase or entry, and that any sale, contract for sale, lease, or contract for lease, prior to the emanation of the patent, shall be utterly null and void, and operate as a forfeiture of the title and purchase-money to the United States. Tenthly, that any one swearing falsely, to obtain for him or herself, or for any other person, the benefit of the provisions of this act, shall be liable to all the pains and penalties of perjury; and that any person procuring another to swear falsely, to obtain for any one the benefits of this act, shall be guilty of subornation of perjury.

Some of these requisitions may be considered somewhat rigid, but they are not more so than may be necessary to introduce a system which, in its practical operations, will wholly prevent any future entries of the public domain for the purposes of speculation. Were this evil only diminished, much good would be effected. But your committee feel confident that the bill proposed by them will entirely suppress speculation in the public lands. Speculations would become impracticable after the adoption of this system, for the following reasons:

First. The speculator must be guilty of subornation of perjury, in procuring the settler to swear falsely, that he enters the land for settlement and cultivation by himself, when in fact he enters it to sell to another.

Secondly. The actual settler would be required to commit perjury, in taking the oath by which he enters the land.

Thirdly. The speculator must incur the hazard of punishment for subornation of perjury.

Fourthly. The settler would incur the hazard of punishment for the crime of perjury.

Fifthly. No speculator would furnish the money to enter the land on a contract of sale by the settler, because such contract would not only be null and void, but operate as a forfeiture of the title and purchase-money to the United States. No capitalist, therefore, would incur the hazard as well as guilt of such an arrangement.

Sixthly. No settler under this law would consent to be made the guilty instrument of an entry for speculation. It is against his interest, for, by consenting to make this entry for another, he forever forfeits the valuable privilege of making another entry for himself. Three years' continuous actual settlement and cultivation must precede the emanation of the patent and right to sell. Consequently, if the entry were made for the use of a speculator, he must have paid the settler, first, for incurring the guilt and hazard of perjury; secondly, for forfeiting the valuable privilege of ever entering a tract for himself; and, thirdly, for the loss of three years' time in occupying the land of another; and then the capitalist must have himself incurred the guilt and hazard of subornation of perjury, and the risk of losing his money and land by an entry in fraud of the law.

Seventhly. As the new States would be deeply interested in arresting the system of speculation and monopoly, the provisions of this law being in consonance with public opinion and public interest, would be rigidly and faithfully executed. No capitalist would dare attempt to procure a single entry for speculation in violation of this law, much less would he dream of the practicability of entering millions of acres every year by the employment of thousands of settlers. The expense, as well as the guilt and hazard, would be too enormous. An entry for speculation under the accumulated difficulties and expenditures arising under the provisions of this law, would be a loss, and not a speculation. When the speculator would have paid the settler for incurring the guilt and hazard of perjury, for forfeiting the privilege of entering another section for himself, and for three years' occupancy of the land, together with the original entrance-money to the Government and three years' interest, he could never sell the tract for cost and charges. To presume that even any frequent attempts would be made to violate the law, is to suppose the great body of settlers in the new States to be corrupt and vicious, the very reverse of which is the fact.

Under this system, then, lands being entered or purchased from the Government only for settlement and cultivation, the sales would be regulated by the annual increase of population in the new States and Territories. The estimate of this probable increase for the future can best be ascertained by reference to the past. The population of the new States and Territories of the Union erected out of the public domain, was, in 1800, only 59,632; in 1810, it was 410,057; in 1820, 1,230,334; and in 1830, it was 2,377,312. Thus, the increase from 1800 to 1810, was 350,425, or about 600 per cent.; the increase from 1810 to 1820, 820,277, or about 200 per cent.; the increase from 1820 to 1830, 1,146,978, or about 103 per cent. Thus, whilst the per centage of increase has diminished at every census, the actual increase, being on a larger capital, has augmented at every enumeration. Conceding that the ratio of increase in the States and Territories falls to 63 per cent., as exhibited by the census of 1840, still the increase from 1830 to 1840 would be about 1,500,000; and your committee believe it will exceed this estimate. Assuming the average of entries by the settlers to be a half section each, as none could enter more than a section, and many could not or would not enter more than one eighth, and assuming six as the usual average number of the family of each settler, himself inclusive, the quantity entered in ten years for settlement would be eighty millions of acres, or eight millions of acres per annum. But this must be reduced by the fact that there were 337,963 slaves in the new States and Territories, which could not be fairly included in averaging the family at six; and that, on this account, about one eighth must be deducted, which would reduce the amount entered annually for settlement to seven millions of acres. But it must also be remembered, that a very large portion of this annual increase of population would not enter lands, and that at least two millions of acres must be deducted on this account, and this will leave five millions of acres as about the true amount that would be entered annually for settlement. Your committee, however, believe that it would rather be less than more than this amount.

By the system proposed by the committee, about five millions of dollars per annum would be received from the sales of the public lands into the national Treasury. By sales for speculation, as well as settlement, assuming the present year as a criterion, about sixteen millions per annum, for a few years, it appears, would be realized. But, by these vast sales for speculation, all the valuable public lands would soon be entered, and the national domain soon cease to be a source of revenue. Thus, by the present system, we are exhausting this great fund for unnecessary revenue, instead of preserving it, as proposed by the committee, to yield a smaller annual amount, but for a much longer series of years, so as to render an increase of the tariff unnecessary. When the tariff reaches its lowest standard, in 1842, the revenue derived therefrom cannot much exceed $13,000,000. Let speculators by that period, or shortly thereafter, have entered all the public lands worth selling, at the minimum price, and an increase of the tariff becomes again inevitable. The system proposed by the committee will avoid these evils, by an annual addition of five millions of dollars, from sales of public land, to the revenue from duties on imports.

Having, as your committee hope, demonstrated the beneficial effects upon the whole Union of sales of the public lands for settlement only, they now proceed to the second branch of the subject—the reduction and graduation of the price of the public lands. The great argument heretofore urged against this measure has been, that it would throw the public lands, at reduced prices, into the hands of speculators. This argument, however, ceases to apply, under the provisions of this bill, by which the public lands can be sold for settlement only. The sales of the public lands operate as a continual drain upon the resources of the West. The tariff upon imports has been greatly reduced, but the general system of reduction has not been permitted to apply to the relief of the Western people, by the reduction of the price of the public lands. The revenues of the General Government are chiefly appropriated in the erection of fortifications, and improvement of harbors, and other expenditures in the Atlantic States. Small, indeed, is the amount appropriated for the new States, whilst annual millions are drained from them by the sale of the public lands, for expenditure upon the maritime frontier. The new States contributed their full proportion to the revenue from the consumption of imports, and pay, in addition, another vast sum into the national Treasury, from the sale of the public lands. Your diminution, then, of the burdens of the people, is unequal, when you refuse to diminish those burdens which operate only upon the people of the new States. Your reduction is sectional, because you refuse to apply it to the public lands, the great commodity purchased by the people of the new States. You fill your Treasury to overflowing with an unnecessary revenue, instead of reducing all the burdens of the people of every State of the Union. Upon the same principle might you refuse to reduce the tariff upon cotton-bagging, because it was purchased only by the South, or decline reducing the tariff upon dye-stuffs, because it was purchased only in the manufacturing States, as refuse a reduction in the price of the public lands, because purchased chiefly by the people of the West. In all these cases you are only yielding up a portion of the national revenue unnecessary for the wants of the Government, and your refusal to extend the reduction to the great commodity purchased by the people of the West is unjust and unequal.

The new States co-operated with the South in reducing their burdens by a reduction of the tariff, and yet, with pain and mortification, your committee perceive many Southern States co-operating with other of the old States, in refusing to extend to the people of the West the benefits of this system of reduction. That the new States, instead of menacing the Union, have submitted to this system of palpable injustice and inequality, affords a striking evidence of their devoted attachment to this confederacy, and presents a strong additional reason in favor of extending to them immediate and effectual relief.

Having proved, as your committee hope, that the price of the public lands ought to be reduced, the next question is, as to the rate of reduction. And here we recur to the act of Congress originating the system of selling the public lands, passed on the 20th of May, 1785. By this act the price was fixed at one dollar per acre. If this price was not too great for fresh lands then, when the Government was poor and oppressed by a heavy debt, it cannot be considered as too high now, when the Government is relieved from all debt, and is collecting a large unnecessary revenue. Were we to propose to reduce the price of fresh lands, never offered for sale, to the price fixed for similar lands by the act of 1785, there could be no just ground of complaint. Being, however, deeply solicitous to obtain the support of all the friends of moderate and gradual reduction, we do not propose to reduce at present the price of public lands that have been offered for sale. Our proposition is to reduce the price of all lands that now have remained, or hereafter shall have remained, five years subject to entry, and less than ten years, to one dollar per acre; ten years, and less than fifteen years, to ninety cents per acre; fifteen years, and less than twenty years, to eighty cents per acre; twenty years, and less than twenty-five years, to seventy cents per acre; twenty-five years, and less than thirty years, to sixty cents per acre; and all lands that shall have been thirty years and upwards subject to entry, shall be reduced to fifty cents per acre. As, under this system, all lands that have not been five years subject to entry will be sold at a dollar and a quarter per acre, and at a dollar per acre from the fifth until the tenth year, the average price at which the public lands would be sold would be at least a dollar per acre. It must be perfectly obvious to all, and the committee will establish the fact by authentic proofs, that the public lands are of very unequal value. In almost every township there is a great variation in the value of the public lands. Many lands that will never command the present minimum price per acre, might be sold at a price descending from the present standard to fifty cents per acre, whilst millions of acres are wholly unsusceptible of cultivation, and can never be sold at any but a nominal price. Why fix the same unvarying price upon all lands, the good as well as the inferior? The price should sink by a descending scale, graduated by the decreasing value. The nearest possible approximation to this descending rate of value, is the plan proposed by the committee. As a general rule, the lands that have remained for a series of years unsold, after they became subject to entry, must be less valuable than the fresh lands; and the value, as a general rule, diminishes with the length of time that the lands have been subject to entry. There are occasional exceptions to this rule, but not more than sufficient to prove its general application. This graduated scale of reduction is the nearest approximation to justice, whilst the unvarying price is the farthest from it. If all the public lands were at once reduced in price, without any graduation, the new and fresh lands would chiefly be sold; but the reduced prices will effect the sale of many inferior lands, that would never be sold at the present fixed minimum price per acre. The reduced price will operate chiefly in favor of the poorer class of citizens, who have not the means of paying the present price. It will enable many a day laborer to become a farmer and owner of the soil he cultivates.

Though that soil, purchased at the reduced price, may be less productive than the farm of his wealthy neighbor, yet it will be his own, it will be his home, and sufficiently fertile to supply the wants of himself and family. It will effect a change most beneficial in his condition, and highly conducive to the best interests of the nation. Shall the Atlantic States continue to drain vast sums of money for public lands from the people of the West, expend it on the seaboard, and refuse to diminish the burdens of the Western people, by reducing the price of the public lands? Such a system is unequal, unjust, and oppressive. To exhaust the resources of one section, for perpetual expenditures in another, cannot be equitable. Suppose the interior States would refuse appropriations for fortifications on the seaboard, upon the ground that, by leaving it defenceless, they would thereby tempt many of their citizens to emigrate to the West; this would be most unjust, and yet it is not more so than the refusal of the maritime States to reduce the price of the public lands, because such refusal would retard the growth of the West. The West has ever been willing to expend her treasure and her blood in defending the maritime cities; and shall the maritime States so legislate as to retard the settlement of the West? Such a course would neither be wise nor patriotic. It would impose perpetual and undiminishing burdens upon the people of one section, for the benefit of another, and render the Government of the Union an instrument of oppression and injustice.

The system we propose disrobes the Government of the character of a speculator, and the auxiliary of speculators, upon the pioneers of the West. The Government, under the present system, for the purpose of revenue only, is throwing the public domain into the hands of speculating monopolists. It will thus aid the sale, whilst it retards the settlement and cultivation, of the lands of the West. It is reviving many of the evils of the old feudal system of Europe. Under that system, the lands were owned in vast bodies, by a few wealthy barons, and leased by them to an impoverished and dependent tenantry. The same consequences must result from the monopolies now progressing in the public lands. Eight millions of acres of the public lands have probably passed during the last year into the hands of a few wealthy speculators, who will hold them up at an extravagant value. These lands, therefore, will remain unoccupied for many years, or occupied only by a dependent tenantry. This is deeply injurious to every portion of the Union. The owner and cultivator of a single farm confers greater benefits upon the community than the monopolist of thousands of acres, permitted to lie waste and uncultivated. The productions of the soil constitute the principal resources of this great nation. Upon the farming interest are all others dependent for their wealth and prosperity. That interest furnishes us not only with food and raiment at home, but sends abroad that hundred of millions in value of exports which is carrying onward so rapidly the prosperity of this republic. Every new farm that is cultivated in the West adds to the wealth and prosperity of the whole Union, whilst the investment of millions in uncultivated lands draws so much money from the channels of productive industry, and depresses the energies of the whole country. The one system will leave the lands of the West waste and uncultivated, the other will subdue the wilderness, and fill it with smiling farms and prosperous villages. The one system will place upon the lands of the West a few wandering and impoverished tenants, controlled by absentee landlords; the other will plant upon your soil a virtuous and independent yeomanry, the owners of the soil they cultivate. The one system will add thousands to your population and resources, thousands to the products of your soil, to your imports and your exports; the other system will invest millions in wholly unproductive capital, and arrest the settlement and cultivation of the soil.

This system of speculation has within the last year progressed to an extent alarming to every friend of equal rights, and should be terminated at once and forever. The monopolies will be terminated by the system proposed by the committee, and the public lands reserved as a perpetual inheritance for the farmers of the Union.

The bill of the committee will greatly augment the population of the Union. It is an undisputed principle of the law of population, that it is most rapidly increased by increasing the facilities of subsistence. The vast effects of this principle are illustrated by comparing the relative advance in population of Ohio, with any of the States upon the continent of Europe. Where, forty years past, was one vast and untrodden wilderness, now is a mighty State, with a population greatly exceeding a million, planted ere the present baleful spirit of speculation and monopoly of the public lands had seized upon the capitalists of the Union. No man will pretend that, if the Union had been confined to the original thirteen States, with their present boundaries, and the new States remained wholly unsettled and uncultivated, that the population of the Union would have been as large by several millions as it now is. Upon every principle that has governed the progress of population, there would now be at least two millions of people less within the limits of the Union, had that Union been confined to the present boundaries of the original thirteen States. A loss of two millions of people to this Union would be indeed incalculable. It would diminish one seventh the power and strength of this nation, both in war and in peace. It would greatly decrease the moral and physical power of this Union, render us less prosperous in peace, less powerful in war, more liable to foreign aggression, and less able to repel it. All the revenue from imports and from public lands bears no comparison with the value of two millions of people. Will the just, the humane, the generous people of the old States, desire to retain the poor man forever poor within their limits, when, by reducing the price of the public lands, they may enable him to procure for himself and family a happy home in the great valley of the West? Are the old States willing to avow the principle that they desire to restrain emigration to the West? It was one of the complaints of the thirteen States, in their declaration of independence, that the British Crown desired to retard our growth, by increasing the dif-facilities of obtaining lands in the colonies: and will these same thirteen States now act upon the same odious principle towards their sisters of the West? The resident of Rhode Island, who becomes a resident of Michigan, does not cease to be a citizen of the American Union; and if, by this change, he improves the condition of himself and family, why should Rhode Island object, when the increased prosperity of every American citizen augments the national strength and glory? Suppose that the new and the interior States should all act upon this narrow and selfish policy towards the States upon the Atlantic seaboard? Suppose they objected to fortifying the seacoast, upon the ground that it drained the money of their citizens for expenditures beyond their limits upon the maritime frontier: what would be the reply of the Atlantic States? It would be, that, in defending the seaboard States, the West aided in defending a part of the republic; and is not the argument equally just, that, in increasing the prosperity of the West, you augment the strength of the Union? Shall there, then, be no reciprocity of benefits, in conducting the affairs of this great republic? So long as the means of subsistence are easy, an increase of capital is nothing to a nation, compared with an increase of population. More especially is this true, when this population is composed of the productive and industrious classes, settled upon their own farms, and cultivating their own soil. But the system which would restrain emigration to the West reverses all these principles, and sacrifices the prosperity of the nation to sectional prejudices and sectional interests. The American statesman who loves his whole country should adopt that policy which will most rapidly increase the population of the whole nation. The inquiry should not be, what policy will best promote the interest of the old States or of the new States, but what will most rapidly increase the prosperity and population of the whole Union. Viewing the question in this light, the policy of cheapening to farmers and settlers the price of the public domain cannot be doubted.

The existing situation of a neighboring territory presents another strong inducement to reduce to settlers the price of the public lands. Texas has now passed from a successful revolution into an independent Government. Whether the people of this Union and the people of Texas (as your committee desire) will consent to its incorporation, as a part of this confederacy, is a question undetermined. Until this question is determined, Texas must be regarded, for the present, as an independent neighboring republic. Stretching, by the boundary which she will obtain, from the Sabine to the Del Norte, from latitude twenty-seven south of the Gulf of Mexico, and approximating latitude forty north, possessing every variety of climate from New England to Florida, a most salubrious atmosphere, a soil fitted for every variety of product, and inviting Northern as well as Southern emigration, Texas must, in any event, carry off a considerable portion of our population from every quarter of the Union. She possesses, within the above-mentioned limits, about two hundred and thirty millions of acres, being rather more than four times the extent of Virginia. Not more than twenty-five millions of acres of this vast domain are covered with valid grants. With this mighty territory, and a sparse population, Texas, being deeply solicitous to increase her physical strength, will do as every other State, possessing the control of its public domain, has done in all former periods. She will throw open this vast body of fresh and fertile lands to actual settlers, and to them alone, at prices nearly nominal. What will be the inevitable consequence? That the emigration from the old States, and from Europe, which now settles the public domain in the new States, will, unless we reduce the price of our public lands in favor of actual settlers, pass beyond our limits, and establish themselves in Texas. The poor man of the old States, who desires to obtain a farm for himself and family, and has not the money to pay our present prices, will necessarily go to Texas. Many, also, who can pay the present prices of our public lands, will also go to Texas, where they can get cheaper and equally fertile lands. If we keep up the price of our lands, whilst Texas fixes her lands at a nominal value, the exhausting effect upon the wealth and population of the whole Union can scarcely be calculated. It will greatly depress the navigating, commercial, and manufacturing interests of the North, and reduce the value of property throughout the Union. When emigrants from the old States settle in the new States, there being a perfect system of free trade between all the States, the prosperity of the new States reacts in favor of the old States, and improvement in any one State advances the prosperity of the whole Union. Every new farm settled in the West gives business to the merchant, the manufacturer, and freighter, of the old States, and adds to the wealth and prosperity of the whole Union. But not so with emigration from the old States to another republic. Our trade with such republic cannot be free. Other nations may furnish its supplies, and there is nothing in return to compensate us for the exhaustion of capital and emigration. We may greatly diminish these threatening evils by reducing to settlers the price of our public lands. If we reduce our lands to the standard fixed by Texas for her lands, the loss of the nation by emigration there will be comparatively small. But if we keep up the price of our lands, whilst Texas fixes her lands at a low rate, we shall lose by emigration at least a million of our population within the next ten years. Can any sum paid into the national Treasury compensate this nation for the loss of a million of her people? It cannot, and we should lose no time in endeavoring to prevent these threatened calamities. Should we refuse to act now, we will, when it is too late, when our population is gone, and property reduced in value, deplore our folly and want of foresight. The present emergency demands immediate action. Without this action the very life-blood of the Union will be exhausted, and a general depression of property, a languishing commerce, a decay of districts, towns, and cities, will certainly ensue. The current of emigration from one part of the Union to the other, from the old to the new States, rolls back a golden tide of trade and business. The old States now supply nearly all the wants of the farmers of the valley of the West, and hence its prosperity wonderfully promotes the welfare of the older States of the Union. The poor emigrant from the old States, who establishes a farm in the West, soon contributes more to the wealth and commerce of the State he left than if he had remained there in dependent poverty. The prosperity of the new States reacts, through the channels of trade and business, in favor of the old States, and hence the wonderful growth of the whole country.

The system we propose will have a wonderful tendency to perpetuate the Union. Under the existing laws, the public lands are now rapidly passing from the Government into the hands of speculators. Sales at the rate of thirteen millions of acres per annum will soon exhaust all that is worth selling of the public domain. But, if the sales be made only to settlers in limited quantities, this great domain will remain for a much longer period the property of the nation, for the sacred purpose only of establishing farms, and securing a freehold to the poorest American. Whilst the whole Union will derive from the sales for settlement only, such moderate and almost unfluctuating revenue as to render an increase of the tariff unnecessary, this noble domain will be filled annually with an industrious population, whose devotion to the Union will be greatly enhanced by the fact of their receiving their farms and homes at a cheap rate from a paternal Government. How different must be the effect of persevering in the present system?

The lands of the West passing into the hands of speculators, all reduction of the price even of inferior public lands refused, even the labor of the settler upon public lands is set up at auction by the Government, and many a tract, rendered only valuable by the improvements of the occupant, is made a subject of speculation; the new States drained annually of millions for expenditure in the seaboard States, and the prosperity of these new States sacrificed for unnecessary revenue. Such a policy must excite sectional feelings, and tend to weaken the bonds of our Union. That the West never has menaced, and we trust never will menace the Union, to obtain any advantage for herself, gives her a strong additional claim to the favorable consideration of the General Government. You have only realized about fifty millions of dollars from the sales of the public lands, but from duties you have received about seven hundred millions; and the more you promote the settlement and cultivation of the soil, the more rapidly will you increase the exports, and consequently augment the imports of the country; and how vastly has your revenue from imports been increased, and must continue to increase, from the settlement and cultivation of the soil of the West, and thus has added millions, and will add millions more, to your revenue from this source.

We hold it to be a sound maxim, that no more money should be collected from the people than is essential for the wants of the Government; all beyond this is tyranny. Government is an agency created by the people for their benefit, and that they should be drained of millions annually beyond the wants of this Government is the very essence of despotism. Leave all unnecessary surplus uncollected in the pockets of the people, and let each freeman expend his own money for such purposes as will, in his opinion, best promote the happiness of himself and family. If the General Government may collect fifty millions of unnecessary revenue, it may collect five hundred millions, and thus subvert the liberties of the people.

The remedy for a surplus revenue is simple: reduce the revenue, and the surplus disappears. Reduction, and not distribution, is the true policy of the Government. Reduce, and there is no necessity to distribute; but distribute, and you will never reduce. Now you have greatly reduced the revenue from duties on imports, decrease the revenue still further, by diminishing the price of the public lands, and confining the sales to actual settlers, and your dangerous surplus soon vanishes. Is this system of sales to speculators, at the same unvarying, unreduced price, to be perpetuated? If so, you perpetuate the system of surplus revenue. You drain annually from the people large amounts of unnecessary revenue. You fix the surplus system as the established policy of the Government, and persevere in enriching the Treasury annually at the expense of the people.

The General Government should never speculate upon the settlers of the public domain, nor aid others in so doing. There are two classes of speculators: one class, comprising many respectable citizens, who occasionally enter or purchase public lands unoccupied by any settler. Although no moral wrong is committed by these individuals, yet even this species of purchase or entry, for speculation, should be arrested, as contrary to the policy of the country, and calculated to retard future settlements. But there is another and very numerous class of speculations upon the public domain, not only permitted, but encouraged by our existing laws, and replete with fraud and extortion. It is this: Immediately succeeding the advertisement of large bodies of public lands for sale at auction by the United States, this second class of speculators explore the whole country advertised for sale, take the number of every quarter section upon which a settler is established, add the value of the improvement made upon the land, by the sweat of the brow of the industrious occupant, to the intrinsic worth of the waste land, and thus compel the settler to pay either the speculator or the Government, not the value of the land only, but, in addition, the value of the improvement made by the occupant himself, after years of toil and labor. In this way, either the speculator or the Government receives money for that which is not its own. It receives money for improvements which it has not made, and houses which it has not erected. It puts, without any compensation, the money for the labor of the settler into the public Treasury, or enables the speculator to put this money into his own pocket. By this system, the Government co-operates with the speculator in depriving the industrious occupant of all remuneration for his labor; and small indeed is the profit which the Government derives from this legalized system of plunder and spoliation.

The authentic records of the Land Office demonstrate that the speculator is the monopolist of nearly all the profit of this immoral, unjust, and oppressive system; a system which is a stain upon the honor of a great nation. The poor but industrious occupant generally attends the land sales, having no more money than a sum sufficient to buy the land he occupies at the minimum price; a speculator bids a few cents over him, and becomes the purchaser of the land, and the owner of an improved farm, paying not one cent for the value of the improvements. In other cases, where the settler has collected something more than the money sufficient to pay for the land he occupies, at the minimum price, and bids that sum, the speculator, by some secret agent employed by him, overbids the settler; the land is struck off to this agent, and the settler leaves the sales in disgust, to mourn over the injustice of the Government of the Union, and to prepare for the removal of himself and family from the little farm which he had improved and expected to have purchased from a paternal Government. After the departure of the settler, the tract is forfeited for non-payment, and the speculator purchases in his own name the forfeited tract, probably at the minimum price per acre. The scenes ensuing many of our land sales are scenes of the deepest distress and misery. They are scenes in which many families are driven forth from their homes, to seek some other spot in the wilderness, where keen-eyed avarice and sordid monopoly may not overtake them. But another land sale comes on, the same scene is repeated, till all hope is extinguished, and nothing is left to the settler but despair and ruin. Yet these scenes of fraud and cruelty are of constant occurrence, permitted and encouraged by the present system of the sales of the public lands at public auction. Your committee have said that the speculator, and not the Government, reaps nearly all the profit of these inglorious transactions, and this is proved by the records of the Land Office. By the documents from the Land Office it appears, that, taking all the sales of the public lands, from the adoption of the cash system, in July, 1820, down to the present period, the average price received by the Government upon these sales has been less than six cents per acre over the minimum price. And it is for this miserable pittance of less than six cents per acre that this great nation incurs the disgrace and dishonor of sending forth the remorseless speculator, authorized and encouraged by our existing laws, to drive from their homes those hardy pioneers who were erecting a home in the wilderness, those industrious and enterprising citizens who in peace subdue the forest and cultivate the soil, and who, whenever danger threatens their country, are the very first to march to the rescue. As there are no citizens more useful and more patriotic than these, so there are none more justly entitled to the regard of the Government. Yet these are the very men who, by the present system, are sacrificed, not for the benefit of the Government, but of speculators. Surely, then, such a system ought to be abandoned. Whilst, then, your committee do not propose the immediate reduction of the price of fresh lands, never offered for sale, they do recommend the total abandonment of the auction system, as productive of no benefit, except to the speculator, disgraceful to the Government, and fraught with the most corrupting consequences. In lieu of this system, your committee propose that all public lands, not yet offered at public sale, shall, at the expiration of four months after an advertisement of the returns of the surveys to the proper land office, become subject to entry at the present minimum price, but in all cases for settlement and cultivation only, and not for speculation; giving, in all cases, a preference to the first occupant, for the section which he cultivates, and upon which he resides; and the same system your committee apply to the land already subject to entry, at the prices as graduated and reduced by this bill. The system proposed by your committee is not the pre-emption system, but a substitute for it. As, however, the pre-emption system has been greatly traduced, and many, without investigation, have been led to believe that the Government has lost millions by the operation of this system, your committee will proceed to demonstrate, from authentic documents, that the total loss (if any) by this system, from the adoption of the cash sales, in July, 1820, to the present period, is, at the highest estimate, $143,259.

By Senate document No. 376, being a report from the Secretary of the Treasury, ordered to be printed May 19, 1836, it appears that the number of acres taken by pre-emptions, from the adoption of the cash system to the present period, is 2,387,650 acres, for all which the pre-emptors paid the Government the price of $1 25 per acre. Now, by the documents from the Land Office before referred to, it appears that the average price obtained for all the public lands sold since the cash system is less than $1 31 per acre, being an excess of less than six cents over the minimum price. Now, multiply the total number of acres procured by pre-emptions, as before given, by six cents, and the result is $143,259, being the highest estimate of loss arising from the pre-emption system, instead of the millions upon millions so frequently proclaimed by the enemies of the system. By inquiry, however, at the Land Office, your committee have ascertained that a large body of lands sold to citizens of Louisiana under the various back-concession laws, selling at the minimum price the swamp lands in the rear to the owners of the front tracts, is embraced in this statement from the Treasury Department, which would still further reduce the loss; and the floats most unwisely attached to the pre-emption system of late years, and which have given rise to all the frauds complained of, have still further increased the estimate. This system of floats, now abandoned by all, should constitute no objection to the pre-emption system. The committee, however, have made no deductions on these accounts. Now, is the loss to the Government of this paltry sum, being less than $9,000 per annum, any equivalent for the proposed sacrifice to speculators of the farms of so many industrious citizens; and when we deduct from this sum the expenses attending land sales, additional to those incurred at sales by private entry, this supposed loss is still further greatly reduced. But the average price obtained for the public lands during the last year, which is the safest criterion, is but two cents and a small fraction over the minimum price per acre, the total of sales in 1835 (exclusive of two small returns not received) being 12,418,007.76 acres, and the price for the whole being $15,811,144 98. Taking, then, the sales of last year as the criterion, and the total estimate of the entire loss from this pre-emption system, multiplying 2,387,650 by two cents, would be $47,753, and deducting from this the additional expenses of land sales beyond the expenses of sales at private entry, and the loss to the Government cannot exceed five hundred dollars per annum. But, in fact, there is no loss from the system, for the occupancy of the land district by settlers preceding a land sale gives additional value to the unoccupied land, and causes it to bring a better price. Thus, by document No. 376, before referred to, the total number of acres covered by pre-emption claims in 1832 was but 49,971.17 acres; and in 1834, 637,597.59 acres; and in 1835, 574,936.85 acres; yet, in each of these two last years, the average price obtained for the public lands, as shown by the Land Office returns, is greater than in 1833, when less than one tenth the number of acres were covered by pre-emption claims. Nothing, then, in point of fact, is gained by the Government by the present system of public sales, whilst it introduces fraud and oppression, and a sacrifice of the industrious settler to the baleful spirit of speculation.

No nation but this speculates upon her citizens in the sale of the public domain. Great Britain, France, Spain, Mexico, gave their lands to their citizens upon the condition of settlement only. The various States of this Union having public lands of their own to sell, sell them at nominal prices to settlers, and not to speculators. From various State laws, of a similar character, we will quote from the laws of the State of Maine only. By the first section of her act of 1824, she declares that her lands, in limited quantities, "shall be sold to such persons only as may wish to become actual settlers," and the price fixed is "thirty cents per acre;" and, by the eighth section of the same act, there is secured to every actual settler, upon any tract, "a prior right of purchase." Here are the settlement and pre-emption principle both imbodyed in the laws of Maine; and your committee believe that the same principles, substantially, will be found in the laws of all the States having public lands of their own within their limits; nor are the checks and guards against frauds in the laws of those States by any means so numerous and rigid as those proposed in this bill. Frauds may have occurred under the State laws which could not take place under the provisions of this bill. But because frauds may have been perpetrated in some cases upon lands in the old States, did those States consent, or would they ever have consented, to throw open all their lands for entry by speculating monopolists, and turn their citizens round to buy of them at exorbitant prices? Why should the old States confine the sales of their own lands to actual settlers, and refuse to act upon the same principles as regards the sale of the lands in the new States? Why sell to settlers only in their own States, and to speculators mainly in the new States? If these lands were within the limits of any old State, and subject to sale by their Legislatures, how soon would they reduce the price, and limit the sales to actual settlers? But now, how different the policy. The question seems to be, not what will best promote the settlement and cultivation of the soil of the West, but how can we derive most money from sales of the public lands to speculating monopolists.

There are many millions of acres of the public lands that will remain forever unsold at the present price. To hold these lands at a price that can never be obtained for them, is to violate the spirit of the compacts by which they were ceded to the General Government; which compacts declare that they shall be "disposed of." To refuse a sale altogether, would be a manifest infraction of the compacts; and is not the exaction of a price which the lands will never bring equivalent to a refusal to sell? But we are told by the opponents of reduction and graduation that the sales of the public lands are still progressing in the State of Ohio. But this State, as we will show, is an exception to the general rule. She has neither mountains nor vast inundated swamps, nor unproductive pine barrens, nor unculturable prairies, to create a large body of refuse lands. She has, as appears from the authentic documents, but 666,000 acres of public lands unsold, ascertained to be unfit for cultivation. Far different is the case in all the other new States and Territories of the Union.

By a resolution of the Senate of the 25th of April, 1828, the registers and receivers of all the various land districts were required to report the quantity, quality, and probable value, of the unsold public lands. This report was made in 1828, and we annex hereto, in a table marked "A," the estimates compiled from these reports. To this table your committee would desire to call the attention of the Senate. From this table it appears that but 666,000 acres of land were ascertained to be unfit for cultivation in the whole State of Ohio, and the average price of all the unsold public lands in Ohio was estimated at sixty-seven cents per acre; in Indiana the quantity unfit for cultivation 2,430,000, and the average price per acre, of all the unsold public lands, ninety cents; in Illinois 6,027,000 acres unfit for cultivation, and the average price per acre fifty cents, of all the unsold public lands; in Missouri, 5,700,000 acres unfit for cultivation, and the average price per acre of all the unsold public lands, twenty cents; in Alabama, 6,915,000 acres unfit for cultivation, average price per acre of all the unsold public lands, twenty cents; Mississippi, 8,294,000 acres unfit for cultivation, average price per acre, seventeen cents, of all the unsold public lands; Louisiana, unfit for cultivation, (very partial returns) 687,000 acres, average price per acre of all the unsold public lands, thirty-seven cents. From the annexed table, made out from the official returns, it appears that of the whole 83,110,873 acres unsold and subject to entry on the 30th of June, 1828, there were returned 34,278,000 acres unfit for cultivation; 5,614,000 acres first-rate, (no doubt now entered); and the remainder, being 43,218,000 acres, inferior. But, from the general data from the land offices not making specific returns, but giving general information, at least 13,000,000 more must be set down as unfit for cultivation, making the total amount 56,218,000 acres unfit for cultivation. From the returns furnished, the average price per acre of the 83,110,873 subject to entry on the 30th of June, 1828, is thirty cents. Now, should this vast body of public lands be held forever at one unvarying price of $1 25 cents per acre? Is such a course consonant with the spirit of the compacts by which these lands were acquired? Is it just to the States in which these lands are situate? Is it wise, as a mere question of revenue? Why hold at one unvarying price lands so utterly different in value? As well might you fix the golden eagle and a fifty-cent piece of silver at the same value, because they were of the same size, as to fix a section of refuse lands and a section of fresh lands at the same price, because their superficial extent was the same.

Your committee will select, from many cases of a similar character, that of the Augusta land office, Mississippi, as presented by the authentic returns. The number of acres unsold on the 30th of June, 1828, was 5,670,000 acres, the average price estimated by the register and receiver, five to eight cents per acre; first-rate, none; worth the minimum price, none; unfit for cultivation, 5,000,000 of acres; which land had then been subject to entry from five to eighteen years, and consequently has been now subject to entry from thirteen to twenty-six years. And is this land selling, or will it ever sell, at the present price? By the returns from the Commissioner of the Land Office, under date of the 21st of April, 1836, giving a statement of the lands purchased at that office, from its establishment to the close of the year 1830, when the valuable Choctaw lands were ceded, and shortly afterwards in part attached to this land district, it appears that the whole amount sold in the old district was 4,700 acres, and not an acre beyond the minimum price. This presents conclusive evidence that these lands never will sell at the present price, and that they are truly estimated, by the register and receiver of the land district, at an average price of from five to eight cents per acre. At the present rate of sales for the last twenty-six years, exhibited by the above returns from that office, it would require 7,839 years to sell not only one half the lands in the Augusta land district, being a period exceeding the time from the creation of the earth to the present moment; and many other of the old land districts will exhibit nearly similar results. By the returns from the Land Office under date of the 27th of April, 1836, it appears there were then subject to entry at private sale 119,259,728.34 acres, showing that the refuse has increased 36,148,855 since the 30th of June, 1828, and must continue to increase, as new districts are from time to time exposed for sale. Taking the average of the value of the refuse of 1828 as a fair estimate of the value of the refuse of 1836, there would now be in market at least 80,000,000 of acres not worth the minimum price, and at least 60,000,000 of this 80,000,000 unfit for cultivation. But it may be asked, whence, then, come the present large sales of the public lands? These sales and entries arise from the following sources: 1st, from the sales of a small portion of the lands embraced in table A, as subject to entry on the 30th of June, 1828, leaving the present unsold balances of those lands still less valuable; 2dly, and almost entirely, from the prodigious quantity of fresh land offered for sale since the 30th of June, 1828—the whole quantity offered for sale up to the 1st of January, 1836, being 169,178,042, and the refuse 119,259,728. Why, then, hold up this immense mass of refuse lands at prices the lands will never bring? The graduation principle is the nearest approach to justice which can be devised, whilst the refusal to graduate is the most unjust and unequal. The new States seem to be looked to now, rather as a source of revenue from the sales of their lands, than with a view to the promotion of their settlement and prosperity. Calculations of the increased population of the new States are held up to the jealous scrutiny of the people of the old States, as if the new States were not members of the same confederacy, and as if those calculations were not most useful which would demonstrate what system would best promote the welfare and prosperity of the whole Union. Our wonderful growth as a nation has been mainly promoted by the settlement of the West.

And have not the people who settle these new States stronger claims to the consideration of the Government, in regard to the disposition of the public domain, than the older members of the confederacy? The people who have settled and are settling the new States give to your public domain there nearly all its value. But for them, those lands would still remain a mighty wilderness, like the lands of Oregon, utterly valueless, however fertile, because it was a wilderness. The people who settle the new States encounter many difficulties and dangers. In the early settlement of the country they are generally surrounded by a savage foe, and the soil they cultivate is often moistened by their blood. The life of the pioneer is almost universally one of toil and danger. He can enjoy but few of the comforts, and none of the luxuries of life. To subdue the wilderness is not an easy conquest. The early settlers of a new country enter the mighty forests of the West, finding your lands there bearing no value. They explore and conquer the wilderness; they make roads and bridges, towns and cities, with their own labor and their own capital, and thus give to your public lands nearly all their market value. They give these States to the Union, and have surely a stronger claim upon you, as regards the disposition of the public lands, than any people who have never seen these new States, and expended neither time nor capital in improving the lands within their limits. Take from the new States the labor and capital employed there by their citizens, and your public lands would have little or no market value. These are facts that should never be forgotten by the just and generous citizens of the older States of the Union. Let us sell, then, only for settlement and cultivation, and at reduced prices, and we will make some return to the new States for the value which their labor and capital have given and are giving to your public domain.

The committee proposes the sale and entry of all the public lands in forty-acre lots—a measure highly important to the poorer class of citizens, and injurious to no interest whatever. We also recommend that all public lands which shall have remained unsold for thirty-five years after they become subject to entry, shall be ceded to the States, respectively, in which such unsaleable refuse is situated, at the price paid by the United States for surveying the lands.

If we may take Ohio as an example, less than a million of acres will be obtained by any State under this provision.

If more land than this is obtained by any one State, it will be because the refuse remaining unsold, after a lapse of thirty-five years from the period of its becoming subject to entry in such State, will be almost wholly unfit for cultivation, and would not, from the nett proceeds of the sales, pay the expenses incurred by the Government for continuing the land offices in those States. Your committee herewith report a bill conformable to the principles of this report.

FEBRUARY 4, 1836.

INCENDIARY PUBLICATIONS.

Mr. Calhoun made the following report:

The select committee to whom was referred that portion of the President's message which relates to the attempts to circulate, through the mail, inflammatory appeals, to excite the slaves to insurrection, submit the following report:

The committee fully concur with the President as to the character and tendency of the papers which have been attempted to be circulated in the South, through the mail, and participate with him in the indignant regret which he expresses at conduct so destructive of the peace and harmony of the country, and so repugnant to the constitution and the dictates of humanity and religion. They also concur in the hope that, if the strong tone of disapprobation which these unconstitutional and wicked attempts have called forth does not arrest them, the non-slaveholding States will be prompt to exercise their power to suppress them, as far as their authority extends. But, while they agree with the President as to the evil and its highly dangerous tendency, and the necessity of arresting it, they have not been able to assent to the measure of redress which he recommends—that Congress should pass a law prohibiting, under severe penalty, the transmission of incendiary publications, through the mail, intended to instigate the slaves to insurrection.

After the most careful and deliberate investigation, they have been constrained to adopt the conclusion that Congress has not the power to pass such a law; that it would be a violation of one of the most sacred provisions of the constitution, and subversive of reserved powers essential to the preservation of the domestic institutions of the slaveholding States, and, with them, their peace and security. Concurring, as they do, with the President, in the magnitude of the evil and the necessity of its suppression, it would have been the cause of deep regret to the committee, if they thought the difference of opinion, as to the right of Congress, would deprive the slaveholding States of any portion of the protection which the measure recommended by the President was intended to afford them. On the contrary, they believe all the protection intended may be afforded, according to the views they take of the power of Congress, without infringing on any provision of the constitution on one side, or the reserved rights of the States on the other.

The committee, with these preliminary remarks, will now proceed to establish the positions which they have assumed, beginning with the first—that the passage of a law would be a violation of an express provision of the constitution.

In the discussion of this point, the committee do not deem it necessary to inquire whether the right to pass such a law can be derived from the power to establish post offices and post roads, or from the trust "of preserving the relation created by the constitution between the States," as supposed by the President. However ingenious or plausible the argument may be, by which it may be attempted to derive the right from these, or any other sources, they must fall short of their object. The jealous spirit of liberty which characterized our ancestors at the period when the constitution was adopted, forever closed the door by which the right might be implied from any of the granted powers, or any other source, if there be any other. The committee refer to the amended article of the constitution which, among other things, provides that Congress shall pass no law which shall abridge the liberty of the press—a provision which interposes, as will be hereafter shown, an insuperable objection to the measure recommended by the President. That the true meaning of this provision may be fully comprehended, as bearing on the point under consideration, it will be necessary to recur briefly to the history of the adoption of the constitution.

It is well known that great opposition was made to the adoption of the constitution. It was acknowledged, on all sides, at the time, that the old confederation, from its weakness, had failed, and that something must be done to save the country from anarchy and convulsion; yet, so high was the spirit of liberty, so jealous were our ancestors of that day of power, that the utmost efforts were necessary, under all the then existing pressure, to obtain the assent of the States to the ratification of the constitution. Among the many objections to its adoption, none were more successfully urged, than the absence in the instrument of those general provisions which experience had shown to be necessary to guard the outworks of liberty: such as the freedom of the press and of speech, the rights of conscience, of trial by jury, and others of like character. It was the belief of those jealous and watchful guardians of liberty, who viewed the adoption of the constitution with so much apprehension, that all these sacred barriers, without some positive provision to protect them, would, by the power of construction, be undermined and prostrated. So strong was this apprehension, that it was impossible to obtain a ratification of the instrument in many of the States, without accompanying it with the recommendation to incorporate in the constitution various articles, as amendments, intended to remove this defect, and guard against the danger apprehended, by placing these important rights beyond the possible encroachment of Congress. One of the most important of these is that which stands at the head of the list of amended articles, and which, among other things, as has been stated, prohibits the passage of any law abridging the freedom of the press, and which left that important barrier against power under the exclusive authority and control of the States.

That it was the object of this provision to place the freedom of the press beyond the possible interference of Congress, is a doctrine not now advanced for the first time. It is the ground taken, and so ably sustained by Mr. Madison, in his celebrated report to the Virginia Legislature, in 1799, against the alien and sedition law, and which conclusively settled the principle that Congress has no right, in any form, or in any manner, to interfere with the freedom of the press.* The establishment of this principle not only overthrew the sedition act, but was the leading cause of the great political revolution which, in 1801, brought the republican party, with Mr. Jefferson at its head, into power.

With these remarks, the committee will turn to the sedition act, in order to show the identity in principle between it and the act which the message recommends to be passed, as far as it relates to the freedom of the press. Among its other provisions, it inflicted punishment on all persons who should publish any false, scandalous, or malicious writing against the Government, with intent to defame the same, or bring it into contempt or disrepute. Assuming this provision to be unconstitutional, as abridging the freedom of the press, which no one now doubts, it will not be difficult to show that if, instead of inflicting punishment for publishing, the act had inflicted punishment for circulating through the mail, for the same offence, it would have been equally unconstitutional. The one would have abridged the freedom of the press as effectually as the other. The object of publishing is circulation; and to prohibit circulation is, in effect, to prohibit publication. They both have a common object—the communication of sentiments and opinions to the public; and the prohibition of one may as effectually suppress such communication as the prohibition of the other, and, of course, would as effectually interfere with the freedom of the press, and be equally unconstitutional.

But to understand more fully the extent of the control which the right of prohibiting circulation through the mail would give to the Government over the press, it must be borne in mind that the power of Congress over the Post Office and the mail is an exclusive power. It must also be remembered that Congress, in the exercise of this power, may declare any road or navigable water to be a post road; and that, by the act of 1825, it is provided "that no stage, or other vehicle which regularly performs trips on a post road, or on a road parallel to it, shall carry letters." The same provision extends to packets, boats, or other vessels, on navigable waters. Like provision may be extended to newspapers and pamphlets; which, if it be admitted that Congress has the right to discriminate in reference to their character, what papers shall or what shall not be transmitted by the mail, would subject the freedom of the press, on all subjects, political, moral, and religious, completely to its will and pleasure. It would, in fact, in some respects, more effectually control the freedom of the press than any sedition law, however severe its penalties. The mandate of the Government alone would be sufficient to close the door against circulation through the mail, and thus, at its sole will and pleasure, might intercept all communication between the press and the people; while it would require the intervention of courts and juries to enforce the provisions of a sedition law, which experience has shown are not always passive and willing instruments in the hands of Government, where the freedom of the press is concerned.

From these remarks, it must be apparent that to prohibit publication on one side, and circulation through the mail on the other, of any paper, on account of its religious, moral, or political character, rests on the same principle, and that each is equally an abridgment of the freedom of the press, and a violation of the constitution. It would indeed have been but a poor triumph for the cause of liberty, in the great contest of 1799, had the sedition law been put down on principles that would have left Congress free to suppress the circulation, through the mail, of the very publications which that odious act was intended to prohibit. The authors of that memorable achievement would have had but slender claims on the gratitude of posterity, if their victory over the encroachment of power had been left so imperfect.

It will, after what has been said, require but few remarks to show that the same principle which applied to the sedition law would apply equally to a law punishing, by Congress, such incendiary publications as are referred to in the message, and of course to the passage of a law prohibiting their transmission through the mail. The principle on which the sedition act was condemned as unconstitutional was a general one, and not limited in its application to that act. It withdraws from Congress all right of interference with the press, in any form or shape whatever; and the sedition law was put down as unconstitutional, not because it prohibited publications against the Government, but because it interfered, at all, with the press. The prohibition of any publication, on the ground of its being immoral, irreligious, or intended to excite rebellion or insurrection, would have been equally unconstitutional; and, from parity of reason, the suppression of their circulation through the mail would be no less so.

But, as conclusive as these reasons are against the right, there are others not less so, derived from the powers reserved to the States, which the committee will next proceed to consider.

The message, as has been stated, recommends that Congress should pass a law to punish the transmission, through the mail, of incendiary publications intended to instigate the slaves to insurrection. It of course assumes for Congress a right to determine what papers are incendiary and intended to excite insurrection. The question, then, is, has Congress such a right? A question of vital importance to the slaveholding States, as will appear in the course of the discussion.

After examining this question with due deliberation, in all its bearings, the committee are of opinion, not only that Congress has not the right, but to admit it would be fatal to those States. Nothing is more clear than that the admission of the right, on the part of Congress, to determine what papers are incendiary, and as such to prohibit their circulation through the mail, necessarily involves the right to determine what are not incendiary, and to enforce their circulation. Nor is it less certain that to admit such a right would be virtually to clothe Congress with the power to abolish slavery, by giving it the means of breaking down all the barriers which the slaveholding States have erected for the protection of their lives and property. It would give Congress, without regard to the prohibition laws of the States, the authority to open the gates to the flood of incendiary publications which are ready to break into those States, and to punish all who dare resist as criminals. Fortunately,

*The article is in the following words:

"Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances."

Congress has no such right. The internal peace and security of the States are under the protection of the States themselves, to the entire exclusion of all authority and control on the part of Congress. It belongs to them, and not to Congress, to determine what is, or is not, calculated to disturb their peace and security, and, of course, in the case under consideration, it belongs to the slaveholding States to determine what is incendiary and intended to incite to insurrection, and to adopt such defensive measures as may be necessary for their security, with unlimited means of carrying them into effect, except such as may be expressly inhibited to the States by the constitution. To establish the truth of this position, so essential to the safety of those States, it would seem sufficient to appeal to their constant exercise of this right, at all times, without restriction or question, both before and since the adoption of the constitution. But, on a point of so much importance, which may involve the safety, if not the existence itself, of an entire section of the Union, it will be proper to trace it to its origin, in order to place it on a more immovable foundation.

That the States which form our Federal Union are sovereign and independent communities, bound together by a constitutional compact, and are possessed of all the powers belonging to distinct and separate States, excepting such as are delegated to be exercised by the General Government, is assumed as unquestionable. The compact itself expressly provides that all powers not delegated are reserved to the States and the people. To ascertain, then, whether the power in question is delegated or reserved, it is only necessary to ascertain whether it is to be found among the enumerated powers or not. If it be not among them, it belongs, of course, to the reserved powers. On turning to the constitution, it will be seen that, while the power of defending the country against external danger is found among the enumerated, the instrument is wholly silent as to the power of defending the internal peace and security of the States, and, of course, reserves to the States this important power, as it stood before the adoption of the constitution, with no other limitation, as has been stated, except such as are expressly prescribed by the instrument itself. From what has been stated, it may be inferred that the right of a State to defend itself against internal dangers is a part of the great, primary, and inherent right of self-defence, which, by the laws of nature, belongs to all communities; and so jealous were the States of this essential right, without which their independence could not be preserved, that it is expressly provided by the constitution,* that the General Government shall not assist a State, even in case of domestic violence, except on the application of the authorities of the State itself; thus excluding, by a necessary consequence, its interference in all other cases.

Having now shown that it belongs to the slaveholding States, whose institutions are in danger, and not to Congress, as is supposed by the message, to determine what papers are incendiary and intended to excite insurrection among the slaves, it remains to inquire, in the next place, what are the corresponding duties of the General Government, and the other States, from within whose limits and jurisdiction their institutions are attacked; a subject intimately connected with that with which the committee are immediately charged, and which, at the present juncture, ought to be fully understood by all the parties. The committee will begin with the first.

It may not be entirely useless to premise that rights and duties are reciprocal; the existence of a right always implying the corresponding duty. If, consequently, the right to protect her internal peace and security belongs to a State, the General Government is bound to respect the measures adopted by her for that purpose, and to co-operate in their execution, as far as its delegated powers may admit or the measure may require. Thus, in the present case, the slaveholding States having the unquestionable right to pass all such laws as may be necessary to maintain the existing relation between master and slave in those States, their right, of course, to prohibit the circulation of any publication or any intercourse calculated to disturb or destroy that relation is inconvertible. In the execution of the measures which may be adopted by the States for this purpose, the powers of Congress over the mail, and of regulating commerce with foreign nations and between the States, may require co-operation on the part of the General Government; and it is bound, in conformity to the principle established, to respect the laws of the State in their exercise, and so to modify its acts as not only to violate those of the States, but, as far as practicable, to co-operate in their execution. The practice of the Government has been in conformity to these views.

By the act of the 28th of February, 1803, entitled "An act to prevent the importation of certain persons into certain States," where, by the laws of those States, their importation is prohibited, masters or captains of ships or vessels are forbidden, under severe penalty, "to import or bring, or cause to be imported or brought, any negro, or mulatto, or person of color, not being a native, or citizen, or registered seaman of the United States, or seamen, natives of countries beyond the Cape of Good Hope, into any port or place which shall be situated in any State which, by law, has prohibited, or shall prohibit, the admission or importation of such negro, mulatto, or other person of color." This provision speaks for itself, and requires no illustration. It is a case in point, and fully embraces the principle laid down. To the same effect is the act of the 25th of February, 1799, respecting quarantine and health laws, which, as belonging to the internal police of the States, stand on the same ground. The act, among other things, "directs the collectors and all other revenue officers, the masters and crews of the revenue cutters, and the military officers in command on the station, to co-operate faithfully in the execution of the quarantine and other restrictions which the health laws of the State may establish."

The principles embraced by these acts, in relation to the commercial intercourse of the country, are equally applicable to the intercourse by mail. There may, indeed, be more difficulty in co-operating with the States in the latter than in the former, but that cannot possibly affect the principle. Regarding it, then, as established both by reason and precedents, the committee, in conformity with it, have prepared a bill, and directed their chairman to report the same to the Senate, prohibiting, under the penalty of fine and dismission from office, any deputy postmaster, in any State, Territory, or District, from knowingly receiving and putting into the mail any letter, packet, pamphlet, paper, or pictorial representation, directed to any post office or person in a State, Territory, or District, by the laws of which the circulation of the same is forbidden; and also prohibiting, under a like penalty, any deputy postmaster in said State, Territory, or District, from knowingly delivering the same, except to such persons as may be authorized to receive them by the civil authority of said State, Territory, or District.

It remains next to inquire into the duty of the States from within whose limits and jurisdiction the internal peace and security of the slaveholding States are endangered.

In order to comprehend more fully the nature and extent of their duty, it will be necessary to make a few remarks on the relations which exist between the States of our Federal Union, with the rights and obligations reciprocally resulting from such relations.

It has already been stated that the States which compose our Federal Union are sovereign and independent communities, united by a constitutional compact. Among its members the laws of nations are in full force and obligation, except as altered or modified by the compact; and, of course, the States possess, with that exception, all the rights, and are subject to all the duties, which separate and distinct communities possess, or to which they are subject. Among these are comprehended the obligation which all States are under to prevent their citizens from disturbing the peace or endangering the security of other States; and in case of being disturbed or endangered, the right of the latter to demand of the former to adopt such measures as will prevent their recurrence, and if refused or neglected, to resort to such measures as its protection may require. This right remains, of course, in force among the States of this Union, with such limitations as are imposed expressly by the constitution. Within their limits, the rights of the slaveholding States are as full to demand of the States within whose limits and jurisdiction their peace is assailed, to adopt the measures necessary to prevent the same, and, if refused or neglected, to resort to means to protect themselves, as if they were separate and independent communities.

Those States, on the other hand, are not only under all the obligations which independent communities would be, to adopt such measures, but also under the obligation which the constitution superadds, rendered more sacred, if possible, by the fact that, while the Union imposes restrictions on the right of the slaveholding States to defend themselves, it affords the medium through which their peace and security are assailed. It is not the intention of the committee to inquire what those restrictions are, and what are the means which, under the constitution, are left to the slaveholding States to protect themselves. The period has not yet come, and they trust never will, when it may be necessary to decide those questions; but come it must, unless the States whose duty it is to suppress the danger shall see in time its magnitude, and the obligations which they are under to adopt speedy and effectual measures to arrest its further progress. That the full force of this obligation may be understood by all parties, the committee propose, in conclusion, to touch briefly on the movements of the abolitionists, with the view of showing the dangerous consequences to which they must lead if not arrested.

Their professed object is the emancipation of slaves in the Southern States, which they propose to accomplish through the agency of organized societies, spread throughout the non-slaveholding States, and a powerful press, directed mainly to excite, in the other States, hatred and abhorrence against the institutions and citizens of the slaveholding States, by addresses, lectures, and pictorial representations, abounding in false and exaggerated statements.

If the magnitude of the mischief affords, in any degree, the measure by which to judge of the criminality of a project, few have ever been devised to be compared with the present, whether the end be regarded, or the means by which it is proposed to be accomplished. The blindness of fanaticism is proverbial. With more zeal than understanding, it constantly misconceives the nature of the object at which it aims, and towards which it rushes with headlong violence, regardless of the means by which it is to be effected. Never was its character more fully exemplified than in the present instance. Setting out with the abstract principle that slavery is an evil, the fanatical zealots come at once to the conclusion that it is their duty to abolish it, regardless of all the disasters which must follow. Never was conclusion more false or dangerous. Admitting their assumption, there are innumerable things which, regarded in the abstract, are evils; but which it would be madness to attempt to abolish. Thus regarded, Government itself is an evil, with most of its institutions intended to protect life and property, comprehending the civil as well as the criminal and military code, which are tolerated only because to abolish them would be to increase instead of diminishing the evil. The reason is equally applicable to the case under consideration, to illustrate which, a few remarks on slavery, as it actually exists in the Southern States, will be necessary.

He who regards slavery in those States simply under the relation of master and slave, as important as that relation is, viewed merely as a question of property to the slaveholding section of the Union, has a very imperfect conception of the institution, and the impossibility of abolishing it without disasters unexampled in the history of the world. To understand its nature and importance fully, it must be borne in mind that slavery, as it exists in the Southern States, (including under the Southern all the slaveholding States,) involves not only the relation of master and slave, but, also, the social and political relations of two races, of nearly equal numbers, from different quarters of the globe, and the most opposite of all others in every particular that distinguishes one race of men from another. Emancipation would destroy these relations—would divest the masters of their property, and subvert the relation, social and political, that has existed between the races from almost the first settlement of the Southern States.

It is not the intention of the committee to dwell on the pecuniary aspect of this vital subject, the vast amount of property involved, equal at least to $950,000,000; the ruin of families and individuals; the impoverishment and prostration of an entire section of the Union, and the fatal blow that would be given to the productions of the great agricultural staples, on which the commerce, the navigation, the manufactures, and the revenue of the country, almost entirely depend. As great as these disasters would be, they are nothing, compared to what must follow the subversion of the existing relation between the two races, to which the committee will confine their remarks.

Under this relation, the two races have long lived in peace and prosperity, and if not disturbed, would long continue so to live. While the European race has rapidly increased in wealth and numbers, and at the same time has maintained an equality, at least, morally and intellectually, with their brethren of the non-slaveholding States, the African race has multiplied with not less rapidity, accompanied by great improvement, physically and intellectually, and the enjoyment of a degree of comfort with which the laboring class in few countries can compare, and confessedly greatly superior to what the free people of the same race possess in the non-slaveholding States. It may, indeed, be safely asserted, that there is no example in history in which a savage people, such as their ancestors were when brought into the country, have ever advanced in the same period so rapidly in numbers and improvement.

To destroy the existing relations would be to destroy this prosperity, and to place the two races in a state of conflict, which must end in the expulsion or extirpation of one or the other. No other can be substituted, compatible with their peace or security. The difficulty is in the diversity of the races. So strongly drawn is the line between the two, in consequence of it, and so strengthened by the force of habit and education, that it is impossible for them to exist together in the same community, where their numbers are so nearly equal as in the slaveholding States, under any other relation than which now exists. Social and political equality between them is impossible. No power on earth can overcome the difficulty. The causes resisting lie too deep in the principles of our nature to be surmounted. But, without such equality, to change the present condition of the African race, were it possible, would be but to change the form of slavery. It would make them the slaves of the community, instead of the slaves of individuals, with less responsibility and interest in their welfare on the part of the community than is felt by their present masters; while it would destroy the security and independence of the European race, if the African should be permitted to continue in their changed condition within the limits of those States. They would look to the other States for support and protection, and would become, virtually, their allies and dependants; and would thus place in the hands of those States the most effectual instrument to destroy the influence and control the destiny of the rest of the Union.

It is against this relation between the two races that the blind and criminal zeal of the abolitionists is directed—a relation that now preserves in quiet and security more than 6,500,000 of human beings, and which cannot be destroyed without destroying the peace and prosperity of nearly half the States of the Union, and involving their entire population in a deadly conflict, that must terminate either in the expulsion or extirpation of those who are the object of the misguided and false humanity of those who claim to be their friends.

He must be blind indeed, who does not perceive that the subversion of a relation which must be followed with such disastrous consequences can only be effected by convulsions that would devastate the country, burst asunder the bonds of the Union, and engulf in a sea of blood the institutions of the country. It is madness to suppose that the slaveholding States would quietly submit to be sacrificed. Every consideration—interest, duty, and humanity, the love of country, the sense of wrong, hatred of oppressors, and treacherous and faithless confederates, and finally despair—would impel them to the most daring and desperate resistance in defence of property, family, country, liberty, and existence.

But wicked and cruel as is the end aimed at, it is fully equalled by the criminality of the means by which it is proposed to be accomplished. These, as has been stated, consist in organized societies and a powerful press, directed mainly with a view to excite the bitterest animosity and hatred of the people of the non-slaveholding States against the citizens and institutions of the slaveholding States. It is easy to see to what disastrous results such means must tend. Passing over the more obvious effects, their tendency to excite to insurrection and servile war, with all its horrors, and the necessity which such tendency must impose on the slaveholding States to resort to the most rigid discipline and severe police, to the great injury of the present condition of the slaves, there remains another, threatening incalculable mischief to the country.

The inevitable tendency of the means to which the abolitionists have resorted to effect their object must, if persisted in, end in completely alienating the two great sections of the Union. The incessant action of hundreds of societies, and a vast printing establishment, throwing out daily thousands of artful and inflammatory publications, must make, in time, a deep impression on the section of the Union where they freely circulate, and are mainly designed to have effect. The well-informed and thoughtful may hold them in contempt, but the young, the inexperienced, the ignorant, and thoughtless, will receive the poison. In process of time, when the number of proselytes is sufficiently multiplied, the artful and profligate, who are ever on the watch to seize on any means, however wicked and dangerous, will unite with the fanatics, and make their movements the basis of a powerful political party, that will seek advancement by diffusing, as widely as possible, hatred against the slaveholding States. But, as hatred begets hatred, and animosity animosity, these feelings would become reciprocal, till every vestige of attachment would cease to exist between the two sections, when the Union and the constitution, the offspring of mutual affection and confidence, would forever perish.

Such is the danger to which the movements of the abolitionists expose the country. If the force of the obligation is in proportion to the magnitude of the danger, stronger cannot be imposed, than is at present, on the States within whose limits the danger originates, to arrest its further progress—a duty they owe, not only to the States whose institutions are assailed, but to the Union and constitution, as has been shown, and, it may be added, to themselves.

The sober and considerate portions of citizens of the non-slaveholding States, who have a deep stake in the existing institutions of the country, would have little forecast not to see that the assaults which are now directed against the institutions of the Southern States may be very easily directed against those which uphold their own property and security. A very slight modification of the arguments used against the institutions which sustain the property and security of the South would make them equally effectual against the institutions of the North, including banking, in which so vast an amount of its property and capital is invested. It would be well for those interested to reflect whether there now exists, or ever has existed, a wealthy and civilized community, in which one portion did not live on the labor of another; and whether the form in which slavery exists in the South is not but one modification of this universal condition; and, finally, whether any other, under all the circumstances of the case, is more defensible, or stands on stronger ground of necessity. It is time to look these questions in the face. Let those who are interested remember that labor is the only source of wealth, and how small a portion of it, in all old and civilized countries, even the best governed, is left to those by whose labor wealth is created. Let them also reflect how little volition or agency the operatives in any country have in the question of its distribution—as little, with a few exceptions, as the African of the slaveholding States has in the distribution of the proceeds of his labor. Nor is it the less oppressive, that in the one case it is effected by the stern and powerful will of the Government, and in the other by the more feeble and flexible will of a master. If one be an evil, so is the other. The only difference is the amount and mode of the exaction and distribution, and the agency by which they are effected.

A bill prohibiting deputy postmasters from receiving or transmitting through the mail, to any State, Territory, or District, certain papers therein mentioned, the circulation of which, by the laws of said State, Territory, or District, may be prohibited, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That it shall not be lawful for any deputy postmaster, in any State, Territory, or District, knowingly to receive and put into the mail any pamphlet, newspaper, handbill, or other paper, printed or written, or pictorial representation, touching the subject of slavery, addressed to any person or post office in any State, Territory, or District, where, by the laws of the said State, Territory, or District, their circulation is prohibited. Nor shall it be lawful for any deputy postmaster, in said State, Territory, or District, knowingly to deliver to any person any such pamphlet, newspaper, handbill, or other paper, printed or written, or pictorial representation, to any person whatever, except to such person or persons as are duly authorized, by the proper authority of such State, Territory, or District, to receive the same.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That it shall be the duty of the Postmaster General to dismiss from office any deputy postmaster offending in the premises, and such deputy postmaster shall, on conviction thereof in any court having competent jurisdiction, be fined in any sum not less than _____ dollars, and not more than _____ dollars, according to the aggravation of the offence, at the discretion of the court.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That it shall be the duty of deputy postmasters, mail carriers, and other officers and agents of the Post Office Department, to co-operate, as far as may be, to prevent the circulation of any pamphlet, newspaper, handbill, or other paper, printed or written, or pictorial representation, as aforesaid, in any State, Territory, or District, where, by the laws of said State, Territory, or District, the same are prohibited, and that nothing in the acts of Congress to establish and regulate the Post Office Department shall be construed to protect any deputy postmaster, mail carrier, or other officer or agent of said Department, convicted of knowingly circulating in any State, Territory, or District, as aforesaid, any such pamphlet, newspaper, handbill, or other paper, printed or written, or pictorial representation, forbidden by the laws of such State, Territory, or District.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the Postmaster General to furnish to the deputy postmasters, and the agents and officers of the Department, copies of the laws of the several States, Territories, and Districts, prohibiting the publication or circulation of any pamphlet, newspaper, handbill, or other paper, printed or written, or pictorial representation, within the limits of said States, Territories, or Districts, for their government in the premises; and make such regulations and give such instructions in carrying this act into effect as may not be contrary to law.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That the deputy postmasters of the offices where the pamphlets, newspapers, handbills, or other papers, printed or written, or pictorial representations aforesaid, may be deposited, shall, under the instructions of the Postmaster General, from time to time give notice of the same, so that they may be withdrawn by the person depositing them; and if not withdrawn in the space of one month thereafter, shall be burnt or otherwise destroyed.

THE SMITHSONIAN LEGACY.

IN SENATE, JANUARY 5, 1836.

Mr. Leigh made the following report:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the message of the President of the 17th December last, transmitting to Congress a report of the Secretary of State, accompanying copies of certain papers relating to a bequest to the United States by Mr. James Smithson, of London, for the purpose of founding, at Washington, an establishment, under the name of "the Smithsonian Institution, for the increase and diffusion of knowledge among men," respectfully report:

That it appears that Mr. James Smithson, late of London, deceased, by his last will and testament, bequeathed the whole of his property to his bankers, Messrs. Drummonds, of Charing Cross, London, in trust, to be disposed of in manner therein provided and directed; and desired his said executors to put his property under the management of the court of chancery; and then, (after bequeathing an annuity of £100 sterling to John Fitall for life,) he bequeathed and provided as follows: "To Henry James Hungerford, my nephew, I give and bequeath, for his life, the whole of the income arising from my property, of every nature and kind whatever, after payment of the above annuity, and, after the death of John Fitall, that annuity likewise; the payments to be made to him at the time interest or dividends become due on the stocks or other property from which the income arises. Should the said Henry James Hungerford have a child or children, legitimate or illegitimate, I leave to such child or children, his or their heirs, executors, and assigns, the whole of my property, of every kind, absolutely and forever, to be divided between them, if more than one, in the manner their father shall judge proper; and in case of his omitting to decide this, as the Lord Chancellor shall judge proper. Should my said nephew, Henry James Hungerford, marry, I empower him to make a jointure. In case of the death of my said nephew without leaving a child or children, or of the death of the child or children he may have had, under the age of twenty-one years, or intestate, I then bequeath the whole of my property (subject to the annuity of £100 to John Fitall, and for the security and payment of which I mean stock to remain in this country) to the United States of America, to found, at Washington, under the name of the Smithsonian Institution, an establishment for the increase and diffusion of knowledge among men."

It further appears, from a letter of Messrs. Clarke, Fynmore, and Fladgate, solicitors, to Mr. Vail, chargé d'affaires of the United States at London, dated the 21st July last, communicated by Mr. Vail to the Secretary of State, that, pursuant to the instructions contained in Mr. Smithson's will, an amicable suit was, on the death of that testator, brought in the court of chancery of England, by the legatee, Mr. Hungerford, against the Messrs. Drummonds, the executors, in which suit the assets were realized; that these were very considerable; that there is now standing in the name of the accountant general of the court of chancery, on the trusts of the will, stock amounting in value to about £100,000; that Mr. Hungerford, during his life, had received the income arising from this property; but that news had reached England that Mr. Hungerford had died abroad, leaving no child surviving him; so that the event has happened on which the executory bequest of this large property was made by the testator, Mr. Smithson, to the United States, to found, at Washington, under the name of "the Smithsonian Institution," an establishment for the increase and diffusion of knowledge among men. Messrs. Clarke, Fynmore, and Fladgate, also inform Mr. Vail that it has now become necessary that measures should be taken for the purpose of getting the decision of the court of chancery as to the further disposition of the property; that it is not clearly defined in Mr. Smithson's will to whom, on behalf of the United States, the property should be paid or transferred; and, indeed, there is so much doubt, that they apprehend the attorney general on behalf of the Crown of England must be joined in the proceedings which it may be requisite the United States should institute; that they act, in this matter, for Messrs. Drummonds, the bankers, who are mere stake-holders, and are ready to do all in their power to facilitate getting the decision of the court of chancery, and carrying the testator's intentions into effect; and that they will be happy to communicate with such professional advisers as the Government of the United States shall think fit to appoint to act for them in England. And having thus stated the nature of the business, they add, that they abstain from making any suggestion as to the party in whose name proceedings should be adopted, considering that the point should be determined by counsel in England, after the opinion of the proper law officers in the United States shall have been taken on the subject.

In a letter of Mr. Vail to the Secretary of State, of the 28th July last, communicating a copy of Mr. Smithson's will, and the letter of Messrs. Clarke, Fynmore, and Fladgate, to him, he says that that letter, and the inquiries he has made, leave no doubt of the will of Mr. Smithson having been established, and its dispositions recognised by the court of chancery of England; that, according to the view taken of the case by the solicitors, the United States, in the event of their accepting the legacy, and the trust coupled with it, should come forward, by their representative, and make themselves parties to an amicable suit before the Lord Chancellor of England, for the purpose of legally establishing the fact of the demise of Mr. Hungerford, the legatee for life, without children and intestate, proving their claim to the benefit of the will, and obtaining a decree in chancery awarding to them the proceeds of the estate; that Messrs. Clarke, Fynmore, and Fladgate, are willing to undertake the management of the suit, on the part of the United States; and that, from what he has learnt of their standing, they may safely be confided in. And Mr. Vail suggests, upon the advice of those gentlemen, a method of proceeding to assert the claim of the United States to the legacy, without further delay, in case it should be thought unnecessary to await the action of Congress to authorize the institution of the requisite legal proceedings.

The Secretary of State submitted the letter of Mr. Vail, and the papers therewith communicated, to the President, who determined to lay the subject before Congress at its next session; and of this determination the Secretary of State apprized Mr. Vail, in a letter of the 26th September last.

The President, in his message of the 17th December, transmits to Congress all the correspondence and information relating to the subject, as the same had been reported to him by the Secretary of State; and adds, that "the Executive having no authority to take any steps for accepting the trust, and obtaining the funds, the papers are communicated with a view to such measures as Congress may deem necessary."

The committee concur in the opinion of the President, that it belongs to the Legislature to devise and prescribe the measures, if any, proper to be adopted on this occasion, and to provide for such expenses as may be incurred in the prosecution of them.

Judging from the letters of Mr. Vail to the Secretary of State, and of Messrs. Clarke, Fynmore, and Fladgate, to Mr. Vail, as well as from the information which the committee themselves have been able to gather as to the course of adjudication of the court of chancery of England in such cases, the committee suppose it unquestionable that the executory bequest contained in Mr. Smithson's will of his whole property to the United States, in the event that has occurred, for the purpose of founding, at Washington, under the name of the Smithsonian Institution, an establishment for the increase and diffusion of knowledge among men, is, by the law of England, a valid bequest; that the United States will be entertained in the court of chancery of England to assert their claim to the fund, as trustees, for the purpose of founding the charitable institution at Washington, to which it is destined by the donor; and that that court will decree that the fund shall be paid and transferred to the United States, or their lawfully authorized agent, leaving it to the United States to apply the property to the foundation of the intended charity at Washington, and to provide for the due administration of the fund, so as to accomplish the purpose of the donor. The committee are sensible, however, that these are points which can only be determined and settled by the judicial authority of England.

In the opinion of the committee, the questions which it behooves Congress to consider, are whether it is competent to the United States, whether it comports with their dignity, whether (all circumstances considered) it is expedient, and proper that the United States should appear as suitors in the courts of justice of England, to assert their claim to the legacy in question, as trustees for the intended charitable institution to be founded at Washington.

It might be a question of much doubt and difficulty whether it would be within the competency of the Government of the United States to appropriate any part of the general revenue collected from the nation at large to the foundation and endowment of a literary or any other charitable institution in the District of Columbia. But, in the opinion of the committee, no such question is involved in the consideration of the present subject. The fund given to the United States by Mr. Smithson's will is nowise, and never can become, part of their revenue; they cannot claim or take it for their own benefit; they can only take it as trustees, to apply to the charitable purpose for which it was intended by the donor.

The committee can see no reason to doubt that the United States must be regarded as the parens patriæ of the District of Columbia. That, in that character, they have a right, and they are in duty bound, to assert a claim to any property given to them for the purpose of founding a charitable institution of any kind within the District, and to provide for the due application and administration of such a fund when they have obtained possession of it. That the rights and duties of the United States, as parens patriæ of the District, in such a case, are the same, whether the charitable donation be made by the subject of a foreign nation, or by a citizen, or whether the claim to the bounty is to be asserted before a domestic court of justice, or before a foreign tribunal, which, by the comity of nations, or the laws of its own country, is bound to entertain the claim, and to adjudge the property to the United States, if they are by law entitled to it. If a foreign tribunal, decreeing such property to the United States, should think proper to impose any conditions incompatible with the constitutional powers of this Government, or with its duties or its dignity, the United States may then decline to accept the property and the trust. But no difficulty of that kind is apprehended.

The committee are also of opinion that the United States, in prosecuting a claim to property given to them for the purpose of founding a charitable institution within the District of Columbia, and which they are entitled to claim, and take, and regulate the administration of, as the parens patriæ of the District, may properly appropriate, out of their general revenue, such sums as may be necessary to prosecute the claim with effect—since the United States have no other pecuniary means to defray the expenses that may be incurred in exercising their powers, or in performing their duties, as parens patriæ of the District, but such as are afforded by their general revenue.

Upon the whole, the committee are of opinion that it is within the competency of the Government of the United States, that it well comports with its dignity, that, indeed, it is its duty, to assert in the courts of justice of England the claim of the United States to the legacy bequeathed to them by Mr. Smithson's will, for the purpose of founding, at Washington, under the name of "the Smithsonian Institution," an establishment for the increase and diffusion of knowledge among men; and that provision ought to be made by Congress to enable the Executive to assert and prosecute the claim with effect.

Therefore, the committee recommend the adoption of a joint resolution authorizing the President to take measures for recovering the said legacy.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, DEC. 21, 1835.

The message of the President of the United States, in relation to the bequest of James Smithson, of London, for founding, at Washington, an "institution for the increase and diffusion of knowledge among men," was referred to a select committee; and

Mr. John Quincy Adams, of Massachusetts; Mr. Thomas, of Maryland; Mr. Garland, of Virginia; Mr. Pearce, of Rhode Island; Mr. Speight, of North Carolina; Mr. McKennan, of Pennsylvania; Mr. Hannegan, of Indiana; Mr. Garland, of Louisiana; and Mr. Chapin, of New York; were appointed the said committee.

JANUARY 14, 1836.

Mr. Adams, from the select committee on the message of the President relating to the bequest of James Smithson, made the following report:

The select committee to which was referred the message of the President of the United States of the 17th of December last, with documents relating to the bequest of James Smithson, of London, to the United States of America, for the purpose of founding at Washington an establishment, under the name of the Smithsonian Institution, for the increase and diffusion of knowledge among men, respectfully report:

That, from the papers transmitted to Congress with the message of the President, it appears that James Smithson, a foreigner, of noble family and of affluent fortune, did, by his last will and testament, made in the year 1826, bequeath, under certain contingencies, which have since been realized, and with certain exceptions, for which provision was made by the same will, the whole of his property, of an amount exceeding four hundred thousand dollars, to the United States of America, to found at Washington, under the name of the Smithsonian Institution, an establishment for the increase and diffusion of knowledge among men.

To the acceptance of this bequest, and to the assumption and fulfilment of the high and honorable duties involved in the performance of the trust committed with it, the Congress of the United States, in their legislative capacity, are alone competent. Your committee believe, not only that they are thus competent, but that it is enjoined upon them, by considerations of the most imperious and indispensable obligation. The first steps necessary to be taken for carrying into effect the benevolent intentions of the testator must be to obtain the possession of the funds, now held by the Messrs. Drummonds, bankers in London, executors of Mr. Smithson's will, and subject to the superintendence, custody, and adjudication, of the Lord Chancellor of England. To enable the President of the United States to effect this object, the committee report herewith a bill.

But your committee think they would imperfectly discharge their duty to this House, to their country, to the world of mankind, or to the donor of this most munificent bequest, were they to withhold a few brief reflections which have occurred to them in the consideration of the subject referred to them by the House—reflections arising from the condition of the testator, from the nature of the bequest, and from the character of the trustee to whom this great and solemn charge has been confided.

The testator, James Smithson, a subject of Great Britain, declares himself, in the caption to the will, a descendant in blood from the Percys and the Seymours, two of the most illustrious historical names of the British islands. Nearly two centuries since, in 1660, the ancestor of his own name, Hugh Smithson, immediately after the restoration of the royal family of the Stuarts, received from Charles the Second, as a reward for his eminent services to that house during the civil wars, the dignity of a Baronet of England, a dignity still held by the Dukes of Northumberland, as descendants from the same Hugh Smithson. The father of the testator, by his marriage with the Lady Elizabeth Seymour, who was descended by a female line from the ancient Percys, and by the subsequent creation of George the Third, in 1766, became the first Duke of Northumberland. His son, and successor, the brother of the testator, was known in the history of our revolutionary war by the name of Lord Percy; was present, as a British officer, at the sanguinary opening scene of our revolutionary war at Lexington, and at the battle of Bunker's Hill, and was the bearer to the British Government of the despatches from the commander-in-chief of the royal forces, announcing the event of that memorable day; and the present Duke of Northumberland, the testator's nephew was the ambassador extraordinary of Great Britain, sent to assist at the coronation of the late King of France, Charles the Tenth, a few months only before the date of this bequest from his relative to the United States of America.

The suggestions which present themselves to the mind by the association of these historical recollections, with the condition of the testator, derive additional interest from the nature of the bequest—the devotion of a large estate to an institution for the increase and diffusion of knowledge among men.

Of all the foundations of establishments for pious or charitable uses, which ever signalized the spirit of the age, or the comprehensive beneficence of the founder, none can be named more deserving of the approbation of mankind than this. Should it be faithfully carried into effect, with an earnestness and sagacity of application, and a steady perseverance of pursuit, proportioned to the means furnished by the will of the founder, and to the greatness and simplicity of his design, as by himself declared, "the increase and diffusion of knowledge among men," it is no extravagance of anticipation to declare that his name will be hereafter enrolled among the eminent benefactors of mankind.

The attainment of knowledge is the high and exclusive attribute of man, among the numberless myriads of animated beings, inhabitants of the terrestrial globe. On him alone is bestowed, by the bounty of the Creator of the universe, the power and the capacity of acquiring knowledge. Knowledge is the attribute of his nature, which at once enables him to improve his condition upon earth, and to prepare him for the enjoyment of a happier existence hereafter. It is by this attribute that man discovers his own nature as the link between earth and heaven; as the partaker of an immortal spirit; as created for higher and more durable ends than the countless tribes of beings which people the earth, the ocean, and the air, alternately instinct with life, and melting into vapor, or mouldering into dust.

To furnish the means of acquiring knowledge is, therefore, the greatest benefit that can be conferred upon mankind. It prolongs life itself, and enlarges the sphere of existence. The earth was given to man for cultivation, to the improvement of his own condition. Whoever increases his knowledge, multiplies the uses to which he is enabled to turn the gift of his Creator to his own benefit, and partakes in some degree of that goodness which is the highest attribute of Omnipotence itself.

If, then, the Smithsonian Institution, under the smile of an approving Providence, and by the faithful and permanent application of the means furnished by its founder to the purpose for which he has bestowed them, should prove effective to their promotion; if they should contribute essentially to the increase and diffusion of knowledge among men, to what higher or nobler object could this generous and splendid donation have been devoted?

The father of the testator, upon forming his alliance with the heiress of the family of the Percys, assumed, by an act of the British Parliament, that name, and under it became Duke of Northumberland. But, renowned as is the name of Percy in the historical annals of England, resounding as it does from the summit of the Cheviot hills to the ears of our children, in the ballad of Chevy Chase, with the classical commentary of Addison: freshened and renovated in our memory as it has recently been from the purest fountain of poetical inspiration, in the loftier strain of Alnwick Castle, tuned by a bard of our own native land;* doubly immortalized as it is in the deathless dramas of Shakespeare; "confident against the world in arms" as it may have been in ages long past, and may still be in the virtues of its present possessors by inheritance; let the trust of James Smithson to the United States of America be faithfully executed by their representatives in Congress; let the result accomplish his object, "the increase and diffusion of knowledge among men," and a wreath of more unfading verdure shall entwine itself in the lapse of future ages around the name of Smithson, than the united hands of tradition, history, and poetry, have braided around the name of Percy, through the long perspective in ages past of a thousand years.

It is, then, a high and solemn trust which the testator has committed to the United States of America, and its execution devolves upon their representatives in Congress duties of no ordinary importance. The location of the institution at Washington, prescribed by the testator, gives to Congress the free exercise of all the powers relating to this subject with which they are, by the constitution, invested, as the local Legislature for the District of Columbia. In adverting to the character of the trustee selected by the testator for the fulfilment of his intentions, your committee deem it no indulgence of unreasonable pride to mark it as a signal manifestation of the moral effect of our political institutions upon the opinions and upon the consequent action of the wise and the good of other regions, and of distant climes; even upon that nation from whom we generally boast of our descent, but whom, from the period of our Revolution, we have had too often reason to consider as a jealous and envious rival. How different are the sensations which should swell in our bosoms with the acceptance of this bequest! James Smithson, an Englishman, in the exercise of his rights as a freeborn Briton, desirous of dedicating his ample fortune to the increase and diffusion of knowledge among men, constitutes for his trustees, to accomplish that object, the United States of America, and fixes upon their seat of Government as the spot where the institution of which he is the founder shall be located.

The Revolution, which resulted in the independence of these United States, was commenced, conducted, and consummated, under a mere union of confederated States. Subsequently to that period a more perfect union was formed, combining in one system the principle of confederate sovereignties with that of a Government by popular representation, with legislative, executive, and judicial powers, all limited, but coextensive with the whole confederation.

Under this Government, a new experiment in the history of mankind is now drawing to the close of half a century, during which the territory and number of States in the Union have nearly doubled, while their population, wealth, and power, have been multiplied more than fourfold. In the process of this experiment they have gone through the vicissitudes of peace and war, amidst bitter and ardent party collisions, and the unceasing changes of popular elections to the legislative and executive offices, both of the General Confederacy and of the separate States, without a single execution for treason, or a single proscription for a political offence. The whole Government, under the continual superintendence of the whole people, has been holding a steady course of prosperity, unexampled in the cotemporary history of other nations not less than in the annals of ages past. During this period our country has been freely visited by observers from other lands, and often in no friendly spirit by travellers from the native land of Mr. Smithson. Their reports of the prevailing manners, opinions, and social intercourse of the people of this Union, have exhibited no flattering or complacent pictures. All the infirmities and vices of our civil and political condition have been conned and noted, and displayed with no forbearance of severe satirical comment to set them off; yet, after all this, a British subject, of noble birth and ample fortune, desiring to bequeath his whole estate to the purpose of increasing and diffusing knowledge throughout the whole community of civilized man, selects for the depositaries of his trust, with confidence unqualified with reserve, the Congress of the United States of America.

In the commission of every trust, there is an implied tribute of the soul to the integrity and intelligence of the trustee; and there is also an implied call for the faithful exercise of those properties to the fulfilment of the purpose of the trust. The tribute and the call acquire additional force and energy, when the trust is committed for performance after the decease of him by whom it is granted, when he no longer exists to witness or to constrain the effective fulfilment of his design. The magnitude of the trust, and the extent of confidence bestowed in the committal of it, do but enlarge and aggravate the pressure of the obligation which it carries with it. The weight of duty imposed is proportioned to the honor conferred by confidence without reserve. Your committee are fully persuaded, therefore, that, with a grateful sense of the honor conferred by the testator upon the political institutions of this Union, the Congress of the United States, in accepting the bequest, will feel, in all its power and plenitude, the obligation of responding to the confidence reposed by him, with all the fidelity, disinterestedness, and perseverance of exertion, which may carry into effective execution the noble purpose of an endowment for the increase and diffusion of knowledge among men.

MILITARY AND NAVAL DEFENCES.

REPORT FROM THE SECRETARY OF WAR,

In compliance with resolutions adopted by the Senate on the 18th February, requesting information of the probable amount of appropriations that would be necessary to place the land and naval defences of the country upon a proper footing of strength and respectability.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR,

April 7, 1836.

SIR: In conformity with your instructions, I have the honor to transmit reports from the Engineer and Ordnance departments, furnishing so much of the information required by the resolution of the Senate of February 18, 1836, as relates to the fortifications of the country, and to a supply of the munitions of war. The former branch of this subject has required laborious investigations on the part of the officers charged with this duty, and their report has therefore been longer delayed than, under other circumstances, would have been proper; but the whole matter was too important to have the interests involved in it sacrificed to undue precipitancy.

The Engineer report was received at the Department on Friday last, and I have embraced such portions of the intervening time as other official calls and a slight indisposition would allow me to devote to its examination. I did not consider that any suggestions I could make would justify a further delay at this advanced stage of the session, while, at the same time, I am aware that this letter will need all the allowance which these circumstances can claim for it.

It is obvious that, in the consideration of any general and permanent system of national defence, comprehensive views are not only necessary, but professional experience, and a knowledge of practical details; such information, in fact, as must be obtained by long and careful attention to the various subjects which form the elements of this inquiry. Although, therefore, I do not concur in all the suggestions contained in these reports, and more particularly in those which relate to the nature and extent of some of our preparations, still I have thought it proper to lay them before you, rather than to substitute any peculiar views of my own for them. Both furnish facts highly interesting to the community; and if they anticipate dangers which it may be thought are not likely to happen, and suggest preparations which future exigencies will not probably require, they are still valuable documents, presenting the necessary materials for the action of the Legislature. The report from the Engineer department, in particular, evinces an accurate knowledge of the whole subject, while, at the same time, its general views are sound and comprehensive. I consider it a very able document.

Under these circumstances, I have thought it proper to submit some general remarks, explanatory of my own views, concerning a practical system of defence, and which will show how far the plans and details are in conformity with my opinion. I feel that this course is due to myself.

I shall confine my observations to the maritime frontier. Our inland border rests, in the Southwest and Northeast, upon the possessions of civilized nations, and requires defensive preparations to meet those contingencies only, which, in the present state of society, we may reasonably anticipate. In the existing intercourse of nations, hostilities can scarcely overtake us so suddenly as not to leave time to move the necessary force to any point upon these frontiers threatened with attack. I am not aware of any peculiar position upon either of these lines of separation which commands the approaches to the country, or whose possession would give much superiority to an invading or defensive force. In fact, the division is, in both cases, an artificial line, through much of its extent, and a portion of the natural boundary offers scarcely any impediment to military operations. Under such circumstances, it seems altogether inexpedient to construct expensive fortifications, which would do little more than protect the space under cover of their guns; which are not required as places of depot, which guard no avenue of communication, and which would leave the surrounding country penetrable in all directions. Without indulging in any improper speculations concerning the ultimate destiny of any portion of the country in juxtaposition with us, or looking for security to any political change, we may safely anticipate that our own advance in all the elements of power will be at least equal to that of the people who adjoin us; nor does the most prudent forecast dictate any precautions, founded upon the opinion that our relative strength will decrease and theirs increase. The lake frontier, indeed, presents some peculiar considerations; and I think the views submitted by the Engineer department, respecting Lake Champlain, are entitled to much weight. This long, narrow sheet of navigable water opens a direct communication into the States of New York and Vermont, while its outlet is in a foreign country, and is commanded by a position of great natural strength. It is also within a few miles of the most powerful and populous portion of Canada, and open to all its resources and energies. With a view, perhaps, to possible rather than to probable events, it may be deemed expedient to construct a work at some proper site within our boundary, which shall close the entrance of the lake to all vessels ascending its outlet. As such a work, however, would be an advanced post, and, from circumstances, peculiarly liable to attack, its extent and defences should be in proportion to its exposure.

There is already a considerable commercial marine upon the four great lakes, Ontario, Erie, Huron, and Michigan, which are opened to the enterprise of our citizens; and this will increase with the augmenting population which is flowing in upon the regions washed by these internal seas. It is obvious that, from natural causes, the physical superiority will be found upon the southern shores of these lakes. The resolution of the Senate embraces the inquiry into the expediency of constructing permanent fortifications in this quarter. And this inquiry properly divides itself into two branches.

1st. The policy of fortifying the harbors upon the lakes; and,

2d. The policy of commanding, by permanent works, the communications between them.

Both of these measures presuppose that the naval superiority upon these waters may be doubtful. But it is difficult to foresee the probable existence of any circumstances which would give this ascendancy to the other party. It is unnecessary to investigate the considerations which bear upon this subject, as they are too obvious to require examination. They are to be seen and felt in all those wonderful evidences of increase and improvement which are now in such active operation. A victorious fleet upon these lakes could disembark an army at almost any point. If a harbor were closed by fortifications, they would only have to seek the nearest beach, and land their men from boats, so that no defences we could construct would secure us against invasion; and temporary block-houses and batteries would probably be found sufficiently powerful to repel the attacks of any vessels seeking to enter the narrow harbors upon the lakes, if we could foresee the existence of any circumstances which would induce an enemy to endeavor to force an entrance into them.

As to the communication between the lakes, the inquiry, from geographical causes, is necessarily restricted to that from Lake Erie to Lake Huron, and to the straits of Michilimackinac. Of the former, almost sixty miles consist of two rivers, completely commanded from their opposite banks, while the entrance into one of these, the river St. Clair, is impeded by a bar, over which there is but about eight feet of water. No armed vessels could force their way up these rivers while the shores were in an enemy's possession, who might construct batteries at every projecting point, and who, in fact, might in many places sweep the decks with musketry. As to the straits of Michilimackinac, they are too broad to be commanded by stationary fortifications, even if any circumstances should lead to the construction and equipment of a hostile fleet upon the bleak and remote shores of Matchedash bay, in the northeastern extremity of Lake Huron.

I am therefore of opinion that our lake frontier requires no permanent defences, and that we may safely rely for its security upon those resources, both in the personnel and matériel, which the extent and other advantages of our country insure to us, and which must give us the superiority in that quarter.

It may, perhaps, be deemed expedient to establish a depot for the reception of munitions of war in some part of the peninsula of Michigan, and to strengthen it by such defences as will enable it to resist any coup de main which may be attempted. From the geographical features of the country, our possessions here recede from their natural points of support, and are placed in immediate contact with a fertile and populous part of the neighboring colony. In the event of disturbances, the ordinary communications might be interrupted, and it would probably be advisable to have in deposit a supply of all the necessary means for offensive or defensive operations, and to place these beyond the reach of any enterprising officer who might be disposed, by a sudden movement, to gain possession of them. The expenditure for such an object would be comparatively unimportant, even should the contingency be judged sufficiently probable to justify precautionary measures.

I had the honor, in a communication to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate, dated February 19, 1836, a copy of which was sent to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs of the House of Representatives, to suggest the mode best adapted, in my opinion, to secure our frontier against the depredations of the Indians. The basis of the plan was the establishment of a road from some point upon the upper Mississippi to Red river, passing west of Missouri and Arkansas, and the construction of posts in proper situations along it. I think the ordinary mode of construction ought not to be departed from. Stockaded forts, with log block-houses, have been found fully sufficient for all the purposes of defence against Indians. They may be built speedily, with little expense, and, when necessary, by the labor of the troops. Our Indian boundary has heretofore been a receding, not a stationary one, and much of it is yet of this character. And even where we have planted the Indians who have been removed, and guaranteed their permanent occupation of the possessions assigned to them, we may find it necessary, in the redemption of the pledge we have given to protect them, to establish posts upon their exterior boundary, and thus prevent collisions between them and the ruder indigenous tribes of that region. I think, therefore, that no works of a more permanent character than these should be constructed upon our frontier. A cordon established at proper distances upon such a road, with the requisite means of operation deposited in the posts, and with competent garrisons to occupy them, would, probably, afford greater security to the advanced settlements than any other measures in our power. The dragoons should be kept in motion along it during the open season of the year, when Indian disturbances are most to be apprehended, and their presence and facility of movement would tend powerfully to restrain the predatory disposition of the Indians; and if any sudden impulse should operate to drive them into hostilities, the means of assembling a strong force, with all necessary supplies, would be at hand. And as circumstances permit, the posts in the Indian country, now in the rear of this proposed line of operations, should be abandoned, and the garrisons transferred to it.

But it is upon our maritime frontier that we are most exposed. Our coast for three thousand miles is washed by the ocean, which separates us from those nations who have made the highest advances in all the arts, and particularly in those which minister to the operations of war, and with whom, from our intercourse and political relations, we are most liable to be drawn into collision. If this great medium of communication, the element at the same time of separation and of union, interposes peculiar obstacles to the progress of hostile demonstrations, it also offers advantages which are not less obvious, and which, to be successfully resisted, require corresponding arrangements and exertions. These advantages depend on the economy and facility of transportation, on the celerity of movement, and on the power of an enemy to threaten the whole shore spread out before him, and to select his point of attack at pleasure. A powerful hostile fleet upon the coast of the United States presents some of the features of a war, where a heavy mass is brought to act against detachments which may be cut up in detail, although their combined force would exceed the assailing foe. Our points of exposure are so numerous and distant that it would be impracticable to keep, at each of them, a force competent to resist the attack of an enemy, prepared, by his naval ascendancy and his other arrangements, to make a sudden and vigorous inroad upon our shores. It becomes us, therefore, to inquire how the consequences of this state of things are to be met and averted.

The first and most obvious, and in every point of view the most proper method of defence, is an augmentation of our naval means to an extent proportioned to the resources and the necessities of the nation. I do not mean the actual construction and equipment of vessels only; the number of those in the service must depend on the state of the country at a given period; but I mean the collection of all such materials as may be preserved without injury, and due encouragement of those branches of interest essential to the growth of a navy, and which may be properly nurtured by the Government; so that, on the approach of danger, a fleet may put to sea, without delay, sufficiently powerful to meet any force which will probably be sent to our coast.

Our great battle upon the ocean is yet to be fought, and we shall gain nothing by shutting our eyes to the nature of the struggle, or to the exertions we shall find it necessary to make. All our institutions are essentially pacific, and every citizen feels that his share of the common interest is affected by the derangement of business, by the enormous expense, and by the uncertain result of a war. This feeling presses upon the community and the Government, and is a sure guarantee that we shall never be precipitated into a contest, nor embark in one, unless imperiously required by those considerations which leave no alternative between resistance and dishonor. Accordingly, all our history shows that we are more disposed to bear while evils ought to be borne, than to seek redress by appeals to arms; still, however, a contest must come; and it behooves us, while we have the means and the opportunity, to look forward to its attendant circumstances, and to prepare for the consequences.

It is no part of my object to enter into the details of a naval establishment. That duty will be much more appropriately and ably performed by the proper Department; but as some of the views I shall present on the subject of our system of fortifications must be materially affected by any general plan of naval operations which, in the event of hostilities, might be adopted, I am necessarily led to submit a few remarks, not professional, but general, upon the extent and employment of our military marine.

There is as little need of inquiry now into our moral as into our physical capacity to maintain a navy, and to meet upon equal terms the ships and seamen of any other nation. Our extended commerce, created and created by those resources which are essential to the building and equipment of fleets, removes all doubt upon one point; and the history of our naval enterprise, from the moment when the colors were first hoisted upon the hastily prepared vessels, at the commencement of our revolutionary struggle, to the last contest in which any of our ships have been engaged, is equally satisfactory upon the other. The achievements of our navy have stamped its character with the country and the world. The simple recital of its exploits is the highest eulogium which can be pronounced upon it.

With ample means, therefore, to meet upon the ocean, by which they must approach us, any armament that may be destined for our shores, we are called upon by every prudent consideration to do so. In the first place, though all wars in which we may be engaged will probably be defensive in their character, undertaken to resent or repeal some injury or to assert some right, and rendered necessary by the conduct of other nations, still the objects of the war can be best attained by its vigorous prosecution. Defensive in its causes, it should be offensive in its character. The greater injury we can inflict upon our opponent, the sooner and the more satisfactory will be the redress we seek. Our principal belligerent measures should have for their aim to attack our antagonist where he is most vulnerable. If we are to receive his assaults, we abandon the vantage ground, and endeavor, in effect, to compel him to do us justice, by inviting his descent upon our shores, and by all those consequences which mark the progress of an invading force, whether for depredation or for conquest. By the ocean only can we seriously assail any Power with which we are likely to be brought into collision.

But, independently of the policy of making an adversary feel the calamities of war, it is obvious that, even in a defensive point of view alone, the ocean should be our great field of operations. No one would advocate the project of endeavoring to make our coast impervious to attack. Such a scheme would be utterly impracticable. A superior fleet, conveying the necessary troops, could effect a landing at numerous points upon our shores, even if the best-devised plan of fortifying them were consummated. And from the nature of maritime operations, such a fleet could bring its whole strength to bear upon any particular position, and by threatening or assailing various portions of the coast, either anticipate the tardy movements of troops upon land, and effect the object before their concentration, or render it necessary to keep in service a force far superior to that of the enemy, but so divided as to be inferior to it upon any given point. These dangers and difficulties would be averted or avoided by the maintenance of a fleet competent to meet any hostile squadron which might be detached to our seas. Our coast would thus be defended on the ocean, and the calamities of war would be as little felt as the circumstances of such a conflict would permit.

As to the other advantages of a navy, in the protection of commerce, they do not come within the scope of my inquiries, and are not therefore adverted to. Nor is it necessary, or indeed proper, that I should present those considerations of distance, of exposure, and of station, which would render a fleet numerically inferior, in the aggregate, to that of the enemy, yet still sufficiently powerful, upon our own coasts, to meet and overcome any armament which could probably be sent here.

It seems to me, therefore, that our first and best fortification is the navy. Nor do I see any limit to our naval preparations, except those imposed by a due regard to the public revenues from time to time, and by the probable condition of other maritime nations. Much of the matériel employed in the construction and equipment of vessels is almost indestructible, or, at any rate, may be preserved for a long series of years; and if ships can be thus kept without injury upon the stocks, by being built under cover, I do not see what should restrain us from proceeding to build as many as may be deemed necessary, and as fast as a due regard to their economical and substantial construction will permit, and to collect and prepare for immediate use all the munitions of war, and other articles of equipment not liable to injury or decay by the lapse of time. Nor do I see that these preparations should be strictly graduated by the number of seamen who would probably enter the service at this time, or within any short period. To build and equip vessels properly requires much time, as well with reference to the execution of the work as to the proper condition of the materials employed. And the costly experiment made by England, when she too hastily increased her fleet, about thirty years ago, by building ships with improper materials and bad workmanship, ought to furnish us with a profitable lesson. These vessels soon decayed, after rendering very little service. Naval means should therefore be provided at a period of leisure, to be ready for immediate employment in a period of exigency; and a due regard to prudence dictates that these means should so far exceed the estimated demands of the service as to supply, in the shortest time, any loss occasioned by the hazards of the ocean and the accidents of war. We may safely calculate that the number of seamen in the United States will increase in proportion to that rapid augmentation which is going on in all the other branches of national interest. If we assume that, at a given period, we may expect to embark in war, our capacity to man a fleet will exceed our present means by a ratio not difficult to ascertain. And even then, by greater exertions, and perhaps higher wages, a larger portion may be induced to enter the naval service, while no exertions can make a corresponding addition to the navy itself, but at a loss of time and expense, and a sacrifice of its permanent interest.

But whatever arrangements we may make to overcome any naval armaments sent out to assail us, we are liable to be defeated and to be exposed to all the consequences resulting from the ascendancy of an enemy. And the practical question is, What shall be done with a view to such a state of things? As I have already remarked, any attempt by fortifications to shut up our coast, so that an enterprising foe, with a victorious fleet, conveying a competent force, and disposed to encounter all the risk of such an expedition, could not make his descent upon the shore, would be useless in itself, and would expose to just censure those who should project such a scheme. And on the other hand, the Government would, if possible, be still more censurable, were our important maritime places left without any defensive works. Between these extremes is a practical medium, and to ascertain where it lies we must briefly look at the various considerations affecting the subject.

What have we to apprehend in the event of a war? Is it within the limits of a reasonable calculation, that any enemy will be able and disposed to debark upon our coast an army sufficiently powerful to lay siege to our fortifications, and to endeavor, by this slow and uncertain process, to obtain possession of them? I put out of view the enormous expense attending such a plan; the distance of the scene of operations from the points of supply and support, with the consequent difficulties and dangers, and the possibility that the conveying fleet might be overpowered by a superior force, and the whole expedition captured or destroyed. All these are considerations which no prudent statesman, directing such an enterprise, will overlook. But beyond there is a question bearing more directly upon the point under examination. Is there any object to be attained, sufficiently important to justify the risk of placing a body of land troops before one of these works, too strong to be carried by a coup de main, and endeavoring to destroy its defences by a regular investment? I think there can be none.

I take it for granted that no nation would embark in the Quixotic enterprise of conquering this country. Any army, therefore, thrown upon our coast, would push forward with some definite object, to be attained by a prompt movement, and by vigorous exertions. Our experience, more than half a century ago, demonstrated that an invading force could command little more than the position it actually occupied. The system of fortifications adopted in Europe is not applicable to our condition. There military movements must be made upon great avenues of communication, natural or artificial, and these are closed or defended by fortresses constructed with all the skill that science and experience can supply, and with all the means that wealth and power can command. An invading army must carry these positions by escalade or by siege, or leave sufficient detachments to blockade them, or must turn them, and move on with all the difficulties attending the interruption of their communication, and with the dangers which such a force in their rear must necessarily occasion. Works of this character are keys to many of the European States, whose political safety depends upon their preservation. Their possession enables their Governments to meet the first shock of war, and to prepare their arrangements, political or military, to resist or avert the coming storm. And although, during some of the wars which arose out of the French Revolution, when, from causes which history is now developing, the armies of France set at defiance the received maxims of military experience, and, justifying their apparent rashness by success, reduced, with unexampled facility, or carried on their operations almost in contempt of the strongest fortifications, the subjugation of each of which had been, till then, the work of a campaign, still the opinion is yet entertained by many, that this system of defence is best adapted to the condition of the European community.

There is also a striking difference between the political situation of those countries and that of ours, which gives to these defensive preparations a character of importance which can never apply to the United States. The possession of a capital in the eastern hemisphere is too often the possession of the kingdom. Habits of feeling and opinion, political associations, and all other causes, combine to give to the metropolis an undue ascendancy. Internal parties contending for superiority, and external enemies aiming at conquest, equally seek to gain possession of the seat of Government. And the most careless observer of the events of the last half century must be struck with the fact that the fate of the capitals and the kingdoms of modern Europe are closely connected together. Under such circumstances, it may be prudent by powerful fortresses to bar the approaches to these favored places, and frequently to construct works to defend them from external attack, or to maintain their occupation against internal violence.

But there is nothing like this in our country, nor can there be till there is a total change in our institutions. Our seats of Government are merely the places where the business of the proper departments is conducted, and have not themselves the slightest influence upon any course of measures, except what is due to public opinion and to their just share of it. If the machine itself were itinerant, the result would be precisely the same. Or if, by any of the accidents of war or pestilence, the proper authorities were compelled to change their place of convocation, the change would be wholly unobserved, except by the few whose personal convenience would be affected by the measure. Nor have our commercial capitals any more preponderating influence than our political ones. And although their capture by an enemy, and the probable loss of property and derangement of business which would be the result, might seriously affect the community, yet it would not produce the slightest effect upon the social or political systems of the country. The power belongs to all, and is exercised by all.

It follows, therefore, that an enemy could have no inducement to hazard an expedition against any of our cities, under the expectation that their capture and possession would lead to political results favorable to them. Washington may indeed be taken again, and its fall would produce the same emotion which was every where felt, when its former capture was known. But an enemy would retire from it with as few advantages as marked its first abandonment, and, if his course were the same, with as few laurels as he won by its possession. I make these remarks, because it seems to me that some of the principles of the European system of fortifications may possibly be transferred to this country, without sufficient attention having been given to those circumstances, both geographical and political, which require a plan exclusively adapted to our own condition.

I consider some of the existing and projected works larger than are now necessary, and calculated for exigencies we ought not, with the prospects before us, to anticipate. If such is the fact, the objection is not only to the expense of their construction and preservation, but also to the greater difficulty of defending them, and the increased garrisons which must be provided and maintained. The hypothesis upon which their extent has been determined, is, that they may be exposed to investment, both seaward and landward, and that they ought to be capable of resisting a combined attack, or, in other words, that their water batteries should be sufficient to repel an assailing squadron, and that their land defences should be sufficient to resist a besieging army.

It is certain that whatever works we erect should be so constructed as to be beyond the reach of any coup de main that would probably be attempted against them. And this capacity must depend upon their exposure and upon the facility with which they can be relieved. But this proposition is far different from one to construct them upon a scale of magnitude which presupposes they are to be formally invested by a powerful land force, and which provides for their ability to make a successful resistance. A dashing military or naval officer may be willing to risk something to get possession of an insulated post by a prompt movement, expecting to accomplish his enterprise before his adversary can be prepared, or succor obtained; and this, even when he looks to no other advantage than the capture of the garrison, and the effect which a brilliant exploit is calculated to produce; and when he is aware that he must abandon his conquest with as much celerity as he attained it. But formal investments of fortified places, with all their difficulties, and expense, and uncertainty, are only undertaken when there is some object of corresponding importance to be expected. We have works constructed, which it would require armies to reduce. Have we any reason to anticipate that they will be assailed by a force proportioned to their magnitude?

I have already remarked that a European Power cannot expect to retain permanent possession of any part of this country. If, therefore, he succeed in overcoming or eluding our fleets, and is prepared with a respectable land force, and ready to risk its employment upon our territory, he can land at many points which we cannot close against him. His debarkation is not a question of practicability, but of expediency. If a safe harbor or roadstead offer itself, and there is no defensive work to prevent his approach, he will, of course, land at the nearest point to the object of his marauding enterprise. If there is such a work, it will be a question of calculation whether it is better to attack and carry it, or to seek another, though more distant, point of debarkation. I think there can be but little doubt but there are few, if any, positions in our country which an enemy would not, under such circumstances, avoid. He would be aware of the facility of communication which our rivers, canals, and railroads afford, of the powerful use we should be prepared to make of steam, in its various forms of application, and of the immense force which, in a short time, could be concentrated upon a given point; and it is scarcely within the limits of possibility that he would venture, formally, to besiege one of our forts, or, if he did, that he would not repent his rashness. Neither the co-operation of his fleet, nor the nearer proximity of the place of landing to the object of attack, would induce him to seek these advantages at the cost which must attend the slow process of besieging a fort, when, by removing to another position, he would land in safety, and save in time, in promptness of movement, and in his escape from the perils of a doubtful contest, more than he would lose by the difference in distance.

I am aware it may be objected that the weakness of a work might tempt an enemy to attack it, and that it may be supposed the power of some of our fortifications to resist a siege may hereafter furnish the true reason why they may not be compelled to encounter one. Certainly the stronger a work is, the less will it be exposed to danger. But this would not furnish a sufficient reason for making its defences out of reasonable proportion to its exposure. The true inquiry is, what circumstances will probably induce and enable an enemy to assail a given point, and with what force; and how can we best meet and repel him? And I believe a just consideration of this proposition will lead to the conclusion that there are scarcely any positions in our country where an enemy would venture to set down before a work too strong to resist a coup de main. In the view, therefore, which I take of this whole subject, it will be perceived that I do not merely suppose an enemy will not invest our larger works, but that they would not do so were these works much inferior to what they are, both in their dimensions and construction.

What object would justify an enemy in attempting to land an army upon our coast? He would not expect to lay waste the country, for such a mode of warfare is not to be anticipated in the present state of society. All that, under the most favorable circumstances, he could accomplish, would be to gain sudden possession of a town, and levy contributions, or to destroy a naval establishment, commercial or military, and precipitately retire to his ships before his operations could be prevented, or his retreat intercepted. I cannot, therefore, concur in the suggestion made in the Engineer report, that the first of the three great objects to be attained by the fortifications of the first class should be to "prevent an enemy from forming a permanent or even a momentary establishment in the country." It is not suited to the present and prospective situation of the United States. I understand the establishments herein contemplated are not the temporary occupation of naval arsenals and cities for the purpose of destruction or plunder, because these objects are specially enumerated, but are lodgments, where armies may be stationed, and whence they may issue to commit inroads into the country.

I refer, in these remarks, to our maritime coast generally. There are, no doubt, certain points less equal to self-defence than others, and where the preparation must be greater. Of this class is the delta of the Mississippi, not only in consequence of its many avenues of approach, but because its great natural highway does not, at present, allow those lateral supplies of the personnel, which, from geographical formation and from the state of the settlements, can be speedily thrown upon most other points of the country. This region, however, is admirably adapted to the use of steam batteries, and they will form its principal means of defence.

To apply these remarks to the plan of fortifications partly completed and partly projected. Fort Monroe, at Old Point Comfort, covers about sixty-three acres of ground, and requires, by the estimates of the Engineer department, two thousand seven hundred men to garrison it in time of war. Its full armament consists of 412 pieces, of different descriptions and caliber. I have been desirous of comparing its superficial extent with some of the European fortresses; but the necessary information could not be obtained within the short time that could be allowed for the inquiry. I understand from General Gratiot, however, that it is probably larger than almost any of the single works in Europe which do not enclose towns within their circuit. Drinkwater, in his History of the Siege of Gibraltar, states that 572 guns were mounted upon that fortress.

The object to be attained by Fort Monroe, in conjunction with Fort Calhoun, intended to mount 232 guns, is to prevent an enemy from entering Hampton Roads, a safe and convenient roadstead. This object is important, because this bay is perfectly landlocked, and has sufficient depth of water for the largest vessels, and is, withal, so near the capes of the Chesapeake, that it furnishes the best station which an enemy could occupy for annoying our commerce, and for committing depredations upon the shores of that extensive estuary. But these works do not command the entrance into the Chesapeake; nor is Hampton Roads the only safe anchorage for a hostile fleet. Their possession, therefore, does not exclude an enemy from these waters, though they will compel him to resort to less convenient positions from whence to carry on his enterprises. A hostile squadron reaching the Chesapeake, and finding the entrance into Hampton Roads guarded by sufficient works, though much less extensive than those at Fort Monroe, would necessarily consider whether the possession of that roadstead is so important as to justify the debarkation of a large body of land troops, and to attempt to carry the works by regular approaches; and this in the face of the strenuous efforts which would be made to relieve it by all the aids afforded by the most improved facilities of communication, and by the light and heavy steam batteries which, upon the approach of war, would be launched upon the Chesapeake, and which, during periods of calm or in certain winds, could approach the hostile ships, and drive them from their anchorage or compel them to surrender, and most of which, from their draught of water, could take refuge in the inlets that other armed vessels could not enter. And even if the works were carried, they could not be maintained without the most enormous expense, nor, in fact, without efforts which no Government three thousand miles off could well make; and all this while Lynnhaven bay, York bay, the Rappahannock, Tangier island, the mouth of the Potomac, and many other places, furnish secure anchorage, and are positions from which an enemy, having the superiority, could not be excluded, and while, in fact, a great part of the Chesapeake may be considered as affording good anchorage ground for large ships. Neither of them is equal to Hampton Roads, but most or all of them furnish stations for occupation and observation which would render it unnecessary to purchase the superior advantages of Hampton Roads by the sacrifice and hazard which would attend the effort. The occlusion of this roadstead does not secure Norfolk; important as it is, from its commerce and navy yard; it only prevents the access of ships of war to it, and against these there is an interior line of defence, which may be considered as accessory to, and, if necessary, independent of, the other. And a land force, deeming the destruction of the navy yard at Norfolk a sufficient object to justify such an expedition, would not set down before Fort Monroe, if its scale of defence were far inferior to what it now is, but would debark at Lynnhaven bay, where there is no impediment, and march in five or six hours through an open country to Norfolk.

New York is, in every point of view, our most important harbor, and its defences should provide for every reasonable contingency. The Engineer report recommends three classes of works: an exterior one for the protection of the harbor; an interior one to shut up Raritan bay; and a third to prevent a hostile fleet from approaching the city through the sound, nearer than the vicinity of Throg's Point. The importance of the first class cannot be doubted. That of the second depends on the value of Raritan bay to an enemy as an anchorage ground, and on the utility of excluding him from a landing at Gravesend bay, upon Long Island, whence an army could march, without obstruction, to Brooklyn and New York. The third is proposed to be erected, in order to bar his access to the lower part of the sound, or, more accurately speaking, to prevent his reaching Hell-gate, a natural barrier, which no fleet could pass, and which is within ten miles of the city. Here, if his aim were New York, he would land, and would find no works to prevent his approach. The two forts proposed to be erected at Throg's Neck and Wilkins's Point, eight miles further up the sound, would compel him to debark beyond the reach of their guns, and would thus add that distance to his march, while, on the north shore, Harlem river would be interposed between him and the city. On the Long Island side there would be no difference but that occasioned by the distance.

It is obvious, then, that, in the consideration of this plan, involving an estimated expenditure, in the aggregate, of $5,807,969, and efficient garrisons, in time of war, of nine thousand men, a close investigation should be made into all the circumstances likely to influence the operations of an enemy. Is the anchorage ground between the Narrows and Sandy Hook of sufficient value to an enemy, looking to the risk of his occupation of the coast, and to the doubts that may be reasonably entertained of the result of so great an experiment, to be carried on, in fact, in the sea, to authorize the commencement of these works without a new examination? Or is the probability of the disembarkation of an army at Gravesend bay, in preference to some other point upon the coast of Long Island, if a convenient one exists, so great as to require these preparations? The same questions may be asked respecting Wilkins's Point. The work at Throg's Point is in the process of construction; and as the river is only about three fourths of a mile wide at this place, I think its completion would be sufficient for this line of defence till the proposed general examination can take place.

The situation of New York affords a fine theatre for the operation of floating batteries; and whether a sufficient number of them would secure it from the designs of an enemy, better than the full completion of the extensive system of permanent fortifications recommended, is a question deserving investigation. Such an investigation I recommend; and after all the necessary facts and considerations are presented, the Government should proceed to place this commercial metropolis of the country in a state of security.

The works at Newport cover about twenty acres, and will mount 468 guns, and will need for their defence about two thousand four hundred men. I cannot, myself, foresee the existence of any circumstances which now call for a fortress of this magnitude in the very heart of New England, constructed, not merely to command the harbor of Newport, but to resist a siege which would, probably, require nearly twenty thousand men to carry it on. I am at a loss to conjecture what adequate motive could induce a foreign Government to detach a fleet and army upon this enterprise. The expense would be enormous. The French army that invaded Egypt was less than 40,000 men, and required for its protection and transportation between 500 and 600 vessels. The army that conquered Algiers was about equal in force, and required, it is said, about 400 transports, besides the ships of war. This scale of preparation for enterprises against the shores of the Mediterranean may enable us to form some conception of the arrangements that would be necessary to send across the ocean to this country, in the present day of its power, an expedition strong enough to form an establishment upon our shores, and to furnish it with supplies necessary to its subsistence and operation.

It has been supposed, indeed, by the board of engineers, that an army would find sufficient reason for the occupation of Rhode Island, in the consideration that it would afford a secure lodgment whence expeditions could be sent to every part of our coast. But it is to be observed that no part of Narragansett bay is necessary for the safety of a hostile fleet, watching that part of our coast. Gardiner's bay, in that vicinity, is a most safe and convenient station, which was occupied by the British during almost the whole of the late war; and it is pretty clear that it cannot be defended by any stationary fortifications that can be constructed. If it can, by floating batteries, so may Narragansett bay, and the enemy thus be prevented from occupying the latter also, without these extensive arrangements, requiring, after Fort Adams shall have been completed at an expense of one million three hundred and twelve thousand dollars, four other forts and a sea wall to be constructed, and eleven hundred and fifty-seven thousand dollars to be expended.

I do not think that the most prudent forecast ought to lead to the apprehension that a force competent to seize such a position would be sent to our country, or that any circumstances could enable them to maintain it in the face of the vigorous efforts that would be made to recover it, and in the midst of a country abounding in all the means to give effect to their exertions. But perhaps the most striking objection to the completion of this extensive plan is, that, under no possible circumstance, can it effect the desired object. That object, if I understand it, is not the mere exclusion of an enemy from Rhode Island, but it is to prevent him from taking possession of a safe and convenient position, whence he could detach his forces, by means of his naval superiority, to any other part of the coast, which would thus be exposed to his depredations.

The value of Gardiner's bay, as a place of naval rendezvous, I have already described. Block island, in its neighborhood, could be occupied by troops desiring only a lodgment; and so could Nantucket island and Martha's Vineyard, and these are only a few hours' sail from Narragansett bay. Buzzard's bay is also a safe and capacious harbor, which cannot be defended, and Martha's Vineyard sound affords commodious places of anchorage. A fleet riding in these moorings would have under its command all the islands in this group, and could secure its communications with its land forces, encamped upon them, which would thus be enabled, at any proper time, to throw itself upon other parts of the coast. It may be doubted, if there were not a cannon mounted upon Rhode Island, whether an enemy, acquainted with the topography and resources of this country, would select it as his place of arms, if I may so term it, when there are islands in the neighborhood which would answer this purpose nearly as well, and where he would be in perfect safety as long as he could maintain his naval ascendancy; and longer than that he could not, under any circumstances, occupy Rhode Island. And if I rightly appreciate the strength and spirit of that part of the country, his tenure, in any event, would be short and difficult. I do not mean to convey the idea that Rhode Island should not be defended. I think it should be; but I do not think that precautions should be taken against events which are not likely to happen. As there is no naval establishment here, it is not necessary to enter into any question concerning defensive arrangements exclusively connected with that object.

It will be perceived, also, that it is proposed to fortify Mount Desert island, on the coast of Maine, and that the expense is estimated at five hundred thousand dollars, and the number of the garrison competent to maintain it at one thousand men. This proposition is founded, not on the value of this harbor to us, for its possesses little, and is, in effect, unoccupied, but on account of its importance to the enemy. Were there no other secure position they could occupy in that quarter, and which could not be defended, I should think the views submitted upon this branch of the subject entitled to great weight. But there are many indentations upon this coast, affording safe anchorage, and which are either not capable of being defended, or, from their great number, would involve an enormous expense, which no sound views of the subject could justify. An enemy, therefore, cannot be deprived of the means of stationing himself upon this coast. And before this expenditure of Mount Desert island is encountered, it ought to be clearly ascertained that the difference, in its practical advantages to an enemy, between the occupation of Mount Desert island and that of some of the other roadsteads in this quarter, incapable of defence, would be sufficiently great to warrant this measure. My present impression is, that it would not.

And on the subject of roadsteads, generally, with a few exceptions, depending on their local positions, I am inclined to the opinion that any attempt to fortify them would be injudicious. I do not speak of harbors and inlets which are occupied by cities and towns, but of mere anchorage grounds, deriving their value from the shelter they afford. If all could be defended, and an enemy excluded from them, the advantages would justify any reasonable expenditure. But this is impracticable; and I doubt whether the circumstances in which most of them differ give such marked superiority to those we can defend over those we cannot, as to lead to any attempt to fortify them, in the first instance, and to maintain garrisons in them during a war.

I have adverted to these particular cases, in order to present my views more distinctly than I could do by mere general observations; certainly not from the remotest design of criticising the reports and the labors of the able professional men to whom the subject has been referred, nor of pursuing the investigation into any further detail.

I consider the duty of the Government to afford adequate protection to the seacoast a subject of paramount obligation; and I believe we are called upon, by every consideration of policy, to push the necessary arrangements as rapidly as the circumstances of the country and the proper execution of the work will allow. I think every town large enough to tempt the cupidity of an enemy should be defended by works, fixed or floating, suited to its local position, and sufficiently extensive to resist such attempts as would probably be made against it. There will, of course, after laying down such a general rule, be much latitude of discretion in its application. Upon this branch of the subject, I would give to the opinion of the engineer officers great and almost controlling weight, after the proper limitations are established. These relate, principally, to the magnitude of the works; and if I am correct in the views I have taken of this branch of the subject, a change in the system proposed is necessary. Works should not be projected upon the presumption that they are to be exposed to, and must be capable of resisting, the attacks of a European army, with its battering train, and all its preparations for a regular siege. Neither our relative circumstances, nor those of any nation with which we shall probably be brought into conflict, can justify us in such an anticipation. All the defences should be projected upon a scale proportioned to the importance of the place, and should be calculated to resist any naval attack, and any sudden assault that a body of land troops might make upon them. But further than this, it appears to me, we ought not to go. The results at Stonington, at Mobile Point, at Fort Jackson, and at Baltimore, during the late war, show that formidable armaments may be successfully resisted with apparently inferior means. These, indeed, do not furnish examples to be followed, as to the scale of our preparations; but they show what stationary batteries have done in our country against ships of war.

It is to be observed that the great object of our fortifications is to exclude a naval force from our harbors. This end they ought fully to answer; and in this problem there are two conditions to be fulfilled:

1st. That they be able to resist any naval batteries that will probably be placed against them; and

2d. That they be also able to resist any coup de main or escalade which might be attempted by land.

An open battery, under many circumstances, might fulfil the first condition, but not the second, and therefore these works should be closed and regularly constructed. It is not to be denied that the proper boundary between the magnitude and nature of the works necessary to attain the objects indicated, and those required to resist, successfully, a formal investment, will sometimes become a matter of doubt; nor that circumstances may not be stated which might induce an enemy to open his trenches against one of these works, because its capacity for defence was not greater. That capacity, however, with relation to the question under consideration, has a far more intimate connexion with the magnitude than with the form of the works, because, if unnecessarily large, they entail upon the country a serious evil in the increased means for their defence, independently of the additional expense in their construction. It is principally, therefore, in the latter point of view that I have presented the doubts which I have expressed upon this point.

Among the hypothetical cases heretofore stated by the board of engineers, was one which supposed that an army of twenty thousand men might be assembled upon one of the flanks of our coast, and that we ought to be prepared, at every important point, to resist the first shock of such a force. I have already glanced at the reasons, geographical, political, financial, and prudential, which, in my opinion, leave little room to expect that any enemy will, hereafter, project an enterprise of this magnitude, so certain in its expense, so uncertain in its result, and so disproportioned to any object which could probably be attained. And the suggestion which was made by the board, of defending the city of Washington, by works erected near the mouth of the Patuxent, proceeds upon similar views. Our navy, our floating batteries, our means of communication and concentration, seem to me far better adapted to the defence of this city than forts at the distance of nearly fifty miles, whose principal effect, if an enemy were resolved upon the enterprise, would be to compel him to make a detour in his expedition, or which would send him to some part of the coast of the bay between the Patuxent and Annapolis, or into the Potomac, where his descent would be uninterrupted, and where he would be but little, if any, further from Washington than at the head of navigation of the Patuxent.

Even during the last war, when the navy of Great Britain rode triumphant upon the ocean, but one serious attempt was made to force an entrance into a fortified harbor, and that was unsuccessful. The greatest possible force which can be brought, and the greatest possible resistance which can be applied, do not constitute a practical rule for the construction of our fixed defences. Moral considerations must also have weight. Probabilities must be examined. The power of the permanent batteries is one of the elements of security. So are the dangers of dispersion, and shipwreck, and all the hazards of a distant expedition, as these must operate on the councils of any country meditating such an enterprise, the efforts of our navy, the co-operation of the floating defences, and the troops which may be ready to meet the enemy upon his debarkation or march.

In submitting these reflections, I am desirous only of discharging the duty confided to me. I am gratified that the whole subject will be presented for the consideration of Congress in a systematic form, and that the principles of its future prosecution can now be settled. The plan originally devised was recommended upon great consideration, and, at the time its initiatory measures were adopted, was calculated for the state of the country. We had just come out of a severe struggle, and had felt the want of adequate preparation, and, above all, we had seen and deplored the circumstances which gave the enemy undisturbed possession of the Chesapeake, and its disastrous consequences; and it was to be expected that our arrangements for future defence should be planned upon the then existing state of things. I imagine there were few who did not concur in this sentiment. Because, therefore, some of our works, from the wonderful advancement of the country in all the elements of power, and from the development of new means of annoyance, are larger than are found necessary at this time, still this does not bring into question the wisdom of the original measure. And, as it is, they are most valuable and useful; but the experience we have acquired may be profitably employed in re-examining the plans proposed for the prosecution of the system, and in inquiring whether the change which has taken place in the condition of the country will not justify a corresponding change in the nature of our preparations, and whether we may not depend more upon floating and less upon stationary defences.

During the period which has intervened since the last war, we have nearly doubled in our population, and all our other resources have probably increased in a still greater ratio. Certainly, some of the facilities and means of defence are augmented beyond any rational expectations. The power of transporting troops and munitions of war has already opened new views upon this subject; and such is the progress and probable extent of the new system of intercommunication, that the time will soon come when almost any amount of physical force may be thrown, in a few hours, upon any point threatened by an enemy. Nashville may succor New Orleans in sixty hours; Cincinnati may aid Charleston in about the same time; Pittsburg will require but twenty-four hours to relieve Baltimore, and troops from that city and from Boston may leave each place in the morning, and meet in New York in the evening. This wonderful capacity for movement increases, in effect, some of the most important elements of national power. It neutralizes one of the great advantages of an assailing force, choosing its point of attack, and possessing the necessary means of reaching it. Detachments liable, under former circumstances, to be cut off in detail, may now be concentrated without delay, and most of the garrisons upon the seaboard may be brought together, and, after accomplishing the object of their concentration, be returned to their stations in time to repel any attack meditated against them.

The improvements which are making in the application of steam have furnished another most important agent in the work of national protection. There can be but little doubt that floating batteries, propelled by this agent, will be among the most efficient means of coast defence. In our large estuaries, such as the bays of New York, of the Delaware, and of the Chesapeake, they will be found indispensable; and one of the most important advantages to be anticipated from the works at Old Point Comfort is the security they will afford to the floating batteries co-operating with them, and which will find a secure shelter in Hampton Roads. A hostile fleet, about to enter the Chesapeake, would certainly calculate the means of annoyance to which it would be exposed by these formidable vessels. During a calm they would take a distant position, insuring their own safety, while, with their heavy guns, they might cripple and destroy the enemy; and their power of motion would enable them, under almost all circumstances, to approach the fleet, and to retire, when necessary, where they could not be pursued. I think it doubtful whether a squadron would anchor in the Chesapeake, or proceed up it, if a competent number of these batteries were maintained and placed in proper positions.

These considerations may well lead us to doubt the necessity of such extensive permanent works, while their non-existence at the time the system was adopted justifies the views which then prevailed; and, without advancing any rash conjecture, we may anticipate such improvements in this branch of the public service as will make it the most efficient means of coast defence. These vessels, properly constructed, may become floating forts almost equal to permanent fortifications in their power of annoyance and defence, and in other advantages far superior to them. Being transferable defences, they can be united upon any point, and a few of them be thus enabled to protect various places. We have been brought by circumstances to a more rigid investigation of our means of defence, and to a re-examination of the whole subject. After an interval of twenty years of tranquillity, public sentiment and the attention of the Government were, by unexpected circumstances, more forcibly directed to this matter. The result cannot fail to be advantageous. The whole subject can be now re-examined by Congress, with all the benefits which much experience has brought, and with the advantage of adapting the system to the advanced state of the country.

There are two bills for fortifications now pending before Congress. One before the House, amounting to $2,180,000, and intended to prosecute works already actually commenced. The estimates for this bill may therefore be considered necessary in themselves, under any view of the general subject, and not unreasonable in amount for the present year, because they include the operations of two years. The incidental expenses, however, may be safely reduced one half, as it will not be necessary to make such extensive repairs as were considered requisite when the estimates were prepared.

The bill pending before the Senate contains appropriations for nineteen new works, and for the sum of $600,000, to be expended for steam batteries. The estimates on which this bill was founded were prepared at a time when prudence required that arrangements should be made for a different state of things from that which now exists. An examination of the general system of defence was not then expedient; and the means of protecting the most exposed points, agreeably to information previously collected, were asked of Congress. It was no time then to stop, and, instead of prosecuting established plans vigorously, to lose the period of action by surveys, and examinations, and discussions. But the opportunity is now afforded, without danger to the public interest, of applying the principles suggested to the works under consideration.

It cannot be doubted but that fortifications at the following places, enumerated in this bill, will be necessary:

At Penobscot bay, for the protection of Bangor, &c.; at Kennebeck river; at Portland; at Portsmouth; at Salem; at New Bedford; at New London; upon Staten Island; at Soller's Flats; a redoubt on Federal Point; for the Barancas; for Fort St. Philip.

These proposed works all command the approach to places sufficiently important to justify their construction under any circumstances that will probably exist. I think, therefore, that the public interest would be promoted by the passage of the necessary appropriations for them. As soon as these are made, such of these positions as may appear to require it can be examined, and the form and extent of the works adapted to existing circumstances, if any change be desirable. The construction of those not needing examination can commence immediately, and that of the others as soon as the plans are determined upon. By this proceeding, therefore, a season may be saved in the operations.

The other works contained in this bill are:

For Provincetown.—And this proposition may be safely submitted to another inquiry, as the practicability of excluding an enemy from any shelter in Massachusetts bay, a matter of deep interest, and as a work at Provincetown, are closely connected.

For Rhode Island, Narragansett bay.—This work may await the result of the views that may be eventually taken on the subject of fortifying this bay.

For a work at the Delaware, outlet of the Chesapeake and Delaware canal.—This may be postponed without injury till next season; and, in the mean time, a project for the floating defences of the Delaware considered, and perhaps the size of the proposed work reduced.

For a work at the Breakwater.—Until the effect of the deposits which are going on in this important artificial harbor are fully ascertained, I consider it injudicious to erect a permanent work for its defence. Another year will, perhaps, settle the question; and if the result is favorable, an adequate fortification should be constructed here without delay.

For a fort on the Patuxent river, and for a fort at Cedar Point.—Both of these works are liable to some of the objections stated, and I think they had better be postponed for more mature consideration.

For fortifications at the mouth of the St. Mary's, Georgia.—This proposition may also be safely submitted to examination.

The estimate for steam batteries may be reduced to $100,000. That sum can be profitably employed.

If these appropriations are early made, most, if not all, these works can be put in operation this season, and the money usefully applied, as fast as their progress will justify; and I think the measure would be expedient. But it is to be remembered that the power of the Department to push them, during the present year, will depend on the reorganization of the corps of engineers. If that corps is not increased, it will be unnecessary to make the appropriations in the bill before the Senate, as the objects contained in the other bill will be sufficient to occupy the time of the present officers of the corps.

Should it be deemed proper to re-examine the subject of the proposed fortifications generally, I would then recommend that an appropriation of $30,000 be made to defray the expenses of a board, including surveyors, &c.

My reflections upon the whole subject lead to the following practical suggestions on the great subject of the measures for the defence of the country:

1. An augmentation of the navy, upon the principles before stated.

2. The adoption of an efficient plan for the organization of the militia.

Having already, in two of the annual reports I have had the honor to make to you, expressed my sentiments upon this subject, I have nothing new to lay before you, either with relation to its general importance, or to the necessary practical details. I consider it one of the most momentous topics that can engage the attention of Congress; and the day that sees a plan of organization adopted, suited to the habits of our people and the nature of our institutions, and fitted to bring into action the physical strength of the country, with a competent knowledge of their duty, and just ideas of discipline and subordination, will see us the strongest nation, for the purposes of self-defence, on the face of the globe. Certainly such an object is worthy the attention of the Legislature.

3. The cultivation of military science, that we may keep pace with the improvements which are made in Europe, and not be compelled to enter into a contest with an adversary whose superior knowledge would give him pre-eminent advantages. War is an advancing science. Many an original genius and many an acute intellect are at all times at work upon it; and the European communities have such a relation to one another, that the profession of arms is peculiarly encouraged, and every effort made to place their military establishments, not at the highest numerical point, but in the best condition for efficient service, both with respect to its morale and materiel. It is not by the mere reading of professional authors that the necessary instruction in this branch of knowledge can be obtained; there must be study and practice; a union of principle and details, which can best be obtained by a course of education directed to this object. This, I think, is one of the greatest advantages of the Military Academy. It cannot have escaped the recollection of those who were upon the theatre of action at the commencement of the last war, that the first year was almost spent in a series of disasters, which, however, brought their advantages. We were comparatively ignorant of the state of military science, and we did not fully recover our true position till we had received many severe lessons; at what an expense of life and treasure need not be stated.

4. The skeleton of a regular establishment, to which any necessary additions may be made, securing, at the same time, economy, with a due power of expansion, and the means of meeting a war with all the benefit of a regularly organized force. This object is attained by our present army.

5. The preparation and proper distribution of all the munitions of war, agreeably to the views hereinafter submitted.

6. I think all the defensive works now in the process of construction should be finished, agreeably to the plans upon which they have been projected.

7. All the harbors and inlets upon the coast, where there are cities or towns whose situation and importance create just apprehension of attack, and particularly where we have public naval establishments, should be defended by works proportioned to any exigency that may probably arise.

Having already presented my general views upon this branch of the inquiry, I need not repeat the practical limitations which I propose for adoption. But before any expenditure is incurred for new works, I think an examination should be made, in every case, in order to apply these principles to the proposed plan of operations, and thus reduce the expense of construction where this can properly be done, and, also, the eventual expense of maintaining garrisons required to defend works disproportioned to the objects sought to be attained. I would organize a board for this object, with special instructions for its government.

8. Provision should be made for the necessary experiments, to test the superiority of the various plans that may be offered for the construction and use of steam batteries; I mean batteries to be employed as accessories in the defence of the harbors and inlets, and in aid of the permanent fortifications.

The progressive improvement in the application of the power of steam renders it inexpedient, at any given time, to make extensive arrangements, connected with this class of works, with a view to their future employment. The improvement of to-day may be superseded by the experience of to-morrow; and modes of application may be discovered, before any exigency arises, rendering a resort to these defences necessary, which may introduce an entire revolution into this department of art and industry. Still, however, experiments should be made, and a small number of these vessels constructed. Their proper draught of water, their form and equipment, the situation and security of their machinery, the number, caliber, and management of their guns, and the best form of the engines to be used, are questions requiring much consideration, and which can only be determined by experience. And there can be little doubt that suitable rewards would soon put in operation the inventive faculties of some of our countrymen, and lead to the tender of plans practically suited to the circumstances. As we acquire confidence by our experience, arrangements could be made for collecting and preparing the indestructible materials for the construction and equipment of these vessels, as far as such a measure may not interfere with any probable change which at the time may be anticipated in the application of the power of steam.

9. I recommend a reconsideration of the project for fortifying the roadsteads or open anchorage grounds, and its better adaptation to the probable future circumstances of the country.

And I would suggest that the works which are determined on be pushed with all reasonable vigor, that our whole coast may be placed beyond the reach of injury or insult, as soon as a just regard to circumstances will permit. No objections can arise to this procedure on the ground of expense, because, whatever system may be approved by the Legislature, nothing will be gained by delaying its completion beyond the time necessary to the proper execution of the work. In fact, the cost will be greater the longer we are employed in it, not only for obvious reasons, arising out of general superintendence and other contingencies, but because accidents are liable to happen to unfinished works, and the business upon them is deranged by the winter, when they must be properly secured; and the season for resuming labor always finds some preparations necessary which would not have been required had no interruption happened.

But the political considerations which urge forward this great object are entitled to much more weight. When once completed, we should feel secure. There is probably not a man in the country who did not look with some solicitude, during the past season, at our comparatively defenceless condition, when the issue of our discussions with France was uncertain; and who did not regret that our preparations, during the long interval of peace we had enjoyed, had not kept pace with our growth and importance. We have now this lesson to add to our other experience. Adequate security is not only due from the Government to the country, and the conviction of it is not only satisfactory, but the knowledge of its existence cannot fail to produce an influence upon other nations, as well in the advent of war itself as in the mode of conducting it. If we are prepared to attack and resist, the chances of being compelled to embark in hostilities will be diminished much in proportion to our preparation. An unprotected commerce, a defenceless coast, and a military marine wholly inadequate to the wants of our service, would indeed hold out strong inducements to other nations to convert trifling pretexts into serious causes of quarrel.

There are two suggestions connected with the prosecution of our works, which I venture to make:

First. That the corps of engineers should be increased. The reasons for this measure have been heretofore submitted, and the proposition has been recommended by you to Congress. I will merely add, upon the present occasion, that the officers of this corps are not sufficiently numerous for the performance of the duties committed to them; and that if an augmentation does not take place, the public interest will suffer in a degree far beyond the value of any pecuniary consideration connected with this increase. And,

Secondly. I think that, when the plan of a work has been approved by Congress, and its construction authorized, the whole appropriation should be made at once, to be drawn from the Treasury in annual instalments, to be fixed by the law. This mode of appropriation would remedy much of the inconvenience which has been felt for years in this branch of the public service. The uncertainty respecting the appropriations annually deranges the business, and the delay which biennially takes place in the passage of the necessary law reduces the alternate season of operations to a comparatively short period. An exact inquiry into the effect which the present system of making the appropriations has had upon the expense of the works would probably exhibit an amount far greater than is generally anticipated.

The report from the Ordnance department shows the quantity and nature of the munitions of war estimated to be eventually necessary, and their probable cost, including new establishments necessary for their fabrication and preservation. The conjectural amount is $29,955,537.

Believing it is not expedient, at present, to make any preparations upon a scale of this magnitude, I have deemed it proper to accompany this report with a brief statement of my own views, where I depart from the suggestions that are presented in this document.

As our fortifications are constructed, their armaments should be provided; and the amount in depot should at all times exceed the anticipated demand, to meet the casualties of the service. We have now on hand 1,818 new cannon for seacoast defence, and about 1,000 others, most of which are either useless or of doubtful character. The works actually finished, or so far completed as to admit of a part of their armament being placed in them, require about 2,000 guns. They are calculated ultimately to mount about 600 more. Others in the process of construction will require about 1,400. So far we have certain data for our estimates; unless, indeed, which I am inclined to believe, it should not be found necessary ever to provide the full complement destined for the largest of these works. Beyond this the subject is conjectural. And the quantity needed must depend upon the principles that may be adopted in the further progress of the system of fortifications. There are four private foundries at which the public cannon are cast. These, if their whole attention were devoted to the object, could manufacture from 1,200 to 1,500 annually. As to carriages and other supplies, the amount that could be procured within a reasonable period is almost indefinite. Iron carriages are now made for all the casemate batteries, and they have not only the advantage of indestructibility from the atmosphere, but, requiring no seasoned materials, they may be supplied by the foundries through the country to almost any extent.

We have two armories for the manufacture of small arms, and there are seven private establishments which fabricate arms for the Government. All these supplies are of the best description, and are submitted to a rigid inspection, which prevents imposition. The armories can at present turn out about 27,000 arms annually, and probably 11,000 or 12,000 could be made at existing private establishments. Should any exigency require larger supplies, the quantity can be much increased. We have now on hand about 700,000 small arms, and there have been issued to the States about 180,000 muskets, 25,000 rifles, 30,000 pistols, and 378 field cannon and carriages, under the act for arming the militia. If 100,000 of these muskets and rifles are preserved, there are in the country 800,000 of those species of arms belonging to the General or State Governments.

What may be considered a proper supply, is a question admitting much difference of opinion. It will be seen that the Ordnance department fixes the amount at about 600,000, in addition to what are now on hand, and including the number necessary to arm the militia. We had, at the commencement of the last war, 240,000 muskets, and during its progress 60,000 more were made and purchased. At its termination there were but 20,000 at the various arsenals. The residue were in the hands of the troops, or had been lost in the service. This consumption was greater, I think, than was necessary, or than would probably again take place. A plan of accountability has been introduced, by which the men are charged with the arms they receive; and if these are improperly lost or injured, the value is deducted from their pay. The paymasters cannot settle with them till this matter is adjusted.

The stock of small arms in Great Britain, in depot, in 1817, was	-	-	-	818,282
In the public service,	-	-	-	200,974
Total,	-	-	-	1,019,256

The number in depot in France, in 1811, was 600,000, not including the great number in service.

My own impression is, that 1,000,000 small arms may be considered a competent supply for the United States; and if so, a large deduction may be made from the estimate of the Ordnance department, under this head of expenditure. Although the component materials of these arms are almost imperishable, still it is not expedient to keep a stock unnecessarily large on hand; because there is not only some risk and expense in their preservation, but because, like every other article manufactured by man, they are no doubt susceptible of great improvement. And it may be that those now made may be superseded by an improved model, which, once introduced, must be adopted, at whatever expense or inconvenience, by all nations. And the ingenious invention lately exhibited in this city, by which a series of balls in separate charges are brought, by a rotary motion, to a common place of discharge, suggests the possibility of a revolution in the form of our firearms.

On the subject of depots for these arms, I accord with the general suggestions made by the Colonel of Ordnance. I think the number should be increased, and arms placed in every part of the country, ready to be used as circumstances may require.

It will be observed that, in the estimate I have made, I confine myself to the armament for the public service, connected with the actual defence of the country, whether to be used by the army or militia, in time of war; but I do not extend my views to a supply for arming the militia, in order to discipline them in time of peace. The extent of this policy is a question not necessary in the consideration of the subject before me.

As the arms in depot approach whatever number may be assumed as the proper maximum, the necessity for additional armories becomes less. When our stock is once completed, the present armories, without any aid from the private establishments, will be able to supply the annual consumption. I think, therefore, that two additional armories, as suggested by the Ordnance department, are not wanted. And, indeed, although there are considerations attending the transportation of the crude and the manufactured article, and other circumstances, which would justify the establishment of a new armory upon the Western waters at present, yet, if the measure is not carried into effect soon, its importance will annually diminish.

But a national foundry for cannon, both for the military and naval service, and perhaps two, in different sections of the country, should be erected without delay. The best interests of the public require it. But I have nothing to add to the suggestions made upon this subject in my last annual report.

As to field artillery, the extent to which it shall be provided must depend upon the views of the Legislature concerning the expediency of issuing it to the militia. If a more efficient organization does not take place, I think the expenditure on this account may well be saved to the public Treasury. I consider all attempts to improve the condition of the militia upon the present plan as so nearly useless, that the whole system has become a burden upon the public, without any corresponding advantage. The principal benefit which results from the existing state of things is the power to call into service such portions of the population as may be wanted. But this may be attained by a simple classification, without the cumbrous machinery which at present creates expense and trouble, and which, while it promises little, performs still less.

Very respectfully, sir, I have the honor to be, &c.

OFFICIAL REPORT FROM THE NAVY DEPARTMENT.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, March 31, 1836.

SIR: In answer to so much of the resolutions of the Senate of the United States of the 18th ultimo, as required information as to "the probable amount of appropriations that may be necessary to supply the United States with ordnance, arms, and munitions of war, which a proper regard to self-defence would require to be always on hand, and the probable amount that would be necessary to place the naval defences of the United States (including the increase of the navy, navy yards, dock yards, and steam or floating batteries) upon the footing of strength and respectability which is due to the security and welfare of the Union," I have the honor to lay before you a report of the Board of Navy Commissioners of the 2d instant, which contains the best information upon the subjects referred to in the possession of this Department; which is respectfully submitted.

MAHLON DICKERSON.

To the President of the United States.

NAVY COMMISSIONERS' OFFICE,

March 2, 1836.

SIR: The Board of Navy Commissioners have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 26th ultimo, requesting a "report on the probable amount that would be necessary to supply the United States with the ordnance, arms, and munitions of war, (so far as may be wanted for the purposes of the navy,) which a proper regard to self-defence would require to be always on hand, and on the probable amount that would be necessary to place the naval defences of the United States (including the increase of the navy, navy yards, dock yards, and steam or floating batteries) upon the footing of strength and respectability which is due to the security and welfare of the Union."

In conformity to these instructions, the Board respectfully state, with respect to the ordnance for the navy, that, after a careful examination of the subject, taking into consideration the ordnance and ordnance stores now on hand, and the extent of force for which it may be expedient to make early provision, they are of opinion that the sum of one million eight hundred thousand two hundred and fifty dollars will be required to supply the ordnance, arms, and munitions of war, which may be wanted for the use of the navy, and which a proper regard to self-defence would require to have prepared ready for use. (See paper A, annexed, for the detail.)

The Board beg leave respectfully to observe, that, for the vessels which are now built, or have been specially authorized, armaments may be provided, with some partial exceptions, from the cannon and carronades already provided, and the deficient ordnance, arms, and other ordnance stores, will be principally required for the vessels which are yet to be authorized or built. It is therefore respectfully recommended that any appropriation for this purpose, instead of being special or separate, should be included in an appropriation for "building and repairing vessels, and for the purchase of materials and stores for the navy."

The second object of inquiry, as to "the probable amount that would be necessary to place the naval defences of the United States (including the increase of the navy, navy yards, dock yards, and steam or floating batteries) upon the footing of strength and respectability which is due to the security and welfare of the Union," embraces a wide range, requires an examination of several subjects of great importance, and the expression of opinions upon which differences of opinion may and probably will exist. Before any estimate can be formed of the probable amount that would be necessary for the purposes proposed, an examination must be had, and an opinion formed, of the nature and extent of the naval force which is "necessary to place the naval defences of the United States upon the footing of strength and respectability which is due to the security and welfare of the Union," and the time within which it ought to be, or might be, advantageously prepared.

Taking into view the geographical position of the United States, with reference to other nations with whom we are most likely to be brought into future collision; the great extent of our maritime frontier, and the extreme importance of securing the communications of the whole valley of the Mississippi, through the Gulf of Mexico, and the intercourse between all parts of the coast; the efficient protection of our widely extended and extremely valuable commerce, under all circumstances; and the great naval and fiscal resources of the country, the Board consider the proper limit for the extent of the naval force to be that which can be properly manned, when the country may be involved in a maritime war.

In estimating this extent, it is assumed that about ninety thousand seamen are employed in the foreign and coasting trade and fisheries. As the navigation has been generally increasing, there is little reason to apprehend any immediate diminution during peace. In any war which would require the employment of all our naval force, it is believed that such interruptions would occur to our commerce as would enable the navy to obtain, without difficulty, at least thirty thousand seamen and ordinary seamen; and if it should continue long, it is probable that a larger number might be engaged. The number of thirty thousand, with the landmen who may be safely combined with them, will therefore be assumed as the number for which vessels ought to be prepared, for the commencement of a state of hostilities.

With respect to the nature of the force which it would be most advantageous to prepare, there will undoubtedly be differences of opinion. The materials for the larger vessels, as ships of the line and frigates, would be obtained with great difficulty, under circumstances which should interfere with our coasting trade, whilst sloops of war and smaller vessels could be built with greater comparative facility, under such circumstances.

The preparation of a considerable number of steam vessels, ready to defend our great estuaries, to aid the operations of our other naval force, and in the concentration or movements of the military force, as circumstances might require, is believed to demand serious and early attention.

Having due regard to these and other considerations, the Board propose that the force to be prepared, ready for use when circumstances may require it, shall consist of 15 ships of the line, 25 frigates, 25 sloops of war, 25 steamers, and 25 smaller vessels; and that the frames and other timber, the copper, ordnance, tanks, and chain cables, shall also be prepared for 10 ships of the line and 10 frigates.

The force proposed to be prepared, ready for use, will employ, and can be manned by, the 30,000 seamen and others which have been considered available in a state of war. The materials for the 10 ships of the line and 10 frigates will constitute a necessary reserve for increasing the number of those vessels, should they be required, or for supplying losses from decay or casualties.

To estimate the amount necessary to prepare this force, it is proposed to ascertain the whole probable cost, including ordnance, by the average cost of similar vessels already built, (steam vessels excepted,) and of materials already procured, and then to deduct the value of the present force, and all other present available means.

In presenting any estimate for the amounts which may be necessary to place the different navy yards in a proper situation, the Board can do no more than give very general opinions, as the objects of expenditure are foreign to their own professional pursuits, and they have no civil engineer to whom they can refer for the necessary detailed information.

From a knowledge of the cost of works hitherto completed or in progress, and of the wants at the respective yards for the proper preservation of materials, and for extending the means for building, preserving, repairing, and equipping vessels, they are satisfied, however, that the public interests would be greatly promoted, and, in fact, absolutely require an average annual expenditure of $500,000, for some years to come, upon the different yards.

In New York, the necessity for a dry dock is severely felt already, and its importance will increase with an increase of the navy. This, with its dependencies, will require nearly a million of dollars. At Pensacola, which nature has designated as one of the naval keys of the Gulf of Mexico, and of the immense commerce of the valley of the Mississippi, large expenditures will be necessary to secure adequate means for repairing and subsisting a naval force upon that station, and thus prevent the many evils which would be severely felt in a state of war, if the vessels were obliged to resort to the Atlantic ports for ordinary repairs or supplies of any kind. In other yards, there are objects of great and urgent importance.

Generally, the proposed arrangements for the preservation of all materials and vessels should precede their collection or construction. Whilst, therefore, the Board propose $500,000 as the average annual appropriation until the yards should be placed in proper order, they would also state that appropriations of $700,000 annually for the next four or five years, and a less sum than $500,000 afterwards, would, in their opinion, be most judicious.

The next subject for consideration is, the nature and extent of force proper to be kept employed in a time of peace, for the protection of our commercial interests, and to prepare the officers and others for the efficient management of the force proposed for a state of war.

Our commerce is spread over every ocean; our tonnage is second only to that of Great Britain, and the value of articles embarked is believed by many to be fully equal to those transported by the ships of that nation. In the safety and prosperity of this commerce all the other interests of the United States are deeply interested. It is liable to be disturbed and injured in various modes, unless the power of the country, exerted through its naval force, is ready to protect it. It is, therefore, proposed that small squadrons should be employed upon different stations, subject, at all times, however, to such modifications as circumstances may require.

Of these squadrons, one might be employed in the Mediterranean, and attend to our interests on the west coasts of Spain and Portugal, and southward to the western coast of Morocco and Madeira.

One in the Indian ocean, to visit, successively, the most important commercial points east of the Cape of Good Hope, to China, then to cross the Pacific, visit the northern whaling stations and islands, cruise some time upon the west coast of America, and return by way of Cape Horn, the coast of Brazil, and the windward West India islands.

One in the Pacific ocean, to attend to our interests upon the west coast of America; keeping one or more vessels at or near the Sandwich and other islands which are frequented by our whale ships and other vessels, and, in succession, cross the Pacific, visiting the islands and southern whaling stations, China, and other commercial places, and return, by the way of the Cape of Good Hope, to the United States.

A squadron upon the coast of Brazil, or east coast of South America, might be charged with attention to our interests on the whole of that coast, and upon the north coast, so far as to include the Orinoco. If a ship of the line should be employed on this station, it might be occasionally sent round to the Pacific.

A squadron in the West Indies and Gulf of Mexico will be necessary for, and may be charged with, attention to the protection of our commerce amongst the West India islands and along the coast of South America, from the Orinoco, round to the Gulf of Mexico.

A small coast squadron upon our Atlantic coast might be very advantageously employed in making our officers familiarly and thoroughly acquainted with all our ports and harbors, which would be very useful in a state of war. The vessels would also be ready for any unexpected service, either to transmit information or orders; to reinforce other squadrons, or to visit our Eastern fisheries. Besides this cruising force, it is recommended that a ship of the line be kept in a state of readiness for service, men excepted, at Boston, New York, and Norfolk, and used as receiving-ships for the recruits, as they are collected. This would give the means of furnishing a considerable increase of force, with a very small addition to the current expense.

For the nature and distribution of this force, the following is proposed:

	Line.	Frigates.	Sloops.	Steamers.	Smaller.	Total.
Mediterranean, -	1	2	2	-	2	7
Indian ocean, -	-	1	2	-	1	4
Pacific, -	-	2	3	-	2	7
Brazil, -	1	1	2	-	2	6
West Indies, -	-	1	4	1	2	8

* As receiving-ships.

Considering this force with reference to its power of giving experience to the officers, and qualifying them for the management of the force proposed for war, it appears that, for the force proposed to be actually employed at sea, in peace and in war, the peace force will require and employ about two thirds the number of commanders of squadrons, about one third the captains, and forty one-hundredths of the commanders and lieutenants and masters, which the proposed war force would demand, and midshipmen sufficient to supply the additional number of these last classes which a change to a state of war would require.

Supposing the foregoing force to be that which is to be kept in commission, the next question is, what force will be necessary to keep afloat, to provide the necessary reliefs? The Board believe that this force should be the least which will answer the object proposed, as every vessel when launched is exposed to a decay which is much more rapid than when left under the cover of a tight ship-house.

We have already six ships of the line afloat, which will be fully equal to our present wants, when they are repaired. A reserve of three frigates may be required, but only to be launched when the necessity for it shall arise; for the sloops of war and smaller vessels, it will probably be sufficient to merely keep up the cruising force as proposed, except some extraordinary demand should arise. The force of steam vessels proposed, when distributed at Boston, New York, Norfolk, and Pensacola, would probably meet all the demands of a state of peace, and furnish useful schools for officers, to prepare them for the proper management of others, when they are required. The force to be kept afloat, then, will be assumed at 6 ships of the line, 11 frigates, 15 sloops of war, 4 steamers, and 10 smaller vessels. The annual amount necessary to keep this force in a state of repair, and to supply the wear and tear of stores of cruising vessels, is estimated at $950,000.

The estimated expense of the force which is proposed to be kept in commission, exclusive of the repairs as above stated, and for the pay of the officers of the navy yards, rendezvous, receiving vessels, of superintendents, and civil officers, at all the shore establishments, and at the present cost of those establishments, is—

For pay of officers and seamen in commission, superintendents, and civil officers, and all others, at all the establishments, about	$2,500,000
For provisions,	750,000
For medicines and hospital stores,	60,000
For ordnance stores, powder, &c.	120,000
For contingencies of all kinds,	390,000
Total for the navy branch,	$3,850,000

If the marines are continued as a part of the naval establishment, instead of substituting ordinary seamen and landsmen for them in vessels, and watchmen in navy yards, and transferring the marines to the army as artillery, as has sometimes been suggested, the sum of about $400,000, annually, will be required for that corps.

To determine the annual amount which it may be necessary to appropriate to prepare the vessels and reserve frames and other materials which have been proposed, some time must be assumed, within which they shall be prepared. Believing that reference to the ability of the Treasury to meet the probable demands upon it, for all the purposes of the Government, must necessarily be considered in determining what amount may be allotted to the navy, the Board have examined the reports of the Secretary of the Treasury, and respectfully propose to establish the ordinary annual appropriations for the navy, including the ordnance, at seven millions of dollars.

The operation of such annual appropriations may be seen by the following recapitulation of the proposed heads of expenditure:

For the force in commission, and its dependencies, as before stated,	$3,850,000
--	-------------

The average appropriation for navy yards,	$500,000
For the repairs and wear and tear of vessels,	950,000
For building vessels and purchase of materials,	1,300,000
Total for the navy proper,	6,600,000
For the marine corps,	400,000
	$7,000,000

By the adoption of this gross sum for the navy and its dependencies, and the other items as proposed, $1,300,000 would be annually applied to increasing the number of our vessels and the purchase of materials; and, with this annual expenditure, the deficiency of $17,760,000 would not be supplied sooner than between thirteen and fourteen years, or at about the year 1850. The Board consider this as the most remote period at which the proposed force ought to be ready, and are of opinion that it might be prepared much sooner, should Congress deem it necessary or advisable to make larger appropriations than have been suggested.

The Board have expressed the opinion that no more vessels should be launched than are absolutely necessary to meet the demands for the force to be kept in commission; but, as a necessary consequence, they recommend that the other additional force should be in such a state of readiness, that it may be launched and equipped by the time that men could be obtained for it. This arrangement renders an early attention to the completion of all the building-slips, ship-houses, and launching-ways, at the different yards, so that the ships may be built, and that our docks, wharves, workshops, and storehouses, should be finished; that our ships may be equipped with the greatest economy and despatch, whenever they may be required.

Before concluding this report, the Board would respectfully offer some remarks upon the form of the appropriations, and suggest some attention to existing acts of Congress.

By the separate acts for the gradual increase of the navy, for the gradual improvement of the navy, for building and rebuilding different vessels—altogether seven in number—each appropriation is rendered separate and distinct, although the general object is the same, and requires the use of the same kinds of materials. It is necessary, in conformity to the law of the 3d of March, 1809, that the vouchers, receipts, expenditures, and accounts of each should be kept separately; and, in strictness, no article purchased for one can be applied to the use of another, however desirable or economical such use may be.

It is suggested, therefore, for consideration, whether it might not be very advantageous for Congress to determine, by some general act or resolution, the number and classes of vessels which the President might be authorized to have built, or for which materials might be procured; and then appropriate specially the amounts which might be devoted to those objects, and for keeping the force afloat in repair, under the general head of "For building and repairing vessels, and for purchase of materials and stores."

The adoption of some such plan, and removing the special restrictions which now exist, and requiring, as at present, detailed estimates for the current repairs, and reports of proceedings in building vessels and for purchase of materials, would, it is believed, greatly simplify and diminish the number of accounts at the Treasury Department, and in all the navy yards, without infringing in any degree the principle of special appropriations; would furnish to Congress all the information they now receive, and would enable us at all times to use those materials which are best prepared, and most appropriate for the different objects for which they might be wanted.

The Board beg leave, also, respectfully to state their opinion of the necessity for the services of a competent civil engineer for the navy, to furnish plans and estimates for all hydraulic and civil objects, and to have a general superintendence of their construction, under the direction of the Department. The particular character of these works requires the supervision of such a person, not less from motives of economy in the ordinary expenditures, than from the more important consideration of their proper arrangement, solidity of construction, and durability.

All which is respectfully submitted.

JNO. RODGERS.

To the Hon. M. DICKERSON,
Secretary of the Navy.

A.

Upon the supposition that the naval force to be so prepared that it might be equipped for sea at short notice, shall consist of 15 ships of the line, 25 frigates, 25 sloops of war, 25 steamers, 25 smaller vessels, and that the frames and other durable materials shall be provided for 10 ships of the line and 10 frigates, as a reserve, the following statement shows the total number and character of the armaments which the whole force will require, the number which can be furnished from the ordnance on hand, and the number which will be still required:

	Ships of line.	Frigates.	Sloops.	Steamers.	S. V.
Total No. required,	25	35	25	25	25
On hand, for	11	22	16	00	12
Deficient,	14	13	9	25	13

Besides the bomb-cannon, guns, and carronades, for these armaments, there would be required shot, shells, small arms, pistols, and cutlasses, and a supply of powder sufficient for equipping a strong force, in case of a sudden emergency.

The cost of these objects may be estimated as follows:

Armaments for 14 ships of the line, at $45,000 each,		$630,000
13 frigates,	16,500	214,500
9 sloops,	6,000	54,000
25 steamers,	3,000	75,000
13 smaller vessels,	1,500	19,500

For guns, bomb-cannon, and carronades,	$993,000
100 shot to each gun, and 200 shells to each bomb cannon, and shells for guns,	427,000
8,000 muskets,	100,000
3,500 pairs of pistols,	43,750
8,000 cutlasses,	34,000
9,000 barrels of powder,	202,500
	$1,800,250

A LATER REPORT FROM THE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY.

NAVY DEPARTMENT,

April 27, 1836.

SIR: In answer to the resolution of the Senate of the 19th instant, requiring of this Department "to inform the Senate what is the maximum amount which can be beneficially expended, annually, towards completing the naval defences of the country—embracing, 1st, ordnance and ordnance stores; 2d, gradual increase of the navy, and collection of materials; 3d, repairs; 4th, navy yards and docks, and other incidental heads of expenditure—provided the appropriations for the expenditures be made at once, for a series of years, to be drawn from the Treasury annually, as needed," I have the honor to state that the subject was referred to the Board of Navy Commissioners, whose report is herewith submitted.

In this report they present estimates of much larger amount than those contained in their report of the 2d of March last, as the maximum which, in their opinion, might be beneficially expended, annually, towards completing the naval defences of the country, "without any limit in reference to the means."

It will be perceived that these estimates are based upon the supposition that our naval preparations shall have no limit, except that imposed by a due regard to the public revenues, and by the probable condition of other maritime nations; and that the fixed, immovable fortifications of our country are to be kept within prescribed limits; and also upon the supposition that we shall erect six dry docks in addition to those already completed, to wit: one at Portsmouth, one at Boston, two at New York, one at Norfolk, and one at Pensacola.

Should it not be deemed expedient by Congress to increase our naval preparations to the extent contemplated by the Commissioners; or should the estimates for immovable fortifications, now submitted, be adopted; or should it not be deemed expedient to provide, at this time, for the construction of six dry docks, a corresponding reduction in the amount of the estimates of the Commissioners should be made.

It must also be observed, that the estimates of expenditures are made without regard to the effect they may have upon the commercial shipping interest of the country.

An expenditure of more than a million and a half of dollars annually, for the "gradual increase of the navy, and collection of materials," would, in my opinion, create such a demand for labor and materials as essentially to increase the expense of ship-building, which could not fail to give foreign navigating interests an advantage over our own.

I thought it due to myself, in presenting the report of the Commissioners of the Navy Board, to make the foregoing observations.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

MAHLON DICKERSON.

HON. M. VAN BUREN,
President of the Senate.

NAVY COMMISSIONERS' OFFICE,

April 21, 1836.

SIR: The Commissioners of the Navy have had the honor of receiving from your hands the resolution of the Senate of the 19th instant, with directions, given personally, and by endorsement on the resolution, to report thereon.

The resolution requires that the Senate be informed "what is the maximum amount which can be beneficially expended, annually, towards completing the naval defences of the country—embracing, first, ordnance and ordnance stores; second, gradual increase of the navy and collection of materials; third, repairs; fourth, navy yards and docks, and other incidental heads of expenditure—provided the appropriations for the expenditure be made at once, for a series of years, to be drawn from the Treasury annually, as needed."

In the report which the Commissioners had the honor of presenting to you on the 2d ultimo, it was proposed "that the force to be prepared ready for use when circumstances may require it, shall consist of fifteen ships of the line, twenty-five frigates, twenty-five sloops of war, twenty-five steamers, and twenty-five smaller vessels; and that the frames and other timber, the copper, ordnance, tanks, and chain cables, shall also be prepared for ten ships of the line and ten frigates." It was further observed that "the force to be ready for use would employ thirty thousand seamen—the number assumed as that for which vessels ought to be prepared, for the commencement of a state of hostilities." In preparing that report, the Board, unap-prized of your views or those of the Government upon the subject, looked to the then fiscal condition of the country, as exhibited in the Treasury reports, and thence drew the inferences expressed as to the sums which might annually and conveniently be applied towards completing our naval defences, confining their views to the supposed convenience of the Treasury, and indicating rather the minimum of the amount of money necessary to place the naval defences of the United States upon the footing of strength and respectability due to the security and welfare of the Union.

But the resolution of the Senate calls for the maximum amount which can be beneficially expended, annually, towards completing the naval defences of the country, without any limit in reference to the means. The question thus presented appears to be unfettered with any restriction, or any consideration, other than that which refers exclusively to the completion of the naval defences of the country.

Had the resolution given any intimation as to the amount of the naval force, or, in other words, as to the nature and extent of the force deemed necessary for the defence of the country, a satisfactory reply might more easily and with more certainty come within the professional ability of the Board. Uninformed upon this material point as to the views of the honorable body by whom the resolution was passed, the Board must of necessity express their own, to show the basis of their calculations upon the subject.

If it be the settled policy of our Government to consider the navy as "our first and best fortification;" if it be determined that our naval preparations shall have no limit except that imposed by a due regard to public revenues, and by the probable condition of other maritime nations; if the fixed, immovable fortifications of our country are to be kept within prescribed limits, that the naval defences, deemed more important because more efficient, may be enlarged to an extent necessary to defend our coast on the ocean, and guard it against invasion, the Commissioners would, with great deference, though with entire confidence in its correctness, express the opinion that an increase of naval preparations beyond that proposed in their letter of the 2d ultimo may become a measure of wise precaution in reference to the high interests thus committed to the protection of the navy, and the solemn duties and responsibilities imposed upon it. Our means of naval defence and annoyance should surely be such as, when exerted against those possessed by other maritime nations with whom we may come in conflict, would fairly promise, if not secure, success.

Leaving, however, the nature and extent of our naval preparations to be decided by those with whom the decision rests, the Commissioners will suppose that fifteen ships of the line, twenty-five frigates, twenty-five sloops of war, twenty-five steamers, and twenty-five smaller vessels, with the frames and other timber, the copper, ordnance, tanks, and chain cables, for ten ships of the line and ten frigates, as a reserve force, may be considered as the amount of force which it may be the pleasure of Congress to provide; and upon this hypothesis they base the reply to the resolution which they have now the honor to submit, observing here that, if a greater force be adjudged expedient, the means necessary to provide it must be proportionately increased.

In the opinion of the Board, every ship belonging to the navy should be kept in such a state of preparation that her full equipment and readiness for actual service, on any emergency, may be secured by the time a crew can be collected for her. The hulls of those not in service at sea should be frequently examined and kept in good condition; their armament, masts, spars, boats, tanks, chain cables, and imperishable stores of every description, should be procured, and carefully preserved in a state of readiness for immediate use; and there should be always kept on hand a full supply of seasoned timber, of all kinds used in the construction of ships of war, and a full supply of spare ready-made masts and spars, of sizes and dimensions adapted to each of the various classes of our ships.

Our navy yards should possess all the conveniences and facilities of building and repairing ships of every class, with the greatest despatch and economy. They should possess ample means of seasoning and preserving timber, and of keeping in a state of perfect security and preservation, ready for immediate use, all the stores and munitions, of every description, essential in the equipment and armament of our ships. To place the yards in this condition, preparations involving large expenditures are indispensable. Dry docks, timber docks, seasoning sheds, building slips, launching ways, ship-houses, store-houses, smitheries, workshops, wharves, &c., must be possessed to an extent proportionate to the number and size of our ships, and the quantity of materials to be kept on hand. We cannot, in a state of peace, secure the services of our ships as promptly as would be desirable, without these conveniences. In war, when time is all-important, when celerity of movement and vigorous action are alike in constant requisition, the want of them would paralyze every exertion, and be felt as a heavy national calamity. Suppose a squadron coming into port after a long cruise, or after a serious engagement at sea, or after encountering usual storms, the ships composing it would require repairs, some of them probably very extensive; many might require docking, and they arrive at a port where there is but one dock; while one is in dock, the residue must wait and take their turn to be docked, and months, at least, may elapse before the squadron (possibly wanted for immediate service) can be repaired and put in a condition for further service. Golden opportunities of sustaining the honor of our flag and advancing the highest interests of our country may thus be lost.

But, without supposing a case, the present actual condition of our ships at New York may be cited as affording ample illustration of the value of these facilities and conveniences, and particularly in reference to docks. If we possessed them at that yard, the ships now there, particularly those of the line, which require extensive repairs, might be put in a condition for service in a much shorter space of time, more effectually, at far less expense, and without incurring any of the risks attending the process of heaving down.

With these considerations in view, the Commissioners would observe that, in their opinion, the sum of one million and eight hundred thousand dollars might be "beneficially expended" in procuring ordnance and ordnance stores; that the maximum amount which could be expended in the first year, from the date of an appropriation, would probably not exceed $300,000, but in the second and subsequent years at least $500,000 might be beneficially expended in providing cannon, carronades, bombs, shot, bomb-shells, muskets, pistols, cutlasses, boarding-pikes, boarding-axes, powder or the materials for making it, and all the other various articles necessary to the armament of the ships. That for "the increase of the navy and collection of materials," the sum of sixteen millions of dollars might be beneficially expended; that during the first year the expenditure for timber could not be very considerable. It might be contracted for in the course of a few months, but the trees should not be felled before the month of October next, and the contractors would not probably commence delivering the timber at the yards before April or May, 1837; and possibly such interruptions from Indian hostilities might arise in getting out the live oak as to postpone the operations of those engaged in that business for a still greater length of time. But the imperishable articles of copper, iron, and lead, might be procured probably during the first year; and it may be observed, as an inducement to procure them now, that the prices now asked for such articles are as low as they have ever been known to be. This observation is grounded upon the latest contracts made for copper and iron.

Under all circumstances, the Commissioners believe that the sum of one million and a half of dollars might be judiciously expended "for the gradual increase of the navy, and collection of materials," during the first year after an appropriation; and that in the six subsequent years the residue of the $16,000,000 (viz: $14,500,000) might be expended; making, in these years, an average expenditure of about $2,417,000.

The probable inability to expend any considerable sum during the first year, for timber, is a circumstance not to be regretted, because we have not the means of seasoning and preserving it. The preparation of such means, which consist of timber docks and seasoning sheds, should precede the reception of timber. They may be prepared by the time the timber will be delivered; and when they shall be ready for the reception of the timber, the timber should be procured as early as may be practicable, in order to give it the longest time possible for seasoning, before it shall be actually used in the construction or repair of ships.

As to "repairs," the operations under this head would necessarily be protracted and limited, until we can have a sufficient number of dry docks, and other conveniences for repairing ships of war. We have now only two dry docks: one at Norfolk, the other at Boston; so that only one vessel can be taken into dock at a time at either of those places; and at other yards where we have ships of the line, it would probably be advisable rather to wait the construction of docks, before commencing any repairs which their bottoms may require. The Commissioners, however, believe that, under this head, nine hundred thousand to a million of dollars may be annually and judiciously expended.

Upon the subject of "navy yards, docks, and other incidental heads of expenditure," the Board would respectfully observe that the plans for improving the yards adopted under the act of Congress of 1827, and approved by the President of the United States, contemplate expenditures to a large amount, the means of estimating which are not in the possession of the Board. It is certain, however, that it will require a series of years to complete the improvements, and it is equally certain that the expense will unavoidably be very large. But to confine our views at present to a portion of those improvements—say a dry dock at Portsmouth, an additional dry dock at Boston, two dry docks at New York, an additional dry dock at Norfolk, and a dry dock at Pensacola, with the number of timber docks, timber sheds, ship-houses, slips, wharves, store-houses, &c., required for these and other yards, and adapted to the proposed force, and essential to keep it in a state of desirable preparation for service—one million and a half of dollars may be considered as the maximum amount which could be "beneficially expended" during the first year; but for each succeeding year two millions and a half may be expended, and very beneficially, until the necessary improvements shall be completed.

These views present the following results, showing the maximum amounts which, in the opinion of the Navy Commissioners, might be beneficially expended annually, for different series of years:

1st. "Ordnance and ordnance stores," during the first year $300,000, and during the second year $500,000; the third year $500,000, and the fourth year $500,000.

2d. "Gradual increase of the navy and collection of materials," during the first year $1,500,000, and each of the second, third, fourth, fifth, sixth, and seventh years, about $2,417,000.

3d. "Repairs," about $1,000,000, say one million of dollars annually.

4th. Navy yards and docks, and other incidental heads of expenditure, $1,500,000 during the first year, and two millions and a half of dollars during the second year, and the like sum annually, till the necessary improvements be completed.

If an appropriation adopting these views were made, and the number and description of vessels recommended in our letter of the 2d ultimo were kept in commission, without diminution or increase, then the annual naval expenditure, exclusive of the expenditure under "gradual improvement," but including four hundred thousand dollars annually for the corps of marines, would be—

For the first year	-	-	$8,550,000
For the second, third, and fourth years, each	-	-	10,667,000
For the fifth, sixth, and seventh years, each	-	-	10,167,000
For subsequent years, each	-	-	7,750,000

until the improvements in the navy yards should be completed to the extent desirable and necessary.

All which is respectfully submitted.

JNO. RODGERS.

Hon. M. DICKERSON,
Secretary of the Navy.

LETTER FROM THE WAR DEPARTMENT,

In answer to a resolution of the Senate, calling for information concerning the Indian tribes, &c.

WAR DEPARTMENT, March 8, 1836.

SIR: In conformity with a resolution of the Senate of the 2d ultimo, I have the honor, herewith, to transmit a tabular statement, giving the information called for respecting the number and situation of the Indians upon the frontiers of the United States, so far as this Department can furnish it, and a report from Major General Macomb, containing a plan for an increase of the numerical strength of the army, accompanied by tables, showing the positions now occupied by it, the number to which it is proposed to increase it, its distribution, should such an increase take place, and the additional expense which will attend the measure.

It is, of course, impracticable to furnish any thing like accurate information concerning the number of the Indians. All that can be expected is such an approximation towards the truth as our means of communication with them will permit. The population of those tribes which are in contact with our settlements, and more particularly of those to whom annuities are paid, may be estimated with considerable probability. But all computations of this nature, respecting the remote and wandering tribes, must be received with much doubt.

It appears, as a general result, from this statement, that about 31,000 Indians have removed from the eastern to the western side of the Mississippi river, and that about 72,000 yet remain to be removed. With a majority of the latter, treaty stipulations already exist for their removal, or for such arrangements as will necessarily lead to it. And there is little doubt but that nearly all of them will, within a few years, quit their present residences, and withdraw to the country west of Missouri and Arkansas. I would remark here, that this statement shows an increase of about 10,000 over the tables heretofore prepared at this Department upon this subject. This increase has been occasioned by a census recently taken of the Eastern Cherokees, and which shows the population of those Indians to be about 18,000. It is estimated that the indigenous tribes of the region between the Mississippi and the Rocky Mountains amount to about 158,000. These, added to the emigrants already removed, will make upwards of 181,000; and when all the tribes are removed, there will be an aggregate Indian population in that country of more than 250,000. This, it will be observed, is independent of the Indians upon the peninsula of Michigan, upon the shores of Lake Huron and Lake Superior, upon the northern coast of Lake Michigan, and of the various bands of the great Chippewa family, oc-cupping the regions south of Lake Superior, and upon the heads of the Mississippi. Much of this country is of such a character that we cannot look forward to any reasonable time within which all these Indians will be required to emigrate. Those, however, in the peninsula of Michigan, will, no doubt, remove within a few years, and will still further increase the aggregate of the Indian population in the West.

It is difficult, from the mode of life and consequent dispersed condition of the Indians, to state their positions accurately, with relation to the inland frontier of the United States, extending from Arkansas to Maine. Beginning, however, at Red river, it will be found that almost all this force is in contact, or may be in communication with the Western and Northwestern frontier of the United States. The Indians are very sparsely scattered along the shore of Lake Superior, and towards the sources of the Mississippi. The Chippewas and Sioux, extensive families, and separated into many bands, divide those regions among them. These Indians are brought into contact upon the Mississippi, about the falls of St. Anthony. And as feuds have existed between them for ages, they frequently send war parties against each other, and, by this means, outrages have been committed upon our citizens. This state of things renders Fort Snelling, at the mouth of the St. Peter's, an important point.

It will be seen, by the tabular statement, that the Indians in the State of New York are supposed to be about 4,000. But this Department has not the means of ascertaining, with any precision, the number upon the Northeastern frontier, in the State of Maine. They have generally been computed in the statistical tables at about 1,000.

The statements herewith furnished embrace all the tribes who now occupy, or who it is supposed will occupy, the country west of the Mississippi, and extending to the Rocky Mountains. It may be safely estimated that this amount of Indian population can furnish 15,000 warriors, who may be considered so nearly in contact with our settlements as to render them at all times dangerous neighbors, unless kept in check by a proper disposition of our military force; and it is probable that double that number could be supplied, if any circumstances should occasion a general war in that region, in which the Indians could be brought to unite. Such a result, however, is altogether improbable, as many of these tribes are hereditary enemies, and are in a constant state of hostilities with one another. And, from the dispersed condition of the Indians, as well as from their habits and the nature of their institutions, a general coalition is not to be anticipated. Nor, indeed, if it existed, could such a force be collected and brought to act together. Still, however, it is obvious that even now there is upon our Western frontier a large force, which has been augmented, and is yet augmenting, by the action of the Government, and upon whose peaceable or friendly disposition no reliance can be placed. And the scenes which are now going on in Florida, and those which have frequently taken place elsewhere, show that the Indians are totally ignorant of their own relative strength and that of the United States, or that, in a moment of impulse, they are totally indifferent to it. A just regard to the tranquillity of an important section of the Union requires that measures should be permanently adopted for preventing a renewal of those predatory incursions which have occasioned so much loss of life and property.

In further obedience to the resolution of the Senate, I have the honor to report that I consider the "present military force of the United States" insufficient "to garrison the fortifications of the seaboard, and at the same time give protection to the inhabitants residing in the States and Territories bordering on the Indian frontier."

The aggregate number of the non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates of the army, according to the existing laws, is 6,301. This is exclusive of the men engaged in the ordnance service, who are principally artificers, and are employed in duties relating to the custody, preservation, repairs, &c., of the public arms. Owing, however, to sickness, to occasional absence, and to the time lost in recruiting and in marching to join their respective corps, as well as to other causes, the actual disposable strength does not average more than 5,260. This is now organized into one regiment of dragoons, four regiments of artillery, and seven regiments of infantry, occupying fifty-three stations, extending along the whole frontier of the United States, inland and Atlantic. If equally divided, the force actually in service would allow to each post a little less than one hundred effective men.

Extensive and permanent fortifications have been constructed upon the seaboard, and it seems to be generally conceded that our most important points of communication with the ocean should be gradually rendered secure by similar works against the advance of an enemy. These forts, as they are finished, should be occupied by troops, not only to prevent such insults and injuries as large commercial places are exposed to, whose approaches are not sufficiently guarded, but also to keep the works in a proper state of preservation. These duties, it is believed, will require the artillery force proposed to be maintained. Experience has shown that we are perpetually liable to occurrences which demand the concentration and movement of the troops. Whenever these happen, the positions occupied must remain defenceless, unless a greater force is raised. This is now the state of things along almost all our Atlantic border.

With respect to the inland frontier, circumstances of a still more imperative character require an augmentation of the army. Events have shown that our force in that quarter is not sufficient to keep the Indians in check. Disturbances are continually occurring at comparatively short intervals, some of which terminate merely by alarming and agitating the country, while others lead to hostilities, more or less extensive. On these occasions, the regular troops are collected from great distances, and a militia force is usually called out. Heavy expenditures are the necessary consequences, besides the loss of property and derangement of business in the section of country where these troubles exist. Instead of having a force at all times embodied, sufficient to overawe the Indians, or, if they commence hostilities, immediately to subdue them, much time is lost in the necessary arrangements, while the spirit of disaffection is spreading, and the hostile force becomes thus greatly increased. Within the last nine years we have had four difficulties of this nature: one with the Winnebagoes, two with the Sacs and Foxes, and one with the Florida Indians; which, altogether, have occasioned great loss of property, great derangement of business, a heavy expenditure of money, and much inconvenience in those portions of country affected by these troubles, and which furnished the militia whose services were required to aid the regular troops in their operations. An augmentation of the army to a reasonable extent, if it did not prevent these occurrences altogether, would certainly render them less frequent, as well as less injurious and extensive. And this policy is not less humane than useful. It is far better, by the display of force, to render its actual employment unnecessary, than it is to be compelled to resort to it, with all the usual accompaniments of an Indian campaign.

The army is so constituted that a very considerable addition may be made to its rank and file, with but little increase in the expense of the officers. It is proposed to augment its numerical strength to 9,955; to leave the regiment of dragoons as it now is, and so to distribute the additional force as to make five regiments instead of four of artillery, and nine regiments instead of seven of infantry. A regiment of artillery now contains 497 non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates, divided into nine companies; and a regiment of infantry, 514 non commissioned officers, musicians, and privates, divided into ten companies. The plan submitted proposes to add 2,032 men to the artillery, and 1,622 to the infantry, and to divide the regiments of both arms into eight companies each, giving to each regiment of the former 804 non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates, and to each regiment of the latter 590 non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates. This organization into companies will have the advantage of uniformity, and it is believed will be found more advantageous to the service than the existing one. The whole artillery force now authorized by law is 1,988, and that of the infantry 3,598, which, with the addition proposed, will make the whole artillery force 4,020, and the whole infantry force 5,220; thus raising the legal establishment of the army to 9,955. These numbers, it will be observed, are exclusive of the commissioned officers. By authorizing the President to require one of these regiments to do duty as riflemen, and one as light infantry, our military establishment would be rendered more complete, and in some situations more efficient; and this might be done without any addition to the expense of maintaining the troops.

The proposed augmentation of the non-commissioned officers, privates, and musicians, may be so distributed as not to require any change in the number of the regiments, or in the grades of the officers, by simply adding a given number to each company. The only advantage, however, of this plan over the proposed one is, that it may be carried into effect at a little less expense. This consideration is always important, and, when not counterbalanced by other circumstances, should be decisive. But I think that in this case the difference in the expenditure is not sufficient to outweigh the other advantages which are presented by the project herewith submitted.

It is proposed to reduce the number of second lieutenants from 142 to 112, making a diminution in that grade of thirty; and at the same time to add twenty-five other officers, making an actual reduction of five in the existing establishment. But as those who are added will be of higher grades, this arrangement will occasion an increase in the annual expense of $8,573, as is shown by one of the accompanying tables. But it will give more efficiency by the increased rank, authority, and experience, of the officers, while at the same time it will probably be found that the number of men proposed to be added to each regiment will be sufficiently great for the attention of all the officers. It will also prevent, in some degree, that dispersion of the regiments, which is very injurious to our service, as it materially impairs the personal superintendence of the field officers. These advantages will be greater as the sphere of command is removed to the more remote frontiers, where circumstances necessarily require higher responsibility and more experience.

All the information necessary to a full knowledge of the increased expense which will attend the addition herein proposed to the numerical strength of the army, will be found in the accompanying tables.

I beg leave to remark that the plan of organization above proposed proceeds upon the assumption that the whole force of the non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates of the army will be about ten thousand. That is the smallest number which, under present circumstances, the public interests will, in my judgment, allow. Should Congress, however, think it proper to add to that number, then I would recommend that the infantry companies be placed upon the same establishment as the companies of artillery. This would render the organization uniform in all respects, and, from the casualties of the service, would not probably give more than two thirds of the number for active field operations.

Very respectfully, your most obedient servant.

HEADQUARTERS OF THE ARMY,
Washington, March 7, 1836.

The undersigned, in conformity with the instructions of the Secretary of War, to submit a project for augmenting the military establishment to ten thousand men, without increasing the number of officers, has, after fully considering the subject, come to the following conclusion:

The present establishment consists of 4 regiments of artillery, of 9 companies each, each company of 55 men, making an aggregate in the 4 regiments, including the non-commissioned staff, of 1,988
7 regiments of infantry, of 10 companies each, each company of 51 men, making an aggregate, in the 7 regiments, including the non-commissioned staff, of 3,598
1 regiment of dragoons, aggregate 715

Aggregate of the army, - - - 6,301

The organization of the regiments of artillery into nine companies is not convenient, nor do the four regiments furnish a sufficient number of companies for the seaboard. It is therefore proposed to add one regiment of artillery, and make each company to consist of 100 men, instead of 55, as now organized. This organization will give a force of 4,020 non-commissioned officers, musicians, artificers, and privates, in the artillery, as will be seen by the accompanying paper, marked A.

The organization of the infantry might also be improved, and the regiments rendered much more useful and efficient, by making each regiment to consist of eight companies instead of ten, and by adding two regiments, to be armed as light infantry or riflemen, to consist also of eight companies each, which can be done by simply adding two companies to the infantry, there being at present seven regiments of infantry on the establishment, consisting of ten companies each, which give an aggregate of seventy companies. By the addition of two companies, the required number of companies, to wit, seventy-two, will be obtained, to constitute nine regiments of eight companies each, and each company to consist of 72 non-commissioned officers and privates, making the whole of the infantry force 5,220 men, as will be seen by paper marked B.

The formation of regiments into eight companies is conformable to our established system of tactics, and is every way much more convenient for manœuvring than either a formation of nine or ten companies, as is now the case with our artillery and infantry. A uniform organization into eight, both for artillery and infantry, is preferable, and more systematic than the irregular formations now existing in the regiments of those arms in our service, as shown above.

If this organization should be adopted, the military establishment would then consist of—

5 regiments of artillery, of 8 companies each, or 40 companies 100 strong, giving a force, including 20 non-commissioned staff, of - - -	4,020
9 regiments of infantry, 8 companies each, each company 72 men, making 72 companies, including 36 non-commissioned staff, giving a force of - - -	5,220
1 regiment of dragoons - - -	715
Making an aggregate of - - -	9,955

Although the number of regiments is increased by the proposed plan for augmenting the army to 9,955, the number of officers is rather diminished than increased, as will appear by the following statement:

There are in the existing four regiments of artillery,

In the proposed five regiments of artillery there will be,
Colonels, - - - -	5

Majors, - - - -	5
Captains, - - - -	40
First lieutenants, - - - -	80

	175

In the proposed nine regiments of infantry there will be,

Aggregate in the present establishment, - - - -	423
Difference, - - - -	5

As the number of men in all the companies of infantry and artillery is considerably increased, an additional number of non-commissioned officers becomes indispensable. In lieu of the non-commissioned staff officer, heretofore denominated sergeant major of a regiment, it is proposed to substitute that of sub-adjutant, to have the rank, pay, and emoluments, of a cadet, with a suitable allowance of clothing, not exceeding the cost of that now allowed a sergeant major. To this office the sergeants may look as the reward of merit, and as the stepping-stone to promotion of lieutenant. It will give great encouragement to the non-commissioned officers of companies, as well as the rank and file, when they see before them a prospect of promotion to the rank of commissioned officer, through the non-commissioned staff. For the same purpose, and with a view to facilitate and distribute more properly the company duties, it is proposed, in the organization, that the first sergeant of each company be styled sergeant major, with the pay and allowances as now provided, which are somewhat greater than those allowed to other sergeants. His duties to the company are analogous to those of an adjutant of a regiment, he having to attend, under the direction of the captain, to all the company details, as it regards the duties of the non-commissioned officers and privates, and the making out of reports, &c. To each company there is also provided a quartermaster sergeant, an indispensable non-commissioned officer, whose duty it is, under the direction of the captain, to take charge of the camp equipage, spare arms, extra clothing, and other property belonging to the company, and keep the accounts of them, as well as to attend to the distribution of the rations, straw, wood, &c., and on the march to take charge of the company baggage; his pay to be the same as that of the other sergeants. In the French army these two non-commissioned officers are allowed to every company, under the title of sergeant major and fourrier. There is no service in which these officers are more wanted than in ours, because our troops are frequently separated from their baggage, in marching through the wilderness, where it is impossible to transport it, and, consequently, obliged to be sent round to meet the troops, either by land or by water, when it is much exposed to be lost or damaged; and thus the troops arriving at the points where they may expect to meet their baggage, without these officers to take charge of it, will be often disappointed, and suffer for the want of essential comforts.

Although, according to the instructions of the Secretary of War, the organization here proposed is limited to ten thousand men, and which may be considered as a minimum force for the purposes for which the army is intended, it is respectfully recommended that, in order to have the amount of force always effective, eighteen men be added to each company of infantry and artillery, which would increase the nominal force to something below twelve thousand men; but owing to the fact of the men being enlisted for only three years, the great distance the recruits have generally to march, and the time consumed in joining the regiments on the frontiers, and the necessity of keeping within the authorized numbers, it hardly can be expected that ten thousand men would ever be exceeded, should Congress authorize twelve thousand men, as here recommended.

Upon a review of the fortifications which have been erected, and which are now in progress for the defence of the seacoast, it is found that there is a considerable deficiency of artillerists to serve the guns, and to guard and preserve the forts, as well as the valuable property in them. It is therefore proposed, as above recommended, to augment the number of companies in the artillery from 36, as now authorized, to 40. These companies of artillery it is proposed to distribute along the seaboard, from Eastport, in Maine, to the delta of the Mississippi; and, in order to show the proposed distribution, two tables are here annexed, marked C and D; that marked C shows how the existing thirty-six companies may be most advantageously disposed of; and that marked D, how it is proposed to distribute the forty companies. Also, a list of forts on the seacoast, prepared by the adjutant general, marked E.

The infantry force, with that of the regiment of dragoons, is best adapted to the defence of the frontiers, including the Gulf of Mexico. The present amount of infantry is not sufficient, in the opinion of the undersigned, to afford adequate protection to the inhabitants residing in the States and Territories bordering on our Indian and other frontiers, and guarding the arsenals in the Southern and Western States.

If the project above recommended, of organizing the infantry, as exhibited in paper marked B, be adopted, making the infantry consist of nine regiments, instead of seven, it is proposed that they be distributed on the frontiers and on the Gulf of Mexico, as shown in paper marked F, which organization and distribution, it is believed, will be the most effectual for maintaining the discipline of the army, and affording protection to our extensive frontiers.

Paper marked G contains a summary of the expense of the present and proposed regiments of artillery and infantry.

Respectfully submitted.

ALEX. MACOMB,

Major General, commanding in chief.

Hon. LEWIS CASS,

Secretary of War.

REPORT UPON THE PATENT LAWS.

IN SENATE, APRIL 28, 1836.

Mr. Ruggles, of Maine, made the following report:

The select committee appointed to take into consideration the state and condition of the Patent Office, and the laws relating to the issuing of patents for new and useful inventions and discoveries, submit the following report:

The promotion of the arts and the improvement of manufactures are the objects aimed at in granting patents for inventions. All civilized nations have provided, in some form, for the encouragement of inventive genius. England, from whom we derived originally most of our notions of national polity, and who has hitherto been considered the "queen of arts," is in no small degree indebted for the distinction to the liberality with which she has always rewarded genius and science for their inventions and discoveries. Individual munificence and the patronage of wealthy associations have there, as in France and Germany, done much to supply whatever was wanting in the liberality of the Government. But such patronage is necessarily partial in its operation. It is limited to particular objects, if not to particular individuals. There appears to be no better way of measuring out appropriate rewards for useful inventions than by a general law, to secure to all descriptions of persons, without discrimination, the exclusive use and sale, for a given period, of the thing invented. In this way they will generally derive a just and appropriate encouragement, proportioned to the value of their respective inventions. It is not at this day to be doubted that the evil of the temporary monopoly is greatly overbalanced by the good the community ultimately derives from its toleration.

The granting of exclusive privileges was in England originally assumed as a prerogative of the Crown, from which it derived a revenue. It was at first limited to the introduction of manufactures from other countries. Afterwards like privileges were granted for new inventions made within the realm. Like all other legal prerogatives, it was subject to abuse, and Parliament found it necessary to limit and restrain it. This was done by the famous statute of monopolies, passed in the reign of James I, which defined the King's prerogative in respect to the description of grants which might legally be made, and among them were patents for inventions and new manufactures. The very brief reservation of right in the Crown contained in that statute, and the judicial decisions in cases arising under the grants of privileges made pursuant to it, constituted the whole of the English law on the subject up to 1835, when a law was passed by Parliament, giving the right to file a disclaimer in certain cases, and containing some other less material provisions.

It is from those judicial decisions that we have derived most of the principles on which our laws on the subject are founded, and which have entered into and influenced the judicial expositions given to them. But the decisions of our courts have been characterized by a more enlightened and liberal application of equitable principles to cases of this description, in a just endeavor to sustain patents for meritorious inventions, instead of seeking to find, in the technicalities of law, a pretext for setting them aside.

Prior to the adoption of the federal constitution, the States, within their narrow limits, could give very little encouragement to inventors by grants of exclusive privileges; and up to that time the arts had made very little progress on this side of the Atlantic. By the constitution of the United States, that power was wisely vested in Congress.

The first act of Congress on the subject was passed in 1790. It authorized the Secretary of State, Secretary of War, and the Attorney General, or any two of them, on application, to grant patents for such new inventions and discoveries as they should deem "sufficiently useful and important." Under that act, the board so constituted exercised the power of refusing patents for want of novelty in the invention or of sufficient utility and importance. This act extended the same privilege to aliens as to citizens. In 1793, it was repealed, and another act passed, authorizing patents to citizens of the United States only, to be granted by the Secretary of State, subject to the revision of the Attorney General. In 1800, the privilege to take out patents was extended to aliens who had resided two years in the country, and made oath of their intention of becoming citizens of the United States.

The act of 1793, which is still in force, gives, according to the practical construction it has received, no power to the Secretary to refuse a patent for want of either novelty or usefulness. The only inquiry is, whether the terms and forms prescribed are complied with. The granting of patents, therefore, is but a ministerial duty. Every one who makes application is entitled to receive a patent by paying the duty required, and making his application and specification in conformity with the law. The necessary consequence is, that patents have, under the act of 1793, been daily granted, without regard to the question of novelty, or even utility, in the ordinary sense; for it has been settled that the term useful, as used in this statute, is only in contradistinction to hurtful, injurious, or pernicious. This construction (that no right is conferred to refuse a patent) has been given to the law by the Department charged with the duty of granting patents, not so much, probably, from any necessary and unavoidable import of the terms of it, as from a disinclination to exercise a power of so much importance in cases where it is not clearly and distinctly granted. And it may be reasonably doubted whether it was the intention of Congress to confer such a power on the Secretary of State alone, since no provision is made for an appeal or other remedy for an incorrect decision adverse to the applicant. Besides, any person occupying that station might be supposed as little qualified, by an acquaintance with the appropriate branches of science or of the arts, to decide such questions, as any officer of the Government. And were he to undertake the task of such an examination as would be necessary to a decision in each case, he would have little time for other official duties.

Under the act referred to, the Department of State has been going on for more than forty years, issuing patents on every application, without any examination into the merit or novelty of the invention. And the evils which necessarily result from the law as it now exists must continue to increase and multiply daily, till Congress shall put a stop to them. Some of them are as follows.

1. A considerable portion of all the patents granted are worthless and void, as conflicting with and infringing upon one another, or upon public rights not subject to patent privileges; arising either from a want of due attention to the specifications of claim, or from the ignorance of the patentees of the state of the arts and manufactures, and of the inventions made in other countries, and even in our own.

2. The country becomes flooded with patent monopolies, embarrassing to bonafide patentees, whose rights are thus invaded on all sides; and not less embarrassing to the community generally, in the use of even the most common machinery and long-known improvements in the arts and common manufactures of the country.

3. Out of this interference and collision of patents and privileges, a great number of law suits arise, which are daily increasing in an alarming degree, onerous to the courts, ruinous to the parties, and injurious to society.

4. It opens the door to frauds, which have already become extensive and serious. It is represented to the committee that it is not uncommon for persons to copy patented machines in the model-room; and, having made some slight immaterial alterations, they apply in the next room for patents. There being no power given to refuse them, patents are issued of course. Thus prepared, they go forth on a retailing expedition, selling out their patent rights for States, counties, and townships, to those who have no means at hand of detecting the imposition, and who find, when it is too late, that they have purchased what the vendors had no right to sell, and which they obtain thereby no right to use. This speculation in patent rights has become a regular business, and several hundred thousand dollars, it is estimated, are paid annually for void patents, many of which are thus fraudulently obtained.

In this collision and interference of patents, the original and meritorious inventor sees his invention, to the perfection of which he has devoted much time and expense, pirated from him, and he must forego the reward which the law was intended to secure to him in the exclusive right it grants; or he must become involved in numerous and expensive law suits in distant and various sections of the country, to protect and confirm his rights. If he be wise, he will generally avoid the latter, and submit to the former alternative of injustice, to which the Government, as the law now is, makes itself accessory. The practice is scarcely less reprehensible, of taking out patents for what has been long in public use, and what every one has therefore a right to use. The patentee in such cases being armed with the apparent authority of the Government, having the sanction of its highest officers, the seal of State, scours the country, and, by threats of prosecution, compels those who are found using the thing patented to pay the patent price or commutation tribute. This exaction, unjust and iniquitous as it is, is usually submitted to.

The extent of the evils resulting from the unrestrained and promiscuous grants of patent privileges may be imagined, when it is considered that there are now issued, since this year commenced, at the rate of more than a thousand a year; a considerable portion of which are doubtless void, for want of originality in the inventions patented, either in whole or in some of the parts claimed as new.

A necessary consequence is, that patents, even for new and meritorious inventions, are so much depreciated in general estimation that they are of but little value to the patentees, and the object of the patent laws, that of promoting the arts by encouragement, is in a great measure defeated.

To prevent these evils in future is the first and most desirable object of a revision and alteration of the existing laws on this subject. The most obvious, if not the only means of effecting it, appears to be to establish a check upon the granting of patents, allowing them to issue only for such inventions as are in fact new, and entitled, by the merit of originality and utility, to be protected by law. The difficulty encountered in effecting this is in determining what that check shall be; in whom the power to judge of inventions before granting a patent can safely be reposed, and how its exercise can be regulated and guarded, to prevent injustice, through mistake of judgment or otherwise, by which honest and meritorious inventors might suffer wrong.

It is obvious that the power must, in the first instance, be exercised by the Department charged with this branch of the public service. But, as it may not be thought proper to intrust its final exercise to the Department, it is deemed advisable to provide for an occasional tribunal to which an appeal may be taken. And, as a further security against any possible injustice, it is thought proper to give the applicant in certain cases, where there may be an adverse party to contest his right, an opportunity to have the decision revised in a court of law.

The duty of examination and investigation necessary to a first decision at the Patent Office is an important one, and will call for the exercise and application of much scientific acquirement and knowledge of the existing state of the arts in all their branches, not only in our own, but in other countries. Such qualifications in the officers charged with the duty will be the more necessary and desirable, because the information upon which a rejection is made at the office will be available in the final decision. It becomes necessary, then, to give to the Patent Office a new organization, and to secure to it a character altogether above a mere clerkship. The competency and efficiency of its officers should correspond with their responsibility, and with the nature and importance of the duties required of them. When the existing organization was adopted, the granting of patents was a matter of little importance, compared with what it now is. The arts in this country were but little understood, and but little cultivated. Agriculture and commerce constituted our principal business. We had few manufactures, except those of a domestic character, adapted to ordinary domestic wants. Our workshops were in Europe. Enterprise, in this country, ran in other channels. The war of 1812 gave it a new direction and a new impulse, by creating an occasion for workshops of our own. Necessity became the mother of invention, and American manufactures sprang into existence as by enchantment. Their rise and progress may be dated from that period; and a more rapid advancement in the arts, and a more astonishing development of human ingenuity, have never taken place in any other age or country. This remark will appear far from extravagant to every one who will take the trouble to examine the subject. This awakening of dormant genius to a practical and active existence, next to the arousing of the political and patriotic energies of the Union, was one of the great results of that contest. It opened to the country a new era. The nation entered upon a new existence. And, since that period, American industry and enterprise, guided by American ingenuity and intellect, have achieved what would have taken Europe a century to accomplish. She has become all at once a manufacturing as well as an agricultural and commercial nation. The useful arts have been cultivated with a success before unexampled, and have contributed, in no small degree, to the wonderful improvements which have spread themselves over our whole country. Who can predict the results, even in a few years, of that spirit of enterprise which pervades the Union, when aided by the Genius of Invention, and propelled onward by powers which she alone can bring into exercise? The very elements are submissive to her will, and all the endless combinations of mechanism are subservient to her purposes. She participates in almost every business and employment of man. Agriculture itself might as well dispense with fertility of soil, as with her aid in its cultivation.

The greatly increasing number of patents granted affords some indication of the improvements which have been going on in the useful arts from year to year. The average number issued annually, from 1790 to 1800, was but 26; from 1800 to 1810, the average number was 91; from 1810 to 1820, it was 200; and for the last ten years, the average number has been 535. During the last year, there were issued 776; and there have been granted in the first quarter of the present year 274; being more in three months than were issued in the whole of the first period of ten years. In the twenty-two years preceding the war of 1812, the average annual number was 73. The first quarter of the present year indicates an aggregate for the year of 1,096, the amount of the duties on which will be upwards of $32,000. The whole number issued at the Patent Office, under the laws of the United States, up to the 31st of March last, is 9,731. This is more than double the number which have been issued, either in England or France, during the same period. In England, for ten years preceding 1830, the average number of patents granted in one year was 145.

Whoever imagines that, because so many inventions and so many improvements in machinery have been made, there remains little else to be discovered, has but a feeble conception of the infinitude and vastness of mechanical powers, or of the unlimited reach of science. Much as has been discovered, infinitely more remains unrevealed. The ingenuity of man is exploring a region without limits, and delving in a mine whose treasures are exhaustless. "Neither are all the mysteries of nature unfolded, nor the mind tired in the pursuit of them."

The first conceptions of ingenuity, like the first suggestions of science, are theories, which require something of experiment and practical exemplification to perfect. Mechanical inventions are at first necessarily crude and incomplete. Time is required to develop their imperfections, and to make the improvements necessary to their adaptation to practical uses. Inventors generally obtain patents before they venture upon those experiments which only can test their inventions. They are apprehensive of being forestalled in their discoveries, and see no other means of protecting themselves against piracy and fraud, than by securing patents at once.

A remedy for this may be easily had, in a provision authorizing caveats to be filed in the office, giving security to the right of discovery for a time sufficient for making the necessary experiments, inquiries, and improvements.

Heretofore aliens not resident in this country have not been admitted to the privileges of our patent laws. But, as American citizens are allowed to take out patents in England and in other countries, a principle of reciprocity would seem to require that foreigners should have similar privileges here, on paying a similar duty or amount of fees that is exacted of our citizens abroad. The fees payable in England, on taking out a patent, amount to $585. If a patent be taken out for the three kingdoms of England, Ireland, and Scotland, they amount to $1,680. In France they are $309; in Spain $292; Austria $208.

A power in the Commissioner of the Patent Office to reject applications for want of novelty in the invention, it is believed, will have a most beneficial and salutary effect in relieving meritorious inventors, and the community generally, from the serious evils growing out of the granting of patents for every thing indiscriminately, creating interfering claims, encouraging fraudulent speculators in patent rights, deluging the country with worthless monopolies, and laying the foundation for endless litigation.

In nineteen cases out of twenty, probably, the opinion of the Commissioner, accompanied by the information on which his decision is founded, will be acquiesced in. When unsatisfactory, the rights of the applicant will find ample protection in an appeal to a board of examiners, selected for their particular knowledge of the subject-matter of the invention in each case.

By this means, without danger to actual and honest inventors, the number of patents would be somewhat diminished. But there would be more confidence in those which should be granted; and, as those which have been heretofore issued should be daily expiring by their limitation, the community would begin to feel and realize the advantages of such a change. The present law waits till infringements and frauds are consummated—nay, it even aids them; and then it offers an inadequate remedy for the injury, by giving an action for damages. It ought, rather, by refusing to grant interfering patents, to render prosecutions unnecessary. Instead of sanctioning the wrong, by granting the privilege to commit it, it should arrest injury and injustice at the threshold, and put an end to litigation before it begins.

Important and interesting as the Patent Office is now considered, it is believed that, under such new organization as is contemplated by the bill presented herewith, it will contribute largely to the great interests of the country, and bear no small part in elevating our national character. American ingenuity has obtained much consideration on the other side of the Atlantic. Even the manufacturers of England are not a little indebted to it for some of their most valuable improvements. Her woollen manufactures, especially, have, within a few years, undergone an entire change, by the adoption of American inventions, by which wool has been made as yielding and submissive to the power of machinery as any material whatever. Cotton machinery has also been greatly improved in the hands of our mechanics; and while England receives from us three fourths of the cotton she uses in raw material, we furnish her also with some of the most valuable improvements in the means of manufacturing it. Indeed, what mechanism or manufacture has, for the last twenty years, been brought across the Atlantic, that has not, on being returned, borne the distinguished marks of the superior ingenuity of American mechanists? Formerly, we borrowed and copied much that was valuable from Europe; now, Europe is borrowing and copying, with no little advantage, from us; and she must not be too much surprised if she shall soon find a formidable balance against her.

To carry fully into effect the objects which have been had in view, it will be necessary to provide larger and more commodious rooms for models, &c., than those now occupied for that purpose. They are insufficient for the models of machinery and other inventions now deposited there, and the number will be increasing several hundred, perhaps a thousand, every year. A great number, supposed to be about five hundred, from a want of room for them elsewhere, have been stowed away in a dark garret. Those which occupy the rooms designed for them are crowded together in a manner unfavorable for exhibition or examination. In such a situation, it is impossible to give them any systematic or scientific arrangement. This disorder and confusion must necessarily be increased by the addition of those heretofore furnished, or they must be consigned to the garret, the common receptacle, where, instead of promoting a taste for, and facilitating the study of, the useful arts, they will only afford evidence of the improvidence of the Government. In addition to this, the present building is too much exposed to destruction by fire. The loss of the records and drawings, and of the several thousands of interesting and valuable models now preserved there, would be, in a great degree, irreparable. There is no additional room to be had in the building they now occupy. The Post Office Department, in the same building, instead of having any room to spare which is now appropriated to it, requires a considerable extension of accommodations, from its increased and increasing business. It needs the whole building. The only way, therefore, of providing the necessary extension of room for the accommodation of the Post Office Department and the city post office, and of providing the requisite accommodations for the Patent Office, is to erect a suitable fire-proof building for the latter on some one of the public lots. There are ample funds arising from duties on patents, heretofore paid into the Treasury, to the account of clerk-hire in that office, which remain unexpended. A portion of that surplus fund, being now about $152,000, may well be appropriated to the construction of a building which should be commodious and comparatively safe from fire.

Such a building as this branch of the public interests requires would do honor to the Government and the country. The Patent Office, with such accommodations, containing the records of this age of inventions, displaying in its halls and galleries numberless models of ingenious and useful mechanism, and contrivances in almost infinite variety, adapted to the mechanic arts, to manufactures, to husbandry, to navigation, steam power, horse power, water power, railroad transportation, and, in fine, to all the common trades and mechanical pursuits of life, as well as to our rapidly multiplying and magnificent public works, would present an object of great interest, and tend not a little to elevate our national character. It has been justly remarked that we can go into no mechanic shop, into no manufactory of any description, upon no farm or plantation, or travel a mile on our railroads or in our steamboats, without seeing the evidence of our originality, and witnessing the fruits and effects of our ingenuity and enterprise. All the inventions and improvements in mechanism which have done so much towards advancing the useful arts and manufactures, should, as far as practicable, be exhibited in one view in the halls of the Patent Office. Such a display would attract the attention of the many thousands who annually visit the capital of the Union from all quarters of the country and all parts of the world. No other nation has yet any thing to be compared with it; neither England nor France has ever required models to be deposited of patented machinery. Collections of models and drawings have sometimes been made by private associations, but they are small in number compared with those we possess.

In addition to the models of machinery, it is proposed to embrace an exhibition of specimens of useful and elegant fabrics and of works of art, which manufacturers and artificers may place there for that purpose. It might, too, embrace a cabinet of interesting minerals, which may be received from time to time from the various parts of our widely extended country, with polished specimens of its beautiful marbles from their different locations, illustrating the geology and many of the natural resources of the country; and, also, a collection of Indian curiosities and antiquities, many of which are now in the possession of one of the Departments, boxed up for want of some suitable place for their exhibition.

In short, the halls of the Patent Office should present a national museum of the arts, and be a general repository of all the inventions and improvements in machinery and manufactures, of which our country can claim the honor; together with such other objects of interest as might convey niently and properly be placed under the superintendence of the Commissioner. Such an institution, while it would be an object of just pride to every American, would have scarcely less influence in advancing and accelerating the progress of the useful arts and the improvements of our manufactures, than would even the encouragement afforded by granting patents for inventions or establishing high tariffs of protection.

With these views, the committee cannot hesitate to recommend an entire reorganization of the Patent Office, and several material alterations in our law of patents, suiting it to the present condition of the arts and the altered circumstances of the country.

A bill in conformity with their views is herewith submitted.

SLAVERY IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
February 8, 1836.

Resolved, That all the memorials which have been offered, or may hereafter be presented to this House, praying for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia; and, also, the resolutions offered by an honorable member from Maine, [Mr. JARVIS,] with the amendment thereto proposed by an honorable member from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] together with every other paper or proposition that may be submitted in relation to the subject, be referred to a select committee, with instructions to report:

That Congress possesses no constitutional authority to interfere, in any way, with the institution of slavery in any of the States of this confederacy; and

That, in the opinion of this House, Congress ought not to interfere, in any way, with slavery in the District of Columbia, because it would be a violation of public faith, unwise, impolitic, and dangerous to the Union. Assigning such reasons for these conclusions as, in the judgment of the committee, may be best calculated to enlighten the public mind, to allay excitement, to repress agitation, to secure and maintain the just rights of the slaveholding States and of the people of this District, and to restore harmony and tranquillity among the various sections of this Union.

Mr. PINCKNEY, of South Carolina; Mr. HAMER, of Ohio; Mr. PIERCE, of New Hampshire; Mr. HARDIN, of Kentucky; Mr. JARVIS, of Maine; Mr. OWENS, of Georgia; Mr. MUEHLBERG, of Pennsylvania; Mr. DROMGOOLE, of Virginia; and Mr. TURRILL, of New York; were appointed a committee in pursuance of the resolution.

Attest: W. S. FRANKLIN, Clerk.

REPORT OF MR. PINCKNEY.

The select committee appointed under the following resolution of the House of Representatives of the United States of the 8th of February, 1836, viz: "Resolved, That all the memorials which have been offered, or may hereafter be presented to this House, praying for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia; and, also, the resolutions offered by an honorable member from Maine, [Mr. JARVIS,] with the amendment thereto proposed by an honorable member from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] together with every other paper or proposition that may be submitted in relation to this subject, be referred to a select committee, with instructions to report: That Congress possesses no constitutional authority to interfere, in any way, with the institution of slavery in any of the States of this confederacy; and that, in the opinion of this House, Congress ought not to interfere, in any way, with slavery in the District of Columbia, because it would be a violation of the public faith, unwise, impolitic, and dangerous to the Union. Assigning such reasons for these conclusions as, in the judgment of the committee, may be best calculated to enlighten the public mind, to allay excitement, to repress agitation, to secure and maintain the just rights of the slaveholding States and of the people of this District, and to restore harmony and tranquillity amongst the various sections of this Union;" respectfully submit the following report, in which they have unanimously concurred:

The subject referred is one of grave import. Your committee approach it with a deep sense of its magnitude and absorbing interest. They have long considered the movements in relation to this matter as fraught with incalculable evils, not only to the slaveholding States, but to every portion of our common country. They rejoice, therefore, that the great body of the people of the non-slaveholding States have come forward, as they have done, in the true spirit of American patriotism, to sustain their constitutional obligations to their Southern brethren, and to arrest the disturbance of the public peace. They rejoice particularly, that the Federal Legislature, acting under a deep sense of its responsibility to the nation, has also interposed its warning voice, and given a solemn expression of its judgment upon this exciting subject; and they feel assured, that as the representatives have responded to the people, so the people will firmly and patriotically sustain the position now taken by their representatives.

As moderation is essential to the discovery of truth, your committee will carefully abstain from every thing that may cause offence, or inflame excitement, in any section of the Union. But while they would make every allowance for the motives of individuals, where the objects contemplated are utterly destructive to society, they cannot too strongly express their condemnation of the conduct of the abolitionists, and their utter abhorrence of the consequences to which, if persisted in, it must inevitably lead. They feel assured that no man, or set of men, will be permitted to put the country and the Government at defiance, by persevering in machinations which threaten to bring the citizens of the different States into collision, and to overthrow the whole system of civil society itself, in the slaveholding portions of the Union. Your committee believe that the strength of the agitators has been greatly exaggerated, by themselves and others; but whether their number be small or great, there can be no doubt that they have done, and are doing, incalculable evil; and every true patriot must be aware that a crisis has now arrived in the political condition of the country, in which neutrality would be criminal, and in which he must determine between the suppression of abolition and the destruction of the Union, and take his stand, accordingly, for or against his country.

Your committee have learned with surprise that the reference of this subject has caused dissatisfaction in certain portions of the South. While they deeply regret this circumstance, they beg leave to remark that it is not only abundantly justified by precedent, but in entire accordance with the established usage and invariable policy, in relation to matters of this character; memorials praying for the abolition of slavery in the States, or in the District of Columbia, having always been either referred or laid upon the table. On the present occasion, the subject was referred for the express purpose of having a report "calculated to sustain the just rights of the slaveholding States and of the people of this District," and by allaying excitement, and repressing agitation, to insure the future repose and permanent tranquillity of the country. The House was unwilling, on the one side, to invade what was believed to be the right of petition, (a right equally dear to every portion of our people, and which, it is thought, could not have been denied in this instance, without establishing a precedent at least as hazardous to the South as to any other section of the Union,) and it was desirous, on the other, to accomplish for the South, what could not have been effected by refusing to receive the memorials, the union of an overwhelming majority, in a solemn and determined stand against the views and objects of the applicants. Whilst the denial of the right of petition could have produced none other than the most mischievous effects, your committee are thoroughly satisfied that the course adopted by the House will produce a state of public opinion and feeling in the non-slaveholding States, eminently favorable to the constitutional rights and interests of the slaveholding sections of the Union.

The resolution under which your committee were appointed naturally divides itself into several branches or propositions, each of which shall be considered in its order.

They are instructed to report, in the first place—

That Congress possesses no constitutional authority to interfere, in any way, with the institution of slavery in any of the States of this confederacy.

Your committee will merely allude to this proposition, in obedience to the express direction given them by the House, and not for the purpose of entering into any argument respecting it. Unquestionably, if there is any political or constitutional principle which the people of the United States consider as settled beyond all possible dispute or controversy, it is that the institution of slavery, as it exists in the States of this confederacy, is municipal, not national, and that it belongs exclusively to the States, and can only be affected by State legislation. The power to regulate or act upon it is one of the reserved powers of the States; a power which was not only not given, nor ever intended to be given, by the framers of the constitution, to the General Government, but which the States expressly and carefully guarded and retained to themselves, by that amendment of that instrument (article 10) in which it is declared, that "all powers not delegated by the constitution to the United States, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people." The subject of slavery in the States, then, is not an open question or matter of debate. The fact that Congress possesses no authority whatever to legislate respecting it, is one that can neither be strengthened by argument, nor made clearer by discussion. And your committee consider it most fortunate for the peace of the country that it is so. He is indeed but little acquainted with the human heart, and has derived but little advantage from the lessons of history, who can imagine for a moment, if he knows any thing of the general character, or considers the political and physical strength of the people of the South, that even if the power of legislation on this subject had been expressly conferred on Congress by the constitution, it could be exercised against the consent of the States interested, without the certainty of civil war, and the probable dissolution of the Union. The declaration, however, which the House has so solemnly and decisively made upon this point, cannot fail, as your committee believe, to produce the most beneficial results. As the abolitionists care little for emancipation in the District, except as the precursor of a far more extended and general scheme, the presumption is, that having now no possible hope of governmental interference with the States, and seeing the more than probable consequences of the exercise of such a power, if it were possessed, they will discontinue their machinations in relation to the District; a consummation devoutly to be wished by every patriot, in every section of the Union. But be the issue what it may, the House of Representatives has done its duty by placing this solemn declaration upon record. It is not only peculiarly proper in itself, considering the present state of the abolition question, but, if any justification were necessary, it is amply justified by precedent. In 1790, (and from that period to the present the abolitionists have steadily aimed at general emancipation,) several petitions, praying for the abolition of slavery in the States, having been presented and referred, the House finally adopted a resolution, amongst others, in which it announced to the petitioners and to the country, "that Congress has no authority to interfere in the emancipation of slaves, or in the treatment of them, in any of the States, it remaining with the several States alone to provide any regulations therein, which humanity or policy may require." Upon the whole, your committee consider the instruction given them by the House upon this point rather as a decisive expression of a great fundamental principle of constitutional law, than as a call upon them to sustain a questionable position. They are aware that some members voted against the instruction upon this point, under the impression that, whilst the principle asserted is unquestionable in itself, its assertion by the House, in this form, might seem to imply doubt, and to countenance the idea that it is really debatable. In this view, the members who thus voted may be joined, perhaps, by many intelligent and worthy citizens of the slaveholding States; but your committee cannot believe that the assertion, in any form, by the House of Representatives, of a principle so important, and at the same time of so strong a local bearing, and particularly by a vote so nearly approaching unanimity as is recorded on its journal in favor of this instruction, can have a tendency to weaken that principle, or its binding and paramount influence upon Congress and the country in all time to come. The precedent above quoted from the Congress of 1790 shows that the House of Representatives of that day, so far from fearing the effect of such action upon its part, sought to record its solemn conviction upon this question of power in themselves, and has handed down to us its judgment, in precise accordance with our own. That House was largely, if not entirely, composed of men of the Revolution, and many of its members are known to have been also members of the convention which formed the federal constitution. Since that period, nearly half a century has rolled away, and now that the successors of that House, acting under the same considerations, solemnly reaffirm the principle laid down by those great and good men, and avow it to be not only the settled opinion of this Congress, but of the great body of the people of the United States, may we not hope, and indeed conclude, that it will be hereafter deemed a solemn and deliberate exposition of the constitution, and that all attempts in future to violate those sacred compromises which lie at the very foundation of our constitutional compact, or to excite apprehension on this subject, will be effectually counteracted and defeated. Your committee cannot but indulge a most confident and animated hope that these good effects will be produced by the present action of the House.

Your committee are instructed to report, in the second place—

That, in the opinion of this House, Congress ought not to interfere, in any way, with slavery in the District of Columbia:

1st. Because it would be a violation of the public faith.

To obey this instruction of the House in the manner pointed out by the resolution, it will be necessary to examine, to some extent, the relations between the Federal Government and the District of Columbia; the probable objects of the provision in the constitution authorizing the cession of the District to the United States; and the consequent expectations which may have been rationally entertained by the States that made the cession, as to the exercise, by Congress, of the powers granted to it over the ceded territory. Before entering upon this examination, however, it may be well to remark that the powers of Congress over this District involved in this discussion are wholly independent of, and derived from a source entirely separate from, the general legislative powers granted to Congress by the constitution. As the Legislature of confederated States, the powers of Congress are equal, and of universal application, throughout all the States; and they were given to Congress before the cession of the District, and were held and exercised independently thereof. This will be made manifest by a brief statement of facts. The first Congress under the constitution assembled on the 4th of March, 1789, and the Government provided for by the constitution was organized on that day. The general powers conferred on the different branches of the Federal Government were exercised from that day forward; and the union of the States, under constitutional government, was then perfected and put in practical operation. The cession from Virginia, of that portion of the District of Columbia that belonged to her, was not made until the 3d of December of that year—nine months after the Federal Government had been in operation;* and the cession by Maryland, of that portion of the District that belonged to her, (and in which the seat of Government is in fact located,) was not made until the 19th day of December, 1791†—more than two years and nine months after the existence of the Government in its present constitutional form. Congress did not, in fact, remove to the District thus ceded, nor did the District thus ceded become practically the seat of Government, until the year 1800; and the laws of the States by which the District was ceded were declared, by an act of Congress of the 16th July, 1790,‡ “to be in force within the District until the removal of the Government to it, and until Congress shall otherwise by law direct.”

It appears, then, that the Federal Government was in operation under the constitution nearly a year before Congress possessed any power of local legislation over any portion of the District of Columbia, and nearly three years before that power became as extensive as the present bounds of the District, or included that portion of the ten miles square in which the seat of Government is in fact located. It also appears that the first act of the Federal Legislature in reference to its jurisdiction, then partly acquired, and partly to be acquired, was to provide for the continuance, in all their force, and in every particular, within the District, of the laws of the States that made the cession, until December, 1800; a period of nine years after the time when the powers of Congress, as a local Legislature for the District, were perfected by the State of Maryland. Nor is this all: by the act of 1790 it was declared, as has been already shown, that the laws of Maryland and Virginia should be the laws of the District, not only “until the time fixed for the removal of the Government thereto,” but also “until Congress shall otherwise provide by law.” No alteration, however, to any considerable extent, has yet been made, and the laws of Virginia and Maryland which were in force at the time of their respective cessions, and in force respectively in the portions of the District ceded by each, still continue to be, in almost every particular, the local laws of the District of Columbia.

Such are the relations at present existing between the Federal Government and the District, so far as local legislation is concerned. The powers of Congress, as the local Legislature of the District, were derived from the cessions by Virginia and Maryland, and the special grant of exclusive legislation, and not from the general powers conferred upon it by the constitution; and these special and local powers, which Congress has now possessed for nearly half a century, have been exercised only to the extent above described; and, from the best information your committee have been able to obtain, to no other or greater extent.

The right of Congress to accept the cession of this territory from the States of Virginia and Maryland is found in the eighth section of the first article of the constitution of the United States, which gives it power “to exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever over such district, not exceeding ten miles square, as may, by cession of particular States, and the acceptance of Congress, become the seat of Government of the United States;” and the purpose for which the cession was to be made and received is declared in the language of the constitution itself, “such district as may become the seat of Government of the United States.” The cession, therefore, was to be made for this purpose, and for no other; and, as regards its use by the Federal Government, the object of this provision evidently was simply to authorize Congress to accept the grant, and to exercise the powers of legislation therein provided for.

It will be conceded by the committee, for the purpose of this report, that the cession was made in conformity with the power of Congress to receive, and that, therefore, by the cession from Virginia and Maryland, Congress is in possession of the powers which the constitution intended it should possess over the district intended to be ceded.

This brings us to the inquiry, as to the probable objects of the grant of “exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever,” over the territory which was to constitute the seat of Government of the United States. In consulting the commentators upon the constitution, it will be found that the old Congress encountered inconveniences, and even dangers, from holding their sessions where State Legislatures had exclusive local jurisdiction, and where State authorities alone were to be depended on in matters of police and personal protection. Indeed, an adjournment of that Congress from the State of Pennsylvania to New Jersey, for a cause of this description, which occurred at the close of the revolutionary war, no doubt contributed greatly to the introduction of this clause into the constitution of the Union. The proceedings of the old Congress show, distinctly, that the acquirement of a territory for the seat of the Federal Legislature, over which it should have exclusive or special jurisdiction, was a favorite idea with that body, as early as the year 1783, and that it continued up to the time of the formation of the constitution. Upon this point your committee will only detain the House with a few of the resolutions adopted by the old Congress that go to establish it. On the 7th of October, 1783, a resolution was passed, “that buildings for the use of Congress be erected on or near the banks of the Delaware,* provided a suitable district can be procured on or near the banks of the said river for a federal town, and that the right of soil, and exclusive or such other jurisdiction as Congress may direct, shall be vested in the United States.” On the 21st of the same month, (October, 1783,) another resolution was passed, preceded by a preamble, as follows: “Whereas there is reason to expect that the providing buildings for the alternate residence of Congress in two places will be productive of the most salutary effects, by securing the mutual confidence and affections of the States, Resolved, That buildings be provided for the use of Congress at or near the lower falls of the Potomac,† or Georgetown, provided a suitable district on the banks of the river can be procured for a federal town, and the right of soil, and an exclusive jurisdiction, or such other as Congress may direct, shall be vested in the United States.”

On the 20th of December, 1784, the old Congress passed, among others, the following resolutions:

“Resolved, That it is expedient that Congress proceed to take measures for procuring suitable buildings to be erected for their accommodation.

“Resolved, That it is inexpedient for Congress at this time to erect public buildings for their accommodation at more than one place.”

These resolutions by the continental Congress, as to the expediency and necessity for a territory for the seat of the Federal Government, over which it should have peculiar if not exclusive jurisdiction, are produced to show the origin of the provision in the constitution upon that subject, and the object for which the acquisition of such a territory was desired. That object, beyond all question, was to secure a seat for the Federal Government, where the power of self-protection should be ample and complete, and where it might be exercised without collision or conflict with the legislative powers of any of the States, so far as its exercise should be required for the great national purposes for which the peculiar or exclusive jurisdiction was sought to be obtained. The jurisdiction was made exclusive, not, as your committee believe, and as they think every considerate citizen will admit, to change the object of the grant of the jurisdiction when it should be made, but to secure that object more effectually by making the Federal Government independent of State interference, and of State protection, within the district where it was to be located, and where its deliberations should be held. Had the legislative power of Congress over this District not been made exclusive, one of the great and wise objects intended to be secured, the prevention of conflict between Federal and State legislation, would have been necessarily defeated. Every statesman will admit the extreme inconvenience and danger of granting powers of legislation of the same character, and to be exercised within the same territory, (powers of local and municipal legislation,) to two distinct and independent legislative bodies; and the extreme difficulty, if not impossibility, of so defining the portions of power to be exercised by each, as to prevent constant conflict and collision. This must have been the result, if any division of the powers of local legislation, within the District of Columbia, had been made between Congress and the States by which the territory was ceded to the United States. Congress required all that power which, through all time, would be indispensably necessary for its own protection, and also to render all the departments of the Federal Government independent of State authority, and entirely dependent on, and obedient to, the Federal Legislature, and it alone, in all matters of police or municipal legislation. The adoption of the federal constitution by the people of the several States with this provision in it, shows that the attainment of these objects was considered of paramount importance; and, hence, in the judgment of your committee, the power in question was made exclusive.

Assuming the correctness of these premises, the next inquiry is, what expectations were the States by which the District was ceded, as well as their sister States, authorized to entertain as to the exercise by Congress of the legislative powers derived from these cessions? These cessions included not only a portion of the territory of those States, but also a portion of their citizens. To secure the great national objects intended by the cession, the jurisdiction of the States over those citizens, as well as over the territory of the District, was transferred to the Federal Legislature. This transfer, from the necessity of the case, abridged the rights of the citizens within the territory, who had been formerly entitled to vote for their legislators and other rulers, by subjecting them to a Government composed of persons in whose election they were to have no choice. Their governance, however, was confided to those intrusted with the common Government of all the States; and when we reflect upon the confidence reposed in Congress by the States that made the transfer, and by the citizens transferred, it accounts at once for the readiness with which the cession was effected. Still, the question recurs, what expectations might reasonably be entertained by the States making the cession, by the other States of the confederacy, so far as their interests were directly or indirectly involved, and by the citizens thus placed under the peculiar care of Congress, as to its exercise of the powers conferred upon it by this cession of territories for a seat of the Federal Government?

Your committee have no hesitation to say, in answer to this inquiry, that those expectations, by all the parties interested, not only might, but must have been, that Congress would exercise the powers conferred, so far as their exercise should be found necessary for the great national objects of the cession, with strict reference to the accomplishment of those objects; and that all other powers conferred by the cession would be exercised with an equally strict reference to the interests and welfare of the inhabitants of the District—those citizens of two free States who had been made dependent on Congress for their local legislation, for the protection of life, liberty, and property—rights guaranteed by the constitution to all the citizens of the confederacy—in order that a seat for the Federal Government, subject to the exclusive control of Congress, might be granted to it. If these positions are correct, it follows necessarily that the institutions, the customs, the rights, the property, and every other incident pertaining to those citizens, and municipal in its character, which they enjoyed as citizens of the States to which they belonged before the cession of the District, and which did not then, and have not yet, interfered with the great national rights and privileges intended to be secured by the cession, should have been hitherto, and should be in all time to come, guarded and preserved with the same paternal care and kindness with which the Legislatures of the States to which they belonged would have guarded and protected them, if they had continued to be intrusted to their respective jurisdictions.

Your committee rely confidently upon this as the great rule for the faithful action of Congress in reference to this subject. They feel assured that no rational man will differ with them. Two questions, then, remain to be considered, to determine whether Congress should or should not attempt to interfere with slavery in the District of Columbia, viz:

1. Do the great national objects which were intended to be secured to the Federal Government by the cession of the territory require such action on the part of Congress?

Your committee will make no argument upon so plain a proposition. No individual within their knowledge, not even the most deluded fanatic, has ever asked, or attempted to justify, a measure of this description upon such a pretext. The security and independence of Congress, from the moment of its removal to this District to the present hour, have been as perfect as the framers of the constitution could have desired. No intimation has ever been heard that the existence of slavery in the District of Columbia has ever produced the slightest danger or inconvenience either to the interests or to the officers of the Federal Government within it. Surely, then, Congress cannot be called upon to interfere with that institution within the District, as one of its duties growing out of the national objects connected with the cession; and if such interference is demanded from it, the demand must grow out of its relations to the District as a local Legislature. This brings the committee to the remaining question:

2. Would the States of Maryland and Virginia, if the cession of this territory to the Federal Government had not been made, from any thing which has been shown to Congress, be induced to interfere with, or abolish, the institution of domestic slavery within it?

At the time of the cession from those States, slavery existed in every portion of their territory, in the same degree, and subject to the same laws and regulations by which it was authorized and regulated in the territory ceded to the Federal Government. It still exists in those States, without any material variation or modification of their laws respecting it. As those States, then, have not abolished it within the territories remaining under their jurisdiction, is it reasonable to suppose that they would have abolished it in the territory comprising the District, had they continued to retain their original jurisdiction over it? Can any reason whatever be given for the abolition of slavery in this particular District, which does not apply with equal force to every other slaveholding section of the country? Can any cause be shown why the States of Maryland and Virginia would have abolished, or would now abolish, slavery in this District, had it continued to form a part of those States, respectively, which would not have warranted or produced general abolition throughout those States? Most unquestionably not. As those States, then, have not abolished slavery in the residue of their territory, it is evident that they would not have abolished it in the District of Columbia, if it had continued subject to their action. It follows conclusively, therefore, that Congress, as the local Legislature of the District, and acting independently of the national considerations connected with its powers over it, is bound, for the preservation of the public faith and the rights of all the parties interested, to act upon the same reasons, and to exercise the same paternal regard, which would have governed the States by which the District was ceded to the Federal Government. And it is unnecessary to add, that Congress has acted wisely in treating the institutions found in existence at the time of the cession, as the institutions of the people of the District; in continuing their laws and customs, as the laws and customs to which they had been used, and which should never be altered, or interfered with, except where the people themselves may be desirous of a change.

Your committee must go further, and express their full conviction that any interference by Congress with the private interests or rights of the citizens of this District, without their consent, would be a breach of the faith reposed in the Federal Government by the States that made the cession, and as violent an infraction of private rights as it would have been if those States themselves, supposing their jurisdiction had remained unimpaired over their territory, had abolished slavery within those portions of their respective limits, and had continued its existence, upon its present basis, in every other portion of them. And surely there is no citizen, in any quarter of the country, who has the smallest regard for our laws and institutions, State and national, or for equal justice, and an equality of rights and privileges among citizens entitled to it, who would attempt to justify such an outrage on the part of those States. The question, then, is, are the citizens of the District desirous of a change themselves? Has any request or movement been made by them that would justify an interference with their private rights on the part of Congress? None, whatever! The citizens of the District not only have not solicited any action on the part of Congress, but it is well known that they earnestly deprecate such action, and regard with abhorrence the efforts that are made by others, who have no interest whatever in the District, to effect it. It is impossible, therefore, that any such interference on the part of Congress could be justified, or even palliated, on the ground that it was sought or desired by those who are alone interested in the subject. If, therefore, Congress were to interfere with this description of property, against the consent of the people of the District, your committee feel bound to say that it would be as gross a breach of public faith, and as outrageous an infraction of private rights, as it would have been if such an interference had been committed by the States of which the District was formerly a part, supposing that it never had been ceded to the United States.

Your committee will here anticipate an objection which may be urged against this reasoning and these conclusions. They have shown that the powers of Congress over this District divide themselves into two classes, national and local; that, in reference to the former, the action of Congress should be governed by the interests of the whole country, so far as they are connected with the branches of the Federal Government located within the District; that, in reference to the latter, its powers are, and its action should be, those of a local and municipal Legislature, extending its paternal care and protection over the citizens dependent upon, and subjected to, this branch of its authority; that, in the exercise of its powers, the safest stand in reference to slavery is, what would the States to which the District originally belonged, and of which its citizens were originally citizens, have done in case their jurisdiction had never been transferred to Congress; and that those States would certainly not have interfered with the institution of slavery in the District, had the power to do so remained with them. The objection anticipated is, that the States in question have pursued an unwise policy as to themselves, and that their having done so should not have bound Congress, as the local Legislature of the District, to a similar policy in relation to its government. To this, however, your committee consider it perfectly conclusive to reply, that, under our institutions, that people is the best governed which is governed most in accordance with its own habits, interests, and wishes; that the policy hitherto pursued by Congress in reference to slavery within the District, your committee have every reason to believe, has been in perfect conformity with the wishes and interests of the citizens concerned; and that it will be time enough for Congress, acting as the local Legislature of the District, and in that capacity bound to consult the governed, as the regulators of its action, to move in any matter relating to their private interests and rights when they themselves shall ask such movement.

There is another consideration connected with this part of the argument, which your committee think worthy of attention. It is this: that there is no law in the District prohibiting the master from manumitting his slaves, which he may do at his own discretion, and without incurring any responsibility whatever. Certain it is that no such law has been passed by Congress. The citizens of the District, therefore, have no necessity for the aid of Congress, should they wish the abolition of slavery among them. They have only to exercise an existing right, and their wish will be accomplished. Can there be more decisive evidence, then, that they do not wish the abolition of slavery, than that it continues to exist among them! or can any one desire more conclusive proof that any attempt by Congress to effect this object by the force of law would be an interference with the rights of private property, against the wishes and consent of those concerned, and for none of the purposes for which Congress is authorized by the constitution to take private property for public use?

Hence, your committee believe they have proved, beyond the power of contradiction, that an interference by Congress with slavery in the District of Columbia would be a violation of the public faith—of the faith reposed in Congress by the States which ceded the territory to the Federal Government, so far as the rights and interests of those citizens residing within the ceded territory are concerned.

Your committee will now consider this proposition in reference to the interests of the States of Maryland and Virginia. They were slaveholding States at the time they made their cession, and they are so still. They entirely surround this District, from which they are only separated upon all sides by imaginary lines. They made the cession for the great national objects which have been already pointed out, and they made it from motives of patriotism alone, and without any compensation from the Federal Government for the surrender of jurisdiction over commanding positions in both States. The surrender was made for purposes deemed sufficiently important, by all the original States, to be provided for in the constitution of the United States; and it was made in conformity with that provision of the constitution. It is surely unnecessary, after this statement of facts, to undertake to show that those patriotic States made this cession for purposes of good to the Union, and consequently to themselves, and not for purposes of evil to themselves, and consequently to the Union; and that the Government of the United States accepted the cession for the same good, and not for evil, purposes.

If, then, it can be demonstrated that the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia would produce evil, and not good, to the States that made the cession, the conclusion is inevitable that such an act on the part of Congress would be a violation of the faith reposed in it by those States. To all to whom this is not perfectly palpable without an argument, the following considerations are presented:

Slavery in the District of Columbia.

[24th Cong. 1st Sess.]

It has been already said that the States of Maryland and Virginia surround the District. It has also been shown that, in reference to slavery within the District, the relations of Congress are entirely those of a local Legislature, and that its action, therefore, in this capacity, should be governed by the same reasons which would have governed those States themselves in relation to this subject, if their jurisdiction over this territory had never been surrendered. Let us suppose, then, that this jurisdiction had never been surrendered by Maryland and Virginia, and that it was now proposed that they should abolish slavery, and relinquish all power of legislation over free blacks, within the portions of those States which constitute the District of Columbia, retaining their respective institutions of slavery in all the remaining portions of their territory. Who is there that would not be amazed at the folly of such an act? Who does not see that such a step would necessarily produce discontent and insurrections in the remaining portions of those States? Who does not perceive that under such circumstances the District would constitute at once a neutral ground, upon which hosts of free blacks, fugitive slaves, and incendiaries, would be assembled in the work of general abolitionism; and that, from such a magazine of evil, every conceivable mischief would be spread through the surrounding country, with almost the rapidity of the movements of the atmosphere? Surely no one can doubt the certainty of the consequential evils in the case supposed. How, then, can any doubt or deny the dangers in the case before us? The territory is the same; it is surrounded by the same portions of slaveholding States; and the only difference is, that in the case supposed the abolition would be the work of State authorities, while, in the other, it is sought to accomplish it by the authority of Congress. The condition of things before and after it is done is the same in both cases, and the opportunities for mischief, in case the work be accomplished, are equal in both. Can it be necessary to say more, to establish the position, that any interference with slavery in the District of Columbia, on the part of Congress, would be a violation of the public faith, the faith reposed in Congress by those States, and without which they never could have been induced to have made that cession?

It only remains, under this head, to show that Congress could not interfere with slavery in the District of Columbia, without a violation of the public faith, in reference to the slaveholding States generally, as well as to the States of Virginia and Maryland. The provision of the constitution authorizing Congress to accept the cession of a territory for a seat of the Federal Government, and to exercise exclusive jurisdiction over it, was as general and universal as any other provision in that instrument. In its national objects all the States were equally interested, and so far as there was any danger that the powers of local legislation conferred on Congress might interfere with, or injuriously affect, the institutions of the various States, each State possessed an interest proportionate to the probable danger to itself. As far as your committee know or believe, however, no apprehension of an interference on the subject of domestic slavery was entertained in any quarter, or expressed by any statesman of the day. An examination of the commentaries on the constitution will show that various apprehensions were entertained, as to the powers conferred on Congress by this clause, such as that privileged classes of society might be created within the District; that a standing army, dangerous to the liberties of the country, might be organized and sustained within it, and the like; but not a suggestion can be found that, under the local powers to be conferred, any attempt would be made to interfere with the private rights of the citizens who might be embraced within the District, or to disturb or change, directly or by consequence, the municipal institutions of the States, or that the subject of domestic slavery, as it existed in the States, could be in any way involved in the proposed cession. At that time, all the States held slaves. Many of them have since, by their own independent action, without influence or interference from the Federal Government, or from their sister States, effected, in their own time and way, the work of emancipation; others of the original States remain as they were at the time of the adoption of the constitution, in reference to this description of property, and several new members have been admitted into the Union as slaveholding States. All the States which have held or now hold slave property have invariably considered the institution as one exclusively subject to State authority, and not to be affected, directly or indirectly, by federal interference. The practice of the Government, as well as its theory, has established this doctrine, and the action of the States, in retaining or abolishing the institution at pleasure, has conformed entirely to this principle. Now, the subject of federal interference has become one of some agitation, and Congress is solicited to adopt measures in relation to the District of Columbia, which have been shown to be most dangerous and destructive to the security and interests of the two slaveholding States by which it was ceded to the Federal Government. Your committee will not trouble the House to prove that any measure of the Federal Legislature, which would have this tendency in those two States, would, from the very necessity of the case, and the unity of the interest wherever it exists, have the same tendency, measurably, in all the other slaveholding members of the Union. This position is too plain for argument. If, then, all the States were equally interested in the national objects for which this territory was ceded as the seat of the Federal Government; if that cession was designed by the framers of the constitution to enure to the benefit of the whole confederacy, and was made in furtherance of that design; and if Congress, contrary to the obvious intent and spirit of the cession, shall do an act not required by the national objects contemplated by it, but directly repugnant to the interests and wishes of the citizens of the ceded territory, and calculated to disturb the peace and endanger the interests of the slaveholding members of the Union, such an act must be in violation of the public faith; of the faith reposed in Congress by the States that made the cession, and which would be deeply injured by such an exercise of power under it, and also of the faith reposed in that body by all the States, inasmuch as no independent State in the Union can be injured in its peace, or its rightful interests, by the action of the Federal Government, without a corresponding injury to every member of the confederated States.

Your committee have already shown that an interference with slavery in the District of Columbia would involve a violation of the public faith, as regards the rights and interests of the citizens thereof. They recur to this topic, however, on account of its importance, and for the purpose of putting it in another light, and, as they consider, upon unanswerable ground. They are aware that, under the constitution,* Congress possesses "exclusive legislation" over the aforesaid District; but the power of legislation was given to be exercised for beneficial purposes only, and cannot, therefore, be exercised, consistently with public faith, for any object that is at war with the great principles upon which the Government itself is founded. The constitution, to be properly understood, must be taken as a whole. Wherever a particular power is granted, the extent to which it may be carried can only be inferred from other provisions, by which it may be regulated or restrained. The constitution, while it confers upon Congress exclusive legislation within this District, does not, and could not, confer unlimited or despotic authority over it. It could confer no power contrary to the fundamental principles of the constitution itself, and the essential and unalienable rights of American citizens. The right to legislate, therefore, (to make the constitution consistent with itself,) is evidently qualified by the provision that "no man shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law,"* and various others of a similar character. We lay it down as a rule, that no Government can do any thing directly repugnant to the principles of natural justice and of the social compact. It would be totally subversive of all the purposes for which government is instituted. Vattel says: "The great end of civil society is, whatever constitutes happiness, with the peaceful possession of property." No republican would tolerate that a man should be punished, by a special statute, for an act not legally punishable at the time of its commission. No republican could approve any system of legislation by which private contracts, lawfully made, should be declared null and void, or by which the property of an individual, lawfully acquired, should be arbitrarily wrested from him by the high hand of power. But these great principles are not left for their support to the natural feelings of the human heart, or to the mere general spirit of republican government. They are expressly incorporated in the constitution, and they have also been recognised, and insisted on, by the Supreme Court of the United States, which lays down the following sound and incontrovertible doctrine: "There are acts which the Federal or State Legislatures cannot do, without exceeding their authority. There are certain vital principles in our free republican Government, which will determine and overrule an apparent and flagrant abuse of legislative power; as to authorize manifest injustice by positive law, or to take away that security for personal liberty or private property, for the protection whereof the Government was established. An act of the Legislature, contrary to the great first principles of the social compact, cannot be considered a rightful exercise of legislative authority. The obligation of a law, in Governments established on express compact, and on republican principles, must be determined by the nature of the power on which it is founded. A few instances will suffice to explain. A law that punished a citizen for an innocent action, or that was in violation of an existing law; a law that destroys or impairs the obligation of the lawful private contracts of citizens; a law that makes a man a judge in his own case; or a law that takes property from A, and gives it to B. It is against all reason and justice for a people to intrust a Legislature with such powers, and therefore it cannot be presumed that they have done it. The Legislature may enjoin or permit, forbid or punish; they may declare new crimes, and establish rules of conduct for future cases, but they cannot change innocence into guilt, or punish innocence as a crime, or violate the rights of an antecedent lawful private contract, or the right of private property. To maintain that our Federal or State Legislatures possess such powers, even if they had not been expressly restrained, would be a political heresy, altogether inadmissible in our free republican Government."† Now, every principle here affirmed by the court applies to and protects the people of this District, as well as the people of the States. The inhabitants of this District are a part of the people of the United States. Every right and interest secured by the constitution to the people of the States, is equally secured to the people of the District. Congress can, therefore, do no act affecting property or person, in relation to this District, which it is prohibited to do in relation to the citizens of the States, without a direct violation of the public faith. For instance, it is a well-settled constitutional principle, that "private property shall not be taken for public use, without just compensation." Now, the true meaning of this provision obviously is, that private property shall be taken only for public use, but shall not be taken, even then, without adequate remuneration. It is evident, however, in reference to slavery, either that the Government would use the slaves, or that it would not. If it would use them, then they would not be emancipated; and it would be an idle mockery to talk of the freedom of those who would only cease to be private, to become public slaves. If it would not use them, then, how could it be said that they were taken for the public use, consistently with the provision just recited? But even if they could be taken without reference to public use, they could not be taken without just compensation. It is exceedingly questionable, however, whether Congress could legally apply the public revenue to such an object, even with the consent of the owners of the slaves. As to emancipation without their consent, and without just compensation, your committee will not stop to consider it. It could not bear examination. Honor, humanity, policy, all forbid it. It is manifest, then, from all the considerations herein stated, (and there are others equally forcible that might be urged,) that Congress could not abolish slavery in the District of Columbia, without a violation of the public faith.

Your committee will only add one or two reflections upon this interesting point.

What is the meaning of the declaration adopted by the House, in relation to the District of Columbia? Is it not that Congress cannot, and will not, do an act which it has solemnly proclaimed to involve a violation of the public faith? Does it not afford every security to the South which it is in the power of the Federal Government to afford? Is it not tantamount, in its binding obligation upon the Government, to a positive declaration that the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia would be unconstitutional? Nay, is it not even more efficacious in point of fact? Constitutional provisions are matters of construction. The opinion of one House, upon an abstract controverted point, may be overruled and reversed by another. But when Congress has solemnly declared that a particular act would be a violation of the public faith, is it to be supposed that it would ever violate a pledge thus given to the country? Can any abolitionist expect it? Need any citizen of a slave State fear it? What is public faith but the honor of the Government? Why are treaties regarded as sacred and inviolable? Why, but because they involve the pledge, and depend upon the sanctity, of the national faith? Why are all compacts or promises made by Governments held to be irrevocably binding? Why, but because they cannot break them without committing perfidy, and destroying all confidence in their justice and integrity? Surely, then, your committee may say with the utmost confidence, (and the sentiment will be ratified by every American heart,) that the declaration now promulgated in relation to this subject will not be departed from by any succeeding Legislature, except under circumstances (should any such ever arise in the progress of our country) in which a departure from it would not be regarded by the slaveholding States themselves as a wanton or arbitrary infraction of the public faith.

Your committee are further instructed to report that, in the opinion of this House, Congress ought not to interfere in any way with slavery in the District of Columbia—2dly. Because it would be unwise and impolitic.

It will be palpable to the minds of all, that if the committee have succeeded in establishing, as they think they have, that any such interference on the part of Congress would be a violation of the public faith, it would be a work of supererogation to attempt to show that such an act would be unwise and impolitic. As there may be some, however, who may not agree with them in their arguments or conclusions upon that point, they feel bound, under the instruction of the House, to offer a few suggestions under this head.

The Federal Government was the creation of the States of the confederacy, and the great objects of its creation and organization "were to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, and provide for the common defence and general welfare."

Apply these principles, then, to an interference by Congress with slavery in the District of Columbia. Such action, to be politic, must be in accordance with some one of those great objects; and it will be the duty of the committee, in as concise a manner as possible, to show that it would not be in accordance with either of them.

First, then, as to the District itself.

It has already been shown that any interference, unsolicited by the inhabitants of the District, cannot "establish justice," or promote the cause of justice within it, but directly the reverse. No greater degree of slavery exists here now, than did exist when the constitution was adopted, and then the inhabitants of the District were citizens of the States of Maryland and Virginia, and had a voice in the adoption of that instrument. Surely their subsequent transfer to the jurisdiction of Congress, made in conformity with that constitution, could not deprive them of the protection to which they were entitled by these great leading principles of it. On the contrary, they had every right to expect that Congress would "establish justice," as to them, in strict compliance with the great charter under which it acted, and by which it is forbidden to interfere with the rights of private property, without their consent, or in any way to affect, injuriously, their domestic institutions. Of those institutions, slavery was, and is, the most important; and any attempt on the part of Congress, acting as the local Legislature of the District, to abolish it, would be not only impolitic, but an act of gross injustice and oppression.

Secondly, as to the States of the Union. Here, again, your committee have but to refer to their former remarks, to show that the abolition of slavery in the District would not "establish justice," but work great injustice to the surrounding States in particular, and to all the slave States in general, and in a degree proportioned to their proximity to the District, and to the influence upon the institution of slavery in the Union, of such action on the part of Congress. They have also shown that the abolition of slavery here, so far from tending to "insure domestic tranquillity," would have a direct tendency to produce domestic discord and violence, and servile war, in all the slaveholding States. As these consequences, then, would follow such action in reference to the States, your committee need not say that, instead of providing for "the common defence by it," Congress would be called upon to provide for the common defence "in consequence of it," and to an extent which cannot now be foreseen. Seeing, then, that the American confederacy was formed for the great objects of providing for "the common defence and general welfare," it follows, necessarily, that Congress is not only restrained from the commission of any act by which these objects may be frustrated, but that it is bound to sustain and promote them. The same provision of the constitution* which requires it to call out the militia to "suppress insurrections," unquestionably imposes the corresponding obligation upon it to commit no act by which an insurrectionary spirit may be excited. The same provision which enjoins it on the Federal Government to "guaranty to each State a republican form of government, and to aid and protect each State against domestic violence,"† evidently implies the correlative obligation to take no step, of which the direct and inevitable tendency would be to overthrow the State Governments, and to involve them in wide-spread scenes of misery and desolation. In one word, if it be the duty of Congress, as it most clearly is, to support and preserve the constitution and the Union, then it is manifest that it is bound to avoid the adoption of any legislation which may lead to their destruction. Your committee consider these positions too obvious to require argument or illustration. They consider it equally manifest, that any attempt to abolish slavery in the District would necessarily tend to the deplorable consequences to which they have adverted. Congress, therefore, is bound, by every principle of duty which forbids it to interfere with slavery in any of the States, to abstain from any similar interference in the District of Columbia.

Your committee have already adverted to the evils that would necessarily result to the surrounding States, and to the slave States generally, from any interference by Congress with the institution of slavery in the District of Columbia. The nature and magnitude of those evils, however, require that they should be exhibited more fully and distinctly. The question is, whether slavery ought to be abolished in the District of Columbia? Now, suppose the affirmative of this proposition were sustained by Congress, what would it be but indirect legislation, or rather direct interference, as regards the rights and property of the Southern States. And can any one imagine that such a state of things would be patiently borne? But this is not all; nay, it is not half the evil that would follow. Could slavery be abolished in the District without leading directly and inevitably to insubordination and revolt throughout the South? And can any one desire to produce such results? Is there a man who has forgotten the history of St. Domingo, or the insurgent attempt at Charleston, or the tragical scenes at Southampton, or the recent and lamentable occurrences in the States of Louisiana and Mississippi? or is there an individual who would wish them repeated, and extended throughout the entire region of the South? Why, then, will infatuated individuals persist in pressing a scheme which is not only impracticable, as regards the States, but fraught with evil to the very objects it is proposed to benefit? True philanthropy would avoid this subject, seeing the distraction it creates, and the dreadful consequences it involves. It would leave it to those whom it most concerns, and who alone are competent to act upon it. It would trust to time, and to the gradual operation of causes which may arise of themselves, but which can neither be produced nor hastened by foreign interference, or the power of this Government. Why, then, your committee earnestly repeat, why urge a measure which is clearly impracticable in itself, which none but the slaveholding States have a right to act on, and which has increased, and will always increase, the hardships and restraints of those for whose imaginary benefit they are waging this cruel and fanatical crusade?

We have said that the scheme of general emancipation is impracticable. The slightest reflection must satisfy every candid mind of the truth of this assertion.

Admitting that the Federal Government had a right to act upon this matter, which it clearly has not, it certainly never could achieve such an operation without full compensation to the owners. And what would probably be the amount required? The aggregate value of all that species of property is not less, probably, than four hundred millions of dollars! And how could such an amount be raised? Will the people of this country ever consent to the imposition of oppressive taxes, that the proceeds may be applied to the purchase of slaves? The idea is preposterous; and not only that, but it is susceptible of demonstration, that even if an annual appropriation of ten millions were actually applied to the purchase and transportation of slaves, the whole number would not be sensibly diminished at the expiration of half a century, from the natural growth and multiplication of the race. Burden the Treasury as we might, it would still be an endless expense and an interminable work. And this view of the subject, surely, is sufficient of itself to prove, that of all the schemes ever projected by fanaticism, the idea of universal emancipation is the most visionary and impracticable.

* Constitution, article 1, section 8.

† Article 4, section 4.

But even if the scheme were practicable, what would be gained by effecting it? Suppose that Congress could emancipate all the slaves in the Union, is such a result desirable? This question is addressed to the sober sense of the people of America. Would it be politic or advantageous? Would it contribute to the wealth, or grandeur, or happiness, of our country? On the contrary, would it not produce consequences directly the reverse? Are not the slaves unfit for freedom; notoriously ignorant, servile, and depraved? and would any rational man have them instantaneously transformed into freemen, with all the rights and privileges of American citizens? Are they capable of understanding correctly the nature of our Government, or exercising judiciously a single political right or privilege? Nay, would they even be capable of earning their own livelihood, or rearing their families independently by their own ingenuity and industry? What, then, would follow from their liberation, but the most deplorable state of society with which any civilized country was ever cursed? How would vice, and immorality, and licentiousness, overrun the land? How many jails and penitentiaries, that now seldom hold a prisoner, would be crowded to suffocation? How many fertile fields, that now yield regular and abundant harvests, would lie unoccupied and desolate? How would the foreign commerce of the South decline and disappear? How many thousands of seamen, of whom Southern agriculture is the very life, would be driven for support to foreign countries? And how large a portion of the federal revenue, derived from foreign commodities exchanged for Southern products, would be lost forever to this Government? And, in addition to all this, what would be the condition of Southern society, were all the slaves emancipated? Would the whites consent that the blacks should be placed upon a full footing of equality with them? Unquestionably not! Either the one class or the other would be forced to emigrate, and, in either case, the whole region of the South would be a scene of poverty and ruin. Or, what is still more probable, the blacks would every where be driven before the whites, as the Indians have been, until they were exterminated from the earth. And surely it is unnecessary to remark, that decay and desolation could not break down the South, without producing a corresponding depression upon the wealth and enterprise of the Northern States. And here let us ask, too, what would be the condition of the non-slaveholding States themselves, as regards the blacks? Are they prepared to receive myriads of negroes, and place them upon an equality with the free white laborers and mechanics, who constitute their pride and strength? Will the new States consent that their territory shall be occupied by negroes, instead of the enterprising, intelligent, and patriotic white population, which is daily seeking their borders from other portions of the Union? Shall the yeomanry of those States be surrounded by thousands of such beings, and the white laborer forced into competition and association with them? Are they to enjoy the same civil and political privileges as the free white citizens of the North and West, and to be admitted into the social circle as their friends and companions? Nothing less than all this will constitute perfect freedom; and the principles now maintained by those who advocate emancipation would, if carried out, necessarily produce this state of things! Yet, who believes that it would be tolerated for a moment? Already have laws been passed in several of the non-slaveholding States to exclude free blacks from a settlement within their limits; and a prospect of general and immediate abolition would compel them, in self-defence, to resort to a system of measures much more rigorous and effective than any which have yet been adopted. Driven from the South, then, the blacks would find no place of refuge in the North; and, as before remarked, utter extermination would be the probable if not the inevitable fate of the whole race. Where is the citizen, then, that can desire such results? Where the American who can contemplate them without emotion? Where the abolitionist that will not pause, in view of the direful consequences of his scheme, both to the whites and the blacks, to the North and the South, and to the whole Union at large?

Your committee deem it their duty to say that, in their opinion, the people of the South have been very unjustly censured in reference to slavery. It is not their purpose, however, to defend them. Their character, as men and citizens, needs no vindication from us. Wherever it is known it speaks for itself, nor would any wantonly traduce it, but those assassins of reputation who are also willing to be the destroyers of life. Exaggerated pictures have been drawn of the hardships of the slave, and every effort made to malign the South, and to enlist against it both the religious and political feeling of the North. Your committee cannot too strongly express their unanimous and unqualified disapprobation of all such movements. The constitution under which we live was framed by our common ancestors, to preserve the liberty and independence achieved by their united efforts in the council and the field. In all our contests with foreign enemies, the South has exhibited an unwavering attachment to the common cause. Where is the spot of which Americans are prouder than the plains of Yorktown? Or when was Britain more humbled, or America more honored, than by the victory of New Orleans? All our history, from the Revolution down, attests the high, and uniform, and devoted, patriotism of the South. Her domestic institutions are her own. They were brought into the Union with her, and secured by the compact which makes us one people; and he who would sow dissensions among members of the same great political family, by assailing the institutions and impugning the character of the citizens of the South, should be regarded as an enemy to the peace and prosperity of our common country.

If there is a feature by which the present age may be said to be characterized, it is that sickly sentimentality which, disregarding the pressing claims and wants of its own immediate neighborhood, or town, or State, wastes and dissipates itself in visionary, and often very mischievous, enterprises, for the imaginary benefit of remote communities. True philanthropy, rightly understood and properly applied, is one of the purest and most ennobling principles of our nature; but, misdirected or perverted, it degenerates into that fell spirit of fanaticism which disregards all ties, and tramples on all obstacles, however sacred or venerable, in the relentless prosecution of its horrid purposes. Experience proves, however, that, when individuals in one place, mistaking the true character of benevolence, rashly undertake, at the imminent hazard of conflict and convulsion, to remedy what they are pleased to consider evils and distresses in another, it is naturally regarded by those who are thus injured either as a species of madness which may be repelled or resisted, as any other madness may, or as manifesting a feeling of hostility on the one side, which must necessarily produce corresponding alienation on the other. It is all important, therefore, that the spirit of abolition, or, in other words, of illegal and officious interference with the domestic institutions of the South, should be arrested and put down; and men of intelligence and influence at the North should endeavor to produce that sound and rational state of public opinion which is equally due to the South and to the preservation of the Union.

And this brings your committee to the last position they have been instructed to sustain; and that is, that, in the opinion of this House, Congress ought not to interfere, in any way, with slavery in the District of Columbia—3dly. Because it would be dangerous to the Union.

The first great object enumerated in the constitution, as an inducement to its adoption, was to "form a more perfect union." At that time, all the States held slaves, to a greater or less extent; and slavery in the States was fully recognised and provided for, in many particulars, in that instrument itself. It was recognised, however, and all the provisions upon the subject so regarded it, as a State, and not a national, institution. At that time, too, as has been before remarked, the District of Columbia constituted an integral part of two of the independent States which became parties to the confederacy and to the constitution itself. Since that time an entire emancipation of slaves has taken place in several of the old States; but in all cases this has been the work of the States themselves, without any interference whatever by the Federal Government. New States have also been admitted into the Union, with an interdiction in their constitutions against involuntary servitude. In this way, the slave States have become a minority in representation in the Federal Legislature. Their interests, however, as States, in the institution of domestic slavery, as it exists within their limits, have not diminished, nor has their right to perfect security under the constitution, in reference to this description of property, been in any way, or to any degree, surrendered or impaired, since the adoption of that instrument by themselves and their sister States.

The operation of causes, to a great extent natural, and proceeding from climate, soil, and consequent production, has rendered slavery a local and sectional institution, and has thus added another to the most alarming apprehensions of patriots for the perpetuity of this Union—the apprehension of local and geographical interests and distinctions. How immensely important is it, then, that Congress should do no act, and assume no jurisdiction, in reference to this great interest, by which it shall ever appear to place itself in the attitude of a local, instead of a national, tribunal—a partial agent, providing for peculiar and sectional objects and feelings, instead of a general and paternal Legislature, equally and impartially promoting the general welfare of all the States. No one can fail to see that any other course on the part of Congress must weaken the confidence of the injured States in the federal authority, and, to the same extent, prove "dangerous to the Union."

Since the adoption of the federal constitution, the District of Columbia has been ceded to the United States as a seat of the Federal Government; but not only many eminent statesmen of the country, but all of the slaveholding States, speaking through their legislative assemblies, firmly believe and insist that the cession so made has conferred upon Congress no constitutional power to abolish slavery within the ceded territory. Your committee have abstained from an examination of this question, because they were not instructed to discuss it. But they have no hesitation to say that, in the view they have taken of the whole question, the obligations of Congress not to act on this subject are as fully binding and insuperable as a positive constitutional interdict, or an open acknowledgment of want of power.

Considering the subject in this light, your committee have already proved that any interference by Congress with the subject of slavery would be evidently calculated to injure the interests and disturb the peace of the slaveholding States; and if they have succeeded in establishing this position, no argument is necessary to show that such consequences, springing from the action of Congress as the local Legislature of the District, would eminently endanger the existence of this Union. It has also been shown that Congress, as the Legislature of the Union, can have no constitutional power over this subject; and that its powers, as a local Legislature of the District, were granted for the mere purpose of rendering its general powers perfect and free from conflict and collision with State authorities. It has also been shown that these local powers should be so exercised as to confer the greatest benefits upon the citizens residing within the District, with the least possible injury to the peculiar interests of any State, or the general interests of all the States. Your committee have also shown, as they think successfully, that the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia would be a deep injury to the citizens of the District, and, therefore, a violation of the trust reposed in Congress as the local Legislature of the District; and, also, that it would inflict an incurable injury upon all the slaveholding States, and would, therefore, be an equal violation of the trust reposed in that body as the Legislature of the Union. If, then, they have established these positions, as they think they have, can any one doubt that the action contemplated would be "dangerous to the Union?" being directly calculated, as it would be, to weaken the confidence of the District in Congress, as a safe and faithful local Legislature, and the confidence of the slaveholding States as an impartial guardian of their interests.

Important as the Union is to each State, and to the whole American people, every one will admit that, as far as possible, strict impartiality and kind feelings to all the interests and all the sections of the country should characterize the action of the Federal Government. The Union was formed for the common and equal benefit of all the States, and for the perfect and equal protection of the rights and interests of all the citizens of all the States. Its only strength is in the confidence of the States, and of the people, that these great benefits will continue to be secured to them, and that these great purposes will be accomplished by its preservation. Any action, therefore, on the part of Congress, which shall weaken or destroy that confidence in any portion of our citizens, or in any State of the Union, must inevitably, to that extent, endanger the Union itself! Who can doubt this reasoning! Who does not know that the agitation of any question connected with domestic slavery, as it exists in this country, among any portion of our citizens, creates apprehension and excitement in the slaveholding States? Who does not know that the agitation of any such question in either branch of Congress shakes their confidence in the security of their most important interests, and, consequently, in the continuance to them of those great benefits, to secure which they became parties to the Union? Who, then, does not believe that any action by Congress, having for its object the abolition of slavery in any portion of the Union, however narrow or limited it may be, would necessarily impair the confidence of the slaveholding States in their security in relation to this description of property, put an end to all their hope of benefits to be derived to them from the further continuance of the Union, and alienate their affections from it? Were Congress, in a single instance, to suffer itself to be impelled, by mere feeling in one portion of the Union, to attempt a gratification of that feeling at the sacrifice of the dearest interests and most sacred rights of another portion, who can doubt that the Union would be seriously endangered, if not destroyed? But this conclusion does not depend upon reasoning alone. The evidences of public sentiment on this point are equally abundant and decisive. Your committee having already extended their report beyond the limits to which they could have wished to confine it, will enter into no details upon this portion of their duty. Suffice it to say that the Legislatures of several, if not all, the slaveholding States, have solemnly resolved that "Congress has no constitutional authority to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia." It would be utterly impossible, therefore, that any such attempt should be made by Congress, without producing an excitement, and involving consequences, which no patriot can contemplate without the most painful emotions. It would be regarded by the slaveholding States as an entering wedge to a scheme of general emancipation, and, therefore, tend to produce the same results, in relation to the Federal Government and the Union, that would be produced by the adoption of any measure directly affecting the domestic institutions of the States themselves. Your committee will not dwell upon the picture that is thus presented to their minds. The reflection it excites is one of mingled bitterness and horror. It is one, they trust, which is never to be realized. Looking upon their beloved country, as it now stands, the envy and admiration of the world; contemplating, as they do, that unrivalled constitution, by which a beauteous family of confederated States, each independent in its own separate sphere, revolve around a federal head with all the harmony and regularity of the planetary system; and knowing, as they do, that, under the beneficent influence of our free institutions, the people of this country enjoy a degree of liberty, prosperity, and happiness, not only unpossessed, but scarcely imagined, by any other upon earth; they cannot and will not advert to the horrors or depict the consequences of that most awful day, when the sun of American freedom shall go down in blood, and nothing remain of this glorious republic but the bleeding, scattered, and dishonored, fragments. It would, indeed, be the extinction of the world's last hope, and the jubilee of tyranny over all the earth!

But your committee feel that, with these painful impressions on their minds, they would but imperfectly discharge their duty if they did not make an earnest appeal to the patriotism of the American people to sustain the resolution adopted by the House. And they would also appeal to the good sense and good feelings of that portion of the abolitionists who, acting under a mistaken sense of moral and religious duty, have embarked in this crusade against the South, solemnly invoking them, in the name of our common country, to abstain from a system of agitation which has not only failed, and will always fail, to attain its objects, but has even brought the Union itself into a state of imminent and fearful peril. It is confidently believed that this appeal will not be made in vain, and that hereafter all who truly love their country will manifest their patriotism by avoiding this unhappy cause of discord and disunion; and that they will make no further exertions upon a subject, from the continued agitation of which nothing but augmented evils can result.

Your committee conclude by reporting the following resolutions, conformably to the instructions given them by the House:

Resolved, That Congress possesses no constitutional authority to interfere, in any way, with the institution of slavery in any of the States of this confederacy.

Resolved, That Congress ought not to interfere, in any way, with slavery in the District of Columbia.

AND WHEREAS it is extremely important and desirable that the agitation of this subject should be finally arrested, for the purpose of restoring tranquillity to the public mind, your committee respectfully recommend the adoption of the following additional resolution, viz:

Resolved, That all petitions, memorials, resolutions, propositions, or papers, relating in any way, or to any extent whatever, to the subject of slavery, or the abolition of slavery, shall, without either being printed or referred, be laid upon the table, and that no further action whatever shall be had thereon.

LAWS OF THE UNITED STATES,

OF

A PUBLIC NATURE,

PASSED AT THE FIRST SESSION OF THE TWENTY-FOURTH CONGRESS, COMMENCING DECEMBER 7, 1835, AND ENDING
JULY 4, 1836.

[No. 1.]—AN ACT making an appropriation for repressing hostilities commenced by the Seminole Indians.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the sum of one hundred and twenty thousand dollars be, and the same hereby is, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to defray the expenses attending the suppression of hostilities with the Seminole Indians in Florida, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, conformably to the provisions of the act of April fifth, eighteen hundred and thirty-two, making appropriations for the support of the Army.

JAMES K. POLK,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
M. VAN BUREN,

Vice President of the U. States and President of the Senate.
Approved, January 14, 1836.

ANDREW JACKSON.

[No. 2.]—AN ACT making an additional appropriation for repressing hostilities commenced by the Seminole Indians.

Be it enacted, &c. That the sum of five hundred thousand dollars be, and the same hereby is, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, in addition to a former appropriation, to defray the expenses attending the suppression of hostilities with the Seminole Indians in Florida: to be expended in the manner provided for in the act approved January fourteenth, eighteen hundred and thirty-six, entitled "An act making an appropriation for repressing hostilities commenced by the Seminole Indians."

Approved, January 29, 1836.

[No. 1.]—RESOLUTION authorizing the President to furnish rations to certain inhabitants of Florida.

Be it resolved, &c. That the President of the United States be authorized to cause rations to be delivered from the public stores to the unfortunate sufferers who are unable to provide for themselves, and who have been driven from their homes by Indian depredations in Florida, until they can [be] re-established in their possessions, or so long as the President may consider it necessary.

Approved, February 1, 1836.

[No. 3.]—AN ACT making appropriations, in part, for the support of Government, for the year one thousand eight hundred and thirty-six.

Be it enacted, &c. That the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated, to be paid out of any unappropriated money in the Treasury, viz.

For pay and mileage to members of Congress and Delegates, five hundred and fifty-six thousand four hundred and eighty dollars.

For pay of the officers and clerks of the Senate and House of Representatives, thirty-three thousand seven hundred dollars.

For stationery, fuel, printing, and all other incidental and contingent expenses of the Senate, fifty-three thousand seven hundred dollars.

For stationery, fuel, printing, and all other incidental and contingent expenses of the House of Representatives, two hundred thousand dollars.

The said two sums last mentioned to be applied to the payment of the ordinary expenditures of the Senate and House of Representatives, severally, and to no other purpose.

Approved, February 11, 1836.

VOL. XII.—a

[No. 4.]—AN ACT authorizing a special term of the Court of Appeals for the Territory of Florida, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, &c. That a special term of the court of appeals for the Territory of Florida shall be holden at Tallahassee, the seat of Government of said Territory, on the first Monday in May next, and all appeals, writs of error, motions, and suits, depending or returnable to the last January term, shall be heard and decided at the special term herein appointed, in the same manner as they might have been under the existing laws if the January term had been holden according to law.

Sec. 2. Be it further enacted, That when, by the death, sickness, or inability to attend, of any of the judges, or for any other cause, the regular terms of said court shall not be holden, it shall and may be lawful for the judges thereof to appoint a special term.

Sec. 3. Be it further enacted, That the county of Franklin, in the Territory of Florida, shall be added to, and form a part of, the middle judicial district of said Territory, and it shall be the duty of the judge of said middle district to hold two regular terms of the superior court, at the town of Appalachiola, commencing on the second Mondays of April and November, and special terms at such other periods as may be required by business, and not interfere with the business of said court in other counties.

Sec. 4. Be it further enacted, That there shall only be one term of the superior court holden for the counties of Madison and Hamilton, in each year.

Approved, February 25, 1836.

[No. 5.]—AN ACT for the relief of the sufferers by the fire in the city of New York.

Be it enacted, &c. That the collector of the port of New York be, and he is hereby, authorized, as he may deem best calculated to secure the interest of the United States, to cause to be extended [with the assent of the sureties thereon] to all persons who have suffered loss of property by the conflagration at that place, on the sixteenth day of December last, by the burning of their buildings or merchandise, the time of payment of all bonds heretofore given by them for duties, to periods not exceeding three, four, and five years, in equal instalments from and after the day of payment specified in the bonds; or to allow the said bonds to be cancelled, upon giving to the said collector new bonds, with one or more sureties, to the satisfaction of the said collector, for the sums of the former bonds, respectively, payable in equal instalments, in three, four, and five years from and after the day of payment specified in the bonds to be taken up or cancelled as aforesaid; and the said collector is hereby authorized and directed to give up or cancel all such bonds, upon the receipt of others described in this section; which last mentioned bonds shall be proceeded with, in all respects, like other bonds which are taken by collectors for duties to the United States, and shall have the same force and validity: Provided, That those who are within the provision of this section, but who may have paid their bonds subsequent to the late fire, shall also be entitled to the benefit of this section, and that the said bonds shall be renewed from the day when the same were paid, and said payments refunded, if not previously put into bank to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States: And provided, also, That the benefits of this section shall not be extended to any person whose loss shall not be proved to the satisfaction of the collector to have exceeded the sum of one thousand dollars.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the collector of the port of New York is hereby authorized and directed to extend the payments, in the manner prescribed in the first section of this act, of all other bonds given for duties at the port of New York, prior to the late fire, and not provided for in the first section as aforesaid, for six, nine, and twelve months from and after the date of payment specified in the bonds; which bonds, when executed agreeably to the provisions of this section, shall be payable with interest, at the rate of five per centum per annum, which interest shall be computed from the times the respective bonds would have fallen due, if this act had not passed: Provided, however, That nothing contained in this act shall extend to bonds which had fallen due before the 17th day of December last: Provided, also, That if, in the opinion of the collector aforesaid, any of the bonds which may be given under this act, or the payment of which may be postponed, shall, at any time, be insecure, it shall be the duty of the said collector to require such additional security as shall be satisfactory to him, and on the failure of such additional security being furnished, the payment of such bond shall be enforced forthwith.

Approved, March 19, 1836.

[No. 6.]—AN ACT authorizing the Secretary of War to transfer a part of the appropriation for the suppression of Indian hostilities in Florida to the credit of subsistence.

Be it enacted, &c. That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to transfer so much of the appropriation for the suppression of Indian hostilities in Florida to the credit of subsistence as may have been taken from the latter fund for the former purpose.

Approved, March 19, 1836.

[No. 7.]—AN ACT to provide for the payment of volunteers and militia corps in the service of the United States.

Be it enacted, &c. That the officers, non-commissioned officers, musicians, artificers, and privates of volunteer and militia corps, who have been in the service of the United States at any time since the first day of November, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and thirty-five, or may hereafter be in the service of the United States, shall be entitled to and receive the same monthly pay, rations, clothing, or money in lieu thereof, and forage, and be furnished with the same camp equipage, including knapsacks, as are or may be provided by law for the officers, musicians, artificers, and privates of the infantry of the Army of the United States.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the officers of all mounted companies who have been in, or may hereafter be in, the service of the United States, each, shall be entitled to receive forage, or money in lieu thereof, for two horses when they actually keep private servants, and for one horse when without private servants, and that forty cents per day be allowed for the use and risk of each horse, except horses killed in battle or dying of wounds received in battle. That each non-commissioned officer, musician, artificer, and private of all mounted companies shall be entitled to receive forage in kind for one horse, with forty cents per day for the use and risk thereof, except horses killed in battle, or dying of wounds received in battle, and twenty-five cents per day in lieu of forage and subsistence, when the same shall be furnished by himself, or twelve and a half cents per day for either, as the case may be.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the officers, non-commissioned officers, musicians, artificers, and privates shall be entitled to one day's pay, subsistence, and other allowances, for every twenty miles' travel from their places of residence to the place of general rendezvous, and from the place of discharge back to their residence.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the volunteers or militia, who have been or who may be received into the service of the United States, to suppress Indian depredations in Florida, shall be entitled to all the benefits which are conferred on persons wounded or otherwise disabled in the service of the United States.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That when any officer, non-commissioned officer, artificer, or private, of said militia or volunteer corps, who shall die in the service of the United States, or returning to his place of residence, after being mustered out of service, or at any time in consequence of wounds received in service, and shall leave a widow, or, if no widow, a child or children under sixteen years of age, such widow, or, if no widow, such child or children, shall be entitled to receive half the monthly pay to which the deceased was entitled, at the time of his death, for and during the term of five years; and in case of the death or intermarriage of such widow before the expiration of five years, the half pay for the remainder of the time shall go to the child or children of said decedent: Provided, always, That the Secretary of War shall adopt such forms of evidence, in applications under this act, as the President of the United States may prescribe.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the volunteers and militia mentioned in the foregoing provisions of this act, called into service before its passage, and who are directed to be paid, shall embrace those only ordered into service by the commanding General or Governors of States, and of the Territory of Florida, under authority from the War Department, for repressing the hostilities of the Florida Indians.

Approved, March 19, 1836.

[No. 2.]—RESOLUTION to establish certain post roads in Missouri and Arkansas.

Resolved, &c. That the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, authorized to establish the following post roads: From Fort Towson, in the Territory of Arkansas, to Fort Gibson, and from Fort Gibson, by Fayette, in Arkansas Territory, Barry Court-house, Van Buren Court-house, Jackson Court-house, Fort Leavenworth, Liberty, in Clay county, Plattsburg, in Clinton county, Fort Des Moines, to the town of Dubuque, on the Mississippi river. And the same shall be continued until otherwise provided for by law.

Approved, March 19, 1836.

[No. 8.]—AN ACT making a further appropriation for the suppression of Indian hostilities in Florida.

Be it enacted, &c. That the sum of five hundred thousand dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, in addition to former appropriations, for suppressing Indian hostilities in Florida.

Approved, April 1, 1836.

[No. 9.]—AN ACT amendatory of "the act for the relief of the sufferers by fire in the city of New York," passed March 19, 1836.

Be it enacted, &c. That the operation of the act entitled "An act for the relief of the sufferers by fire in the city of New York," passed the nineteenth day of March last past, shall be, and hereby is, limited and confined exclusively to such bonds of the description set forth in said act, as were made and entered into at the custom-house in the city of New York prior to the sixteenth day of December last past.

Approved April 5, 1836.

[No. 10.]—AN ACT to suspend the operation of the second proviso, third section of "An act making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of Government for the year one thousand eight hundred and thirty-five."

Be it enacted, &c. That so much of the third section of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of Government for the year 1835," as provides "that the whole number of custom-house officers in the United States, on the 1st of January, 1834, shall not be increased until otherwise allowed by Congress," be, and the same is hereby, suspended to the end of the present session of Congress.

Approved, April 9 1836.

[No. 11.]—AN ACT to repeal so much of the act entitled "An act transferring the duties of Commissioner of Loans to the Bank of the United States, and abolishing the office of Commissioner of Loans," as requires the Bank of the United States to perform the duties of Commissioner of Loans for the several States.

Be it enacted, &c. That the first, second, and third sections of the act entitled "An act transferring the duties of Commissioner of Loans to the Bank of the United States, and abolishing the office of Commissioner of Loans," passed March third, eighteen hundred and seventeen, be, and the same are hereby, repealed; and the Bank of the United States and its several branches, and such State banks employed under the provisions of said act by the Bank of the United States, as have heretofore done and performed, or are now doing and performing, the duties of Commissioner of Loans, shall be, and they are hereby, required to transmit to the Secretary of the Treasury, immediately after the passing of this act, all the books, papers, and records in their possession relating to their duties as Commissioners of Loans.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Bank of the United States and its several branches, and the State banks employed by the Bank of the United States, performing the duties of Commissioners of Loans, shall be, and they are hereby, required to pay into the Treasury of the United States, within three months after the passing of this act, all the money in their possession for the redemption of the public debt of the United States, and the interest thereon remaining in their hands, which has not been applied for by the person or persons entitled to receive the same.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to pay over to the person or persons entitled to receive the same, the amount so received into the Treasury by virtue of the second section of this act, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That nothing contained in this act shall be construed to authorize the appointment of a Commissioner or Commissioners of Loans in any State, District, or Territory of the United States.

Approved, April 11, 1836.

[No. 12.]—AN ACT making appropriations for the payment of the revolutionary and other pensioners of the United States, for the year one thousand eight hundred and thirty-six.

Be it enacted, &c. That the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the pensioners of the United States, for the year one thousand eight hundred and thirty-six.

For the revolutionary pensioners under the several acts, other than those of the fifteenth of May, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-eight, the seventh of June, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-two, and the fifth of July, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-two, in addition to an unexpended balance of three hundred and thirty-five thousand three hundred and ninety-five dollars and seventy-five cents, the sum of three hundred and forty-seven thousand six hundred and twenty-nine dollars.

For the invalid pensioners under various laws, in addition to an unexpended balance of two hundred and one thousand seven hundred and twenty-one dollars and twenty-seven cents, one hundred and five thousand eight hundred and twenty-five dollars.

For pensions to widows and orphans, payable through the office of the Third Auditor, in addition to the unexpended balance of two thousand one hundred and ninety-five dollars and twenty-two cents, two thousand dollars.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That hereafter no bank notes of less denomination than ten dollars, and that from and after the third day of March, Anno Domini eighteen hundred and thirty-seven, no bank notes of less denomination than twenty dollars, shall be offered in payment in any case whatsoever in which money is to be paid by the United States or the Post Office Department, nor shall any bank note of any denomination be so offered, unless the same shall be payable, and paid on demand, in gold or silver coin, at the place where issued, and which shall not be equivalent to specie at the place where offered, and convertible into gold or silver upon the spot, at the will of the holder, and without delay or loss to him: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to make any thing but gold or silver a legal tender by any individual, or by the United States.

Approved, July 4, 1836.

[No. 13.]—AN ACT to carry into effect the treaties concluded by the Chickasaw tribe of Indians on the twentieth October, eighteen hundred and thirty-two, and the twenty-fourth May, eighteen hundred and thirty-four.

Be it enacted, &c. That all moneys received from the sale of lands under stipulations of the treaties with the Chickasaw Indians of the twentieth of October, eighteen hundred and thirty-two, and the twenty-fourth of May, eighteen hundred and thirty-four, shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States, in the same manner that moneys received from the sales of public lands are paid into the Treasury.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That all payments required to be made, and all moneys required to be vested by the said treaty, are hereby appropriated in conformity to it, and shall be drawn from the Treasury, as other public moneys are drawn therefrom, under such instructions as may from time to time be given by the President.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That all investments of stock required by the said treaty shall be made under the direction of the President; and the special account of the funds under the said treaty shall be kept at the Treasury, and a statement thereof shall be annually laid before Congress, and the sum of one hundred and fifty thousand dollars, heretofore appropriated, agreeably to the said treaty, and to aid in its fulfilment, shall be refunded to the Treasury as soon as funds sufficient therefor are received from the sale of the said lands.

Approved, April 20, 1836.

[No. 14.]—AN ACT establishing the Territorial Government of Wisconsin.

Be it enacted, &c. That from and after the third day of July next, the country included within the following boundaries shall constitute a separate Territory for the purposes of temporary government, by the name of Wisconsin, that is to say: Bounded on the east by a line drawn from the northeast corner of the State of Illinois, through the middle of Lake Michigan, to a point in the middle of said lake, and opposite the main channel of Green Bay, and through said channel and Green Bay to the mouth of the Menominee river; thence through the middle of the main channel of said river, to that head of said river nearest to the Lake of the Desert; thence in a direct line to the middle of said lake; thence through the middle of the main channel of the Montreal river, to its mouth; thence with a direct line across Lake Superior, to where the territorial line of the United States last touches said lake northwest; thence on the north, with the said territorial line, to the White-earth river; on the west, by a line from the said boundary line, following down the middle of the main channel of White-earth river, to the Missouri river, and down the middle of the main channel of the Missouri river to a point due west from the northwest corner of the State of Missouri; and on the south from said point, due east to the northwest corner of the State of Missouri; and thence with the boundaries of the States of Missouri and Illinois, as already fixed by acts of Congress. And after the said third day of July next, all power and authority of the Government of Michigan, in and over the Territory hereby constituted, shall cease: Provided, That nothing in this act contained shall be construed to impair the rights of persons or property now appertaining to any Indians within the said Territory, so long as such rights shall remain unextinguished by treaty between the United States and such Indians, or to impair the obligations of any treaty now existing between the United States and such Indians, or to impair or any wise to affect the authority of the Government of the United States to make any regulations respecting such Indians, their lands, property, or other rights, by treaty, or law, or otherwise, which it would have been competent to the Government to make if this act had never been passed: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to inhibit the Government of the United States from dividing the Territory hereby established into one or more other Territories, in such manner, and at such times, as Congress shall, in its discretion, deem convenient and proper, or from attaching any portion of said Territory to any other State or Territory of the United States.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Executive power and authority in and over the said Territory shall be vested in a Governor, who shall hold his office for three years, unless sooner removed by the President of the United States. The Governor shall reside within the said Territory; shall be commander-in-chief of the militia thereof; shall perform the duties and receive the emoluments of Superintendent of Indian Affairs, and shall approve of all laws passed by the Legislative Assembly, before they shall take effect; he may grant pardons for offences against the laws of the said Territory, and reprieves for offences against the laws of the United States, until the decision of the President can be made known thereon; he shall commission all officers who shall be appointed to office under the laws of the said Territory, and shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That there shall be a Secretary of the said Territory, who shall reside therein, and hold his office for four years, unless sooner removed by the President of the United States; he shall record and preserve all the laws and proceedings of the Legislative Assembly hereinafter constituted, and all the acts and proceedings of the Governor in his executive department; he shall transmit one copy of the laws and one copy of the executive proceedings on or before the first Monday in each year, to the President of the United States, and, at the same time, two copies of the laws to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, for the use of Congress. And in case of the death, removal, resignation, or necessary absence of the Governor from the Territory, the Secretary shall have, and he is hereby authorized and required to execute and perform, all the powers and duties of the Governor during such vacancy or necessary absence.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the legislative power shall be vested in the Governor and a Legislative Assembly. The Legislative Assembly shall consist of a Council and House of Representatives. The Council shall consist of thirteen members, having the qualification of voters as hereinafter prescribed, whose term of service shall continue four years. The House of Representatives shall consist of twenty-six members, possessing the same qualifications as prescribed for the members of the Council, and whose term of service shall continue two years. An apportionment shall be made, as nearly equal as practicable, among the several counties, for the election of the Council and Representatives, giving to each section of the Territory representation in the ratio of its population, Indians excepted, as nearly as may be. And the said members of the Council and House of Representatives shall reside in, and be inhabitants of, the district for which they may be elected. Previous to the first election, the Governor of the Territory shall cause the census or enumeration of the inhabitants of the several counties in the Territory to be taken and made by the sheriffs of the said counties, respectively, and returns thereof made by said sheriffs to the Governor. The first election shall be held at such time and place, and be conducted in such manner, as the Governor shall appoint and direct; and he shall, at the same time, declare the number of members of the Council and House of Representatives to which each of the counties is entitled under this act. The number of persons authorized to be elected having the greatest number of votes in each of the said counties for the Council, shall be declared, by the said Governor, to be duly elected to the said Council; and the person or persons having the greatest number of votes for the House of Representatives, equal to the number to which each county may be entitled, shall also be declared, by the Governor, to be duly elected: Provided, The Governor shall order a new election when there is a tie between two or more persons voted for, to supply the vacancy made by such tie. And the persons thus elected to the Legislative Assembly shall meet at such place on such day as he shall appoint; but, thereafter, the time, place, and manner of holding and conducting all elections by the People, and the apportioning the representation in the several counties to the Council and House of Representatives, according to population, shall be prescribed by law, as well as the day of the annual commencement of the session of the said Legislative Assembly; but no session, in any year, shall exceed the term of seventy-five days.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That every free white male citizen of the United States above the age of twenty-one years, who shall have been an inhabitant of said Territory at the time of its organization, shall be entitled to vote at the first election, and shall be eligible to any office within the said Territory; but the qualifications of voters at all subsequent elections shall be such as shall be determined by the Legislative Assembly: Provided, That the right of suffrage shall be exercised only by citizens of the United States.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the legislative power of the Territory shall extend to all rightful subjects of legislation; but no law shall be passed interfering with the primary disposal of the soil; no tax shall be imposed upon the property of the United States; nor shall the lands or other property of non-residents be taxed higher than the lands or other property of residents. All the laws of the Governor and Legislative Assembly shall be submitted to, and, if disapproved by the Congress of the United States, the same shall be null and of no effect.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That all township officers, and all county officers, except judicial officers, justices of the peace, sheriffs, and clerks of courts, shall be elected by the People, in such manner as may be provided by the Governor and Legislative Assembly. The Governor shall nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Legislative Council, shall appoint, all judicial officers, justices of the peace, sheriffs, and all militia officers, except those of the staff, and all civil officers not herein provided for. Vacancies occurring in the recess of the Council shall be filled by appointments from the Governor, which shall expire at the end of the next session of the Legislative Assembly; but the said Governor may appoint, in the first instance, the aforesaid officers, who shall hold their offices until the end of the next session of the Legislative Assembly.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That no member of the Legislative Assembly shall hold or be appointed to any office created, or the salary or emoluments of which shall have been increased whilst he was a member, during the term for which he shall have been elected, and for one year after the expiration of such term; and no person holding a commission under the United States, or any of its officers, except as a militia officer, shall be a member of the said Council, or shall hold any office under the Government of the said Territory.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That the judicial power of the said Territory shall be vested in a supreme court, district courts, probate courts, and in justices of the peace. The supreme court shall consist of a chief justice and two associate judges, any two of whom shall be a quorum, and who shall hold a term at the seat of Government of the said Territory, annually, and they shall hold their offices during good behavior. The said Territory shall be divided into three judicial districts; and a district court or courts shall be held in each of the three districts, by one of the judges of the supreme court, at such times and places as may be prescribed by law. The jurisdiction of the several courts herein provided for, both appellate and original, and that of the probate courts, and of the justices of the peace, shall be as limited by law: Provided, however, That justices of the peace shall not have jurisdiction of any matter of controversy, where the title or boundaries of land may be in dispute, or where the debt or sum claimed exceeds fifty dollars. And the said supreme and district courts, respectively, shall possess chancery as well as common law jurisdiction. Each district court shall appoint its clerk, who shall keep his office at the place where the court may be held, and the said clerks shall also be the registers in chancery; and any vacancy in said office of clerk happening in the vacation of said court may be filled by the judge of said district, which appointment shall continue until the next term of said court. And writs of error, bills of exception, and appeals in chancery causes, shall be allowed in all cases, from the final decisions of the said district courts to the supreme court, under such regulations as may be prescribed by law; but in no case removed to the supreme court shall a trial by jury be allowed in said court. The supreme court may appoint its own clerk, and every clerk shall hold his office at the pleasure of the court by which he shall have been appointed. And writs of error and appeals from the final decisions of the said supreme court shall be allowed and taken to the Supreme Court of the United States, in the same manner, and under the same regulations, as from the circuit courts of the United States, where the value of the property, or the amount in controversy, to be ascertained by the oath or affirmation of either party, shall exceed one thousand dollars. And each of the said district courts shall have and exercise the same jurisdiction, in all cases arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States as is vested in the circuit and district courts of the United States. And the first six days of every term of the said courts, or so much thereof as shall be necessary, shall be appropriated to the trial of causes arising under the said Constitution and laws. And writs of error, and appeals from the final decisions of the said courts, in all such cases shall be made to the supreme court of the Territory, in the same manner as in other cases. The said clerks shall receive in all such cases the same fees which the clerk of the District Court of the United States in the northern district of the State of New York receives for similar services.

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That there shall be an Attorney for the said Territory appointed, who shall continue in office four years, unless sooner removed by the President, and who shall receive the same fees and salary as the Attorney of the United States for the Michigan Territory. There shall also be a Marshal for the Territory appointed, who shall hold his office for four years, unless sooner removed by the President, who shall execute all process issuing from the said courts when exercising their jurisdiction as circuit and district courts of the United States. He shall perform the same duties, be subject to the same regulations and penalties, and be entitled to the same fees, as the Marshal of the district court of the United States for the northern district of the State of New York; and shall, in addition, be paid the sum of two hundred dollars, annually, as a compensation for extra services.

Sec. 11. And be it further enacted, That the Governor, Secretary, Chief Justice and Associate Judges, Attorney, and Marshal, shall be nominated, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appointed by the President of the United States. The Governor and Secretary, to be appointed as aforesaid, shall, before they act as such, respectively take an oath or affirmation before some judge or justice of the peace in the existing Territory of Michigan, duly commissioned and qualified to administer an oath or affirmation to support the Constitution of the United States, and for the faithful discharge of the duties of their respective offices; which said oaths, when so taken, shall be certified by the person before whom the same shall have been taken, and such certificate shall be received and recorded by the said Secretary among the executive proceedings. And, afterwards, the Chief Justice and Associate Judges, and all other civil officers in said Territory, before they act as such, shall take a like oath or affirmation before the said Governor or Secretary, or some judge or justice of the Territory who may be duly commissioned and qualified, which said oath or affirmation shall be certified and transmitted by the person taking the same to the Secretary, to be by him recorded as aforesaid; and, afterwards, the like oath or affirmation shall be taken, certified, and recorded, in such manner and form as may be prescribed by law. The Governor shall receive an annual salary of two thousand five hundred dollars for his services as Governor and as superintendent of Indian affairs. The said Chief Justice and Associate Judges shall each receive an annual salary of eighteen hundred dollars. The Secretary shall receive an annual salary of twelve hundred dollars. The said salaries shall be paid quarterly, at the Treasury of the United States. The members of the Legislative Assembly shall be entitled to receive three dollars each per day, during their attendance at the sessions thereof, and three dollars each for every twenty miles' travel in going to and returning from the said sessions, estimated according to the nearest usually-travelled route. There shall be appropriated, annually, the sum of three hundred and fifty dollars, to be expended by the Governor to defray the contingent expenses of the Territory; and there shall also be appropriated, annually, a sufficient sum, to be expended by the Secretary of the Territory, and upon an estimate to be made by the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, to defray the expenses of the Legislative Assembly; the printing of the laws and other incidental expenses; and the Secretary of the Territory shall annually account to the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States for the manner in which the aforesaid sum shall have been expended.

Sec. 12. And be it further enacted, That the inhabitants of the said Territory shall be entitled to, and enjoy, all and singular the rights, privileges, and advantages, granted and secured to the people of the territory of the United States northwest of the river Ohio, by the articles of the compact contained in the ordinance for the Government of the said Territory, passed on the thirteenth day of July, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-seven; and shall be subject to all the conditions and restrictions and prohibitions in said articles of compact imposed upon the people of the said Territory. The said inhabitants shall also be entitled to all the rights, privileges, and immunities heretofore granted and secured to the Territory of Michigan, and to its inhabitants, and the existing laws of the Territory of Michigan shall be extended over said Territory, so far as the same be incompatible with the provisions of this act, subject, nevertheless, to be altered, modified, or repealed, by the Governor and Legislative Assembly of the said Territory of Wisconsin; and, further, the laws of the United States are hereby extended over, and shall be in force in, said Territory, so far as the same, or any provisions thereof, may be applicable.

Sec. 13. And be it further enacted, That the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Wisconsin shall hold its first session at such time and place in said Territory as the Governor thereof shall appoint and direct; and at said session, or as soon thereafter as may by them be deemed expedient, the said Governor and Legislative Assembly shall proceed to locate and establish the seat of Government for said Territory, at such place as they may deem eligible, which place, however, shall thereafter be subject to be changed by the said Governor and Legislative Assembly. And twenty thousand dollars, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, is hereby given to the said Territory, which shall be applied by the Governor and Legislative Assembly to defray the expenses of erecting public buildings at the seat of Government.

Sec. 14. And be it further enacted, That a delegate to the House of Representatives of the United States, to serve for the term of two years, may be elected by the voters qualified to elect members of the Legislative Assembly, who shall be entitled to the same rights and privileges as have been granted to the delegates from the several Territories of the United States to the said House of Representatives. The first election shall be held at such time and place or places, and be conducted in such manner, as the Governor shall appoint and direct. The person having the greatest number of votes shall be declared by the Governor to be duly elected, and a certificate thereof shall be given to the person so elected.

Sec. 15. And be it further enacted, That all suits, process, and proceedings, and all indictments and informations which shall be undetermined on the third day of July next, in the courts held by the additional judge for the Michigan Territory, in the counties of Brown and Iowa; and all suits, process, and proceedings, and all indictments and informations which shall be undetermined on the said third day of July, in the county courts of the several counties of Crawford, Brown, Iowa, Du-Buque, Milwaukee, and Des Moines, shall be transferred to be heard, tried, prosecuted, and determined, in the district courts hereby established, which may include the said counties.

Sec. 16. And be it further enacted, That all causes which shall have been or may be removed from the courts held by the additional judge for the Michigan Territory, in the counties of Brown and Iowa, by appeal or otherwise, into the supreme court for the Territory of Michigan, and which shall be undetermined therein on the third day of July next, shall be certified by the clerk of the said supreme court, and transferred to the supreme court of said Territory of Wisconsin, there to be proceeded in to final determination, in the same manner that they might have been in the said supreme court of the Territory of Michigan.

Sec. 17. And be it further enacted, That the sum of five thousand dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended by and under the direction of the Legislative Assembly of said Territory, in the purchase of a library for the accommodation of said Assembly, and of the supreme court hereby established.

Resolved, &c. That the Postmaster General be authorized, provided the same can be done at the present rates of compensation, to extend the term of the existing contracts for the transportation of the mail, to the thirtieth day of June inclusive, next succeeding the thirty-first day of December in each year in which said contracts expire, so that the contract year may, after the first day of January next, commence on the first day of July, instead of the first day of January.

Approved, May 14, 1836.

[No. 5.]—A RESOLUTION to authorize the Secretary of War to receive additional evidence in support of the claims of Massachusetts and other States of the United States for disturbances, services, &c. during the late war.

Resolved, &c. That the Secretary of War, in preparing his report pursuant to a resolve of the House of Representatives, agreed to on the twenty-fourth of February, eighteen hundred and thirty-two, be, and he hereby is, authorized, without regard to existing rules and requirements, to receive such evidence as is on file, and any further proofs which may be offered tending to establish the validity of the claims of Massachusetts upon the United States, or any part thereof, for services, disbursements, and expenditures during the late war with Great Britain; and in all cases where such evidence shall in his judgment prove the truth of the items of claim, or any part thereof, to act on the same in like manner as if the proof consisted of such vouchers and evidence as are required by existing rules and regulations touching the allowance of such claims; and that in the settlement of claims of other States upon the United States for services, disbursements, and expenditures during the late war with Great Britain, the same kind of evidence, vouchers, and proof, shall be received as is herein provided for in relation to the claim of Massachusetts, the validity of which shall be, in like manner, determined and acted upon by the Secretary of War.

Approved, May 14, 1836.

[No. 23.]—AN ACT to give effect to patents for public lands issued in the names of deceased persons.

Be it enacted, &c. That in all cases where patents for public lands have been or may hereafter be issued, in pursuance of any law of the United States, to a person who had died, or who shall hereafter die, before the date of such patent, the title to the land designated therein shall inure to, and become vested in, the heirs, devisees, or assignees, of such deceased patentee, as if the patent had issued to the deceased person during life; and the provisions of this act shall be construed to extend to patents for lands within the Virginia military district in the State of Ohio.

Approved, May 20, 1836.

[No. 24.]—AN ACT explanatory of the act entitled "An act to prevent defalcations on the part of disbursing agents of the Government, and for other purposes."

Be it enacted, &c. That the act entitled "An act to prevent defalcations on the part of disbursing agents of the Government, and for other purposes," approved the twenty-fifth of January, eighteen hundred and twenty-eight, shall not be construed to authorize the pension of any pensioner of the United States to be withheld.

Approved, May 20, 1836.

[No. 25.]—AN ACT authorizing the President of the United States to accept the service of volunteers, and to raise an additional regiment of dragoons or mounted riflemen.

Be it enacted, &c. That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, authorized to accept volunteers who may offer their services either as infantry or cavalry, not exceeding ten thousand men, to serve six or twelve months after they shall have arrived at the place of rendezvous, unless sooner discharged; and the said volunteers shall furnish their own clothes, and, if cavalry, their own horses, and, when mustered into service, shall be armed and equipped at the expense of the United States.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the said volunteers shall be liable to be called upon to do military duty only in cases of Indian hostilities, or to repel invasions whenever the President shall judge proper; and when called into actual service, and while remaining therein, shall be subject to the rules and articles of war, and shall be in all respects, except as to clothing, placed on the same footing with similar corps of the United States army; and, in lieu of clothing, every non-commissioned officer and private in any company who may thus offer themselves, shall be entitled, when called into actual service, to receive in money a sum equal to the cost of the clothing of a non-commissioned officer or private (as the case may be) in the regular troops of the United States.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the said volunteers so offering their services shall be accepted by the President in companies, battalions, squadrons, regiments, brigades, or divisions, whose officers shall be appointed in the manner prescribed by law in the several States and Territories to which such companies, battalions, squadrons, regiments, brigades, or divisions shall respectively belong: Provided, That where any company, battalion, squadron, regiment, brigade, or division of militia, already organized, shall tender their voluntary services to the United States, such company, battalion, squadron, regiment, brigade, or division shall continue to be commanded by the officers holding commissions in the same at the time of such tender; and any vacancy thereafter occurring shall be filled in the mode pointed out by law in the State or Territory wherein the said company, battalion, squadron, regiment, brigade, or division shall have been originally raised.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to organize companies, so tendering their services, into battalions or squadrons, battalions or squadrons into regiments, regiments into brigades, and brigades into divisions, as soon as the number of volunteers shall render such organization, in his judgment, expedient; and the President shall, if necessary, apportion the staff, field, and general officers among the respective States or Territories from which the volunteers shall tender their services, as he may deem proper; but until called into actual service, such companies, battalions, squadrons, regiments, brigades, or divisions shall not be considered as exempt from the performance of militia duty as if required by law, in like manner as before the passage of this act.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the volunteers who may be received into the service of the United States, by virtue of the provisions of this act, shall be entitled to all the benefits which may be conferred on persons wounded in the service of the United States.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That there shall be raised and organized, under the direction of the President of the United States, one additional regiment of dragoons or mounted riflemen, to be composed of the same number and rank of the officers, non-commissioned officers, musicians and privates, composing the regiment of dragoons now in the service of the United States, who shall receive the same pay and allowances, be subject to the same rules and regulations, and be engaged for the like term, and upon the same conditions, in all respects whatever, as are stipulated for the said regiment of dragoons now in service.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States may disband the said regiment whenever, in his opinion, the public interest no longer requires their services, and the sum of three hundred thousand dollars, required to carry into effect the provisions of this act, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That so much of this act as relates to volunteers shall be in force for two years from and after the passage of this act, and no longer.

Approved, May 23, 1836.

[No. 26.]—AN ACT making appropriations for the suppression of hostilities by the Creek Indians.

Be it enacted, &c. That the sum of five hundred thousand dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to defray any expenses which have been or may be incurred in suppressing hostilities by the Creek Indians, by calling out, by the President, of any part of the militia of the United States, according to the provisions of the Constitution and law; which sum, if expended, shall be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, conformably to the provisions of the act of Congress of second of January, seventeen hundred and ninety-five; of the act of fifth of April, eighteen hundred and thirty-two, making appropriations for the support of the Army; and of the act of the nineteenth March, eighteen hundred and thirty-six, providing for the payment of volunteer and militia corps in the service of the United States.

Approved, May 23, 1836.

[No. 27.]—AN ACT to provide for the payment of expenses incurred and supplies furnished on account of the militia received into the service of the United States for the defence of Florida.

Be it enacted, &c. That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to cause to be paid the expenses that have been incurred, and the supplies that have been furnished, in the States of South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Louisiana, and the Territory of Florida, on account of the militia received into the service of the United States for the defence of Florida: Provided, That the accounts for these claims shall be examined and audited at the Treasury, as in other cases.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of War be authorized to cause the militia called out to defend East Florida, by Generals Clinch and Hernandez, or by the Governor of Middle and West Florida, and such other militia and volunteers as have been received and mustered into the service of the United States and regularly discharged, to be paid in like manner with the volunteers and militia ordered into service under orders from the War Department.

Approved, May 28, 1836.

[No. 28.]—AN ACT to extend the western boundary of the State of Missouri to the Missouri river.

Be it enacted, &c. That when the Indian title to all the lands lying between the State of Missouri and the Missouri river shall be extinguished, the jurisdiction over said land shall be hereby ceded to the State of Missouri, and the western boundary of said State shall be then extended to the Missouri river, reserving to the United States the original right of soil in said lands, and of disposing of the same: Provided, That this act shall not take effect until the President shall, by proclamation, declare that the Indian title to said lands has been extinguished; nor shall it take effect until the State of Missouri shall have assented to the provisions of this act.

Approved, June 7, 1836.

[No. 29.]—AN ACT to carry into effect a Convention between the United States and Spain.

Be it enacted, &c. That the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint one commissioner, whose duty it shall be to receive and examine all claims which may be presented to him under the convention for the settlement of claims between the United States of America and her Catholic Majesty the Queen of Spain, concluded at Madrid on the seventeenth day of February, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-four, which are provided for by the said convention, according to the provisions of the same, and the principles of justice, equity, and the law of nations. The said commissioner shall have a secretary, versed in the Spanish and French languages, both to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; and the commissioner, secretary, and clerk shall, before they enter on the duties of their offices, take oath well and faithfully to perform the duties thereof.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the said commissioner shall be, and he is hereby, authorized to make all needful rules and regulations, not contravening the laws of the land, the provisions of this act, or the provisions of the said convention, for carrying his said commission into full and complete effect.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the commissioner, so to be appointed, shall attend at the city of Washington, and his salary shall begin to be allowed within thirty days after his appointment: and within twelve months from the time of his attendance as aforesaid, he shall terminate his duties. And the Secretary of State is required, as soon as the said commissioner shall be appointed, to give notice of his attendance at Washington as aforesaid, and to be published in two newspapers in the city of Washington, and in such other newspapers as he may think proper.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That all records, documents, or other papers, which now are in, or hereafter, during the continuance of this commission, may come into the possession of the Department of State, in relation to such claim, shall be delivered to the commissioner aforesaid.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the compensation of the respective officers for whose appointment provision is made by this act, shall not exceed the following sums, namely: To the said commissioner, at the rate of three thousand five hundred dollars per annum; to the secretary, at the rate of two thousand dollars per annum; and to the clerk, at the rate of fifteen hundred dollars per annum. And the President of the United States shall be, and he is hereby, authorized to make such provision for the contingent expenses of the said commissioner as shall appear to him reasonable and proper; and the said salaries and expenses shall be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the Secretary of the Treasury to cause the inscription or inscriptions which shall be issued by the Spanish Government, in pursuance of the aforesaid convention, to be deposited in the archives of the Legation of the United States at Paris, until otherwise ordered by the President of the United States; and it shall also be lawful for the Secretary of the Treasury, and he is hereby authorized and required, to cause the moneys which may from time to time be paid, in pursuance of the said convention, to be duly received and accounted for at Paris, and the same to be remitted, on the most advantageous terms, to the United States of America; and the said moneys, so received and remitted, shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States, and the same are hereby appropriated, to be distributed and paid to those authorized to receive them, according to the provisions of this act.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That the commissioner aforesaid shall report to the Secretary of State a list of all the several awards made by him, a certified copy of which shall be by the said Secretary of State transmitted to the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall thereupon distribute in ratable proportions, among the persons in whose favor the awards shall have been made, such moneys as may have been received into the Treasury in virtue of this act, according to the proportions which their respective awards shall bear to the whole amount then received; first deducting such sums of money as may be due the United States from said persons in whose favor said awards shall be made; and shall cause certificates to be issued by the Secretary of the Treasury, in such form as he may prescribe, showing the proportion to which each may be entitled of the amount that may thereafter be received; and on the presentation of the said certificates at the Treasury, as the nett proceeds of the general instalments, payable by the Government of Spain, shall have been received, such proportions thereof shall be paid to the legal holders of the said certificates.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That all communications to and from the secretary of the commissioner appointed under this act, on the business of the commission, shall pass by mail free of postage.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That as soon as this commission shall be executed and completed, the records, documents, and all other papers in the possession of the commission, or its officers, shall be deposited in the office of the Secretary of State.

Approved, June 7, 1836.

[No. 6.]—A RESOLUTION authorizing the repair of the bridge across the river Potomac, at Washington.

Be it resolved, &c. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to have all repairs made to the bridge across the Potomac river, which have become necessary from the late flood, and that the expenses of said repairs be paid out of the money heretofore appropriated for the erection of said bridge, and which is now in the Treasury unexpended.

[No. 31.]—AN ACT to establish an arsenal of construction in the State of North Carolina.

Be it enacted, &c. That the sum of forty-five thousand dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, from any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, towards the purchase of a site and the building of an arsenal of deposite and general construction, near the town of Fayetteville, in the State of North Carolina.

Approved, June 14, 1836.

[No. 32.]—AN ACT repealing the fourteenth section of the "Act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States," approved April tenth, eighteen hundred and sixteen.

Be it enacted, &c. That the fourteenth section of the act entitled "An act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States," approved April tenth, eighteen hundred and sixteen, shall be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Approved, June 15, 1836.

[No. 33.]—AN ACT to divide the Green Bay land district in Michigan, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, &c. That the country on the western shore of Lake Michigan, embraced within the limits of the Green Bay land district, as established by the act of Congress of the twenty-sixth day of June, eighteen hundred and thirty-four, shall be, and is hereby, divided by a line commencing on the western boundary of said district, and running thence, east, between townships ten and eleven north, to the line between ranges seventeen and eighteen east; thence, north, between said ranges of townships, to the line between townships twelve and thirteen north; thence, east, between said townships twelve and thirteen, to Lake Michigan; and all the country bounded north by the division line here described, south by the base line, east by Lake Michigan, and west by the division line between ranges eight and nine east, shall constitute a separate district, and be called the Milwaukee land district.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That two additional districts shall be, and are hereby, established in the peninsula of Michigan, one to be called the Grand river, and the other the Saginaw, land district, the former of which shall be bounded as follows, to wit: Beginning at the shore of Lake Michigan, on the line between townships three and four north, and running east on said line to the line between ranges number six and seven west of the principal meridian; thence on said range line south, to the base line of the public surveys; thence on said base line east, to the principal meridian line; thence north on said meridian, to the north boundary of township ten north; thence west on the line between townships ten and eleven north, to the western boundary of range two west; and thence north, following the line between ranges two and three west, so as to include all that portion of the peninsula of Michigan lying west of said line. The Saginaw district shall embrace all the tract of country bounded on the west by the Grand river district aforesaid; on the south by the division line between townships number five and six, north of the base line; on the east by the division line between ranges eleven and twelve, east of the principal meridian; and on the north and northeast by Saginaw bay and Lake Huron.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That for each of all the aforesaid districts there shall be appointed a register and receiver, who shall reside and superintend the sales of the public lands in such place, in each respective district, as the President of the United States may designate. They shall give security in the same manner and in the same sums, and their compensation, emoluments, duty, and authority shall, in every respect, be the same, in relation to the lands which may be disposed of at their offices, as are, or may be, provided by law relative to the registers and receivers of public money in the several offices established for the sale of the public lands.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, as soon as the same can be done, to cause the proper plats of the surveys of the said districts to be deposited in the land offices intended for them, respectively; and he is hereby authorized to allow and pay out of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands the reasonable expenses which may be incurred in carrying into effect the provisions of this act.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the lands which were ceded to the United States by the treaty made with the confederated tribes of Sac and Fox Indians at Fort Armstrong, in the State of Illinois, on the twenty-first day of September, eighteen hundred and thirty-two, be, and the same are hereby, attached to, and made a part of, the Wisconsin land district, in the Territory of Michigan; and that said lands shall be liable to be surveyed and sold at Mineral Point, or wherever the President may direct, in the same manner as other public lands of the district.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That this act shall take effect and be in force from and after the first day of August next.

Approved, June 15, 1836.

[No. 34.]—AN ACT to establish the northern boundary line of the State of Ohio, and to provide for the admission of the State of Michigan into the Union upon the conditions therein expressed.

Be it enacted, &c. That the northern boundary line of the State of Ohio shall be established at, and shall be a direct line drawn from the southern extremity of Lake Michigan to the most northerly cape of the Maumee (Miami) bay, after that line, so drawn, shall intersect the eastern boundary line of the State of Indiana; and from the said north cape of the said bay, north-east to the boundary line between the United States and the province of Upper Canada, in Lake Erie; and thence with the said last mentioned line, to its intersection with the western line of the State of Pennsylvania.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Constitution and State Government which the People of Michigan have formed for themselves be, and the same is hereby, accepted, ratified, and confirmed; and that the said State of Michigan shall be, and is hereby, declared to be one of the United States of America, and is hereby admitted into the Union upon an equal footing with the original States, in all respects whatsoever: Provided, always, and this admission is upon the express condition, That the said State shall consist of and have jurisdiction over all the territory included within the following boundaries, and over none other, to wit: Beginning at the point where the above-described northern boundary of the State of Ohio intersects the eastern boundary of the State of Indiana, and running thence with the said boundary line of Ohio, as described in the first section of this act, until it intersects the boundary line between the United States and Canada, in Lake Erie; thence, with the said boundary line between the United States and Canada, through the Detroit river, Lake Huron, and Lake Superior, to a point where the said line last touches Lake Superior; thence, in a direct line through Lake Superior, to the mouth of the Montreal river; thence, through the middle of the main channel of the said river Montreal, to the middle of the Lake of the Desert; thence, in a direct line, to the nearest head water of the Menomonic river; thence, through the middle of that fork of the said river first touched by the said line, to the main channel of the said Menomonic river; thence, down the centre of the main channel of the same, to the centre of the most usual ship channel of the Green bay of Lake Michigan; thence, through the centre of the most usual ship channel of the said bay, to the middle of Lake Michigan; thence, through the middle of Lake Michigan, to the northern boundary of the State of Indiana, as that line was established by the act of Congress of the nineteenth of April, eighteen hundred and sixteen; thence, due east with the north boundary line of the said State of Indiana, to the northeast corner thereof; and thence south, with the east boundary line of Indiana, to the place of beginning.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That, as a compliance with the fundamental condition of admission contained in the last preceding section of this act, the boundaries of the said State of Michigan, as in that section described, declared, and established, shall receive the assent of a convention of delegates elected by the People of said State for the sole purpose of giving the assent herein required; and, as soon as the assent herein required shall be given, the President of the United States shall announce the same by proclamation; and thereupon, and without any further proceeding on the part of Congress, the admission of the said State into the Union, as one of the United States of America, on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever, shall be considered as complete, and the Senators and Representative who have been elected by the said

State as its representatives in the Congress of the United States shall be entitled to take their seats in the Senate and House of Representatives, respectively, without further delay.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That nothing in this act contained, or in the admission of the said State into the Union as one of the United States of America, upon an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever, shall be so construed or understood as to confer upon the People, Legislature, or other authorities of the said State of Michigan any authority or right to interfere with the sale, by the United States, and under their authority, of the vacant and unsold lands within the limits of the said State, but that the subject of the public lands, and the interests which may be given to the said State therein, shall be regulated by future action between Congress, on the part of the United States, and the said State, or the authorities thereof. And the said State of Michigan shall in no case, and under no pretence whatsoever, impose any tax, assessment, or imposition of any description upon any of the lands of the United States within its limits.

Approved, June 15, 1836.

[No. 35].—AN ACT for the admission of the State of Arkansas into the Union, and to provide for the due execution of the laws of the United States within the same, and for other purposes.

Whereas the people of the Territory of Arkansas did, on the thirtieth day of January, in the present year, by a convention of delegates, called and assembled for that purpose, form for themselves a Constitution and State Government, which Constitution and State Government, so formed, is republican: and whereas the number of inhabitants within the said Territory exceeds forty-seven thousand seven hundred persons, computed according to the rule prescribed by the Constitution of the United States; and the said convention have, in their behalf, asked the Congress of the United States to admit the said Territory into the Union as a State, on an equal footing with the original States:

Be it enacted, &c. That the State of Arkansas shall be one, and is hereby declared to be one of the United States of America, and admitted into the Union upon an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever; and the said State shall consist of all the territory included within the following boundaries to wit: Beginning in the main channel of the Mississippi river, on the parallel of thirty-six degrees north latitude, running from thence west, with the said parallel of latitude, to the Saint Francis river; thence up the middle of the main channel of said river to the parallel of thirty-six degrees thirty minutes north; from thence west to the southwest corner of the State of Missouri; and from thence, to be bounded on the west, to the north bank of Red river, by the lines described in the first article of the treaty between the United States and the Cherokee nation of Indians west of the Mississippi, made and concluded at the city of Washington, on the twenty-sixth day of May, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and twenty-eight; and to be bounded on the south side of Red river by the Mexican boundary line, to the northwest corner of the State of Louisiana; thence east, with the Louisiana State line, to the middle of the main channel of the Mississippi river; thence up the middle of the main channel of the said river, to the thirty-sixth degree of north latitude, the point of beginning.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That until the next general census shall be taken, the said State shall be entitled to one representative in the House of Representatives in the United States.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That all the laws of the United States, which are not locally inapplicable, shall have the same force and effect within the said State of Arkansas, as elsewhere within the United States.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the said State shall be one judicial district, and be called the Arkansas district; and a district court shall be held therein, to consist of one judge, who shall reside in the said district, and be called a district judge. He shall hold at the seat of Government of the said State two sessions annually, on the first Mondays of April and November; and he shall, in all things, have and exercise the same jurisdiction and powers which were, by law, given to the judge of the Kentucky district, under an act entitled "An act to establish the judicial courts of the United States." He shall appoint a clerk for the said district court, who shall reside and keep the records of the court at the place of holding the same; and shall receive for the services performed by him the same fees to which the clerk of the Kentucky district is entitled for similar services.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That there shall be allowed to the judge of the said district court the annual compensation of two thousand dollars, to commence from the date of his appointment, to be paid quarter-yearly at the Treasury of the United States.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That there shall be appointed in the said district a person learned in the law, to act as attorney for the United States, who shall, in addition to his stated fees, be paid by the United States two hundred dollars, as a full compensation for all extra services.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That a marshal shall be appointed for the said district, who shall perform the same duties, be subject to the same regulations and penalties, and be entitled to the same fees, as are prescribed to marshals in other districts; and he shall, moreover, be entitled to the sum of two hundred dollars annually, as a compensation for all extra services.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That the State of Arkansas is admitted into the Union upon the express condition that the people of said State shall never interfere with the primary disposal of the public lands within the said State, nor shall they levy a tax on any of the lands of the United States within the said State; and nothing in this act shall be construed as an assent by Congress to all or to any of the propositions contained in the ordinance of the said convention of the people of Arkansas, nor to deprive the said State of Arkansas of the same grants, subject to the same restrictions, which were made to the State of Missouri by virtue of an act entitled "An act to authorize the people of the Missouri Territory to form a Constitution and State Government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, and to prohibit slavery in certain Territories," approved the sixth day of March, one thousand eight hundred and twenty.

Approved, June 15, 1836.

[No. 7].—RESOLUTION providing for the distribution of weights and measures.

Resolved, &c. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, directed to cause a complete set of all the weights and measures adopted as standards, and now either made or in the progress of manufacture, for the use of the several custom-houses, and for other purposes, to be delivered to the Governor of each State in the Union, or such person as he may appoint, for the use of the States, respectively, to the end that a uniform standard of weights and measures may be established throughout the United States.

Approved, June 14, 1836.

[No. 36].—AN ACT to regulate the deposits of the public money.

Be it enacted, &c. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to select as soon as may be practicable, and employ as the depositories of the money of the United States, such of the banks incorporated by the several States, by Congress for the District of Columbia, or by the Legislative Councils of the respective Territories for those Territories, as may be located at, adjacent or convenient to, the points or places at which the revenues may be collected or disbursed; and in those States, Territories, or Districts in which there are no banks, or in which no bank can be employed as a deposite bank, and within which the public collections or disbursements require a depository, the said Secretary may make arrangements with a bank or banks, in some other State, Territory, or District, to establish an agency, or agencies, in the States, Territories, or District so destitute of banks, as banks of deposite; and to receive through such agencies such deposits of the public money as may be directed to be made at the points designated, and to make such disbursements as the public service may require at those points; the duties and liabilities of every bank thus establishing any such agency to be the same in respect to its agency, as are the duties and liabilities of deposite banks generally, under the provisions of this act: Provided, That at least one such bank shall be selected in each State and Territory, if any can be found in each State and Territory willing to be employed as depositories of the public money, upon the terms and conditions hereinafter prescribed, and continue to conform thereto; and that the Secretary of the Treasury shall not suffer to remain in any deposite bank an amount of the public moneys more than equal to three-fourths of the amount of its capital stock actually paid in, for a longer time than may be necessary to enable him to make the transfers required by the twelfth section of this act; and that the banks so selected shall be, in his opinion, safe depositories of the public money, and shall be willing to undertake to do and perform the several duties and services, and to conform to the several conditions prescribed by this act.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That if, at any point or place at which the public revenue may be collected, there shall be no bank located, which, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury, is in a safe condition, or where all the banks at such point or place shall fail or refuse to be employed as depositories of the public money of the United States, or to comply with the conditions prescribed by this act, or where such banks shall not have sufficient capital to become depositories of the whole amount of moneys collected at such point or place, he shall and may order and direct the public money collected at such point or place to be deposited in a bank or banks in the same State, or in some one or more of the adjacent States, upon the terms and conditions hereinafter prescribed: Provided, That nothing in this act contained shall be so construed as to prevent Congress at any time from passing any law for the removal of the public money from any of the said banks, or from changing the terms of deposit, or to prevent the said banks at any time from declining any longer to be the depositories of the public money upon paying over, or tendering to pay, the whole amount of public moneys on hand, according to the terms of its agreement with the said Secretary.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That no bank shall hereafter be selected and employed by the Secretary of the Treasury as a depository of the public money until such bank shall have first furnished to the said Secretary a statement of its condition and business, a list of its directors, the current price of its stock, and also a copy of its charter; and likewise, such other information as may be necessary to enable him to judge of the safety of its condition.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the said banks, before they shall be employed as the depositories of the public money, shall agree to receive the same upon the following terms and conditions, viz.

First. Each bank shall furnish to the Secretary of the Treasury, from time to time, as often as he may require, not exceeding once a week, statements setting forth its condition and business, as prescribed in the foregoing section of this act, except that such statements need not, unless requested by said Secretary, contain a list of the directors or a copy of the charter. And the said banks shall furnish to the Secretary of the Treasury, and to the Treasurer of the United States, a weekly statement of the condition of his account upon their books. And the Secretary of the Treasury shall have the right, by himself, or an agent appointed for that purpose, to inspect such general accounts in the books of the bank as shall relate to the said statements: Provided, That this shall not be construed to imply a right of inspecting the account of any private individual or individuals with the bank.

Secondly. To credit as specie all sums deposited therein to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States, and to pay all checks, warrants, or drafts drawn on such deposits, in specie, if required by the holder thereof.

Thirdly. To give, whenever required by the Secretary of the Treasury, the necessary facilities for transferring the public funds from place to place, within the United States, and the Territories thereof, and for distributing the same in payment of the public creditors, without charging commissions or claiming allowance on account of difference of exchange.

Fourthly. To render to the Government of the United States all the duties and services heretofore required by law to be performed by the late Bank of the United States and its several branches or offices.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That no bank shall be selected or continued as a place of deposit of the public money, which shall not redeem its notes and bills on demand in specie; nor shall any bank be selected or continued as aforesaid, which shall, after the fourth of July, in the year one thousand eight hundred and thirty-six, issue or pay out any note or bill of a less denomination than five dollars; nor shall the notes or bills of any bank be received in payment of any debt due to the United States which shall, after the said fourth day of July, in the year one thousand eight hundred and thirty-six, issue any note or bill of a less denomination than five dollars.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall be, and he is hereby, authorized, and it shall be his duty, whenever in his judgment the same shall be necessary or proper, to require of any bank so selected and employed as aforesaid, collateral or additional securities for the safe-keeping of the public moneys deposited therein, and the faithful performance of the duties required by this act.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the Secretary of the Treasury to enter into contracts in the name and for and on behalf of the United States, with the said banks so selected or employed, whereby the said banks shall stipulate to do and perform the several duties and services prescribed by this act.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That no bank which shall be selected or employed as the place of deposit of the public money, shall be discontinued as such depository, or the public money withdrawn therefrom, except for the causes hereinafter mentioned, that is to say: if, at any time, any one of said banks shall fail or refuse to perform any of said duties, as prescribed by this act, and stipulated to be performed by its contract, or if any of said banks shall at any time refuse to pay its own notes in specie, if demanded, or shall fail to keep in its vaults such an amount of specie as shall be required by the Secretary of the Treasury, and shall be, in his opinion, necessary to render the said bank a safe depository of the public moneys, having due regard to the nature of the business transacted by the bank; in any and every such case it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to discontinue any such bank as a depository, and withdraw from it the public moneys which it may hold on deposit at the time of such discontinuance. And in case of the discontinuance of any of said banks, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to report to Congress immediately, if in session, and if not in session, then at the commencement of its next session, the facts and reasons which have induced such discontinuance. And in case of the discontinuance of any of said banks as a place of deposit of the public money for any of the causes hereinbefore provided, it shall be lawful for the Secretary of the Treasury to deposit the money thus withdrawn in some other banks of deposit already selected, or to select some other bank as a place of deposit, upon the terms and conditions prescribed by this act. And in default of any bank to receive such deposit, the money thus withdrawn shall be kept by the Treasurer of the United States, according to the laws now in force, and shall be subject to be disbursed according to law.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That, until the Secretary of the Treasury shall have selected and employed the said banks as places of deposit of the public money, in conformity to the provisions of this act, the several State and District banks at present employed as depositories of the money of the United States shall continue to be the depositories aforesaid, upon the terms and conditions upon which they have been so employed.

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to lay before Congress, at the commencement of each annual session, a statement of the number and names of the banks employed as depositories of the public money, and of their condition, and the amount of public money deposited in each, as shown by their returns at the Treasury; and if the selection of any bank as a depository of the public money be made by the Secretary of the Treasury, while Congress is in session, he shall immediately report the name and condition of such bank to Congress; and if any such selection shall be made during the recess of Congress, he shall report the same to Congress during the first week of its next session.

Sec. 11. And be it further enacted, That whenever the amount of public deposits to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States, in any bank, shall, for a whole quarter of a year, exceed the one-fourth part of the amount of the capital stock of such bank actually paid in, the bank shall allow and pay to the United States for the use of the excess of the deposits over the one-fourth part of its capital, an interest at the rate of two per centum per annum, to be calculated, for each quarter, upon the average excesses of the quarter; and it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, at the close of each quarter, to cause the amounts on deposit in each deposite bank for the quarter to be examined and ascertained, and to see that all sums of interest accruing under the provisions of this section are by the banks respectively passed to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States in his accounts with the respective banks.

Sec. 12. And be it further enacted, That all warrants or orders for the purpose of transferring the public funds from the banks in which they now are, or may hereafter be deposited, to other banks, whether of deposit or not, for the purpose of accommodating the banks to which the transfer may be made, or to sustain their credit, or for any other purpose whatever, except it be to facilitate the public disbursements, and to comply with the provisions of this act, be, and the same are hereby, prohibited and declared to be illegal; and in cases where transfers shall be required for purposes of equalization under the provisions of this act, in consequence of too great an accumulation of deposits in any bank, such transfers shall be made to the nearest deposite banks which are considered safe and secure, and which can receive the moneys to be transferred under the limitations in this act imposed: Provided, That it may be lawful for the President of the United States to direct transfers of public money to be made from time to time to the mint and branch mints of the United States, for supplying metal for coining.

Sec. 13. And be it further enacted, That the money which shall be in the Treasury of the United States on the first day of January, eighteen hundred and thirty-seven, reserving the sum of five millions of dollars, shall be deposited with the several States, in proportion to their respective representation in the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, as shall, by law, authorize their Treasurers, or the competent authorities, to receive the same on the terms hereinafter specified; and the Secretary of the Treasury shall deliver the same to such Treasurers, or other competent authorities, on receiving certificates of deposite therefor, signed by such competent authorities, in such form as may be prescribed by the Secretary aforesaid, which certificates shall express the usual and legal obligations, and pledge the faith of the State for the safe keeping and repayment thereof, and shall pledge the faith of the States receiving the same to pay the said moneys, and every part thereof, from time to time, whenever the same shall be required by the Secretary of the Treasury, for the purpose of defraying any wants of the public Treasury beyond the amount of the five millions aforesaid: Provided, That if any State declines to receive its proportion of the surplus aforesaid, on the terms before named, the same shall be deposited with the other States, agreeing to accept the same on deposite, in the proportion aforesaid: And provided further, That when said money, or any part thereof, shall be wanted by the said Secretary, to meet the appropriations made by law, the same shall be called for, in ratable proportions, within one year, as nearly as conveniently may be, from the different States with which the same is deposited, and shall not be called for in sums exceeding ten thousand dollars, from any one State, in any one month, without previous notice of thirty days for every additional sum of $20,000 which at any time may be required.

Sec. 14. And be it further enacted, That the said deposite shall be made with the said States, in the following proportions, and at the following times, viz. one quarter part on the first day of January, eighteen hundred and thirty-seven, or as soon thereafter as may be; one quarter part on the first day of April; one quarter part on the first day of July; and one quarter part on the first day of October, all in the same year.

Sec. 15. And be it further enacted, That, to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to carry into effect the provisions of this act, he be authorized to appoint three additional clerks for his Department, the one at a salary of one thousand six hundred dollars per annum, and the remaining two at a salary of one thousand dollars each per annum; and to pay the said clerks quarterly, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Approved, June 23, 1836.

[No. 37.]—AN ACT authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to act as the agent of the United States, in all matters relating to their stock in the Bank of the United States.

Be it enacted, &c. That from and after the passage of this act it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to assume and exercise the agency and direction, in behalf of the United States, over their property in the Bank of the United States, whether the same be standing on the books of the bank in the name of the United States, or of the Treasurer of the United States, for the use of the Secretary of the Navy, for the payment of navy pensions; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby invested with the authority necessary for carrying into effect the duties of said agency, by voting in behalf of the United States at any meetings of the stockholders, and performing any other act in relation to the same which any stockholder would be authorized to do.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That, as agent of the United States as aforesaid, the Secretary of the Treasury shall be furnished, from time to time, as often as he may require, by the directors of the Bank of the United States, or by the trustees who shall have been, or may be appointed, either by said directors or the stockholders of said bank, or in their behalf, or by such individuals as may have the custody, control, or possession of the books and effects of the same, with statements of the amount of the capital stock of the said corporation undivided, of debts due beyond the same on account of said bank, of the moneys remaining on deposite, of the notes of said bank outstanding, and of the specie on hand on account of the same; and said Secretary shall have the same rights as any stockholder to inspect and examine, or cause to be inspected and examined, all such accounts in the books of said bank, or of any trust arising out of or holding the effects of said corporation, as shall relate to the statements hereby required to be made.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized and directed to receive and deposite in the Treasury of the United States any dividends which may be made of the capital stock, or of the surplus profits of said bank.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall be, and he hereby is, authorized and empowered to receive the capital stock belonging to the United States, in the late Bank of the United States, in such instalments, and payable at such times, and with such rates of interest, as he shall see fit to agree to; and also to settle and adjust the claim for surplus profits accruing on said capital stock, on such terms as he may think proper, and in like manner to receive the amount thereof in such instalments, and payable at such times and with such rates of interest as he may agree to.

Approved, June 23, 1836.

[No. 38.]—AN ACT to settle and establish the northern boundary line of the State of Ohio.

Be it enacted, &c. That the northern boundary of the State of Ohio shall be established by, and extend to, a direct line running from the southern extremity of Lake Michigan to the most northerly cape of the Miami bay; thence, northeast, to the northern boundary line of the United States; thence, with said line, to the Pennsylvania line.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the boundary line surveyed, marked, and designated agreeably to "An act to authorize the President of the United States to ascertain and designate the northern boundary of the State of Indiana," approved March the second, eighteen hundred and twenty-seven, shall be deemed and taken as the east and west line mentioned in the Constitution of the State of Indiana, drawn through a point ten miles north of the southern extreme of Lake Michigan, and shall be and forever remain the northern boundary of said State.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the northern boundary line, ascertained, surveyed, and marked, agreeably to a law of Congress entitled "An act to ascertain and mark the line between the State of Alabama and the Territory of Florida, and the northern boundary of the State of Illinois, and for other purposes," approved March second, eighteen hundred and thirty-one, shall be deemed and taken as the line west from the middle of Lake Michigan, in north latitude forty-two degrees thirty minutes, to the middle of the Mississippi river, as defined in the act of Congress entitled "An act to enable the people of the Illinois Territory to form a Constitution and State Government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States," approved eighteenth of April, eighteen hundred and eighteen, and shall be and forever remain the northern boundary line of said State.

Approved, June 23, 1836.

[No. 39.]—AN ACT to remove the Land Office from Clinton to Jackson, in the State of Mississippi.

Be it enacted, &c. That the Land Office at present established at Clinton, in the State of Mississippi, be hereafter kept at Jackson, in the same State.

Approved, June 23, 1836.

[No. 40.]—AN ACT to amend an act to grant certain relinquished and unappropriated lands to the State of Alabama, for the purpose of improving the navigation of the Tennessee, Coosa, Cahaba, and Black Warrior rivers.

Be it enacted, &c. That so much of the second section of the act above recited as restricts the State of Alabama from having the power to sell, dispose of, or grant the residue of the lands granted by the act, to which this is a supplement, at a price not less than the minimum price of the public lands, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the assent of the United States is hereby given to any act which the Legislature of the State of Alabama may pass for imposing a toll on the use of such parts of the canal or canals which have been or may be constructed at or around the Muscle and Colbert's shoals of the river Tennessee: Provided, That such tolls shall be expended exclusively on the said canals, and shall not exceed in amount the sum required to keep them in repair, and to defray the expenses of lock tenders, collectors, superintendents, and managers; and that no part of this act shall be construed as a repeal of the exemption contained in the seventh section of the aforesaid act of the property of the United States, and all persons in their service, from any toll whatever: And provided further, That an annual report shall be made to the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States of the rate and amount of tolls charged or collected on said canals, and their application.

Approved, June 23, 1836.

[No. 41].—AN ACT supplementary to the act entitled "An act for the admission of the State of Arkansas into the Union, and to provide for the due execution of the laws of the United States within the same, and for other purposes."

Be it enacted, &c. That, in lieu of the propositions submitted to the Congress of the United States by an ordinance passed by the convention of delegates at Little Rock, assembled for the purpose of making a Constitution for the State of Arkansas, which are hereby rejected, and that the following propositions be, and the same are hereby, offered to the General Assembly of the State of Arkansas, for their free acceptance or rejection, which, if accepted under the authority granted to the General Assembly for this purpose by the convention which framed the Constitution of the said State, shall be obligatory upon the United States:

First. That section numbered sixteen in every township, and, when such section has been sold, or otherwise disposed of, other lands equivalent thereto, and as contiguous as may be, shall be granted to the State for the use of the inhabitants of such township, for the use of schools.

Second. That all salt springs, not exceeding twelve in number, with six sections of land adjoining to each, shall be granted to the said State, for the use of said State, the same to be selected by the General Assembly thereof, on or before the first day of January, one thousand eight hundred and forty; and the same, when so selected, to be used under such terms, conditions, and regulations, as the General Assembly of said State shall direct: Provided, That no salt spring, the right whereof is now vested in any individual or individuals, or which may hereafter be confirmed or adjudged to any individual or individuals, shall, by this section, be granted to said State: And provided, also, That the General Assembly shall never sell or lease the same, at any one time, for a longer period than ten years, without the consent of Congress; and that nothing contained in the act of Congress entitled "An act authorizing the Governor of the Territory of Arkansas to lease the salt springs in said Territory, and for other purposes," or in any other act, shall be construed to give to the said State any further or other claim whatsoever, to any salt springs or lands adjoining thereto, than to these hereby granted.

Third. That five per cent. of the nett proceeds of the sale of lands lying within the said State, and which shall be sold by Congress, from and after the — day of — next, after deducting all expenses incident to the same, shall be reserved for making public roads and canals within the said State, under the direction of the General Assembly thereof.

Fourth. That a quantity of land not exceeding five sections be, and the same is hereby, granted to the said State, in addition to the ten sections which have already been granted, for the purpose of completing the public buildings of the said State, at Little Rock; which said five sections shall, under the direction of the General Assembly of said State, be located, at any time, in legal divisions of not less than one quarter section, in such townships and ranges as the General Assembly aforesaid may select, on any of the unappropriated public lands of the United States within the said State.

Fifth. That two entire townships of land which have already been located by virtue of the act entitled "An act concerning a seminary of learning in the Territory of Arkansas," approved the second of March, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-seven, and hereby vested in and confirmed to the General Assembly of the said State, be appropriated solely to the use of such seminary by the General Assembly: Provided, That the five foregoing propositions herein offered are on the condition that the General Assembly or Legislature of the said State, by virtue of the powers conferred upon it by the convention which framed the Constitution of the said State, shall provide, by an ordinance irrevocable without the consent of the United States, that the said General Assembly of said State shall never interfere with the primary disposal of the soil within the same by the United States, nor with any regulations Congress may find necessary for securing the title in soil to the bona fide purchasers thereof; and that no tax shall be imposed on lands the property of the United States; and that in no case shall non-resident proprietors be taxed higher than residents; and that the bounty lands granted, or hereafter to be granted, for military services during the late war, shall, whilst they continue to be held by the patentees or their heirs, remain exempt from any tax laid by order or under the authority of the State, whether for State, county, township, or any other purpose, for the term of three years from and after the date of the patents respectively.

Approved, June 23, 1836.

[No. 42].—AN ACT supplementary to the act entitled "An act to establish the northern boundary line of the State of Ohio, and to provide for the admission of the State of Michigan into the Union on certain conditions."

Be it enacted, &c. That in lieu of the propositions submitted to the Congress of the United States by an ordinance passed by the convention of delegates at Detroit, assembled for the purpose of making a Constitution for the State of Michigan, which are hereby rejected; and that the following propositions be, and the same are hereby, offered to the Legislature of the State of Michigan, for their acceptance or rejection; which, if accepted under the authority conferred on the said Legislature by the convention which framed the Constitution of the said State, shall be obligatory upon the United States:

First. That section numbered sixteen in every township of public lands, and, where such section has been sold or otherwise disposed of, other lands equivalent thereto, and as contiguous as may be, shall be granted to the State for the use of schools.

Second. That the seventy-two sections of land set apart and reserved for the use and support of a university by an act of Congress approved on the twentieth day of May, eighteen hundred and twenty-six, entitled "An act concerning a seminary of learning in the Territory of Michigan," are hereby granted and conveyed to the State, to be appropriated solely to the use and support of such university, in such manner as the Legislature may prescribe: And provided, also, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to impair or affect in any way the rights of any person or persons claiming any of said seventy-two sections of land, under contract or grant from said university.

Third. That five entire sections of land, to be selected and located under the direction of the Legislature, in legal divisions of not less than one quarter section, from any of the unappropriated lands belonging to the United States within the said State, are hereby granted to the State for the purpose of completing the public buildings of the said State, or for the erection of public buildings at the seat of Government of the said State, as the Legislature may determine and direct.

Fourth. That all salt springs within the State, not exceeding twelve in number, with six sections of land adjoining, or as contiguous as may be to each, shall be granted to the said State for its use, the same to be selected by the Legislature thereof, on or before the first of January, eighteen hundred and forty; and the same, when so selected, to be used on such terms, conditions, and regulations as the Legislature of the said State shall direct: Provided, That no salt spring, the right whereof is now vested in any individual or individuals, or which may hereafter be confirmed or adjudged to any individual or individuals, shall, by this section, be granted to said State: And provided, also, That the General Assembly shall never sell or lease the same, at any one time, for a longer period than ten years, without the consent of Congress.

Fifth. That five per cent. of the nett proceeds of the sales of all public lands lying within the said State, which have been or shall be sold by Congress, from and after the first day of July, eighteen hundred and thirty-six, after deducting all the expenses incident to the same, shall be appropriated for making public roads and canals within the said State, as the Legislature may direct: Provided, That the five foregoing propositions herein offered are on the condition that the Legislature of the said State, by virtue of the powers conferred upon it by the convention which framed the Constitution of the said State, shall provide, by an ordinance irrevocable without the consent of the United States, that the said State shall never interfere with the primary disposal of the soil within the same by the United States, nor with any regulations Congress may find necessary for securing the title in such soil to the bona fide purchasers thereof; and that no tax shall be imposed on lands, the property of the United States; and that in no case shall non-resident proprietors be taxed higher than residents; and that the bounty lands granted, or hereafter to be granted, for military services during the late war, shall, whilst they continue to be held by the patentees or their heirs, remain exempt from any tax laid by order or under the authority of the State, whether for State, county, township, or any other purpose, for the term of three years from and after the date of the patents respectively.

Approved, June 23, 1836.

[No. 8.]—A RESOLUTION to furnish the Rotundo with paintings.

Resolved, &c. That a joint committee be appointed to contract with one or more competent American artists for the execution of four historical pictures upon subjects serving to illustrate the discovery of America; the settlement of the United States; the history of the Revolution; or of the adoption of the Constitution; to be placed in the vacant panels of the Rotundo; the subject to be left to the choice of the artists under the control of the committee.

Approved, June 23, 1836.

[No. 9.]—A RESOLUTION referring the petition and papers of the heirs of Robert Fulton, deceased, to the Secretary of the Navy, to report thereon to Congress.

Resolved, &c. That the petition and papers of the heirs of Robert Fulton be referred to the Secretary of the Navy, to state an account between the United States and said heirs, by debiting them with all the moneys paid to the said Robert Fulton, and not settled on the books of the Treasury Department.

Second. To credit the said heirs with all moneys advanced or expended by the said Fulton, in and about the business of the United States, committed to his care, or about which he had an agency.

Third. To credit the said heirs with a compensation commensurate with the value and importance of the services rendered by the said Robert Fulton to the United States, in inventing a system of coast and harbor defence, and in testing its utility, so far as he was employed or engaged to render such services, by the authorities of the United States, or when such services were recognised as having been rendered for the United States, previous to, or during the late war with Great Britain.

Fourth. To credit the said heirs with the like compensation, for the services of the said Robert Fulton, for inventing and in superintending the construction of a steam frigate at New York, during and after said war.

Fifth. To credit the said heirs with a just and equitable compensation, for the detention of the steamboat Vesuvius, at New Orleans, from the thirteenth of December, eighteen hundred and fourteen, to the twelfth of March, eighteen hundred and fifteen, both days inclusive, being the time the said boat remained aground, by reason of her being impressed into the service of the United States, and grounded when in said service.

Second. Be it further resolved, That the said Secretary of the Navy be authorized to take such further testimony as he shall think necessary, and that he ascertain what defence was made to the suit in favor of the United States against the representatives of Robert Fulton, in the southern district of New York, and what composed the items of set-off to the claim of the United States; and that said Secretary report his proceedings at the next session of Congress.

Approved, June 23, 1836.

[No. 43.]—AN ACT to disapprove and annul certain acts of the Territorial Legislature of Florida, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, &c. That no act of the Territorial Legislature of any of the Territories of the United States, incorporating any bank, or any institution with banking powers or privileges, hereafter to be passed, shall have any force or effect whatever, until approved and confirmed by Congress.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the following acts of the Territorial Legislature of Florida, namely: an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Bank of St. Joseph," passed February twelfth, eighteen hundred and thirty-six; an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Florida Insurance and Banking Company," passed February tenth, eighteen hundred and thirty-six; an act passed February fourteenth, eighteen hundred and thirty-six, entitled "An act to incorporate the St. Joseph Insurance Company;" and all other acts and parts of acts, passed by the said Territorial Legislature of Florida, in the year eighteen hundred and thirty-six, creating banks or extending banking corporations, or corporations with banking powers, or conferring banking powers on any corporation or institution whatever, be, and the same hereby are, disapproved and annulled.

Approved, July 1, 1836.

[No. 44.]—AN ACT to change the time of holding the district court of the United States for the western district of Virginia, holden at Clarksburg.

Be it enacted, &c. That from and after the first day of August next, the sessions of the district court of the United States for the western district of Virginia, required by law to be holden at Clarksburg, shall be held on the first Mondays of April and September annually.

Approved, July 1, 1836.

[No. 45.]—AN ACT explanatory of an act entitled "An act to release from duty iron prepared for, and actually laid on, railways and inclined planes."

Be it enacted, &c. That the act of the fourteenth of July, eighteen hundred and thirty-two, entitled "An act to release from duty iron prepared for, and actually laid on, railways and inclined planes," shall not be so construed as to include spikes, pins, or chains, as railroad iron.

Approved, July 1, 1836.

[No. 46.]—AN ACT to provide for the due execution of the laws of the United States within the State of Michigan.

Be it enacted, &c. That the laws of the United States which are not locally inapplicable, shall have the same force and effect within the State of Michigan, as elsewhere within the United States.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the said State shall be one district, and be called the District of Michigan; and a district court shall be held therein, to consist of one judge, who shall reside in the said district, and be called a district judge. He shall hold, at the seat of Government of the said State, two sessions of the said district court annually on the first Mondays in May and October; and he shall in all things have and exercise the same jurisdiction and powers which were by law given to the judge of the Kentucky district under an act entitled "An act to establish the judicial courts of the United States." He shall appoint a clerk for the said district, who shall reside and keep the records of the said court at the place of holding the same, and shall receive, for the services performed by him, the same fees to which the clerk of the Kentucky district is by law entitled for similar services.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That there shall be allowed to the judge of the said district court the annual compensation of two thousand dollars, to commence from the date of his appointment, to be paid quarterly at the Treasury of the United States.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That there shall be appointed in the said district a person learned in the law, to act as attorney for the United States, who shall, in addition to his stated fees, be paid annually by the United States two hundred dollars, as a full compensation for all extra services; the said payment to be made quarter-yearly at the Treasury of the United States.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That a marshal shall be appointed for the said district, who shall perform the same duties, be subject to the same regulations and penalties, and be entitled to the same fees as are prescribed and allowed to marshals in other districts, and shall, moreover, be entitled to the sum of two hundred dollars annually, as a compensation for all extra services: Provided, however, That this act shall not take effect until the State of Michigan shall be admitted into the Union, according to the provisions of the act entitled "An act to establish the northern boundary line of the State of Ohio, and to provide for the admission of the State of Michigan into the Union on certain conditions."

Approved, July 1, 1836.

[No. 10.]—A RESOLUTION to apply the unexpended balance of the appropriation for the Potomac bridge to the improvement of Maryland avenue, leading thereto, and for other purposes.

Resolved, &c. That the balance of the appropriation for the construction of the bridge across the Potomac, at the city of Washington, remaining unexpended after the said bridge shall have been repaired in obedience to the directions contained in the joint resolution passed for that purpose at the present session of Congress, be, and the same hereby is, appropriated, to be applied, under the direction of the Commissioner of Public Buildings, towards the graduation, gravelling, and planting of the Maryland avenue, in said city, from its eastern extremity to the said bridge, in equal proportions on the east and west of the Capitol, according to distance.

Sec. 2. And be it further resolved, That it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of Public Buildings to attend to the draws, cause the bridge to be properly lighted, to guard against wanton injuries and obstructions, and to preserve a due police on and near it, so as to insure the safety of passengers and of the public property; that said Commissioner shall receive for his services the yearly compensation of three hundred dollars, and be authorized to employ three assistants, at a compensation not exceeding one dollar and fifty cents a day.

Approved, July 1, 1836.

[No. 47.]—AN ACT to regulate the compensation of certain officers of revenue cutters.

Be it enacted, &c. That in lieu of pay, rations, and all other allowances now authorized by law to the captains and first, second, and third lieutenants of the revenue cutters of the United States, there shall be allowed and paid, quarterly, from and after the passage of this act, to each captain at the rate of twelve hundred dollars per annum; to each first lieutenant, at the rate of nine hundred and sixty dollars per annum; to each second lieutenant, at the rate of eight hundred and sixty dollars per annum; to each third lieutenant, at the rate of seven hundred and ninety dollars per annum.

Approved, July 2, 1836.

[No. 48.]—AN ACT making appropriations for the suppression of Indian hostilities and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, &c. That the balance of the appropriation of one million of dollars, made by the act of April twenty-nine, eighteen hundred and thirty-six, and now remaining in the Treasury, shall be, and the same is hereby, made applicable to the payment of any expenditures authorized by the said act, and rendered necessary by the calling out by the President of the United States of any part of the militia or volunteers of the United States for the suppression or prevention of any Indian hostilities.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the sum of two million four hundred thousand dollars shall be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to defray any expenses which have been or may be incurred in preventing or suppressing the hostilities of any Indians, by calling out, under the direction of the President of the United States, any part of the militia or volunteers according to the provisions of the Constitution and laws; which sum, if expended, shall be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, conformably to the provisions of the act of Congress of January second, seventeen hundred and ninety-five, of the act of April fifth, eighteen hundred and thirty-two, making appropriations for the support of the Army, and the act of March nineteen, eighteen hundred and thirty-six, providing for the payment of volunteers and militia corps in the service of the United States.

Approved, July 2, 1836.

[No. 49.]—AN ACT to grant to the New Orleans and Nashville Railroad Company the right of way through the public lands of the United States.

Be it enacted, &c. That there be, and is hereby, granted to the New Orleans and Nashville Railroad Company, incorporated by the several States through which the said road is intended to pass, the right of way through such portion of the public lands as remain unsold: Provided, That the portion of the public lands occupied therefor shall not exceed eighty feet in breadth; that the route of the said road shall be surveyed and designated through the public lands by plain marks or monuments, and copies of the notes of survey, with a plat or plats thereof, and a description of the said landmarks or monuments, and their connexion with the prior official surveys of the adjacent lands, be transmitted to the General Land Office in Washington within sixty days after the said surveys and plats are completed, and that they be completed within two years from the date of this act.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That for such depots, watering places, and workshops as may be essential to the convenient use of the said road, there be also granted to the said company such portions of the public land as they may, under like restrictions and conditions, select, on either side of the said road: Provided, That not more than five acres, to be laid off in a square form, shall be selected for such use or purpose at any one place: Provided, also, That not more than one such square shall be granted for every fifteen miles of the said road lying within the public lands: And provided, moreover, That such selections shall be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury for the time being.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That, so long as the public lands in the vicinity of the said road shall remain unsold, the said company shall have power to take therefrom such materials of earth, stone, or wood as may be necessary for the construction of the said road: Provided, That the grants herein contained, as well of the use of the public lands as of the materials for the construction of the said road, shall cease and determine, unless the road be begun within the period of two years from the date of this act, and completed within eight years thereafter: And provided, moreover, That, if the said road shall, at any time after its completion, be discontinued or abandoned by the said company, the grants hereby made shall cease and determine.

Approved, July 2, 1836.

[No. 50.]—AN ACT to renew the gold medal struck and presented to General Morgan, by order of Congress, in honor of the battle of the Cowpens.

Be it enacted, &c. That, in pursuance of the request of Morgan Neville, in his memorial presented at the present session of Congress, the Director of the Mint be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be struck a gold medal of the intrinsic value of one hundred and fifty dollars, in honor of the battle of the Cowpens, which was fought on the seventeenth day of January, seventeen hundred and eighty-one, to replace the original medal presented by a resolution of the Continental Congress, of March ninth, seventeen hundred and eighty-one, to Brigadier General Daniel Morgan: the said medal to be struck from the original die, and delivered, when executed, to the said Morgan Neville, the lineal heir of General Morgan; the expense of the same to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Approved, July 2, 1836.

[No. 51.]—AN ACT to repair and extend the United States arsenal at Charleston, South Carolina.

Be it enacted, &c. That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause such repairs and improvements to be made to the United States arsenal in Charleston, South Carolina, as may be deemed necessary for the public service; and that the sum of twenty thousand dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated for this purpose, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Approved, July 2, 1836.

[No. 52.]—AN ACT to provide for the better protection of the Western frontier.

Be it enacted, &c. That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to cause to be surveyed and opened a military road, from some point upon the right bank of the Mississippi river, between the mouth of St. Peter's and the mouth of the Des Moines river, upon such route as may appear best calculated to effect the purposes of this act, to Red river.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the said road shall pass west of the State of Missouri and of the Territory of Arkansas, on condition that the assent of the Indian tribes who have not heretofore given their assent, through whose territory said road is to pass, shall be first obtained; and if such assent cannot be obtained, then east of the western boundaries of said State and Territory; and shall be so constructed as to enable troops to move along the same with proper facility. And the following mode of construction shall be adopted, subject to such alterations as the President may, from time to time, direct to be made. The timber shall be cut down to a reasonable width, and the wet and marshy places shall be causewayed or otherwise rendered passable; cheap bridges shall be erected over the smaller streams, not having good fords across them; and, where it may be found necessary, the road may be thrown up in the centre.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the military posts shall be constructed at such places along the said road as, in the opinion of the President, may be most proper for the protection of the frontier, and for the preservation of the necessary communication.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the troops of the United States shall be employed in performing the labor herein required, whenever, in the opinion of the President, the same can be done with a just regard to their other duties; and the other labor rendered necessary shall be procured in such manner as the President may direct.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the sum of one hundred thousand dollars shall be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, to be applied towards the accomplishment of the objects specified by this act.

Approved, July 2, 1836.

[No. 56].—AN ACT for laying off the towns of Fort Madison and Burlington, in the county of Des Moines, and the towns of Bellevue, Du Buque, and Peru, in the county of Du Buque, Territory of Wisconsin, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, &c. That the tracts of land in the Territory of Wisconsin, including the towns of Fort Madison and Burlington, in the county of Des Moines; Bellevue, Du Buque, and Peru, in the county of Du Buque; and Mineral Point, in the county of Iowa, shall, under the direction of the surveyor of the public lands, be laid off into town lots, streets, avenues, and the lots for public use called the public squares, and into out-lots, having regard to the lots and streets already surveyed, in such manner and of such dimensions as he may think proper for the public good and the equitable rights of the settlers and occupants of the said towns: Provided, The tracts of land so to be laid off into town lots, &c. shall not exceed the quantity of one entire section, nor the town lots one-half of an acre; nor shall the out-lots exceed the quantity of four acres each. When the survey of the lots shall be completed, a plat thereof shall be returned to the Secretary of the Treasury, and within six months thereafter the lots shall be offered to the highest bidder, at public sale, under the direction of the President of the United States, and at such other times as he shall think proper: Provided, That no town lot shall be sold for a sum less than five dollars: And provided, further, That a quantity of land of proper width, on the river banks at the towns of Fort Madison, Bellevue, Burlington, Du Buque, and Peru, and running with the said rivers the whole length of said towns, shall be reserved from sale, (as shall also the public squares,) for the public use, and remain forever for public use, as public highways and for other public uses.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the said surveyor to class the lots already surveyed in the said towns of Fort Madison, Burlington, Bellevue, Du Buque, Peru, and Mineral Point, into three classes, according to the relative value thereof, on account of situation and eligibility for business, without regard, however, to the improvements made thereon; and, previous to the sale of said lots as aforesaid, each and every person or persons, or his, her, or their legal representatives, who shall heretofore have obtained from the agent of the United States a permit to occupy any lot or lots in the said towns, or who shall have, by building or enclosure, actually occupied or improved any lot or lots in the said towns, or within the tracts of land hereby authorized to be laid off into lots, shall be permitted to purchase such lot or lots by paying therefor, in cash, if the same fall within the first class as aforesaid, at the rate of forty dollars per acre; if within the second class, at the rate of twenty dollars per acre; and if within the third class, at the rate of ten dollars per acre: Provided, That no one of the persons aforesaid shall be permitted to purchase, by authority of this section, more than one acre of ground, to embrace improvements already made.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the sum of three thousand dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to defray the expenses of surveying the lands covering the said towns of Fort Madison, Burlington, Bellevue, Du Buque, Peru, and Mineral Point.

Approved, July 2, 1836.

For accoutrements for the army, one hundred and two thousand three hundred and five dollars.

For the purchase of sites and the construction of arsenals for the deposit of arms in Arkansas, Missouri, and at Memphis, in Tennessee, forty-two thousand two hundred and fifty-six dollars: Provided, That the cost of such arsenals shall not exceed fourteen thousand dollars each.

For the purchase of twenty-eight fire engines, and the necessary apparatus, twenty-two thousand four hundred dollars.

For storehouses at Newport, Kentucky, one thousand five hundred dollars.

For purchasing seven acres of land, including the site of the powder magazine attached to the arsenal at Saint Louis, Missouri: Provided, the same shall be ascertained not to be on land of the United States, two thousand one hundred dollars.

For erecting a piazza in front of the building occupied as barracks by the troops at Augusta arsenal, Georgia, four hundred and fifty dollars.

For barracks, quarters, storehouses, hospital, stables, and materials for the same at Fort Jesup, Louisiana, twenty-five thousand dollars.

For rebuilding the wharf, and materials for the same, at Fort Wolcott, Newport, Rhode Island, five hundred dollars.

For constructing a wood-yard, and a wood-yard wharf, and for materials for the same, at Fort Monroe, Virginia, one thousand dollars.

For constructing a wharf, and for materials for the same, at Fort Severn, Maryland, one thousand dollars.

For rebuilding and repairing barracks, quarters, the hospitals, storehouses, and materials for same, at Fort Brady, Michigan Territory, five thousand dollars.

For the purchase of land adjoining Fort Sullivan, and the buildings thereon, three thousand seven hundred and fifty dollars.

For the following objects, in addition to former appropriations for the same:

For national armory at Harper's Ferry, seventy-seven thousand eight hundred and ninety-seven dollars.

For national armory at Springfield, forty-five thousand dollars.

For the purchase or manufacture of light brass and iron field artillery, and for construction of field artillery carriages, caissons, and travelling forges, one hundred and thirty-seven thousand one hundred and ninety dollars.

For the construction of furnaces for heating cannon balls, twelve thousand dollars.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States is hereby authorized, under the restrictions of the act of the first of May, eighteen hundred and twenty, to make transfers from one head of appropriations for fortifications, to that of another for a like object, whenever, in his opinion, the public interest shall require it.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the several sums of money appropriated by this act, and all other sums which have been or may be appropriated during the present session of Congress, shall be drawn from the Treasury, or paid over to the disbursing officers or agents of the Government, only as the same may be required by the several objects of expenditure authorized by law.

Approved, July 2, 1836.

[No. 63.]—AN ACT to amend an act entitled "An act authorizing the laying off a town on Bean river, in the State of Illinois, and for other purposes," approved fifth of February, eighteen hundred and twenty-nine.

Be it enacted, &c. That all acts and duties required to be done and performed by the surveyor of the States of Illinois and Missouri, and the Territory of Arkansas, under the act to which this is an amendment, shall be done and performed by a board of commissioners of three in number, any two of whom shall form a quorum to do business; said commissioners to be appointed by the President of the United States, and shall, previous to their entering upon the discharge of their duties, take an oath or affirmation to perform the same faithfully and impartially.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the said commissioners shall have power to hear evidence and determine all claims to lots of ground arising under the act to which this is an amendment; and for this purpose the said commissioners are authorized to administer all oaths that may be necessary, and reduce to writing all the evidence in support of claims to pre-emption presented for their consideration; and when all the testimony shall have been heard and considered, the said commissioners shall file with the Register and Receiver of the Land Office at Galena the testimony in each case, together with a certificate in favor of each person having the right of pre-emption; and upon making payment to the Receiver at Galena for the lot or lots to which such person is entitled, the Receiver shall grant a receipt therefor, and issue certificates of purchase, to be transmitted to the General Land Office, as in other cases of the sale of public lands.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the Register and Receiver at Galena, after the board of commissioners have heard and determined all the cases of pre-emption under the act to which this is an amendment, shall expose the residue of lots to public sale to the highest bidder, after advertising the same in three public newspapers at least six weeks prior to the day of sale, in the same manner as is provided for the sale of the public lands in other cases; and after paying to the commissioners the compensation hereinafter allowed them, and all the other expenses incident to the said survey and sale, the Receiver of the Land Office shall pay over the residue of the money he may have received from the sale of lots aforesaid, by pre-emption as well as at public auction, into the hands of the county commissioners of Jo Daviess county, to be expended by them in the erection of public buildings, and the construction of suitable wharves in the town of Galena.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the commissioners appointed to carry this act into effect shall be paid by the Receiver six dollars each, per day, for their services, for every day they are necessarily employed.

Approved, July 2, 1836.

[No. 64.]—AN ACT to change the organization of the Post Office Department, and to provide more effectually for the settlement of the accounts thereof.

Be it enacted, &c. That the revenue arising in the Post Office Department, and all debts due to the same, shall, when collected, be paid under the direction of the Postmaster General, into the Treasury of the United States.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Postmaster General shall submit to Congress at the next, and each succeeding annual session, specific estimates of the sums of money expected to be required for the service of the Department in the subsequent year, commencing on the first day of July, under the following heads, viz. "Compensation of Postmasters," "Transportation of the Mails," "Ship, Steamboat, and Way Letters," "Wrapping Paper," "Office Furniture," "Advertising," "Mail Bags," "Blanks," "Mail Locks, Keys, and Stamps," "Mail Depredations and Special Agents," "Clerks for Offices," and "Miscellaneous." And the Postmaster General shall render an account to Congress, at each succeeding annual session, of the amounts actually expended for each of the purposes above specified.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the aggregate sum required "for the service of the Post Office Department," in each year, shall be appropriated by law out of the revenue of the Department, and that all payments of the receipts of the Post Office Department into the Treasury shall be to the credit of the said appropriation.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the sums appropriated for the service aforesaid shall be paid by the Treasurer in the manner herein directed: Provided, That the compensation of postmasters, the expenses of post offices, and such other expenses of the Department for which appropriations have been made, as may be incurred by postmasters, may be deducted out of the proceeds of their offices, under the direction of the Postmaster General: And provided, also, That all charges against the Department by postmasters, on account of such expenses, shall be submitted for examination and settlement, to the Auditor herein provided for; and that no such deduction shall be valid, unless the expenditure so deducted be found to have been made in conformity to law: And provided, also, That the Postmaster General shall have power to transfer debts due on account of the Department, by postmasters and others, in satisfaction of the legal demands for which appropriations have been made, of such contractors who may be creditors of the Department as shall have given bonds, with security, to refund any moneys that may come into their hands over and above the amount which may be found due to them on the settlement of their accounts.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the Treasurer of the United States shall give receipts for all moneys received by him to the credit of the appropriation for the service of the Post Office Department; which receipts shall be endorsed upon warrants drawn by the Postmaster General, and without such warrant no acknowledgment for money received as aforesaid shall be valid.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department shall be disbursed by the Treasurer out of the moneys paid into the Treasury for the service of the Post Office Department, upon the warrants of the Postmaster General, registered and countersigned as herein provided, and expressing on their faces the appropriation to which they should be charged.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That the Treasurer shall render his accounts of the moneys received and paid by him on account of the Post Office Department, quarterly to the Auditor for the Post Office Department, hereinafter provided for, and shall transmit copies of the same, when adjusted by him, to the two Houses of Congress.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That there shall be appointed by the President, with the consent of the Senate, an Auditor of the Treasury for the Post Office Department, whose duty it shall be to receive all accounts arising in the said Departments, or relative thereto, to audit and settle the same, and certify their balances to the Postmaster General: Provided, That if either the Postmaster General, or any person whose account shall be settled, be dissatisfied therewith, he may, within twelve months, appeal to the First Comptroller of the Treasury, whose decision shall be final and conclusive. The said Auditor shall report to the Postmaster General, when required, the official forms of papers to be used by postmasters, and other officers or agents of the Department concerned in its receipts and payments, and the manner and form of keeping and stating its accounts. He shall keep and preserve all accounts, with the vouchers, after settlement. He shall promptly report to the Postmaster General all delinquencies of postmasters in paying over the proceeds of their offices. He shall close the accounts of the Department quarterly, and transmit to the Secretary of the Treasury quarterly statements of its receipts and expenditures. He shall register, charge, and countersign, all warrants upon the Treasury for receipts and payments issued by the Postmaster General, when warranted by law. He shall perform such other duties, in relation to the financial concerns of the Department, as shall be assigned to him by the Secretary of the Treasury, and shall make to them, respectively, such reports as either of them may require respecting the same. The said Auditor may frank, and receive, free of postage, letters and packets under the regulations provided by law for other officers of the Government. And all letters and packets to and from the Chief Engineer, which may relate to the business of his office, shall be free of postage.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the Postmaster General to decide on the official forms of all papers to be used by postmasters, and other officers or agents of the Post Office Department, concerned in its receipts and payments, and the manner and form of keeping and stating its accounts; to enforce the prompt rendition of the returns of postmasters, and of all certificates, acknowledgments, receipts, and other papers, by postmasters and contractors, relative to the accounts of the Department; to control, according to law, and subject to the settlement of the Auditor, the allowances to postmasters, the expenses of post offices, and all other expenses incident to the service of the Department; to regulate and direct the payment of the said allowances and expenses for which appropriations have been made; to superintend the disposition of the proceeds of post offices and other moneys of the Department; to prescribe the manner in which postmasters shall pay over their balances; to grant warrants for money to be paid into the Treasury, and out of the same, in pursuance of appropriations by law, to persons to whom the same shall be certified to be due by the said Auditor: Provided, That advances of necessary sums to defray expenses may be made by the Postmaster General to agents of the Department employed to investigate mail depredations, examine post routes and post offices, and perform other like services, to be charged by the Auditor for the Post Office Department, and be accounted for in the settlement of their accounts.

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That the Auditor for the Post Office Department shall state and certify, quarterly, to the Postmaster General, accounts of the moneys paid pursuant to appropriations, in each year, by postmasters, out of the proceeds of their offices, towards the expenses of the Department, under each of the heads of the said expenses specified in the second section of this act; upon which the Postmaster General shall issue warrants to the Treasurer of the United States, as in case of the receipt and payment of the said moneys into and out of the Treasury, in order that the same may be carried to the credit and debit of the appropriation for the service of the Post Office Department, on the books of the Auditor for said Department.

Sec. 11. And be it further enacted, That the Postmaster General shall, within sixty days after the making of any contract, cause a duplicate thereof to be lodged in the office of the Auditor of the Post Office Department. Upon the death, resignation, or removal of any postmaster, he shall cause his bond of office to be delivered to the said Auditor; and shall also cause to be promptly certified to him all establishments and discontin-uances of post offices, and all appointments, deaths, resignations, and removals of postmasters, together with all orders and regulations which may originate a claim, or in any manner affect the accounts of the Department.

Sec. 12. And be it further enacted, That the accounts of the Post Office Department shall be kept in such manner as to exhibit the amounts of its revenues, derived respectively from "letter postages," "newspapers and pamphlets," and "fines;" and the amount of its expenditures for each of the following objects, namely: "Compensation of Postmasters," "Transportation of the Mails," "Ship, Steamboat, and Way Letters," "Wrapping Paper," "Office Furniture," "Advertising," "Mail Bags," "Blanks," "Mail Locks, Keys, and Stamps," "Mail Depredations and Special Agents," "Clerks for Offices," and "Miscellaneous."

Sec. 13. And be it further enacted, That the bonds and contracts of postmasters, mail contractors, and other agents of the Post Office Department, shall hereafter be made to and with the United States of America; and all suits to be commenced for the recovery of debts or balances due by postmasters and others, or upon bonds or contracts made to or with the present or any former Postmaster General, or for any fines, penalties, or forfeitures, imposed by the laws respecting the Post Office Department, or by the Postmaster General, pursuant thereto, shall be instituted in the name of the United States of America; and the demands in such suits shall have all the privileges and priorities in adjudication and payment secured to other claims of the United States by the existing laws: Provided, That actions and suits which may have been instituted in the name of the Postmaster General, previous to the passage of this act, shall not be affected by the provisions of this section.

Sec. 14. And be it further enacted, That the Auditor of the Post Office Department shall superintend the collection of all debts due to the Department, and all penalties and forfeitures imposed on postmasters for failing to make returns, or pay over the proceeds of their offices; he shall direct suits and legal proceedings, and take all such measures as may be authorized by law, to enforce the prompt payment of moneys due to the Department.

Sec. 15. And be it further enacted, That copies of the quarterly returns of postmasters, and of any papers pertaining to the accounts in the office of the Auditor for the Post Office Department, certified by him under his seal of office, shall be admitted as evidence in the courts of the United States; and in every case of delinquency of any postmaster or contractor, in which suit may be brought, the said Auditor shall forward to the attorney of the United States certified copies of all papers in his office tending to sustain the claim; and in every such case a statement of the account, certified as aforesaid, shall be admitted as evidence, and the court trying the cause shall be thereupon authorized to give judgment and award execution, subject to the provisions of the thirty-eighth section of the act to reduce into one the several acts establishing and regulating the Post Office Department, approved March third, eighteen hundred and twenty-five. No claim for a credit shall be allowed upon the trial but such as shall have been presented to the said Auditor, and by him disallowed in whole or in part, unless it shall be proved to the satisfaction of the court that the defendant is, at the time of the trial, in possession of vouchers not before in his power to procure, and that he was prevented from exhibiting to the said Auditor a claim for such credit, by some unavoidable accident. In suits for balances due from postmasters, interest, at the rate of six per cent. per annum, shall be recovered from the time of the default until payment.

Sec. 16. And be it further enacted, That the attorneys of the United States, in the prosecution of suits for moneys due on account of the Post Office Department, shall obey the directions which may, from time to time, be given to them by the Auditor for the Post Office Department; and it shall be the duty of each of the said attorneys, immediately after the end of every term of any court in which any of the suits aforesaid shall have been pending, to forward to the said Auditor a statement of all the judgments, orders, and steps which have been made or taken in the same, during the said term, accompanied by a certificate of the clerk, showing the parties to, and amount of, each judgment, and such other information as may be required by the said Auditor. The said attorneys shall direct speedy and effectual process of execution upon the said judgments; and it shall be the duty of the marshals of the United States to whom the same shall be directed, to make to the said Auditor, at such times as he may direct, returns of the proceedings which have taken place upon the said process of execution.

Sec. 17. And be it further enacted, That in all cases where any sum or sums of money have been paid out of the funds of the Post Office Department to any individual, or individuals, under pretence that service has been performed therefor, when in fact such service has not been performed, or by way of additional allowance for increased service actually rendered, when the additional allowance exceeds the sum which, by the provisions of law, might rightfully have been allowed therefor; and in all other cases where the moneys of the Department have been paid over to any person, in consequence of fraudulent representations, or by the mistake, collusion, or misconduct of any officer or clerk of the Department, it shall be the duty of the Postmaster General to cause suit to be brought in the name of the United States of America, to recover back the same, or the excess, as the case may be, with interest thereon.

Sec. 18. And be it further enacted, That the Auditor for the Post Office Department shall adjust and settle all balances due from postmasters on account of transactions prior to the first day of July, eighteen hundred and thirty-six. He shall, when necessary, institute suits for the same, and cause them to be effectually prosecuted to judgment and execution; and, in cases in which proceedings at law for these or any other balances that are or may become due on account of the Post Office Department have been or shall be fruitless, may direct the institution of suits in chancery, to set aside fraudulent conveyances or trusts, or attach debts due to the defendants, or obtain any other proper exercise of the powers of equity, to have satisfaction of the said judgments; and the courts of the United States, sitting in chancery, shall have jurisdiction to entertain such bills, and make such decrees and orders thereupon as may be consonant to the principles and usages of equity. The said Auditor shall report to the Postmaster General, to be by him submitted to Congress at its next annual session, a statement of all the balances and debts due to the Post Office Department as aforesaid by late postmasters, showing in each case the name and office of the principal debtor, the names of the sureties, if any, the amount of the debt, the time at which it accrued, the steps taken to collect the same, and whether they have been successful or not. The said statement shall also classify such of the said balances as may then remain due, into such as are considered collectable, and such as are not, with the whole amount of each class.

Sec. 19. And be it further enacted, That the Auditor for the Post Office Department, or any mayor of a city, justice of peace, or judge of any court of record in the United States, by him especially designated, shall be authorized to administer oaths and affirmations, in relation to the examination and settlement of the accounts committed to his charge; and if any person shall knowingly swear or affirm falsely, touching the expenditures of the Post Office Department, or in relation to any account of, or claim against, or in favor of, the said Department, he or she shall, upon conviction thereof, suffer as for wilful and corrupt perjury.

Sec. 20. And be it further enacted, That there shall be employed by the Postmaster General a third Assistant Postmaster General, who may receive and send letters and packets free of postage, and, in lieu of the clerks now employed in the Department, one chief clerk, three principal clerks, and thirty-three other clerks, one messenger, and three assistant messengers, and two watchmen.

Sec. 21. And be it further enacted, That there shall be employed by the Secretary of the Treasury, in the office of the Auditor for the Post Office Department, one chief clerk, four principal clerks, and thirty-eight other clerks, one messenger, and one assistant messenger, also three clerks, one at a salary of fourteen hundred dollars per annum, one at a salary of twelve hundred dollars, and one at a salary of one thousand dollars, in the office of the Treasurer of the United States, in lieu of the same number of clerks now employed in the office of the Fifth Auditor of the Treasury, in adjusting the accounts of the Post Office Department.

Sec. 22. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the Postmaster General to make to Congress, at each annual session thereof, the following several reports:

First. A report of all contracts made for the transportation of the mail within the preceding year, stating in each case of contract its date and duration, the name of the contractor, the route or routes embraced in the contract, with the length of each, with the times of arrival and departure at the ends of each route, the mode of transportation contracted for, and the price stipulated to be paid by the Department. Also, a statement of all such land and water mails as may have been established or ordered by the Department within the year preceding, other than those let to contract at the annual lettings of mail contracts, specifying, in each case, the route or water-course on which the mail is established, the name of the person employed to transport it, the mode of transportation, the amount paid or to be paid, and the proposed duration of the order or contract.

Second. A report of all allowances made to contractors within the year preceding, beyond the sums originally stipulated in their respective contracts, and the reasons for the same; and of all orders made by the Department, whereby additional expense is or will be incurred, beyond the original contract price, on any land or water route, specifying in each case the route to which the order relates, the name of the contractor, the original service provided by the contract, the original price, the date of the order for additional service, the additional service required, and the additional allowance therefor; also, a report of all curtailments of expenses effected by the Department within the preceding year, specifying, in each case, the same particulars as required in cases of additional allowances.

Third. A report of all incidental expenses of the Department for the year ending on the thirtieth day of June preceding, arranged according to their several objects, as for "Wrapping Paper," "Office Furniture," "Advertising," "Mail Bags," "Blanks," "Mail Locks, Keys, and Stamps," "Mail Depredations and Special Agents," "Clerks for Offices," "Miscellaneous," showing the sum paid under each head of expenditure; and the names of the persons to whom paid, except only persons employed in detecting depredations on the mail, and other confidential agents, need not be disclosed in said report.

Fourth. A report of the finances of the Post Office Department for the year ending on the thirtieth day of June preceding, showing the whole amount of balances due to the Department at the beginning of the year, from postmasters and all others, the whole amount of postage that accrued within the year, the whole amount of the engagements and liabilities of the Department for mail transportation during the year, the amount actually paid during the year for and on account of mail transportation and otherwise, stating separately so much of the said amount as may have been paid on account of the transportation of the mail, and for other debts for the same object, in preceding years.

Fifth. A report of all fines imposed, and deductions from the pay of contractors made during the preceding year, for failures to deliver the mail, or for any other cause, stating the names of the delinquent contractors, the nature of the delinquency, the route on which it occurred, the time when it occurred, the time when the fine was imposed, and whether the fine has been remitted, or order for deduction rescinded, and for what reason.

Sec. 23. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the Postmaster General, before advertising for proposals for the transportation of the mail, to form the best judgment practicable as to the mode, time, and frequency of transportation on each route, and to advertise accordingly. No consolidated or combination bid shall be received, and no additional compensation shall be made to any mail contractor, so that the compensation for additional regular service shall exceed the exact proportion which the original compensation bears to the original services stipulated to be performed; and no extra allowance shall be made to any contractor by the Postmaster General for an increase of expedition in the transportation of the mail, unless the employment of additional stock or carriers, by the contractor, shall be rendered necessary; and in such case the additional compensation shall never bear a greater proportion to the additional stock or carriers rendered necessary, than the sum stipulated in the original contract bears to the stock and carriers necessarily employed in its execution; and when any extra service shall be ordered, the amount of the allowance therefor, in dollars and cents, shall be signified in the order for such service, and be forthwith entered upon the books of the Post Office Department; and no additional compensation shall be paid for any extra regular service rendered before the issuing of such order and the making of such entry; and every order, entry, or memorandum whatever, on which any action of the Department is to be had, allowance made, or money paid, and every contract, paper, or obligation drawn up in said office, by any officer thereof, shall have affixed to it its true date; and every paper relating to contracts or allowances filed in said office shall have the date of its filing endorsed thereon. And whenever it shall become necessary to change the terms of any existing contract in any other manner than that designated by this act, or to enter into a contract for the transportation of the mail at any other time than at the annual letting, the Postmaster General shall give notice in one newspaper published at Washington City, and in one newspaper published as near as may be to the route on which the services are to be performed, for at least four weeks before changing or making such contract, inviting proposals therefor; which proposals shall be received and opened, and such proceedings thereon had, in all things, as at the annual letting. Provided, however, That the Postmaster General may make temporary contracts until a regular letting can take place.

Sec. 24. And be it further enacted, That proposals for mail contracts shall be delivered to the Department sealed, and shall be kept sealed until the biddings are closed, and shall then be opened and marked in the presence of the Postmaster General, and of one of the Assistant Postmasters General, or in the presence of two of the Assistant Postmasters General. And the contracts in all cases shall be awarded to the lowest bidder, except when his bid is not more than five per centum below that of the last contractor, on the route bid for, who shall have faithfully performed his contract: Provided, however, That the Postmaster General shall not be bound to consider the bid of any person who shall have wilfully or negligently failed to execute or perform a prior contract.

Sec. 25. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the Postmaster General to have recorded, in a well-bound book, a true and faithful abstract of offers made to him for carrying the mail, embracing as well those which are rejected as those which are accepted. The said abstract shall contain the names of the party or parties offering; the terms on which he or they propose to carry the mail; the sum for which it is offered to contract; and the length of time the agreement is to continue. And it shall also be the duty of the Postmaster General to put on file, preserve the originals of the propositions of which abstracts are here directed to be made, and to report at each session of Congress a true copy from the said record of all offers made for carrying the mail as aforesaid.

Sec. 26. And be it further enacted, That if any person employed in the Post Office Department, or Postmaster, shall become interested in any mail contract, or act as agent, with or without compensation, in any matter or thing relating to business in said Department, for any contractor, or person offering to become a contractor, he shall be forthwith dismissed from office, and shall be liable to pay so much money as would have been realized from said contract, to be recovered in an action of debt in any court having jurisdiction thereof, in the name of the United States, for the use of the Post Office Department; and it shall be the duty of the Postmaster General to cause prosecution to be instituted.

Sec. 27. And be it further enacted, That every proposal for the transportation of the mail shall be accompanied by a written guaranty, signed by one or more responsible persons, to the effect that he or they undertake that the bidder or bidders will, if his or their bid be accepted, enter into an obligation in such time as may be prescribed by the Postmaster General, with good and sufficient sureties, to perform the service proposed. No proposal shall be considered unless accompanied by such guaranty. If, after the acceptance of a proposal, and notification thereof to the bidder or bidders, he or they shall fail to enter into an obligation, within the time prescribed by the Postmaster General, with good and sufficient sureties, for the performance of the service, then the Postmaster General shall proceed to contract with some other person or persons, for the performance of the said service, and shall forthwith cause the difference between the amount contained in the proposal so guaranteed, and the amount for which he may have contracted for the performance of said service, for the whole period of the proposal, to be charged up against the said bidder or bidders, and his or their guarantor or guarantors, and the same may be immediately recovered by the United States, for the use of the Post Office Department, in an action of debt against either or all of the said persons.

Sec. 28. And be it further enacted, That no contract for the transportation of the mail shall knowingly be made by the Postmaster General with any person who shall have entered into any combination, or proposed to enter into any combination, to prevent the making of any bid for a mail contract by any other person or persons; or who shall have made any agreement, or shall have given or performed, or promised to give or perform, for any consideration whatever, or to do or not to do any thing whatever, in order to induce any other person or persons not to bid for a mail contract. And if any person so offending be a mail contractor, he may be forthwith dismissed from the service of the Department: Provided, That whenever the Postmaster General shall exercise the power conferred on him by this section, he shall transmit a copy or statement of the evidence on which he acts to Congress, at its next session.

Sec. 29. And be it further enacted, That no person whose bid for the transportation of the mail may be accepted, shall receive any pay until he shall have executed his contract according to law and the regulations of the Department; nor shall any payment be made for any additional regular service in the transportation of the mail, unless the same shall have been rendered in obedience to a prior legal order of the Postmaster General.

Sec. 30. And be it further enacted, That so much of the act concerning the Post Office Department, approved March third, eighteen hundred and twenty-five, as directs that duplicates or copies of contracts or orders made by the Postmaster General shall be lodged in the office of the Comptroller of the Treasury, be repealed.

Sec. 31. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the Postmaster General to furnish to the postmasters at the termination of each route, a schedule, specifying the times of arrival and departure at their offices, respectively, of each mail, a copy of which the postmaster shall put up in some conspicuous place in his office; and the Postmaster General shall also furnish a notice, in like manner, of any change or alteration in the arrivals and departures which may be ordered by him. And it shall be the duty of every postmaster promptly to report to the Department every delinquency, neglect, or malpractice of the contractors, their agents, or carriers, that may come to his knowledge. And the Postmaster General shall cause to be kept, and returned to the Department at short and regular intervals, by postmasters at the end of the routes, and such others as he may think proper, registers, showing the exact times of the arrival and departure of the mails.

Sec. 32. And be it further enacted, That, if any postmaster shall unlawfully detain in his office any letter, package, pamphlet, or newspaper, with intent to prevent the arrival and delivery of the same to the person or persons to whom such letter, package, pamphlet, or newspaper may be addressed or directed in the usual course of the transportation of the mail along the route; or if any postmaster shall, with intent as aforesaid, give a preference to any letter, package, pamphlet, or newspaper, over another, which may pass through his office, by forwarding the one and retaining the other, he shall, on conviction thereof, be fined in a sum not exceeding five hundred dollars, and imprisoned for a term not exceeding six months, and shall, moreover, be forever thereafter incapable of holding the office of postmaster in the United States.

Sec. 33. And be it further enacted, That there shall be appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a deputy postmaster for each post office at which the commissions allowed to the postmaster amounted to one thousand dollars or upwards, in the year ending the thirtieth day of June, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-five, or which may, in any subsequent year, terminating on the thirtieth day of June, amount to or exceed that sum, who shall hold his office for the term of four years, unless sooner removed by the President.

Sec. 34. And be it further enacted, That assistant postmasters and clerks regularly employed and engaged in post offices shall be exempt from militia duties and from serving on juries, and from any fine or penalty for neglect thereof.

Sec. 35. And be it further enacted, That advertisements of letters remaining in post offices, may, under the direction of the Postmaster General, be made in more than one newspaper: Provided, That the whole cost of advertising shall not exceed four cents for each letter.

Sec. 36. And be it further enacted, That no postmaster shall receive free of postage, or frank, any letter or packet composed of, or containing any thing other than paper (or money); and for a violation of this provision, the offender shall be dismissed from office, and upon conviction in any court of competent jurisdiction pay a fine of twenty dollars. And no person shall hold the office of postmaster who shall not be an actual resident of the city or town wherein the office is situated, or the district of country usually supplied by said office.

Sec. 37. And be it further enacted, That when any one or more of the sureties of a postmaster shall notify to the Postmaster General their desire to be released from their suretyship, or when the Postmaster General shall deem it necessary, he shall require the said postmaster to execute a new bond, with security, which, when accepted by the Postmaster General, shall be as valid as the bond given upon the original appointment of said postmaster, and the sureties in the prior bond shall be released from responsibility for all acts or defaults of said postmaster, which may be done or committed subsequent to the acceptance of the new bond, the date of which shall be endorsed thereon: Provided, That payments made subsequent to the execution of the new bond by said postmaster shall be applied first to discharge any balance which may be due on the old bond, unless he shall, at the time of payment, expressly direct them to be applied to the credit of his new account.

Sec. 38. And be it further enacted, That if any person shall be accessory after the fact, to the offence of stealing or taking the mail of the United States, or of stealing or taking any letter or packet, or enclosure in any letter or packet sent or to be sent in the mail of the United States, from any post office in the United States, or from the mail of the United States, by any person or persons whatever, every person so offending as accessory, shall, on conviction thereof, pay a fine not exceeding one thousand dollars, and be imprisoned for a term not exceeding five years; and such accessory after the fact may be tried, convicted, and punished in the district in which his offence was committed, though the principal offence may have been committed in another district, and before the trial of the principal offender: Provided, Such principal offender has fled from justice, or cannot be arrested to be put upon his trial.

Sec. 39. And be it further enacted, That in case the Postmaster General shall deem it expedient to establish an express mail, in addition to the ordinary mail, on any of the post roads in the United States, for the purpose of conveying slips from newspapers in lieu of exchange newspapers, or letters, other than such as contain money, not exceeding half an ounce in weight, marked "express mail," and public despatches, he shall be authorized to charge all letters and packets carried by such express mail with triple the rates of postage to which letters and packets, not free, may be by law subject, when carried by the ordinary mails.

Sec. 40. And be it further enacted, That in case of the death, resignation, or absence of the Postmaster General, all his powers and duties shall devolve, for the time being, on the First Assistant Postmaster General.

Sec. 41. And be it further enacted, That the Postmaster General shall be authorized, whenever the same may be proper for the accommodation of the Public in any city, to employ letter-carriers, for the delivery of letters received at the post office in said city; except such as the persons to whom they are addressed may have requested, in writing, addressed to the postmaster, to be retained in the post office; and for the receipt of letters at such places in the said city as the Postmaster General may direct, and for the deposit of the same in the post office; and for the delivery by a carrier of each letter received from the post office, the person to whom the same may be delivered shall pay not exceeding two cents, and for the delivery of each newspaper and pamphlet, one-half cent; and for every letter received by a carrier, to be deposited in the post office, there shall be paid to him, at the time of the receipt, not exceeding two cents; all of which receipts by the carriers in any city shall, if the Postmaster General so direct, be accounted for to the postmaster of said city, to constitute a fund for the compensation of the said carriers, and be paid to them in such proportions and manner as the Postmaster General may direct. Each of the said carriers shall give bond with sureties, to be approved by the Postmaster General, for the safe custody and delivery of letters, and for the due account and payment of all moneys received by him.

Sec. 42. And be it further enacted, That the Postmaster General shall be authorized, in his discretion, to contract for carrying the mail on the navigable canals of the several States, in all cases where, in his opinion, the public interests and convenience shall require it; and for the time during which mails may be carried on such canals, or any parts thereof, the same are hereby declared to be post roads.

Sec. 43. And be it further enacted, That the following annual salaries shall be allowed to the Assistant Postmasters General, and to the clerks, messengers, and watchmen, provided for the service of the Post Office Department, viz.

To the three Assistant Postmasters General, each twenty-five hundred dollars.

To the chief clerk, two thousand dollars.

To the three principal clerks, each one thousand six hundred dollars.

To ten clerks, each one thousand four hundred dollars.

To fifteen clerks, each one thousand two hundred dollars.

To eight clerks, each one thousand dollars.

To the messenger, seven hundred and fifty dollars.

To the three assistant messengers, each three hundred and fifty dollars.

To the two watchmen, each three hundred dollars.

Sec. 44. And be it further enacted, That the following annual salaries shall be allowed to the Auditor of the Post Office Department, and to the clerks and messengers herein provided for the service of his office, viz.

To the Auditor, three thousand dollars.

To the chief clerk, two thousand dollars.

To the four principal clerks, each one thousand six hundred dollars.

To ten clerks, each one thousand four hundred dollars.

To twenty clerks, each one thousand two hundred dollars.

To eight clerks, each one thousand dollars.

To the messenger, seven hundred and fifty dollars, and to the assistant messenger, three hundred and fifty dollars.

Sec. 45. And be it further enacted, That the sum of three million one hundred and fifty thousand dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated for the service of the Post Office Department for the year commencing on the first day of July, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-six, out of any moneys in the Treasury arising from the revenues of the said Department, to be accounted for in the manner pointed out in the second section of this act.

Sec. 46. And be it further enacted, That this act shall be in force and take effect from the passage thereof.

Approved, July 2, 1836.

[No. 66.]—AN ACT to promote the progress of useful arts, and to repeal all acts and parts of acts heretofore made for that purpose.

Be it enacted, &c. That there shall be established and attached to the Department of State, an office to be denominated the Patent Office; the chief officer of which shall be called the Commissioner of Patents; to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, whose duty it shall be, under the direction of the Secretary of State, to superintend, execute, and perform all such acts and things touching and respecting the granting and issuing of patents for new and useful discoveries, inventions, and improvements, as are herein provided for, or shall hereafter be, by law, directed to be done and performed, and shall have the charge and custody of all the books, records, papers, models, machines, and all other things belonging to said office. And said Commissioner shall receive the same compensation as is allowed by law to the Commissioner of the Indian Department, and shall be entitled to send and receive letters and packages by mail, relating to the business of the office, free of postage.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That there shall be, in said office, an inferior officer, to be appointed by the said principal officer, with the approval of the Secretary of State, to receive an annual salary of seventeen hundred dollars, and to be called the Chief Clerk of the Patent Office: who, in all cases during the necessary absence of the Commissioner, or when the said principal officer shall become vacant, shall have the charge and custody of the seal, and of the records, books, papers, machines, models, and all other things belonging to the said office, and shall perform the duties of Commissioner during such vacancy. And the said Commissioner may also, with like approval, appoint an examining clerk, at an annual salary of fifteen hundred dollars; two other clerks at twelve hundred dollars each, one of whom shall be a competent draughtsman; one clerk at one thousand dollars; a machinist at twelve hundred and fifty dollars; and a messenger at seven hundred dollars. And said Commissioner, clerks, and every other person appointed and employed in said office, shall be disqualified and interdicted from acquiring or taking, except by inheritance, during the period for which they shall hold their appointments, respectively, any right or interest, directly or indirectly, in any patent for an invention or discovery which has been, or may hereafter be, granted.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the said principal officer, and every other person to be appointed in the said office, shall, before he enters upon the duties of his office or appointment, make oath or affirmation, truly and faithfully to execute the trust committed to him. And the said Commissioner and the chief clerk shall also, before entering upon their duties, severally give bonds, with sureties, to the Treasurer of the United States, the former in the sum of ten thousand dollars, and the latter in the sum of five thousand dollars, with condition to render a true and faithful account to him or his successor in office, quarterly, of all moneys which shall be by them respectively received for duties on patents, and for copies of records and drawings, and for all other moneys received by virtue of said office.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the said Commissioner shall cause a seal to be made and provided for the said office, with such device as the President of the United States shall approve; and copies of any records, books, papers, or drawings, belonging to the said office, under the signature of the said Commissioner, or, when the office shall be vacant, under the signature of the chief clerk, with the said seal affixed, shall be competent evidence in all cases in which the original records, books, papers, or drawings, could be evidence. And any person making application therefor, may have certified copies of the records, drawings, and other papers deposited in said office, on paying for the written copies the sum of ten cents for every page of one hundred words; and for copies of drawings, the reasonable expense of making the same.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That all patents issuing from said office shall be issued in the name of the United States, and under the seal of said office, and be signed by the Secretary of State, and countersigned by the Commissioner of said office, and shall be recorded, together with the descriptions, specifications, and drawings, in the said office, in books to be kept for that purpose. Every such patent shall contain a short description or title of the invention or discovery, correctly indicating its nature and design, and in its terms grant to the applicant or applicants, his or their heirs, administrators, executors, or assigns, for a term not exceeding fourteen years, the full and exclusive right and liberty of making, using, and vending to others to be used, the said invention or discovery, referring to the specifications for the particulars thereof, a copy of which shall be annexed to the patent, specifying what the patentee claims as his invention or discovery.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That any person or persons having discovered or invented any new and useful art, machine, manufacture, or composition of matter, or any new and useful improvement, or any art, machine, manufacture, or composition of matter, not known or used by others before his or their discovery or invention thereof, and not, at the time of his application for a patent, in public use or on sale, with his consent or allowance, as the inventor or discoverer, and shall desire to obtain an exclusive property therein, may make application in writing to the Commissioner of Patents, expressing such desire, and the Commissioner, on due proceedings had, may grant a patent therefor. But before any inventor shall receive a patent for any such new invention or discovery, he shall deliver a written description of his invention or discovery, and of the manner and process of making, constructing, using, and compounding the same, in such full, clear, and exact terms, avoiding unnecessary prolixity, as to enable any person skilled in the art or science to which it appertains, or with which it is most nearly connected, to make, construct, compound, and use the same; and in case of any machine, he shall fully explain the principle and the several modes in which he has contemplated the application of that principle or character by which it may be distinguished from other inventions; and shall particularly specify and point out the part, improvement, or combination, which he claims as his own invention or discovery. He shall, furthermore, accompany the whole with a drawing or drawings, and written references where the nature of the case admits of drawings, or with specimens of ingredients, and of the composition of matter, sufficient in quantity for the purpose of experiment, where the invention or discovery is of a composition of matter; which descriptions and drawings, signed by the inventor and attested by two witnesses, shall be filed in the Patent Office; and he shall moreover furnish a model of his invention, in all cases which admit of a representation by model, of a convenient size to exhibit advantageously its several parts. The applicant shall also make oath or affirmation that he does verily believe that he is the original and first inventor or discoverer of the art, machine, composition, or improvement, for which he solicits a patent, and that he does not know or believe that the same was ever before known or used; and also of what county he is a citizen; which oath or affirmation may be made before any person authorized by law to administer oaths.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That, on the filing of any such application, description, and specification, and the payment of the duty hereinafter provided, the Commissioner shall make, or cause to be made, an examination of the alleged new invention or discovery; and if, on any such examination, it shall not appear to the Commissioner that the same had been invented or discovered by any other person in this country prior to the alleged invention or discovery thereof by the applicant, or that it had been patented or described in any printed publication in this or any foreign country, or had been in public use or on sale with the applicant's consent or allowance prior to the application, if the Commissioner shall deem it to be sufficiently useful and important, it shall be his duty to issue a patent therefor. But whenever, on such examination, it shall appear to the Commissioner that the applicant was not the original and first inventor or discoverer thereof, or that any part of that which is claimed as new had before been invented or discovered, or patented, or described in any printed publication in this or any foreign country, as aforesaid, or that the description is defective and insufficient, he shall notify the applicant thereof, giving him, briefly, such information and references as may be useful in judging of the propriety of renewing his application, or of altering his specification to embrace only that part of the invention or discovery which is new. In every such case, if the applicant shall elect to withdraw his application, relinquishing his claim to the model, he shall be entitled to receive back twenty dollars, part of the duty required by this act, on filing a notice in writing of such election in the Patent Office, a copy of which, certified by the Commissioner, shall be a sufficient warrant to the Treasurer for paying back to the said applicant the said sum of twenty dollars. But if the applicant in such case shall persist in his claim for a patent, with or without any alteration of his specification, he shall be required to make oath or affirmation anew, in manner as aforesaid. And if the specification and claim shall not have been so modified as, in the opinion of the Commissioner, shall entitle the applicant to a patent, he may, on appeal, and upon request in writing, have the decision of a board of examiners, to be composed of three disinterested persons, who shall be appointed for that purpose by the Secretary of State, one of whom at least to be selected, if practicable and convenient, for his knowledge and skill in the particular art, manufacture, or branch of science to which the alleged invention appertains; who shall be under oath or affirmation for the faithful and impartial performance of the duty imposed upon them by said appointment. Said board shall be furnished with a certificate in writing of the opinion and decision of the Commissioner, stating the particular grounds of his objection, and the part or parts of the invention which he considers as not entitled to be patented. And the said board shall give reasonable notice to the applicant, as well as to the Commissioner, of the time and place of their meeting, that they may have an opportunity of furnishing them with such facts and evidence as they may deem necessary to a just decision; and it shall be the duty of the Commissioner to furnish to the board of examiners such information as he may possess relative to the matter under their consideration. And on an examination and consideration of the matter by such board, it shall be in their power, or a majority of them, to reverse the decision of the Commissioner, either in whole or in part, and, their opinion being certified to the Commissioner, he shall be governed thereby in the further proceedings to be had on such application: Provided, however, That before a board shall be instituted in any such case, the applicant shall pay to the credit of the Treasury, as provided in the ninth section of this act, the sum of twenty-five dollars, and each of said persons so appointed shall be entitled to receive for his services in each case a sum not exceeding ten dollars, to be determined and paid by the Commissioner out of any moneys in his hands, which shall be in full compensation to the persons who may be so appointed, for their examination and certificate as aforesaid.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That whenever an application shall be made for a patent which, in the opinion of the Commissioner, would interfere with any other patent for which an application may be pending, or with any unexpired patent which shall have been granted, it shall be the duty of the Commissioner to give notice thereof to such applicants, or patentees, as the case may be; and if either shall be dissatisfied with the decision of the Commissioner on the question of priority of right or invention, on a hearing thereof, he may appeal from such decision, on the like terms and conditions as are provided in the preceding section of this act; and the like proceedings shall be had to determine which or whether either of the applicants is entitled to receive a patent as prayed for. But nothing in this act contained shall be construed to deprive an original and true inventor of the right to a patent for his invention, by reason of his having previously taken out letters patent therefor in a foreign country, and the same having been published at any time within six months next preceding the filing of his specification and drawing. And, whenever the applicant shall request it, the patent shall take date from the time of the filing of the specification and drawings, not however exceeding six months prior to the actual issuing of the patent; and, on like request, and the payment of the duty herein required, by any applicant, his specification and drawings shall be filed in the secret archives of the office until he shall furnish the model, and the patent be issued, not exceeding the term of one year, the applicant being entitled to notice of interfering applications.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That before any application for a patent shall be considered by the Commissioner as aforesaid, the applicant shall pay into the Treasury of the United States, or into the Patent Office, or into any of the deposite banks to the credit of the Treasury, if he be a citizen of the United States, or an alien, and shall have been resident in the United States for one year next preceding, and shall have made oath of his intention to become a citizen thereof, the sum of thirty dollars; if a subject of the King of Great Britain, the sum of five hundred dollars; and all other persons the sum of three hundred dollars; for which payment duplicate receipts shall be taken, one of which is to be filed in the office of the Treasurer. And the moneys received into the Treasury under this act shall constitute a fund for the payment of the salaries of the officers and clerks herein provided for, and all other expenses of the Patent Office, and to be called the Patent fund.

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That where any person hath made, or shall have made, any new invention, discovery, or improvement, on account of which a patent might, by virtue of this act, be granted, and such person shall die before any patent shall be granted therefor, the right of applying for and obtaining such patent shall devolve on the executor or administrator of such person, in trust for the heirs at law of the deceased, in case he shall have died intestate; but if otherwise, then in trust for his devisees, in as full and ample manner, and under the same conditions, limitations, and restrictions, as the same was held, or might have been claimed or enjoyed by such person in his or her lifetime; and when application for a patent shall be made by such legal representatives, the oath or affirmation provided in the sixth section of this act shall be so varied as to be applicable to them.

Sec. 11. And be it further enacted, That every patent shall be assignable in law, either as to the whole interest, or any undivided part thereof, by any instrument in writing; which assignment, and also every grant and conveyance of the exclusive right under any patent to make and use, and to grant to others to make and use, the thing patented within and throughout any specified part or portion of the United States, shall be recorded in the Patent Office within three months from the execution thereof, for which the assignee or grantee shall pay to the Commissioner the sum of three dollars.

Sec. 12. And be it further enacted, That any citizen of the United States, or alien who shall have been a resident in the United States one year next preceding, and shall have made oath of his intention to become a citizen thereof, who shall have invented any new art, machine, or improvement thereof, and shall desire further time to mature the same, may, on paying to the credit of the Treasury, in manner as provided in the ninth section of this act, the sum of twenty dollars, file in the Patent Office a caveat, setting forth the design and purpose thereof, and its principal and distinguishing characteristics, and praying protection of his right, till he shall have matured his invention; which sum of twenty dollars, in case the person filing such caveat shall afterwards take out a patent for the invention therein mentioned, shall be considered a part of the sum herein required for the same. And such caveat shall be filed in the confidential archives of the office, and preserved in secrecy. And if application shall be made by any other person within one year from the time of filing such caveat, for a patent of any invention with which it may in any respect interfere, it shall be the duty of the Commissioner to deposite the description, specifications, drawings, and model, in the confidential archives of the office, and to give notice, by mail, to the person filing the caveat of such application, who shall, within three months, after receiving the notice, if he would avail himself of the benefit of his caveat, file his description, specifications, drawings, and model; and if, in the opinion of the Commissioner, the specifications of claim interfere with each other, like proceedings may be had in all respects as are in this act provided in the case of interfering applications: Provided, however, That no opinion or decision of any board of examiners, under the provisions of this act, shall preclude any person interested in favor of or against the validity of any patent which has been or may hereafter be granted, from the right to contest the same in any judicial court in any action in which its validity may come in question.

Sec. 13. And be it further enacted, That whenever any patent which has heretofore been granted, or which shall hereafter be granted, shall be inoperative or invalid, by reason of a defective or insufficient description or specification, or by reason of the patentee claiming in his specification as his own invention more than he had or shall have a right to claim as new, if the error has, or shall have arisen by inadvertency, accident, or mistake, and without any fraudulent or deceptive intention, it shall be lawful for the Commissioner, upon the surrender to him of such patent, and the payment of the further duty of fifteen dollars, to cause a new patent to be issued to the said inventor, for the same invention, for the residue of the period then unexpired for which the original patent was granted, in accordance with the patentee's corrected description and specification. And in case of his death, or any assignment by him made of the original patent, a similar right shall vest in his executors, administrators, or assignees. And the patent so re-issued, together with the corrected description and specification, shall have the same effect and operation in law, on the trial of all actions hereafter commenced for causes subsequently accruing, as though the same had been originally filed in such corrected form, before the issuing of the original patent. And whenever the original patentee shall be desirous of adding the description and specification of any new improvement of the original invention or discovery which shall have been invented or discovered by him subsequent to the date of his patent, he may, like proceedings being had in all respects as in the case of original applications, and on the payment of fifteen dollars, as hereinbefore provided, have the same annexed to the original description and specification; and the Commissioner shall certify, on the margin of such annexed description and specification, the time of its being annexed and recorded; and the same shall thereafter have the same effect in law, to all intents and purposes, as though it had been embraced in the original description and specification.

Sec. 14. And be it further enacted, That whenever, in any action for damages for making, using, or selling the thing whereof the exclusive right is secured by any patent heretofore granted, or by any patent which may hereafter be granted, a verdict shall be rendered for the plaintiff in such action, it shall be in the power of the court to render judgment for any sum above the amount found by such verdict as the actual damages sustained by the plaintiff, not exceeding three times the amount thereof, according to the circumstances of the case, with costs; and such damages may be recovered by action on the case, in any court of competent jurisdiction, to be brought in the name or names of the person or persons interested, whether as patentee, assignees, or as grantees of the exclusive right within and throughout a specified part of the United States.

Sec. 15. And be it further enacted, That the defendant in any such action shall be permitted to plead the general issue, and to give this act, and any special matter in evidence, of which notice in writing may have been given to the plaintiff or his attorney, thirty days before trial, tending to prove that the description and specification filed by plaintiff does not contain the whole truth relative to his invention or discovery, or that it contains more than is necessary to produce the described effect; which concealment or addition shall fully appear to have been made for the purpose of deceiving the Public, or that the patentee was not the original and first inventor or discoverer of the thing patented, or of a substantial and material part thereof claimed as new, or that it had been described in some public work anterior to the supposed discovery thereof by the patentee, or had been in public use, or on sale, with the consent and allowance of the patentee, before his application for a patent, or that he had surreptitiously or unjustly obtained the patent for that which was in fact invented or discovered by another, who was using reasonable diligence in adapting and perfecting the same; or that the patentee, if an alien at the time the patent was granted, had failed and neglected, for the space of eighteen months from the date of the patent, to put and continue on sale to the Public, on reasonable terms, the invention or discovery for which the patent issued; and whenever the defendant relies in his defence on the fact of a previous invention, knowledge, or use of the thing patented, he shall state, in his notice of special matter, the names and places of residence of those whom he intends to prove to have possessed a prior knowledge of the thing, and where the same had been used; in either of which cases judgment shall be rendered for the defendant, with costs: Provided, however, That, whenever it shall satisfactorily appear that the patentee, at the time of making his application for the patent, believed himself to be the first inventor or discoverer of the thing patented, the same shall not be held to be void on account of the invention or discovery, or any part thereof, having been before known or used in any foreign country, it not appearing that the same, or any substantial part thereof, had before been patented or described in any printed publication: And provided, also, That, whenever the plaintiff shall fail to sustain his action on the ground that in his specification of claim is embraced more than that of which he was the first inventor, if it shall appear that the defendant had used or violated any part of the invention justly and truly specified and claimed as new, it shall be in the power of the court to adjudge and award as to costs as may appear to be just and equitable.

Sec. 16. And be it further enacted, That, whenever there shall be two interfering patents, or whenever a patent, on application, shall have been refused on an adverse decision of a board of examiners, on the ground that the patent applied for would interfere with an unexpired patent previously granted, any person interested in any such patent, either by assignment or otherwise, in the one case, and any such applicant in the other case, may have remedy by bill in equity; and the court having cognizance thereof, on notice to adverse parties, and other due proceedings had, may adjudge and declare either the patents void, in the whole or in part, or inoperative and invalid in any particular part or portion of the United States, according to the interest which the parties to such suit may possess in the patent, or the inventions patented, and may also adjudge that such applicant is entitled, according to the principles and provisions of this act, to have and receive a patent for his invention, as specified in his claim, or for any part thereof, as the fact of priority, of right, or invention shall in any such case be made to appear. And such adjudication, if it be in favor of the right of such applicant, shall authorize the Commissioner to issue such patent, on his filing a copy of the adjudication, and otherwise complying with the requisitions of this act: Provided, however, That no such judgment or adjudication shall affect the rights of any person except the parties to the action, and those deriving title from or under them subsequent to the rendition of such judgment.

Sec. 17. And be it further enacted, That all actions, suits, controversies, and cases arising under any law of the United States, granting or confirming to inventors the exclusive right to their inventions or discoveries, shall be originally cognizable, as well in equity as at law, by circuit courts of the United States, or any district court having the powers and jurisdiction of a circuit court; which courts shall have power upon bill in equity filed by any party aggrieved, in any such case, to grant injunctions, according to the course and principles of courts of equity, to prevent the violation of the rights of any inventor as secured to him by any law of the United States, on such terms and conditions as said courts may deem reasonable: Provided, however, That from all judgments and decrees from any such court rendered in the premises, a writ of error or appeal, as the case may require, shall lie to the Supreme Court of the United States, in the same manner and under the same circumstances as is now provided by law in other judgments and decrees of circuit courts, and in all other cases in which the court shall deem it reasonable to allow the same.

Sec. 18. And be it further enacted, That whenever any patentee of an invention or discovery shall desire an extension of his patent beyond the term of its limitation, he may make application therefor, in writing, to the Commissioner of the Patent Office, setting forth the grounds thereof; and the Commissioner shall, on the applicant's paying the sum of forty dollars to the credit of the Treasury, as in the case of an original application for a patent, cause to be published, in one or more of the principal newspapers in the city of Washington, and in such other paper or papers as he may deem proper, published in the section of country most interested adversely to the extension of the patent, a notice of such application, and of the time and place when and where the same will be considered, that any person may appear and show cause why the extension should not be granted. And the Secretary of State, the Commissioner of the Patent Office, and the Solicitor of the Treasury, shall constitute a board to hear and decide upon the evidence produced before them both for and against the extension, and shall sit for that purpose at the time and place designated in the published notice thereof. The patentee shall furnish to said board a statement, in writing, under oath, of the ascertained value of the invention, and of his receipts and expenditures, sufficiently in detail to exhibit a true and faithful account of the loss and profit in any manner accruing to him from and by reason of said invention. And if, upon a hearing of the matter, it shall appear to the full and entire satisfaction of said board, having due regard to the public interest therein, that it is just and proper that the term of the patent should be extended, by reason of the patentee, without neglect or fault on his part, having failed to obtain, from the use and sale of his invention, a reasonable remuneration for the time, ingenuity, and expense bestowed upon the same, and the introduction thereof into use, it shall be the duty of the Commissioner to renew and extend the patent, by making a certificate thereon of such extension, for the term of seven years from and after the expiration of the first term; which certificate, with a certificate of said board of their judgment and opinion as aforesaid, shall be entered on record in the Patent Office; and thereupon the said patent shall have the same effect in law as though it had been originally granted for the term of twenty-one years. And the benefit of such renewal shall extend to assignees and grantees of the right to use the thing patented, to the extent of their respective interest therein: Provided, however, That no extension of a patent shall be granted after the expiration of the term for which it was originally issued.

Sec. 19. And be it further enacted, That there shall be provided for the use of said office, a library of scientific works and periodical publications, both foreign and American, calculated to facilitate the discharge of the duties hereby required of the chief officers therein, to be purchased under the direction of the Committee of the Library of Congress. And the sum of fifteen hundred dollars is hereby appropriated, for that purpose, to be paid out of the Patent fund.

Sec. 20. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the Commissioner to cause to be classified and arranged, in such rooms or galleries as may be provided for that purpose, in suitable cases, when necessary for their preservation, and in such manner as shall be conducive to a beneficial and favorable display thereof, the models and specimens of compositions and of fabrics and other manufactures and works of art, patented or unpatented, which have been, or shall hereafter be, deposited in said office. And said rooms or galleries shall be kept open during suitable hours for public inspection.

Sec. 21. And be it further enacted, That all acts and parts of acts heretofore passed on this subject be, and the same are hereby, repealed: Provided, however, That all actions and processes in law or equity, sued out prior to the passage of this act, may be prosecuted to final judgment and execution, in the same manner as though this act had not been passed, excepting and saving the application to any such action of the provisions of the fourteenth and fifteenth sections of this act, so far as they may be applicable thereto: And provided, also, That all applications or petitions for patents, pending at the time of the passage of this act, in cases where the duty has been paid, shall be proceeded with and acted on in the same manner as though filed after the passage thereof.

Approved, July 4, 1836.

[No. 67.]—AN ACT to regulate the compensation of certain officers of Revenue Cutters.

Be it enacted, &c. That in lieu of pay, rations, and all other allowances now authorized by law to the captains, and first, second, and third lieutenants of the revenue cutters of the United States, there shall be allowed and paid, quarterly, from and after the passage of this act, to each captain, at the rate of twelve hundred dollars per annum; to each first lieutenant, at the rate of nine hundred and sixty dollars per annum; to each second lieutenant, at the rate of eight hundred and sixty dollars per annum; to each third lieutenant, at the rate of seven hundred and ninety dollars per annum.

Approved, July 2, 1836.

[No. 68.]—AN ACT to re-organize the General Land Office.

Be it enacted, &c. That from and after the passage of this act, the executive duties now prescribed, or which may hereafter be prescribed by law, appertaining to the surveying and sale of the public lands of the United States, or in any wise respecting such public lands, and also such as relate to private claims of land, and the issuing of patents for all grants of land under the authority of the Government of the United States, shall be subject to the supervision and control of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, under the direction of the President of the United States.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That there shall be appointed in said office, by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, two subordinate officers, one of whom shall be called Principal Clerk of the Public Lands, and the other Principal Clerk on Private Land Claims, who shall perform such duties as may be assigned to them by the Commissioner of the General Land Office; and in case of vacancy in the office of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, or of the absence or sickness of the Commissioner, the duties of said office shall devolve upon and be performed, ad interim, by the Principal Clerk of the Public Lands.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That there shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, an officer to be styled the Principal Clerk of the Surveys, whose duty it shall be to direct and superintend the making of surveys, the returns thereof, and all matters relating thereto, which are done through the offices of the Surveyor General; and he shall perform such other duties as may be assigned to him by the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That there shall be appointed by the President, by and with the consent of the Senate, a Recorder of the General Land Office, whose duty it shall be, in pursuance of instructions from the Commissioner, to certify and affix the seal of the General Land Office to all patents for public lands, and he shall attend to the correct engrossing and recording and transmission of such patents. He shall prepare alphabetical indexes of the names of patentees, and of persons entitled to patents; and he shall prepare such copies and exemplifications of matters on file or recorded in the General Land Office, as the Commissioner may from time to time direct.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That there shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, an officer to be called the Solicitor of the General Land Office, with an annual salary of two thousand dollars, whose duty it shall be to examine and present a report to the Commissioner of the state of facts in all cases referred by the Commissioner to his attention which shall involve questions of law, or where the facts are in controversy between the agents of the Government and individuals, or there are conflicting claims of parties before the Department, with his opinion thereon; and also to advise the Commissioner, when required thereto, on all questions growing out of the management of the public lands, or the title thereto, private land claims, Virginia military scrip, bounty lands, and pre-emption claims; and to render such further professional services in the business of the department as may be required, and shall be connected with the discharge of the duties thereof.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint a Secretary, with a salary of fifteen hundred dollars per annum, whose duty it shall be, under the direction of the President, to sign in his name, and for him, all patents for land sold or granted under the authority of the United States.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the Commissioner to cause to be prepared, and to certify, under the seal of the General Land Office, such copies of records, books, and papers, on file in his office, as may be applied for, to be used in evidence in courts of justice.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That whenever the office of Recorder shall become vacant, or in case of the sickness or absence of the Recorder, the duties of his office shall be performed, ad interim, by the Principal Clerk on Private Land Claims.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That the Receivers of the land offices shall make to the Secretary of the Treasury monthly returns of the moneys received in their several offices, and pay over such moneys pursuant to his instructions. And they shall also make to the Commissioner of the General Land Office like monthly returns, and transmit to him quarterly accounts current of the debits and credits of their several offices with the United States.

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner of the General Land Office shall be entitled to receive an annual salary of three thousand dollars; the Recorder of the General Land Office, an annual salary of fifteen hundred dollars; the principal clerk of the surveys, an annual salary of eighteen hundred dollars; and each of the said principal clerks, an annual salary of eighteen hundred dollars, from and after the date of their respective commissions; and that the said Commissioner be authorized to employ, for the service of the General Land Office, one clerk, whose annual salary shall not exceed fifteen hundred dollars; four clerks, whose annual salary shall not exceed fourteen hundred dollars each; sixteen clerks, whose annual salary shall not exceed thirteen hundred dollars each; twenty clerks, whose annual salary shall not exceed twelve hundred dollars each; five clerks, whose annual salary shall not exceed eleven hundred dollars each; thirty-five clerks, whose annual salary shall not exceed one thousand dollars each; one principal draughtsman, whose annual salary shall not exceed fifteen hundred dollars; one assistant draughtsman, whose annual salary shall not exceed twelve hundred dollars; two messengers, whose annual salary shall not exceed seven hundred dollars each; three assistant messengers, whose annual salary shall not exceed three hundred and fifty dollars each; and two packers, to make up packages of patents, blank forms, and other things necessary to be transmitted to the district land offices, at a salary of four hundred and fifty dollars each.

Sec. 11. And be it further enacted, That such provisions of the act of the twenty-fifth of April, in the year one thousand eight hundred and twelve, entitled "An act for the establishment of a General Land Office in the Department of the Treasury," and of all acts amendatory thereof, as are inconsistent with the provisions of this act, be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Sec. 12. And be it further enacted, That from the first day of the month of October, until the first day of the month of April, in each and every year, the General Land Office and all the bureaus and offices therein, as well as those in the Departments of the Treasury, War, Navy, State, and General Post Office, shall be open for the transaction of the public business at least eight hours in each and every day, except Sundays, and the twenty-fifth day of December; and from the first day of April until the first day of October, in each year, all the aforesaid offices and bureaus shall be kept open for the transaction of the public business at least ten hours, in each and every day, except Sundays and the fourth day of July.

Sec. 13. And be it further enacted, That if any person shall apply to any register of any land office to enter any land whatever, and the said register shall knowingly and falsely inform the person so applying that the same has already been entered, and refuse to permit the person so applying to enter the same, such register shall be liable therefor to the person so applying for five dollars for each acre of land which the person so applying offered to enter to be recovered by action of debt in any court of record having jurisdiction of the amount.

Sec. 14. And be it further enacted, That all and every of the officers whose salaries are hereinbefore provided for, are hereby prohibited from directly or indirectly purchasing, or in any way becoming interested in the purchase of the public land; and in case of a violation of this section by such officer, and on proof thereof being made to the President of the United States, such officer, so offending, shall be forthwith removed from office.

Approved, July 4, 1836.

[No. 69.]—AN ACT in addition to the act entitled "An act making appropriations in part for the support of Government for the year eighteen hundred and thirty-six, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, &c. That the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated: For compensation granted by law to the members of the Senate and House of Representatives, in addition to the appropriation heretofore made for that object, seventy-two thousand two hundred and sixteen dollars; for compensation of the Senators and Representatives elected by Michigan, seven thousand seven hundred and seventy-six dollars; for the contingent expenses of Senate, twelve thousand dollars; for allowance for wastage in gold and silver coinage at the Mint, for labor and for alloy, in addition to the former appropriation, thirty-three thousand dollars; for extra clerk hire in the General Land Office for the year eighteen hundred and thirty-six, fourteen thousand six hundred and sixty-six dollars and sixty-four cents; for messengers in the offices of the Chief Engineer, Adjutant General, the Commanding General, Surgeon General, and Inspector General, and in the Clothing Bureau, Topographical, Ordnance, and Subsistence Departments, two thousand five hundred and sixty-eight dollars; for the assistant messenger in the First Comptroller's office, in addition to a former appropriation, fifty dollars; for compensation to the Surveyor in Alabama, in addition to a former appropriation, five hundred dollars; for compensation to the clerks in the office of the Secretary of the Navy, and in the Navy Commissioners' Office, in addition to the sums already appropriated for the present year, nineteen hundred dollars.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That so much of the act of the ninth May, eighteen hundred and thirty-six, "providing for the salaries of certain officers therein named, and for other purposes," as provides for the employment of an additional clerk in the office of the Navy Commissioners, and for his compensation for the year eighteen hundred and thirty-six, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the third section of the act making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year one thousand eight hundred and thirty-five is hereby repealed; and that the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay to the collectors, deputy collectors, naval officers, surveyors, and their respective clerks, together with the weighers, gaugers, measurers, and markers of the several ports of the United States, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such sums as will give to the said officers, respectively, the same compensation in the year one thousand eight hundred and thirty-six, according to the importations of that year, as they would have been entitled to receive if the act of the fourteenth of July, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-two had not gone into effect: Provided, That no officer shall receive, under this act, a greater annual salary or compensation than was paid to such officer for the year one thousand eight hundred and thirty-two; and that in no case shall the compensation of any other officers than collectors, naval officers, surveyors, and clerks, whether by salaries, fees, or otherwise, exceed the sum of fifteen hundred dollars each per annum; nor shall the union of any two or more of those offices in one person entitle him to receive more than that sum per annum: Provided, further, That the said collectors, naval officers, and surveyors, shall render an account quarterly to the Treasury, and the other officers herein named, or referred to, shall render an account quarterly to the respective collectors of the customs, where they are employed, to be forwarded to the Treasury, of all the fees and emoluments whatever by them respectively received, and of all expenses incidental to their respective offices; which accounts shall be rendered on oath or affirmation, and shall be in such form, and be supported by such proofs, to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, as will, in his judgment, best enforce the provisions of this section, and show its operation and effect: Provided, also, That any salary or compensation due for the year one thousand eight hundred and thirty-five, shall not be affected by this section: Provided, however, That in the event of any act being passed by Congress at the present session to regulate and fix the salaries or compensations of the respective officers of the customs, then this section shall operate and extend to the time such act goes into effect, and no longer.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the following sums are hereby appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for interpreters, guards, and other expenses incidental to the Consulates in the Turkish Dominions, five thousand five hundred dollars. For refunding the duty paid upon the Belgian vessel Antonius and her cargo, beyond the amount which would have been paid by a Dutch vessel, fourteen hundred and twenty-six dollars and seven cents. For compensation to the clerks in the office of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, in addition to a former appropriation, fifty dollars. For an outfit of a Charge d'Affaires to Russia, four thousand five hundred dollars. For compensation to the third Assistant Postmaster General, one thousand two hundred and fifty dollars. For compensation to the clerks, messengers, and watchmen in the Post Office Department, as provided by the act to change the organization of the said Department, in addition to the sum heretofore appropriated for compensation to the clerks and messengers in the office of the Postmaster General, four thousand and fifty dollars. For compensation to the Auditor for the Post Office Department, one thousand five hundred dollars. For compensation to the clerks and messengers in the office of the Auditor for the Post Office Department, as provided by the act to change the organization of said Department, twenty-seven thousand seven hundred and fifty dollars. For contingencies in the office of the Auditor for the Post Office Department, fifteen hundred dollars. For alteration and repairs of the Capitol, including repairs of the roof over the principal stairway to the Representatives Hall, and copping the projecting steps and top surface of the cornice round the base of the dome of the Rotunda six thousand three hundred and eighteen dollars and seventy-five cents. For lighting lamps, and keeping the grounds and walks of the Capitol square in order, including the cost of trees and shrubs, four thousand five hundred dollars. For the gardener employed in superintending the Capitol square and other public grounds, one thousand dollars. For alterations and repairs of the President's House, for the gardener's salary, and for keeping the grounds and walks in order, including the cost of trees and shrubs, three thousand four hundred and sixty dollars. For the annual expenses of two fire engines, two hundred dollars. For gravelling the yard east of the Capitol, two thousand dollars. For repairing culverts, two hundred and thirty-one dollars. For purchase of Smith's spring, including one acre of land, and for enclosing the same, for building culverts, and keeping the water pipes in order, five thousand three hundred dollars. For attendants on the furnaces of the Rotundo during the recess, one hundred and fifty dollars. For replanting trees and keeping boxes in order on the Pennsylvania Avenue, purchase of trees and planting in Fountain square, Lafayette square, and across the public reservation at Seventh street, one thousand two hundred dollars. For a workshop, one thousand two hundred dollars. For conveying the surplus water of the Capitol to the Botanic garden, making a basin, and purchasing a fountain of Hiram Powers, five thousand dollars.

For enclosing the garden and grounds of the magazine and marine hospital near the Eastern Branch, five hundred dollars. For a dwarf wall and fence between the executive buildings and the President's house, one thousand one hundred and sixty-five dollars and fifty cents. For extending the Capitol square and improving the grounds within and adjacent to the same as far west as the first street intersecting Pennsylvania Avenue from the east, the sum of twenty-five thousand dollars, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated. For enlarging the folding room of the House, three hundred and fifty dollars.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, authorized to cause to be erected, on or near the site of the former Treasury building, or any other public lot which he may select, a fire-proof building of such dimensions as may be required for the present and future accommodations of the Treasury Department, upon such plan and of such materials as he may deem most advantageous; and that for this purpose there be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of one hundred thousand dollars.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the material of which the walls of the Capitol and President's mansion are constructed shall be adopted for the construction of the aforesaid building: Provided, upon full inquiry, a cheaper and more suitable material cannot be obtained: And provided, always, That the foundation walls of the said building, below the surface of the earth and two feet above, shall be of the hardest and most solid rock.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That there be erected on some appropriate site, under the direction of the President of the United States, a fire-proof building, with suitable accommodations for the Patent Office, and to be provided with the necessary cases and furniture; the expense of which shall not exceed one hundred and eight thousand dollars.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That there be and hereby is appropriated, for defraying the expense of such building and cases, the sum of one hundred and eight thousand dollars, to be paid out of the Patent fund in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That the same kind of material of which the walls of the Capitol and the mansion of the President are constructed shall be adopted for the construction of the aforesaid building: Provided, A cheaper and more suitable material cannot be procured.

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That the duties and powers of the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund are hereby suspended until revived by law, and the records of the commissioners be transferred to the custody of the Secretary of the Treasury, who is hereby authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, any outstanding debts of the United States, and the interest thereon.

Sec. 11. And be it further enacted, That, for the purchase of eight acres of land, by the improvements thereon, near the barracks at Key West, if in the opinion of the Secretary of War the public service and health of the troops require it, a sum not exceeding six thousand dollars is hereby appropriated.

Sec. 12. And be it further enacted, That so much of the third section of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of Government for the year eighteen hundred and thirty-five," as provides that "the whole number of custom-house officers in the United States on the first day of January, eighteen hundred and thirty-four, shall not be increased until otherwise allowed by Congress," be, and the same is hereby, suspended until the fourth day of March next.

Approved, July 4, 1836.

[No. 70.]—AN ACT supplementary to an act entitled "An act to regulate the deposits of the public money," passed twenty-third June, eighteen hundred and thirty-six.

Be it enacted, &c. That nothing in the act to which this is a supplement, shall be so construed as to prevent the Secretary of the Treasury from making transfers from banks in one State or Territory to banks in another State or Territory, whenever such transfers may be required, in order to prevent large and inconvenient accumulations in particular places, or in order to produce a due equality and just appropriation, according to the provisions of said act.

Approved, July 4, 1836.

[No. 71].—AN ACT to carry into effect in the States of Alabama and Mississippi the existing compacts with those States in regard to the five per cent. fund and the school reservations.

Be it enacted, &c. That a sum equivalent to five per cent. of the nett proceeds of the lands within the State of Mississippi, ceded by the Chickasaws by the treaty of the twentieth of October, eighteen hundred and thirty-two, which have been, or may hereafter be, sold by Congress, shall be, and is hereby, reserved, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be applied in the same manner, and for the same uses and purposes, as is designated by the fifth section of the act of Congress of the first of March, eighteen hundred and seventeen.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That there shall be reserved from sale, in the State of Mississippi, a quantity of land, equal to one thirty-sixth part of the lands ceded by said Chickasaws as aforesaid, within said State of Mississippi, which land shall be selected, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, in sections, or half-sections, or quarter-sections, out of any public lands remaining unsold, that shall have been offered at public sale within either of the land districts in said State of Mississippi, contiguous to said lands within said State, so ceded by the Chickasaws as aforesaid; which lands, when so selected as aforesaid, the same shall vest in the State of Mississippi, for the use of schools within said territory in said State, so ceded as aforesaid by the Chickasaws; and said lands, thus selected, shall be holden by the same tenure, and upon the same terms and conditions, in all respects, as the said State now holds the lands heretofore reserved for the use of schools in said State.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That a sum equivalent to five per cent. of the nett proceeds of the lands within the State of Alabama, ceded by the Chickasaws by the treaty aforesaid, which have been, or may hereafter be, sold by Congress, shall be, and is hereby, reserved, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be applied in the same manner, and for the same uses and purposes, as is designated by the sixth section of the act of Congress of the second of March, eighteen hundred and nineteen.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That there shall be reserved from sale in the State of Alabama, a quantity of land equal to one thirty-sixth part of the lands ceded by the Chickasaws as aforesaid, within said State of Alabama, which land shall be selected under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, in sections, or half-sections, or quarter-sections, out of any public lands remaining unsold that shall have been offered at public sale within any land district in said State of Alabama, contiguous to said lands within said State, so ceded by the Chickasaws as aforesaid; which lands, when so selected, as aforesaid, the same shall vest in the State of Alabama, for the use of schools within said territory in said State, so ceded, as aforesaid, by the Chickasaws; and said lands, thus selected, shall be holden by the same tenure, and upon the same terms and conditions, in all respects, as the said State now holds the lands heretofore reserved for the use of schools in said State.

Approved, July 4, 1836.

[No. 72].—AN ACT to authorize the appointment of additional Paymasters; and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, &c. That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, authorized and empowered to appoint three additional paymasters, to be attached to the Pay Department of the Army: Provided, That the appointments be submitted to the Senate for their confirmation, in the same manner as other officers of the Army.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the officers appointed in virtue of this act shall perform the same duties, and receive the same pay and allowances as the present paymasters of the Army; and shall, in like manner, be subject to the rules and articles of war; and, previous to entering upon the duties of their office, shall give such bonds to the United States as the Secretary of War may direct for the faithful performance of their duties.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That when volunteers or militia are called into the service of the United States, so that the paymasters authorized by law shall not be deemed sufficient to enable them to pay the troops with proper punctuality, it shall be lawful for the President to assign to any officer of the Army the duty of paymaster, who, while so assigned, shall perform the same duty, give the same bond, be subject to the same liability, and receive the same emoluments as are now provided for pay-masters of the Army: Provided, however, That the number of officers so assigned shall not exceed one for every two regiments of militia or volunteers: And provided, also, That the whole emoluments of the said officers, including their pay and allowances in the line, shall not exceed the pay and emoluments of a paymaster.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, authorized and empowered to appoint three additional surgeons and five assistant surgeons, to be attached to the medical staff of the Army.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That, during the absence of the Quartermaster General, or the chief of any other military bureau of the War Department, the President be authorized to empower some officer of the Department or corps whose chief is absent, to take charge thereof, and to perform the duties of Quartermaster General or chief of the department or corps, as the case may be, during such absence: Provided, That no additional compensation be allowed therefor.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House of Representatives, as soon as may be after the close of the present session, and of each succeeding session, to prepare and publish a statement of all appropriations made during the session, and also a statement of the new officers created, and the salaries of each, and also a statement of the offices, the salaries of which are increased, and the amount of such increase.

Approved, July 4, 1836.

[No. 73].—AN ACT confirming claims to land in the State of Louisiana.

Be it enacted, &c. That the decisions in favor of land claimants made by the register and receiver of the land office in New Orleans, under date the first of December, eighteen hundred and thirty-five, by virtue of an act entitled "An act for the final adjustment of claims to land in the State of Louisiana," which have been laid before Congress at the present session by the Secretary of the Treasury, be, and the same are hereby, confirmed, with the exception of the claims of Narcisse Carmouche, Julie Alexandre, and Martin Major, Nicholas Bara, and Francis Menard, saving and reserving, however, to all adverse claimants the right to assert the validity of their claims in a court of justice.

Approved, July 4, 1836.

[No. 74].—AN ACT to suspend the discriminating duties upon goods imported in vessels of Portugal, and to reduce the duties on wines.

Be it enacted, &c. That so much of the several acts of Congress as imposes a discriminating duty upon goods, wares, and merchandise imported in foreign vessels be, and hereby is, suspended, so far as respects the produce or manufactures of Portugal proper, including Madeira, Porto Santo, and the Azores, when imported in vessels wholly and truly belonging to the subjects or citizens of said places; so that such produce or manufactures shall be subject to the same duties only as if imported in vessels of the United States: Provided, however, And this suspension shall continue no longer than this section remains in force.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That from and after the thirtieth day of July, eighteen hundred and thirty-six, the duty on all kinds of wine imported into the United States shall be reduced one-half, so that no more than one-half the amount now assessed shall be thereafter assessed.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That all kinds of wine, whether imported before or after the passage of this act, may be put into the custom-house stores, under the bond of the importer or owner; and such of the said wines as shall remain under the control of the proper officer of the customs, on the thirtieth day of July, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-six, shall be subject to no other duty than if the same were imported after that day; and if the duties, or any part thereof, on the wines deposited as aforesaid shall have been paid previous to the said thirtieth day of July, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-six, the amount of excess of duty shall be refunded to the person importing and depositing the same: Provided, That no wines shall be so deposited unless in the casks or bottles as imported: And provided, further, That the benefit of this act shall not be extended to any wines not entitled to debenture.

Approved, July 4, 1836.

[No. 75].—AN ACT for the purchase of certain rights or inventions of William H. Bell, of North Carolina.

Be it enacted, &c. That the Secretary of the Treasury be hereby authorized to pay to Captain William H. Bell, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of twenty thousand dollars, whenever said Bell shall transfer and convey to the United States all his, said Bell's, right, interest, and title, in and to two certain patents, viz. one called a machine for elevating heavy cannon, the other called a traverse board for pointing cannon; together with all the right to the United States to use every improvement that has been made by said Bell on the said inventions since patenting the same: Provided, however, The said sum of twenty thousand dollars shall be in full for all claims against the United States for using said patents.

Approved, July 4, 1836.

[No. 76.]—AN ACT confirming claims to land in the State of Missouri, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, &c. That the decisions in favor of land claimants, made by the Recorder of land titles in the State of Missouri, and the two commissioners associated with him by virtue of an act entitled "An act for the final adjustment of private land claims in Missouri," approved July ninth, eighteen hundred and thirty-two, and an act supplemental thereto, approved March second, eighteen hundred and thirty-three, as entered in the transcript of decisions transmitted by the said recorder and commissioners to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and by him laid before Congress at the two last and present sessions, be, and the same are hereby, confirmed, saving and reserving, however, to all adverse claimants, the right to assert the validity of their claims in a court or courts of justice: Provided, That nothing in this act contained shall apply to, or be in confirmation of, the claim of Don Carlos D. Villemont, for a tract of land at Point Chicot: And provided, also, That nothing in this act contained shall apply to, or be in confirmation of, the following claims, to wit: Manuel Lisa, six thousand arpens; J. Coontz, and Hempstead, four hundred and fifty arpens; Matthew Saucier, one thousand two hundred arpens; Charles Tayon, one thousand six hundred arpens; sons of Joseph M. Pepen, five thousand six hundred arpens; Louis Lorimiere, thirty thousand arpens; Bartholomew Cousin, ten thousand arpens; Manuel Gonzales Moro, eight hundred arpens; Seneca Rollins, four hundred arpens; William Long, four hundred arpens; James Journey, four hundred arpens; Joachim Lisa, six thousand arpens; Francois Lacombe, four hundred arpens; Israel Dodge, seven thousand and fifty-six arpens; Andrew Chevallier, four hundred arpens; Joseph Silvain, two hundred and fifty arpens; John P. Cabanis, two thousand arpens; William Hartly, six hundred and fifty arpens; William Morrison, seven hundred and fifty arpens; Solomon Bellew, three hundred and fifty arpens; Paschal Detchemenez, seven thousand fifty-six arpens; Baptiste Annuzze, two hundred and forty arpens; Alexander Maurice, four hundred arpens; Jean Baptiste Valle, twenty thousand arpens; Israel Dodge, one thousand arpens; Walter Fenwick, ten thousand arpens; John T. Smith, ten thousand arpens; and Mackey Wherry, sixteen hundred arpens.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That if it shall be found that any tract or tracts confirmed as aforesaid, or any part thereof, had been previously located by any other person or persons under any law of the United States, or had been surveyed and sold by the United States, this act shall confer no title to such lands in opposition to the rights acquired by such location or purchase; but the individual or individuals whose claims are hereby confirmed shall be permitted to locate so much thereof as interferes with such location or purchase, on any unappropriated land of the United States within the State of Missouri or Territory of Arkansas, in whichever the original claim may be, that may be subject to entry at private sale: Provided, That such location shall conform to legal divisions and subdivisions, and shall not interfere with the rights of other persons.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the locations authorized by this act shall be entered with the register of the proper land office, who shall, on application for that purpose, make out for such claimant a certificate of location, which, with the certificate of confirmation, shall be transmitted to the Commissioner of the General Land Office; and if it shall appear to the satisfaction of the said Commissioner that such certificate shall have been fairly obtained, according to the true intent and meaning of this act and the laws of the United States, then, and in that case, patents shall be granted in like manner as is provided by law for the other lands of the United States. And for each certificate of location to be issued as aforesaid, the register shall be entitled to receive from the person applying therefor the sum of one dollar.

Approved, July 4, 1836.

[No. 77.]—AN ACT to repeal so much of the act of March second, seventeen hundred and ninety-nine, as respects the issuing of certificates on the importation of wines.

Be it enacted, &c. That so much of the act of Congress passed second March, seventeen hundred and ninety-nine, as requires that the surveyor or chief officers of inspection of any port where wines may be landed, shall give to the proprietor, importer, or consignee thereof, or his or her agent, a certificate, as mentioned in the fortieth and forty-first sections of said act, is hereby repealed.

Approved, July 4, 1836.

[No. 78.]—AN ACT granting half pay to widows and orphans where their husbands or fathers have died of wounds received in the military service of the United States in certain cases, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, &c. That when any officer, non-commissioned officer, musician, or private of the militia, including rangers, sea fencibles, and volunteers, shall have died while in the service of the United States, since the twentieth of April, eighteen hundred and eighteen, or who shall have died in consequence of a wound received whilst in the service, since the day aforesaid, and shall have left a widow, or, if no widow, a child or children under sixteen years of age, such widow, or, if no widow, such child or children shall be entitled to receive half the monthly pay to which the deceased was entitled at the time of his death or receiving such wound, for and during the term of five years; and in case of the death or marriage of such widow before the expiration of said five years, the half pay for the remainder of the time shall go to the said decedent: Provided, That the half pay aforesaid shall be half the monthly pay of the officers, non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates of the infantry of the regular army, and no more: Provided, also, That no greater sum shall be allowed to the widow, or the child or children of any officer than the half pay of a Lieutenant colonel.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That if any officer, non-commissioned officer, musician, soldier, Indian spy, mariner or marine, whose service during the revolutionary war was such as is specified in the act passed the seventh day of June, eighteen hundred and thirty-two, entitled "An act supplementary to the act for the relief of certain surviving officers and soldiers of the Revolution," have died since the fourth day of March, eighteen hundred and thirty-one, and before the date of said act, the amount of pension which would have accrued from the fourth day of March, eighteen hundred and thirty-one, to the time of his death, and become payable to him by virtue of that act, if he had survived the passage thereof, shall be paid to his widow; and if he left no widow, to his children, in the manner prescribed in the act hereby amended.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That if any person who served in the war of the Revolution, in the manner specified in the act passed the seventh day of June, eighteen hundred and thirty-two, entitled "An act supplementary to the act for the relief of certain surviving officers and soldiers of the Revolution," have died leaving a widow whose marriage took place before the expiration of the last period of his service, such widow shall be entitled to receive, during the time she may remain unmarried, the annuity or pension which might have been allowed to her husband, by virtue of the act aforesaid, if living at the time it was passed.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That any pledge, mortgage, sale, assignment, or transfer of any right, claim, or interest in any money or half pay granted by this act, shall be utterly void and of no effect; each person acting for and in behalf of any one, entitled to money under this act, shall take and subscribe an oath, to be administered by the proper accounting officer, and retained by him and put on file, before a warrant shall be delivered to him, that he has no interest in said money by any pledge, mortgage, sale, assignment, or transfer, and that he does not know or believe that the same has been so disposed of to any person whatever.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of War shall adopt such forms of evidence, in applications under this act, as the President of the United States shall prescribe.

Approved, July 4, 1836.
